When he was forty years of age, he went on a visit to a friend, not far from a section of the country that was soon to become the scene of a campaign. While there he was busy in acquainting himself with the country, thinking it not unlikely that this knowledge might be of use to him, and while here the brave grenadier was astonished to learn that the war had been suddenly shifted to that quarter, and that a regiment of Austrians was pushing on to occupy a narrow pass about ten miles from where he was staying, and the possession of which would give the man opportunity to prevent an important movement of the French which was then on foot. They hoped to surprise this post, and were moving so rapidly upon it that they were not more than two hours distant from the place where he was staying, and which they would have to pass in their march. It matters not how he heard the news. It is sufficient to say that he determined at once to act upon it.

He had no idea of being captured by the enemy in their advance, and he at once set off for the pass. He knew that the pass was defended by a stout tower and a garrison of thirty men, and he hoped to be able to warn the men of their danger.

He hastened on, and arriving there found the tower in perfect condition. It had just been vacated by the garrison, who had heard of the approach of the Austrians, had been seived with a panic thereat, and had fled, leaving their arms, consisting of thirty excellent muskets.

La Tour d'Auvergne gnashed his teeth with rage as he discovered this. Searching in the building, he found several boxes of ammunition which the cowards had not destoyed. For a moment he was in despair, but then, with a grim smile, he began to fasten the main door, and pile against it such articles as he could find.

When he had done this he loaded all the guns he could find, and placed them, together with a good supply of ammunition, under the loop-holes that commanded the road by which the enemy must advance.

Then he ate heartily of the provisions he had brought with him, and sat down to wait. He had absolutely formed the heroic resolution to defend the tower alone against the enemy.

There were some things in his favor in such an undertaking. The pass was steep and narrow, and the enemy's troops could enter it only in double files, and in doing this would be fully exposed to the fire from the tower. The original garrison of thirty men could easily have held it against a division, and now one man was about to hold it against a regiment.

It was dark when La Tour d'Auvergne reached the tower, and he had to wait some time for the enemy. They were longer in coming than he expected, and for a while he was tempted to believe they had abandoned the expedition.

About midnight, however, his practised ear caught the tramp of feet. Every moment the sound came nearer, and at last he heard them entering the defile. Immediately he discharged a couple of muskets into the darkness to let them know he knew of their presence and intentions, and he heard the quick, short commands of the officers, and, from the sounds, he supposed that the troops were retiring from the pass. Until the morning he was undisturbed. The Austrian commander, feeling assured that the garrison had been informed of his movements, and was prepared to receive him, saw that he could not surprise the post as he had hoped to do, and deemed it prudent to wait till daylight before making his attack.

At sunrise he summoned the garrison to surrender. A grenadier answered the summons.

"Say to your commander," he said, in reply to the messenger, "that this garrison will defend this pass to the last extremity."

The officer who had borne the flag of truce retired, and in about ten minutes a piece of artillery was brought into the pass and opened on the tower. But to effect this, the piece had to be placed directly in front of the tower, and within easy musket range of it. They had scarcely got the gun in position, when a rapid fire was opened on it from the tower, and continued with such marked effect that the piece was withdrawn after the second discharge, with a loss of five men.

This was a bad beginning; so, half an hour after the gun was withdrawn, the Austrian colonel ordered an assault.

As the troops entered the defile they were received with a rapid and accurate fire, so that when they had passed over half the distance they had to traverse, they had lost fifteen men. Disheartened by this, they returned to the mouth of the defile.

Three more assaults were repulsed in this manner, and the enemy by sunset had lost forty-five men, of whom ten were killed.

The firing from the tower had been rapid and accurate, but the Austrian commander had noticed this peculiarity about it—every shot seemed to come from the same place. For a while this perplexed him, but at last he came to the conclusion that there was a number of loop-holes close together in the tower, so constructed as to command the ravine perfectly.

At sunset the last assault was made and repulsed, and at dark the Austrian commander sent a second summons to the garrison.

This time the answer was favorable. The garrison offered to surrender at sunrise the next morning if allowed to march out with their arms and return to the army unmolested. After some hesitation the terms were accepted.

Meantime La Tour d'Auvergne had passed an anxious day in the tower. He had opened the fight with an armament of thirty loaded muskets, but had not been able to discharge them all. He had fired with surprising rapidity, but with surprising accuracy, for it was well known in the army that he had never thrown away a shot. He had determined to stand to his post until he had accomplished his end, which was to hold the place twenty-four hours, in order to allow the French army time to complete its manœuvre. After that he knew the pass would be of no consequence to the enemy.

When the demand for a surrender came to him after the last assault, he consented to it upon the conditions named.

The next day at sunrise the Austrian troops lined the pass in two files, extending from the mouth to the tower, leaving a space between them for the garrison to pass out.

The heavy door of the tower opened slowly, and in a few minutes a bronzed and scarred grenadier, literally loaded down with muskets, came out and passed down the line of troops. He walked with difficulty under his heavy load.

To the surprise of the Austrians, no one followed him from the tower.

In astonishment the Austrian colonel rode up to him and asked in French why the garrison did not come out.

"I am the garrison, Colonel," said the soldier, proudly.

"What!" exclaimed the Colonel, "do you mean to tell me that you alone have held that tower against me?"

"I have had the honor, Colonel," was the reply.

"What possessed you to make such an attempt, grenadier?"

"The honor of France was at stake."

The colonel gazed at him for a moment with undisguised admiration. Then, raising his cap, he said warmly,

"Grenadier, I salute you. You have proved yourself the bravest of the brave."

The officer caused all the arms which La Tour d'Auvergne could not carry to be collected, and sent them all, with the grenadier, into the French lines, together with a note relating the whole affair.

When the knowledge of it came to the ears of Napoleon, he offered to promote La Tour d'Auvergne, but the latter declined to accept the promotion, saying he preferred to remain where he was.

The brave soldier met his death in an action at Aberhausen, in June, 1800, and the simple and expressive scene at roll call in his regiment was commenced and continued by the express command of the Emperor himself.

Remarks by the Editor.—The foregoing is a touching historical account, and we have inserted it for the moral use we would make of it. We admire the bravery of the grenadier and the motive that actuated him—"the honor of" his country. Let us learn a lesson from it. We have One who has redeemed us to God by his blood. Alone he stood in the dreadful fortress of trial, with the world against him; but he held out, and never surrendered. No odds of numbers, no sorrows or sufferings, could make him desert the post so important to bring life to dying men. Shall we, then, dear children, abandon, or betray his cause, or act cowardly in it? Shall we not brave reproach, suffering, or death itself, if thereby we can uphold the "honor" of our divine Redeemer? Remember, the time will come when Jesus will "confess" such "before" his "Father and the holy angels." O, how great will that honor be, dear children. Would you not like to share in it? If so, stand by Jesus and his truth now; suffer what you may by it. Let the timid take courage, and not flee like the cowardly soldiers who deserted the "tower" before even an attack upon it had been made. "The honor of" Christ "is at stake." Let that be defended to the last extremity, and "never surrender," but hold out for him till he shall say, "It is enough." Happy will be that blessed hour, and happy be the eternal thought, "my Saviour approved my devotion to him." O, glorious reward; and soon it will come. Live, then, for him who died to redeem you from death, and now lives to give you life eternal.

PERSONALITY OF THE DEVIL.

THE TEMPTATION IN THE GARDEN OF EDEN.

It is important that we get right views of the divine word, for only by so doing can we become truly enlightened as well as sanctified children of God. To know what constitutes truth, is not, however, always so easy; not that the truth itself is in every case so hard to be arrived at, but that prejudice, the teachings of men, or our own wishes and their counteracting influences prove, often, the means of throwing a veil over our minds, and concealing that which otherwise would be readily apprehended. The question which the Gentile governor propounded, "What is truth?" is one that we should ask in relation to any subject which may be presented for our consideration, and we should examine it carefully and prayerfully to ascertain the mind of God, that we may be brought into harmony with him in knowledge, and through it, under the influence of the Spirit, into conformity to his mind and will, to be sanctified and set apart for his own service, and glory and praise.

We have been highly favored as a class of believers; we have been made to see great light; have been led into much truth; and, while regarding it as above price, to consider error as of no profit, but have felt a deep anxiety to be entirely freed from all views not in harmony with the word of inspiration. Is there not, however, reason to fear that we may, in our anxiety to gain and retain the truth, only lose our hold on that which is true, and grasp that which is false? It seems to me that here lies our chief danger, and the denial of the doctrine of the personality of the devil affords, in my view, a striking example of the danger we are in of leaving the belief of the true for the false, —of parting with the gold for the dross. Did I not realize this, I would not feel like trespassing upon the time and patience of the readers of the Herald of Life, but, as I may be in the right, while other good friends may be in the wrong, as I conscientiously believe them to be, I feel it to be my duty to give my views with as much ability as God may enable me, praying that the truth may be arrived at, to the glory and praise of the God of holiness and truth, whose "word is truth."

Before entering upon the subject of the temptation in the garden as evidence of the existence of a personal evil spirit, I would make a few remarks on the word "devil." The proof that the term is derived from a word signifying "d'evil," "of evil," which, by contraction has been transformed into "d'evil," and finally into "devil," is, although interesting as a matter of investigation, no argument to my mind against the idea of the personality of the devil. While the principle of evil has an existence, it has also its culmination or heading up in a personal being. Thus the spirit of anti-Christ spoken of by John, in his first Epistle, 2d chap. is to have its expression or development in an individual, "the man of sin," described by Paul, in 2 Thess. 2d chap. But there is not only a principle of evil, which has its heading up in a personal, intelligent and evil being, but there is also a principle of good which has its complete and perfect expression in a personal, intelligent being—God, whose name, taken from the principle or attribute of his character, "Good,"—has been contracted from "Good" to "God." So that no proof is afforded from the fact that the original word, translated "d'evil," "of evil," has been contracted to "devil," that there may not be a personal, evil intelligence,—the devil,—but, on the contrary, analogy, as in the case above given, affords us reason to believe that such a being has an existence,—that the principle of evil has its full expression in a being demonstrated the "Devil." And I propose to show that such a personal, intelligent evil being must have been acting in the temptation, the record of which we shall now subject to a rigid investigation.

If we examine the book of Genesis, we find that it is not a fanciful sketch but that it gives us a history of facts. The first two chapters speak of the creation of the heavens and the earth from its condition of chaos—the assignment of the luminaries of heaven to their special work,—the bringing into existence of vegetables and animals, followed by the creation of man, male and female, who were placed in the garden of Eden, and commanded to eat freely of every tree therein, except "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil." The penalty to follow disobedience was "death." In the third chapter the temptation and its consequences are brought to view. We shall quote the verses only which more especially refer to the subject. "Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made, and he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden; but of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die; for God doth know, that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened; and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil. And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof and did eat; and gave also unto her husband with her, and he did eat." verses 1–6 "And the Lord God said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done? And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me and I did eat. And the Lord God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle and above every beast of the field: upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life: and I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." verses 13–15.

The circumstances narrated above were of such a character, we contend, as to be explicable only on the idea that the real tempter was an intelligent, evil being, whether serpent, satan, devil, or whatever the name by which he may be designated. In the narrative the serpent is brought to view as the apparent tempter. That he was the real tempter, serving any other use than as a medium to make the temptation more effective, cannot be believed, if we consider some points in the temptation. That he played a part in it, is evident from the fact that he was punished for beguiling the woman. If all the devil there is is to be found in ourselves why was the serpent punished at all? That he was, is clearly set forth in the record. "Because thou hast done this," —beguiled the woman—"thou art cursed above all cattle," etc., v. 14. The Almighty punished him because of his connection with the temptation, as many an innocent one has suffered in consequence of the wickedness of another, the real agent, the other being but an unconscious instrument in carrying out the purposes of the unprincipled employer. The serpent's powers were employed to aid in the temptation, and for this reason he shared in the punishment. In what way those powers were brought to bear upon the woman we shall see presently.

That the serpent was not the real tempter, but that he served as a medium whose powers were brought to bear in aid of the efforts of the invisible, yet real and intelligent tempter is evident if we consider the language made use of. In the account of the temptation he is represented as saying, "Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?" To those who think that all the devil there is, is to be found in our own lusts, we would say that the tempter was not, as this passage shows, existent in Eve, but was something outside of her, and an intelligent accountable being at that. For, Eve, as yet, had in her heart no evil—she had not yet sinned—she was yet, as everything else made by God was declared to be, "very good." No, the tempter was in the serpent, and apparently was the serpent; but this could not in reality be the case. The serpent was a beast of the field, and to have possessed powers and capacities capable of apprehending all that this first verse of the temptation implies, would have made him equal with man in regard to the knowledge of God, and an accountable being. But the serpent was a beast of the field, low in the scale of creation, and we have no evidence that either he, or any other animal upon our earth than man, was endowed with the capacity to apprehend the idea of a God, and of future rewards and punishments. To attribute to the serpent, then, such knowledge as that referred to, is contrary to all reason, and our ideas of moral accountability, and revelation have given us no intimation that, with the exception of man, a being highly endowed, any other animal on this globe could attain to the knowledge of a first great cause to whom he was morally accountable for the acts of his existence. The being then, capable of conceiving such ideas of God, and his relation to man, must have been an intelligent one, far higher in the scale of creation and endowment than the serpent, and this latter, while the apparent speaker, could have served only as the medium for the transmission of the thoughts and temptation originating with the other.

But if the serpent was only a medium, it may be asked why the narrative is made to countenance the idea that he was the real tempter? To this we answer that the record presents the temptation in the precise form in which it appeared to the woman. She recognized the presence of the fruit and the serpent only, the conversation on the part of the tempter was carried on, or proceeded from the mouth of the serpent—she had no idea in all probability, of the existence of any invisible, evil being, for no intimation as yet appears, from the divine record, to have been given of such an one; and though it may have appeared singular to her at first that a beast should hold converse with her, this feeling probably wore off soon, or had perhaps but little existence subject as she was to an influence proceeding from the serpent, the operation of which influence constituted the part specially played by the serpent in the temptation, and by which the action on the part of the real tempter was rendered more effective. This influence consisted, in all probability, in the magnetic power possessed by the serpent to charm and fascinate. By it the woman was brought into such a condition as to be more readily controlled in her perceptions and the exercise of her powers, and thus to be brought more completely and readily under the influence of the invisible, evil agent. The existence of this fascinating power is described by natural history, and by this fascination or charming the special action of the serpent was manifested. The effect of this influence on the woman was similar to that produced by mesmerism, whereby the powers often become so controlled as to bring the subject into such a state that he will receive and embrace ideas often the very opposite to opinions previously and strongly entertained; instances of which have been furnished in the history of many of our number in connection with the subject of the time of the second coming of the Saviour. Besides it is probable that this conversation had been going on for some time previous to the broaching of the temptation; the subject is ushered in so abruptly as to leave room for the belief that other matters had been spoken of previously, by which the woman had become accustomed to the remarkable fact that a serpent could exercise powers of vocal language, and during this period, through his high magnetic powers, the process of fascination or charming was going on, this constituting the work of beguiling, so far as the exercise of the natural powers of the serpent were concerned, and thus the better fitting the woman to be acted upon by the arts of the invisible, intelligent beguiler, who used the serpent, so far as the transmission of ideas was concerned, as a mere medium, just as a ventriloquist throws his own voice into other objects, some of these, perhaps, destitute altogether of life and understanding.

As it is very evident from what has already been said, that the serpent could not have been the real tempter, but that the temptation was the work of an intelligent being, so it is also certain that he must have been an evil one. The object of the temptation was to shake the confidence of the woman in the truth of God, and lead her into an act of disobedience, the result of which was to be—death. And this by holding out to her the idea that she would be very wise, knowing good and evil, and that she would be immortal—never die. None but an evil being, and a very intelligent one, could have engaged in such a work, so that we are forced to conclude, as the serpent was incapable of manifesting such intelligence, and Eve was as yet good—no evil in her—that the evil was outside of her and in an invisible, evil, intelligent being, who made use of the serpent, and called to his aid the magnetic fascinating powers of the beast to make the temptation more sure and effective.

In all the circumstances of the temptation as further set forth in the language describing it, we see the same intelligence with the addition of deep art and cunning, observed in the question with which the adversary opens his attack upon the faith and obedience of the woman. A settled, determined effort is put forth to shake her faith in the truthfulness of God, and to lead her to disobey her Creator. To discuss these circumstances would only be to go over the same ground, and bring to view the same facts—that the evil was not in Eve; that until she sinned she was good—not holy, but "very good," as God had declared his works to be; that the serpent's part in the affair was to fascinate and charm the woman by his magnetic power, thus bringing her more readily and perfectly under the influence of the real, intelligent, yet unseen and evil spirit, who used the serpent as a medium, through whom he might hold converse with the woman, and the more successfully carry on his work of temptation.

In looking at the subject in the light of these reflections, my mind has been brought to the conclusion that in this temptation we find recorded the first development or manifestation of spiritualism. In this delusion there are three important actors—the subject who is to be influenced, the magnetic medium through whom the influence is brought to bear upon the subject, and the unseen, intelligent, evil spirit or spirits who are the grand moving springs in the matter, and have an object to accomplish by these manifestations.

In the temptation in the garden there were also three actors—the woman who was the subject of the temptation—the highly magnetic serpent who was the medium through which the tempter operates—and the intelligent evil spirit—who, through the serpent, sought to accomplish the fall of our first parents, and succeeded in his undertaking; he boldly denied the truthfulness of God, and in the face of the divine declaration that disobedience would be followed by death, asserted the doctrine of "Man's Natural Immortality." So saith the Spiritualism of these days. One, and a chief object of the manifestations of this horrible delusion, is declared to be the assertion and defence of the doctrine of the "immortality of the soul." The same spirit is the moving power in the earlier as well as later manifestations—the object is the same.

The views we entertain on the subject of the temptation in the garden, summed up, are these: The tempter was not in Eve—she was "very good" until she sinned—the serpent was not the real tempter, but was used as a magnetic-medium to fascinate the woman, and thereby bring her the more readily and certainly under the power and influence of the real tempter, who was an intelligent evil spirit, that the serpent could not have manifested the powers of mind and moral sense exhibited in the language employed by him—he was a beast of the field, and not an accountable being, and, beside his magnetic use, was likewise employed as a medium for conveying the thoughts and suggestions of the real and invisible tempter—and that in the garden of Eden Spiritualism was first manifested, and the grand lie enunciated that man by nature is immortal—a doctrine which the Spiritualism of the present day regards as its peculiar mission to advocate and defend.

In my next article I shall consider the temptation of Christ, as showing the existence of a personal evil being, the devil.

THE REFORMERS—HYMNOLOGY, ETC.

Mr. Landis, in his work, "The Immortality of the Soul and the Final Condition of the Wicked Carefully Considered," says:

"That Luther or any of the Reformers believed in what has been called the natural immortality of the soul; that is, that God created the soul to live as an angel, without the body, and to enjoy in a separate state the highest and most perfect bliss of the resurrection state, (a view which so favored the pernicious delusions of popery,) no man of sense believes, so far as I know. But that he and all his brethren held to its separability from the body, and to its separate and conscious, and happy or miserable state, between death and the resurrection, no man of reputation as a scholar will venture to deny."

According to this extract, "the pernicious delusions of popery" are "favored" by the notion that "the highest and most perfect bliss of the resurrection state" can be enjoyed in the state which the believer enters upon at death. As the work of Mr Landis—though emanating from a Presbyterian and Calvinist—was given to the world by the Methodist Episcopal Church, it would be eminently proper for that religious body to examine and see whether it is not itself justly chargeable with inculcating continually, and on a large scale, a sentiment which, according to its mouth-piece on the immortality question, "no man of sense" would dare impute to "Luther or any of the Reformers." We boldly aver that it does this very thing. And while we prefer this accusation, we are fully aware that Methodism's illustrious founder said—"It is, indeed, very generally supposed that the souls of good men, as soon as they are discharged from the body, go directly to heaven; but this opinion has not the least foundation in the oracles of God." We say that we are fully aware that John Wesley—though a believer in the separate conscious existence of the human soul—wrote thus; and we also freely admit, that there are Methodist preachers, not a few, who, when pressed with the consideration that the notion of going to heaven at death nullifies the importance of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, will tell us that they believe the full, the perfected bliss of departed saints is deferred till the last day. But, notwithstanding all this, we declare our conviction, that the idea of a complete reward at death has so imbedded itself in one of Methodism's vastly influential and constantly operative forms of doctrinal inculcation, that no degree of change in the tone of pulpit teaching can bring the needed remedy. The reader will at once understand us, when we say that we refer to Methodist Hymnology, as found in the denominational Hymn Book. That work—containing, we thankfully acknowledge, abundant matter which will ever be precious to the Christian heart—is full of the anti-Wesleyan as well as anti-Scriptural sentiment of going to heaven at death; and, what is more and worse, it abounds in such inculcations respecting the bliss and employments of disembodied spirits, and in depreciation of the "wearisome body," the "fleshly load," as leave literally nothing, that would be accounted desirable, to be secured by the resurrection of the dead, and the second coming of Him who "died and lived, that He might be Lord of both the dead and living." These assertions are made not at random, but upon information obtained, years ago, by no little painstaking. We grant that there is, in the Hymn Book in question, an occasional recognition of the fact, that the resurrection will bring the believer something, not previously enjoyed, in the way of reward. But this modicum of wheat is, necessarily, almost hidden from view by reason of the mountains of immortal-soul chaff in which it is buried up. In dismissing this point, for the present, we do not hesitate to express our belief, that no man who accepts as true and Scriptural the general tenor of the Methodist Hymn Book, in its teachings concerning the future state of the righteous, can feel any rational interest in the doctrine of the Resurrection of the dead. And we do not doubt that our present complaint is, in all its force, justly applicable to the Hymnology of every other sect holding the doctrine of the soul's immortality. In 1849, five Bishops of the M. E. Church declared that their Hymn Book would "not require an other revision for generations to come." Should these dignitaries of the church come to see the Bible truth that "the dead praise not the Lord," they could not fail to perceive the need of immediately revising the hymns which, in every variety of form, contradict this assumption of the inspired volume.

The foregoing remarks are rather aside from the main point to which we intended to call attention, in connection with the sentences we have quoted from Mr. Landis. That writer would have us believe that "all" of Martin Luther's "brethren"—meaning the "Reformers" of that period held to the "happy" condition of the souls of the righteous between death and the resurrection. We will do Mr. L. the justice to admit, that he appears to us to have made a clear case on that point in respect to Luther; though he himself cites conclusive evidence, from Bayle's Dictionary, showing that at one period of the great reformer's life—in 1522 (when he was thirty-nine years of age)—he was "much inclined to believe that the souls of the just sleep till the day of judgment without knowing where they are." It is claimed that "he rectified this opinion in course of time."

But of Luther's "brethren" in the Reformation: John Calvin was one of these, and we desire to bring before our readers some of the sayings of that distinguished theologian, leaving them to judge whether his views of the intermediate state of the righteous were harmonious with those maintained by Mr. Landis, and by those in whose interest the bad-spirited book of the latter was written. In his commentary on the account, in the Gospels, of our Lord's discourse with the Sadducees concerning the resurrection, Calvin says:

"Who say that there is no resurrection. How the sect of the Sadducees originated we have explained under another passage. Luke assures us they denied not only the final resurrection of the body, but also the immortality of the soul, (Acts xxiii. 8.) And, indeed, if we consider properly the doctrine of Scripture, the life of the soul, apart from the hope of the resurrection, will be a mere dream; for God does not declare that, immediately after the death of the body, souls live, as if their glory and happiness were enjoyed by them in perfection, but delays the expectation of them till the last day. I readily acknowledge that the philosophers, who were ignorant of the resurrection of the body, have many discussions about the immortal essence of the soul; but they talk so foolishly about the state of the future life that their opinions have no weight. But since the Scriptures inform us that the spiritual life depends on the hope of the resurrection, and that souls, when separated from the bodies, look forward to it, whoever destroys the resurrection deprives souls also of their immortality."

Calvin is, of course, right in imputing to the Sadducees a non-belief in "the immortality of the soul," but not so in affirming that a denial of that dogma by them is stated in Acts xxiii. 8. Joseph Addison Alexander's note on the first clause of that passage is as follows: "For Sadducees (without the article) indeed say (i. e. are accustomed so to say or teach) that there is no resurrection (literally, not to be a resurrection) neither angel nor spirit, i. e. any other spirit, the genus of which angel is a species. Or spirit may be used in the specific sense of disembodied soul (as in Heb. xii. 23.)" The "specific sense" named here by Alexander has manifestly no warrant in his cited proof-text, for that speaks of "the spirits of just MEN MADE PERFECT," which certainly is not a "disembodied" condition.

Calvin's opinion of the "many discussions" of "the philosophers" "about the immortal essence of the soul," is worth remembering. And as we write this, it occurs to us to suggest that it would be well for our Oceanport friends to bring it to the attention of the Methodist preacher at Long Branch. If that gentleman, in his public attacks upon our views of Life through Christ, has not sometimes talked "foolishly," then not a few of his utterances were misunderstood by a number of intelligent persons who heard him. But he is a young man, and may yet see cause to modify the views which, on this question, he has so confidently put forth.

"Glory and happiness" beyond this life are, according to Calvin in the extract before us, to be delayed "till the last day." Should Mr. Landis, or any one else, lay stress on the words "in perfection," for the purpose of saving Calvin from implying aught that would be adverse to the notion that large measures of bliss are to be enjoyed in the intermediate state, we are prepared to refute the claim with another citation. And for this purpose, in part, we now give Calvin's note, in his Commentary, on 1 Cor. xv. 18:

"Then they who are fallen asleep. Having it in view to prove, that if the resurrection of Christ is taken away, faith is useless, and Christianity is a mere deception, he had said that the living remain in their sins; but as there is a clearer illustration of this matter to be seen in the dead, he adduces them as an example. 'Of what advantage were it to the dead that they were once Christians? Hence our brethren who are now dead, did to no purpose live in the faith of Christ.' But if it is granted that the essence of the soul is immortal, this argument appears, at first sight, inconclusive; for it will very readily be replied, that the dead have not perished, inasmuch as their souls live in a state of separation from their bodies. Hence some fanatics conclude that there is no life in the period between death and the resurrection; but this frenzy is easily refuted. For although the souls of the dead are now living, and enjoy quiet repose, yet the whole of their felicity and consolation depends exclusively on the resurrection; because it is well with them on this account, and no other, that they wait for that day, on which they shall be called to the possession of the kingdom of God. Hence as to the hope of the dead, all is over, unless that day shall sooner or later arrive."

Those who hold "that there is no life in the period between death and the resurrection" need not be disturbed by Calvin's charge of fanaticism, so long as they have the great practical element of their faith on the state of the departed endorsed by that divine. If Christians of the present day will join with Calvin in declaring, in relation to the saints, that "the whole of their felicity and consolation depends exclusively on the resurrection," they will speedily—assisted by the illumination which this whole question is receiving in these days—come to see, that the notion that "the souls of the dead are now living" deserves nothing better than the "quiet repose" of oblivion. With the period of Christ's second coming and the Resurrection full in view, let our watchword, concerning "the hope of the dead," be that of Calvin, viz., ☞ "ALL IS OVER, UNLESS THAT DAY SHALL SOONER OR LATER ARRIVE." ☜

H. L. HASTINGS FIFTEEN YEARS AGO.

The following article will show where he was in 1852. It is taken from the Bible Examiner for March of that year. Where is the author of it now? The stillness of death seems to dwell with him so far as the LIFE theme is concerned. He went forward bravely till he came to the cap stone of that theme—then fought it stoutly—then became "like any other man." If he cannot go to the crowning glory of the doctrine of "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST," O, that he might not go back from such noble testimony as the following from his pen fifteen years ago.

ETERNAL TORMENT.

"Come, now, and let us reason together."—Isa. i. 18.

For the investigation of truth reason has an appropriate office, and hence Jehovah, as it were, calls men to the exercise of that faculty. He says produce your cause—bring forth your strong reasons—thus furnishing him with certain mental powers, and then so simplifying his august annunciations that they may be apprehended and appreciated by human reason.

Reason, however, must be made to keep in its proper place. It is to follow, not precede, revelation. The man who would exalt it to the highest place, and set it as a judge over revelation, will do well to remember the undeniable fact that the world by wisdom knew not God, and as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his thoughts more lofty than ours.

In bringing reason to bear upon this question, the object is not to decide the matter by its aid, but, taking it for granted that the eternity of torment has been shown to be unscriptural, it may also be shown to be unreasonable.

The idea controverted is, that the wicked shall, in a future state, be upheld by the mighty power of God, or else subsist by virtue of their inherent indestructibility, and caused to suffer the most dreadful anguish, and that without intermission or termination. Against this idea we urge several reasons:

1. Its inconsistency with the justice of God.

Justice is manifested in a ruler by a proper and righteous distribution of rewards and punishments. It requires of him that he reward the deserving, and that he inflict proper punishment upon those whose course of life has been contrary to those rules of action by which they are or should be governed. Justice requires that these inflictions shall sustain a due and just relation to the character of the crime. Now, then, it is evident that infinite crimes deserve infinite punishment; and no crime that is not infinite can deserve such punishment. To deny this is to deny that there should be a proportion between crime and punishment.

But it is said that the guilt of the sinner is infinite, because it is the transgression of an infinitely righteous law and against an infinite Being. To this it may be replied that this no more makes their guilt infinite than an act of obedience to that infinitely righteous law instituted by that infinite Being renders a man infinitely righteous.

Others, to avoid this difficulty, declare that the infinite guilt of the sinner is produced by an infinite or eternal succession of sinful acts. That while in hell his actions tend constantly to augment his guilt, and thus he is punished eternally for that eternal succession of crimes.

This, it will be seen, is entirely inconsistent with those declarations which teach that man is to be judged according to the deeds done in the body; for, if he is thus augmenting his guilt during the interim succeeding death and preceding the resurrection, he will be judged according to the deeds done out of the body as well as in. But it may be further remarked, in answer this, that the condition of man at such a time would be utterly inconsistent with man's free moral agency, without which no action can be considered as possessing moral qualities. To illustrate: A king might issue an edict forbidding his subjects to cry aloud upon pain of imprisonment. Now, we may admit the king's right to enforce this law. But suppose, still further, that the king should, after arresting and imprisoning a thousand of his subjects for violating this law, command that his officers should place the right hand of each of those prisoners in a vice, and by a sudden motion crush them all to pummice, and then make the involuntary cry of anguish which no doubt each of them would utter a crime, and pretext for continued imprisonment—repeating the agonizing torture from time to time, and thus causing them to violate the law! All would at once exclaim against the injustice of such a proceeding. But this, cruel and unjust as it may seem, appears to me to be a fair illustration of that view which represents sinners in hell as "perpetually swelling their enormous sum of guilt, and still running deeper, immensely deeper, in debt to divine and infinite justice."

In order to sustain this position of the infinite succession of transgressions, it must be proved, first, that there will be a revealed law in hell; for, where there is no law there can be no transgression; and, second, that man will be free to act while enduring the most intense and hopeless anguish. This can never be done, and therefore the infliction of eternal torment upon any portion of the human family cannot be consistent with the justice of God.

II. Its inconsistency with the Love of God.

The book of God contains no passage more precious than that which tells us that God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life. Christ also teaches that our Father in heaven is kind to the evil and unthankful. But, says an objector, does not God say, He is angry with the wicked every day? I answer, no. The expression "with the wicked" is not in the Hebrew: the LXX gives an idea exactly opposite, and the Vulgate has it thus: God is a just judge, strong and patient. Is he angry every day? We answer, no! He is not angry every day. The Lord is slow to anger and great in power, and will not at all acquit the wicked. God's mercy and love have been conspicuous even in all his judgments. He smote great kings, for his mercy endureth forever.

Now, the idea of eternal torment is absolutely inconsistent with the declaration of God's mercy and love. Do men say that God is himself present in hell to see the punishment of these rebels against his goverment, that it may be adequate to the infinity of their guilt, his fiery indignation kindles, and his incensed fury feeds the flame of their torment, and this eternally? We answer, he retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy.

III. Its inconsistency with the holiness of God.

God is displeased with sin. This needs no proof. The bloody sacrifice of ancient times—the constant commands to repentance, and the amazing sacrifice of the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, all testify that God abhors iniquity. He prefers that man should not sin. He says to his rebellious people, "O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandment!" And again, "O that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my ways!"

The life which God here bestows upon man may be abused or not. Man has liberty of action, which is good; when he sins he abuses the good gift of God, and God is not chargeable with that abuse. His existence is and may be a blessing—he turns it into a curse many times. Not so an eternal existence amid the flames of hell. Existence there must of necessity be a curse. Man will not then have the freedom of thought or action which he here enjoys. He will have no space for repentance nor hope for mercy. Now, is it reasonable to suppose or believe that God, who hates iniquity, who abhors sin, will preserve to all eternity countless myriads of human beings for the sole purpose of allowing them to sin and causing them to suffer? Can we suppose that the Almighty God of holiness and truth would address a sinner in this way. "I am of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and because you have sinned against me for a few brief years, surrounded as you were by many incentives to transgression, I will place you where you shall sin against me eternally." Can we believe that God would say to a blasphemer, "Because you have cursed your God, because you have dishonored his name, and because I am holy and hate blasphemy, I will place you where your only occupation shall be to blaspheme my name as long as I exist!" Our minds revolt from such an idea as this, so unlike the character of the God of the Bible. Far more in accordance with the character of that God is the declaration of his own blessed word, that "All the proud and all that do wickedly shall be stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch."

But it is said that the wicked will be thus tormented to show to the people of God and to the whole universe the consequences of disobedience and sin. I reply, then, this cannot be the case, on account of

IV. Its inconsistency with the happiness of the redeemed. Suppose, for an illustration, that you were in a royal palace, surrounded by luxury and beauty and glory. Flowers are filling the air with fragrance—forests are waving in the splendid landscape—fountains are pouring forth their bright waters to sparkle in the glad sunlight—sounds of enrapturing melody are wafted on the busy zephyr. Suppose that as you repose here in joy and peace and happiness, you cast your eye without and see in the distance an Indian camp-fire—around it stand the red warriors of the forest, and amid its burning brands and its fiery embers, you see some captives treading round and round their burning pathway. You gaze a moment—you listen to their low, wailing moan, or piercing shriek, and as you look with straining eyes, you recognize among those helpless captives who must tread the fearful circuit of those burning coals, until they fall dead, a father, a mother, a wife, or a sweet child, that you saw but a week ago beaming with health and beauty. Where would be your bliss as this blood-curdling sight rose in the distance before your eyes? What joy could pleasing sights, or sweet sounds, or lovely friends produce under these circumstances? Would you desire to dwell longer in that fair palace? Nay, a prison would be preferred to Paradise, if it would shut from your view such horrors as these!

But this fails to convey the remotest idea of the horrors of eternal torment. I know it is said that then all human feelings are to be changed, but I deny that this will be the case. Jesus, while here on earth, wept not only by the sepulchre of his friends, but over the city of his enemies. We are to follow his example, but are we to cultivate emotions of love and mercy all our lives long and then have them torn from our bosom by the hand of God, and our hearts left as hard as an adamant? Nay, verily. I do not say that this change cannot be effected, but I do say that as the act which takes from the tongue the ability to taste bitterness takes from it also the ability to discern sweetness, as the act which prevents the eye seeing evil prevents it seeing good; as the agency that incapacitates the ear to hear discord, also incapacitates it to hear melody; so that act which so changes my nature that I am no longer susceptible of sorrow and anguish, renders me no longer susceptible of joy or pleasure. God may make man so that he cannot feel pity for the anguish of others, but if he does so, he can no longer be partaker of others' joys. Now, it is utterly unreasonable to suppose that God will perfect his meek and merciful and penitent and pitiful children by indurating their hearts until they vie in hardness with the nether millstone! The happiness of the blessed is the result, not of such a process as this, but it consists in the absence of every evil thing, and the most perfect capacity for enjoyment imaginable.

Reader, if you ever escape the corruptions that are in the world through lust—if you ever sing with the redeemed on Zion's radiant heights—if you ever possess the conqueror's palm, the unfading crown—if you ever enter the pearly portals of the city of the Lord—if the sound of your tread is ever heard within the golden streets—if the music of your harp is ever heard by the still waters of Life—in a word, if you are saved, think you that you can go and stand and view the wild surgings of the fiery waves, and list to the dread wails of the innumerable damned, and hear the terrific blasphemies that make "the cheek of darkness pale," and the groans that end not, and see the tears that ever fall, but not in mercy's sight, and then recognize among those tortured wretches a friend, a brother, or a child, with whom you lived and walked on earth, and whose soul, it may be, you neglected to save? Think, amid scenes like this, you could return to the courts of glory, and with these woeful accents falling on your ears, sing among the blessed and possess fulness of joy and pleasures forevermore? I tell you, nay. The memory of that sight would haunt you—those sounds would ring in your ears, and the thought that such anguish and torture was still endured and was to be endured forever, would mar the joys of heaven with a sorrow that the earth knoweth not.

These, then, are some of the reasons that strengthen me in the belief that "all the wicked will God destroy." God is just, therefore men will not be eternally tormented. God is love, therefore men will not be eternally tormented. God is holy, therefore men will not be eternally tormented. The saints will be perfectly happy, therefore men will not be eternally tormented.

H. L. H.

And we add: For the same reason, men will not be raised from the dead into life to be hopelessly tormented; but, dying in their sins, will be "held with the cords" thereof to eternal ages, and live no more; for, "the wages of sin is death."—ED. HER. OF LIFE.

DISTRICTS IN PURGATORY.

A woman and two children, says Dr. Brownlee, called on a lady in Broadway, New York, to ask alms. The woman was dressed in black, and said that she was left a widow, with the children she had accompanying her, in distressed circumstances, and she urged her request for alms with considerable earnestness. The lady informed her that she could give her no money, but offered her food and articles of clothing if she might need them. But those would not do; the widow wanted money, and she insisted so earnestly on the gift of money, that the lady asked her into the house, and entered into conversation with her, when she drew from the widow the following story:

"My husband," said she, "died a few weeks ago, and since that I've had no peace. Priest ——— called on me soon after, and reproved me for not paying over to him the sum of money necessary for his release from that place of torment. I asked him how much that would be. 'Oh,' said he, 'we have different prices for different souls. For saying mass for some we have one hundred dollars, for others fifty, and for others less. The least sum I can accept for praying the soul of your departed husband out of that place of torment is twenty-four dollars.' And now he gives me no peace, because, you know, I have not the money, and what can I do for the soul of my poor husband?" The lady took a Bible, and handing it to the afflicted widow, said to her, "There, take this Bible, and go to the priest you speak of, and request him to fold down a leaf on that place which teaches the doctrine of purgatory, and then you bring the Bible to me, and I will give you the whole amount you want to pay for the praying your husband out of that place of torment." The poor Romanist was delighted with this proposal. She took the Bible and made off in great haste to the priest, but she was not gone a great while; she soon returned more sorrowful than before. She told the lady, in great distress, that she carried the Bible to the priest, and informed him how he could put her in the way of obtaining the whole amount necessary to procure the release of her husband's soul from the torments of purgatory. But alas! instead of turning down a leaf in her Bible in the place where it teaches the doctrine of purgatory, he flew into a violent rage, and ordered her from his presence, saying, "See that the twenty-four dollars are forthcoming, or I'll put you under penance for having in your possession that heretical book, and your husband shall never be released from purgatory till the money is paid down; and mind you, no other priest but myself can pray him out, for he is in my district."—Selected by L. I HAVE LEARNED TO BE CONTENT.

"I have never been so miserable in my life!"

"What is it that makes you so unhappy?"

"Living in this lonesome spot. Nothing to look at but the sea. Nothing to hear but its ceaseless roar."

"Do you think if you were to try you could be contented here?"

"No, there is no need of my trying to cheat and deceive myself. I am unhappy."

"Let me tell you of a lovely girl I met last night in this little cottage, which you think is so pretty. I would like to have you see her. Will you go with me for a few minutes?" Louise consented and the sisters entered. They were shown to Lucy's room. She lay with her eyes closed. Hearing their footsteps, she looked up, and a bright smile illumined her face, as she bade them welcome. Louise judged from the conversation that Lucy had been very ill.

"Are you very unhappy?" she asked.

"No, not now. When I was first taken sick I felt that I could not endure the pain. And the prospect of always being a cripple was more than I could bear. I longed and prayed for death. Every pain I hailed with a sort of joy, hoping it might the sooner free me from life. Now I think I know what the apostle meant when he said, 'I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content.'"

A new light seemed to dawn upon the mind of Louise. "I have learned to be content," she repeated to herself. Was this knowledge acquired through pain and suffering? Rousing herself, she asked Lucy "How did you learn to be content?"

"It was a long and bitter lesson. In my distress I was visited by a minister and his family who were spending the summer here. They read the Bible, prayed with me and conversed often of the Saviour's love. I was very unhappy; yet I struggled on, hoping to grow calm and endure my sufferings bravely. But I could not bring rest or comfort to my mind. I prayed for strength and help. No answer came to my prayers. I only grew more conscious of my weakness. At last, feeling utterly helpless, I gave myself to Jesus, willing to submit to his will and to bear all the suffering he should send upon me. From that moment I have never been really unhappy. How could I be with Jesus for my friend? I am far happier than those who are well and strong, and yet are strangers to his love."

"I believe you," said Louise. And she thought of her murmurs and complaints, and of her restless, dissatisfied heart. She added aloud, "I wish that I possessed the same joy."

"Do not expect to find it away from Christ. Nothing but his love can fill your soul. Come to him as a little child, willing to trust in him, and he will give you rest. Yes, dear sister, come to him. 'Ask and you shall receive, his love.' And when this treasure is yours, then can you truly say, I have learned to be content."—Selected.

Fisher's Catechism.—No. 2.

"Q. What kind of death was this which was threatened upon disobedience?

"Ans.—It was death temporal, spiritual and ETERNAL.

"Q. Is eternity of punishment essential to the threatening, or penal sanction of the law?

"Ans.—No: else there never had been a satisfaction for sin."

What have we here? First, a distinct affirmative that the death threatened upon disobedience, (which death Mr. Fisher claims was part of the penalty of the law) was eternal, and secondly a declaration that "eternity of punishment" is not "essential to the threatening or penal sanction of the law." Now if death be the penalty; if eternal death be one of the kinds of death threatened, then eternal death must be the punishment due to sin. If this be so, then how comes it to pass that the penalty is not essential? God gives a law, affixes a penalty, but its execution is not "essential" to the "penal sanction of the law."

Is there harmony here? May we declare that eternal death is the punishment of sin, and yet eternity of punishment is not essential? It is "essential" that, for the satisfaction of justice, the penalty should be executed, unless by the intervention of pardon it be remitted. In the case of the sinner, the rejector of Christ, pardon does not intervene. He is left to suffer the penalty. If that penalty be eternal death, it seems to us essential to the vindication of God's moral government that the penalty be executed.

Right here, it is proper to state that, with a just understanding of this penalty all difficulties are removed. Not eternal death, but death was the threatened penalty. This was visited upon Adam "in its fullest latitude and extent." Whether that death shall be eternal will depend upon the faith of Adam after his expulsion from Eden. Whether he had such a faith in "the seed of the woman" as united him to Christ, the "second Adam," we are not advised. And so with all Adam's posterity. They come under the dominion of death because they are "in Adam." This death will be eternal unless Christ Jesus, the LIFE GIVER, shall redeem them from its power. In the language of a writer in the April number of the Methodist Quarterly Magazine, (Rev. S. M. Merrill of Circleville, Ohio), "all death is eternal in the nature of things. This is implied in the fact that it is the destruction, and not the mere suspension of life. It must be so unless there is something in it that will destroy itself, and bring back the life it took away. But having only a negative existence, it can have no such power. Stripped of the trappings of fancy, which lively imaginations have gathered around it, death appears without form, attribute, quality or being. It is an effect and not an agent. Hence, if death once occur, whether in the vegetable, animal, or spiritual kingdom, it will reign forever unless arrested by divine power in the production of a new life."

The death threatened is simply death. But, as our author says, "all death is eternal in the nature of things." There is nothing "in it that will destroy itself:" hence the need of "divine power." To the saints this power is pledged, and a resurrection to eternal life assured.

Mr. Fisher certainly fails to present a harmonious statement of penalty, or we fail in our understanding of terms. We submit the two questions, with their answers, to the consideration of those whose faith is reflected in Mr. Fisher's work. His argument, by which he makes it "consist with the justice of God to inflict eternal punishment for temporal sinning," I need not follow. It is the old statement of sin as an "infinite evil," etc. My only motive in reviewing his questions at all, is to hold up to the consideration of those who subscribe to his "catechism" the fact that he does not deem "eternity of punishment essential to the penal sanction of the law;" while yet he declares eternal death to be the penalty (in part at least) of the law. If there is harmony here, or if the two statements can be made to harmonize in the interest of truth, I doubt not that the columns of the HERALD OF LIFE will be freely offered for the purpose. "We buy the truth and sell it not," and they are our best friends who show us the truth as God reveals it.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

"Our Chief Danger."

What is it? An excellent brother thinks it lies in "The denial of the doctrine of the personality of the devil." To do this he calls, "parting with the gold for the dross." We can sympathize with those who are sincerely afraid that long cherished ideas may be too ruthlessly swept away. There are some of these ideas which have such a sanctity about them, from having been taught us by our pious mothers, and pious ministers, that a suggestion of the possibility of their being only a tradition of men, originating in times of superstition, is painful to our minds; and with such minds we would deal tenderly. Still, it is important that we receive nothing for truth which is at war with the reason with which our CREATOR has endowed us, and which He calls on us to exercise when he says, "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the LORD." Isa. i. 18.

The doctrine of an inherent immortal soul is one of the strongest traditions inculcated on us from our infancy; and to call in question its truthfulness shocked the moral feelings of the Christian world almost as much as if we had questioned the being of God. Yet many of us have lived to see the immortal soul theory shaken to its foundation, and ready to pass away with other absurd and baseless theories.

The doctrine of a personal, spiritual being; invisible; a fallen angel; once a holy being in heaven, now a rebel against God, wandering through all the earth, yet everywhere present, laboring to thwart God's designs and purposes, and succeeding most marvelously with the vast majority of the human race, if a truth, needs to be confirmed by something more than inferences, however skilfully drawn. That God should suffer such a being to attack our first parents, in their innocency, without informing them even of his existence, not so much as giving them a hint that he might hide himself in a harmless and innocent beast, thus giving the malicious being every advantage that an enemy could desire, is a demand on our faith, to which we can only yield when reason is dethroned and demonstrated to be a useless endowment.

We are told that, "While the principle of evil has an existence, it has also its culmination or heading up in a personal being." Suppose that were admitted as a truth, what then? Does it follow that the personal being is some other being back of, or prior to man? If so, where will you stop? Is there any stopping place short of a self-existent personal being, co-existent with God himself? The moment it is admitted there is an evil spirit being, who was once good, you are met with the same difficulty you imagine in the case of man in Eden; and there is no escape from the dilemma that the first evil being became such by self-perversion, or he was so without beginning of existence.

It is said, "The book of Genesis....gives us a history of facts." To this we fully assent. Let us keep to the facts and not enter the field of fancy; or if you do enter there, do not find fault with us if we take the same liberty. Where in the book of Genesis is it stated that a personal, spiritual, evil being, entered into the serpent and talked with Eve through that "beast of the field" as a "medium"? "Facts" are what we call for in the case. Where are they? They are not there; and instead of them we are treated to fancy, or traditions; and we shall as soon find an "immortal soul" in Genesis as a "personal spirit devil." It is said:

"The circumstances narrated" [Gen. iii. 13–15] "were of such a character, as to be explicable only on the idea that the real tempter was an intelligent, evil being, whether serpent, satan, devil, or whatever the name by which he may be designated. In the narrative the serpent is brought to view as the apparent tempter."

Is this statement a "fact"? Was the serpent only "the apparent tempter"? If so, that "fact" is not stated in the "narrative;" and we cannot accept an inference against the clearly stated "fact" that, "The serpent said unto the woman," etc. If the advocates of a personal devil, say the "tempter was an intelligent" being; we may admit that; but it does not follow that it was an "evil being," because temptation of itself is not a moral evil; and it does not, necessarily, follow that the thing or person which is the cause of temptation is morally evil. When a man eats too much, we would not think to say the food was a moral evil, or that the man's desire for food was such. The food may be good and the desire to eat be good; but he has not exercised sufficient watchfulness over, or restraint on his desire for a good thing; and the man would only add to his sin by saying that, "an intelligent, evil being" hid himself in his dish and led him to excess in eating; to say nothing of the superstition of such an idea.

As the advocates of a "personal, evil being" have to add fancy to "facts," in making out their case from Genesis, we certainly have the same right to make suggestions as to the process of temptation; and our suggestions will have the advantage of theirs from the fact that our experiences in the process of temptation will in most cases be found to agree with what we shall suggest.

Our first parents had a desire to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. If they had no such desire a prohibition was useless and meaningless. The desire then was not sinful, or morally evil. The command, however, not to indulge that desire for knowledge by partaking of the fruit of a certain tree, was clear and definite; and the consequences, viz., death, fairly set before them. The occasion of the temptation is clearly set before us. "The serpent was more subtle [wise] than any beast of the field," etc. "And he said unto the woman," etc. The question now arises how was the conversation narrated carried on? The serpent has not, and there is no evidence that he ever had organs by which he could utter audible words; and if he had spoken by miracle, then God must have wrought that miracle or suffered the supposed devil to work one to carry on the plot. Yet such a miracle would be likely to defeat the plot; for the fact of a beast talking, not known to do so, naturally, must have created suspicion of something wrong, and the woman would have been likely to have fled from him instead of entering into conversation with him. Be that as it may, the "fact" is palpable that literal talking by the serpent was impossible.

Such being the "fact," we give the account such interpretation as reason, experience, and scripture combine to justify. What is the process of temptation in our own minds? An object of desire is presented; we perhaps doubt if it is lawful for us to possess ourselves of it in a certain way. Reasoning commences in our minds: we hold a dialogue within ourselves, and finally determine to do the thing; then we go forward and do it. Here is exactly James' definition of the matter: "Every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, [or, desire] and enticed." That is, he is drawn away from a right path of indulging a desire, lawful in itself, to seek its gratification in an improper way. "Then when lust hath conceived," [consented to do the thing] "it bringeth forth sin:" [acts in the matter:] "and sin when it is finished," [becomes actual, or the act is completed,] "bringeth forth death:" which is its "wages."

Here is a clear statement of the process of temptation, and it corresponds with all experience, of which we are conscious when we are led into sin. The lust, or desire, is good in itself; the sin is in its gratification in a way prohibited; that is, in an unlawful manner, or in an excessive one; either of which constitutes sin.

In our next we will apply these points to the case of the parents of our race, and see if they were probably tempted or led into sin in any other way than their children have been ever since.

Definite Time.

Numbers of sincere hearts have been exercised on the subject of definite time for the second advent of our Lord for years past, and with some it still continues to be agitated. Toward these persons we have the most sincere good will, and have said just as little as possible adverse to their views, thinking they would soon become satisfied of their mistake in calculating time. We have long been sure that all calculation of definite time, for the event of our Lord's return "from heaven," must prove a failure. The argument we used in the Bible Examiner in 1846, when the subject was being discussed of the event occurring in '47, we have never seen answered, and we believe it to be unanswerable by any rational argument. It is as follows:

I will here briefly state the ground of my disbelief in any definite time being revealed fo[r] the second advent. The whole argument in fa[v]or of its being revealed, is based on assumed [p]remises, or inferential conclusions. One single, positive assertion of our Lord is sufficient to [s]ettle this whole controversy in my mind. Mar[k] xiii. 32. 'Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." It is worse [t]han idle, in my mind, for any man to say that our Lord did not teach that we had not the definite y[ear] revealed; for he guards against his words being thus perverted in the next verse, "Take ye heed, watch and pray for ye know not when the time is." Now if the time is revealed in any of the prophetic numbers of Daniel, some "man," some "angel" or "the Son" did "make it known," and of course did know it. There is no escape from this conclusion but by doing violence to the words of the Lord; and those who persist in doing it may prepare themselves for greater trials than any they have ever yet experienced if the Lord does not give them over to the wildest fanaticism. I will put my argument in a logical form, thus:

If the definite time for the second advent is revealed, in the prophetic numbers of Daniel, some man, some angel, or the Son of God did reveal it, and must therefore know it.

Our Lord Jesus Christ saith—"Ye know not when the time is. Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son."

Therefore no man nor angel, neither the Son hath made the time known, and the inference from the prophetic numbers of Daniel is false.

To this position, in our mind, all opposition is just as baseless as the assumption of an immortal soul in man. We deplore the attempts to fix the definite time of the second advent of Christ, as fraught with immense evil to the cause of truth, and tending to bring the idea of the advent itself into contempt.

We should lament such a result; and hence can have no part in any attempts, coming from what quarter they will, to fix on a day, or year of the advent. We are settled in the fact that the event is still future, and to be realized at no distant day. That it is near we can labor to show with any class of believers. But when they will insist on knowing "the time," day or year, we can have no followship with their position.

Banish the Mournful Thought.

We gave two weeks ago an extract from a work of the author of "Man all Immortal," now Bishop Clark, of the M. E. Church. Here follows another from the same source. Speaking of the grave and the dear departed ones, he says:

"While we cherish the spot where the dear departed lie as something sacred and holy in the heart's affections, and though we often go there to commune in our thoughts and feelings with them, yet it is well to dislodge from our minds so gloomy a thought as that their spirits are evermore hovering around the sad, mournful spot. Ah, who could cherish such an idea without a sensible augmentation of sorrow and of deep concern? The place is so cold and lonely. The night winds sigh so dolefully there. How dreadful, in the dead of night, is that dreary and dreamless silence! The snow lies so cold upon the grave; and fiercer than even the cutting anguish of your bereaved heart are the wintry storms that rave, and drift, and whirl around the monumental marble. Can any one, then, wish the sainted dead to be there? No, no. We would not wish them to be there. They are not there; it is only inanimate mortality. It feels not its loneliness, and is not chilled by the coldness of the place. Banish, then, the thought from your mind; for they are not there. In happier society than that in the city of the dead they live; to sweeter sounds they listen; to the music of angelic choirs they bend an enraptured ear. In genial and stormless climes they have found a home."

This is beautiful poetry. It is true the "spirits" of the dead are not "hovering around the sad, mournful spot"—the grave. That would be "mournful" indeed! No wonder such a thought is "dreadful"—dreadful to think the spirits are where "the snow lies so cold upon the grave!" and then, for them to stay out there "in the dead of night!" and through "the wintry storms that rave, and drift, and whirl around the monumental marble!" Surely, "we would not wish for them to be there," for it must be fearful to think what those "immaterial immortals" must suffer from such "wintry storms!" What a penetrating material these storms must be charged with to make the immaterials feel that such a place is "dreadful!" "They are not there," cries out the Doctor. Truly, for once he is right; but where are they? He answers—"In happier society....to sweeter sounds they listen; to the music of angel choirs they bend an enraptured ear," etc. Here is enough of untruth, and we are glad he did not add, "They are praising the Lord," for that would be so palpable a falsehood that no mask could cover it; because the divine Spirit of God hath declared, by the mouth of the prophet, "The dead praise not the Lord, neither they that go down into silence." Psa. cxv. 17.

Dr. Clark next gives us some account of the doctrine of the "transmigration of souls," travelling through various bodies of animals, beasts, birds and fishes, till they reach the "pure world of blessed spirits." Possibly he had Pres. Beecher's "Conflict of Ages" in his mind; but he calls this doctrine a "Dark and gloomy speculation," yet he admits it was "prevalent in the theology of the ancient Egyptians, in the philosophy of Pythagoras and of Plato, and has found advocates in nearly every age." So it must be true, if the advocates of the soul's immortality are correct in arguing the truth of their theory by telling us "It must be true that the soul is immortal, because all nations have believed it so;" and Plato has especially been appealed to in proof of the truth of their theory. Let them take the whole dose which Plato and his brother philosophers have mixed for them, and not shrink from it because its dregs are bitter. We boldly assert, the darling doctrine of the natural immortality of the soul has no higher origin than heathen philosophy: not one word of it in the Bible. Dr. Clark next speaks as follows:

"As science advanced and knowledge increased, the old theory of an under-world region, where the dead were gathered, gave place to the more distinct theory of an intermediate abode. The poet thus describes this separate, intermediate abode:

"O see! an awful world is this
Where spirits are detain'd. 'Tis half a heaven
And half a hell! What horrid mixture here!
I see before me, and along the edge
Of rayless night, on either side the shades
Of spirits move; as yet unjudged, undoomed,
Or unrewarded! Some do seem to hope:
Some sit in gloom; some walk in dark suspense;
Some agonize to change their state. O, say,
Is all this real, or but a monstrous dream?

"Having received the first indication of this doctrine from heathen philosophy, it was subsequently evolved in christian light. It first became a part of christian philosophy, and then a part of christian faith. The Council of Florence, in 1439, established it as a doctrine of the Papal Church, and it was afterward reaffirmed by the Council of Trent. It is also recognized in the forms of the Episcopal church. In the Papal Church this intermediate abode is connected with the idea of purgatory and the extension of man's probation to this middle abode. This privilege, however, does not extend to those who have not believed and been baptized into the church; for all such, they believe, go immediately and without hope, to hell. In the Episcopal Church this intermediate abode is regarded as a place where the spirit is detained till the resurrection of the body and its final glorification; and for these events they believe it to be undergoing a preparatory training while in its separate abode."

Here again Dr. Clark gives us a pretty fair account of the origin of the intermediate, conscious state of the dead; and "the poet's" description differs nothing essentially from the "orthodox" account of the same state; but he objects to the papal part of the conscious state of the dead-alive ones.

"A Monstrous Fraud."

What is it? He who is now one of the bishops of the Methodist E. Church, in the article from which we have given other extracts, pounces on our views of the state of the dead in the following manner:

"Another error relating to the intermediate state, and one that is more revolting to all the instincts of our nature than any of those we have considered, is that the soul dies with the body. It is strange that such a doctrine should ever have found place with those who believe in the resurrection and in everlasting life after death. Yet such is actually the case. This theory is thus stated by some of its modern advocates: 'The whole man, whatever are his component parts, suffers privation of life in what we call death.' And again, 'The period which elapses between the time of death and the resurrection is spent in unconsciousness and inactivity; the soul is either extinct or in a profound and dreamless sleep, forgetful of all that is past, ignorant of all that is around it, and regardless of all that is to come.' The philosophical basis of this doctrine is the assumption that the soul is only the result of the physical organization, and, therefore, can have no separate existence. But all reason and all philosophy demonstrate the falseness of this assumption. The premises being taken away, the conclusion is of no force. The scriptural argument is absurd and unsustained. The assumption that the Bible teaches such a doctrine is a monstrous fraud upon all revelation. Quickened and revived as this doctrine has been repeatedly amid the delusions and heresies of the present day, it has so little to give it countenance, either in reason or revelation, and is in itself so repugnant to to all the instincts of the soul, that no degree of fanaticism can give it more than a brief and sickly existence. A sufficient refutation of the assumption will be found in the scripture doctrines we shall develop in the subsequent discussion of this subject. But we may inquire here, How can this state of unconscious sleep or of absolute extinction be consistent with the living union of the believer in Christ? 'Because I live ye shall live also.' This is the great pledge of our uninterrupted life. He that believeth hath eternal life; he that liveth and believeth on him shall never die; and he that hath the Son hath life. Christ is the source of our life; and as the source cannot become extinct, neither can the life that flows from it. Death has no power here. Instead of locking our faculties up in unconsciousness, and isolating us from our union with Christ, it can only break down some of the obstructions to that intercourse that have heretofore existed.

'It gives us more than was in Eden lost.'"

We have put in italic those parts of the foregoing to which we wished to call special attention. If the soul does not "die with the body" then it can have no resurrection; hence on this theory there is no resurrection of the man, because the resurrection is of "the dead." "How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" "But some will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" 1 Cor. xv. 12, 35. "They" is spoken of the dead. If the soul is not dead it shares not in the resurrection, and the body only is the subject of it: and Paul saith—"Thou fool! that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die: and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain" (i. e., mere grain) "it may chance of wheat or some other: but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed its own body." Here the apostle seems to affirm that the body given the resurrection dead is not the identical one that was sown; but the resurrection man must be the identical or it is no resurrection, but an entire new creation: hence it follows that whatever constituted the essential man was dead. Whatever the soul may be, therefore, it was dead and is the proper resurrection subject. We give here the paraphrase of John Locke, Esq., on Paul's words, 1 Cor. xv. 36–38.

"Thou fool! does not daily experience teach thee that the seed which thou sowest corrupts and dies before it springs up and lives again? that which thou sowest is the bare grain of wheat, or barley, or the like; but the body which it has when it rises up is different from the seed that is sown. For it is not the seed that rises up again, but quite a different body, such as God has thought fit to give it, viz., a plant of a particular shape and size, which God has appointed to each sort of seed."

We pass this paraphrase without indorsing it, but leaving it to its own weight. But if the body only dies, the body only can be the subject of the resurrection, and it must be identical or it is no resurrection. We believe the same particles of matter may enter into the body with which the dead come in the resurrection or they may not. We regard that point as entirely unessential; but the same identical man who died must be the subject of the resurrection; and whatever constitutes his identity must therefore have been dead. And "it is strange that such a doctrine" as the denial of the death of the man proper, "should ever have found place with those who" profess "to believe in the resurrection, and in everlasting life," not "after death," but after the resurrection at the last day. Bishop Clark says—"The scriptural argument," to sustain the unconscious state of the dead, "is absurd and unsustained." That is, of course, in his mind: but whether it is so in fact we may possibly see before we have done. He adds —"The assumption that the Bible teaches such a doctrine is a monstrous fraud upon all revelation." We reply—The doctrine that "Thou shalt not surely die" appears to be the great "fraud;" and if age can make it true it is as old as could be desired. What side of that controversy our respected author has adopted is quite apparent, and will doubtless be still more so. He talks of the view we advocate being that of the "absolute extinction" of man in death, even "of the believer in Christ." We will not say he is guilty of "a monstrous fraud" in this insinuation; but we will say he is sadly mistaken in our views. "The dead in Christ" are "asleep;" hence are unconscious. What that state of sleep is, except that it is one of "no knowledge," we do not pretend to say; but it is not one of "absolute extinction:" they will awake at the voice of Christ—"at the last day"—as did Lazarus at Bethany, when he was dead and Christ called him forth. He "had been dead," said the record, but Jesus said, "I go that I may awake him out of his sleep," and he did awake him; and he will awake all his followers when he shall "himself descend from heaven with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God;" then "the dead in Christ shall rise;" and our friend C. will find it difficult to produce a promise of Christ, because "I live ye shall live also," that embraces any period "after death" till "the last day" resurrection.

In the sentiment that "Christ is our life" we heartily concur; therefore the life principle is not of ourselves: "the source" is in Christ, who is alive forevermore. "Death has no power" to deprive the believer of this life, though such believer sleep in utter unconsciousness one year or a thousand: he will surely awake at the voice of Christ; but as to substituting the sentiment—"Death gives us more than was in Eden lost"—for the promise of Christ—"I will raise him up at the last day"—we wish not to share in such blasphemy.

Our friend says the doctrine of the unconscious state of the dead till the resurrection, or "that the soul dies with the body"—"is more revolting to all the instincts of our nature than any of those errors" he had previously "considered." Now, his "instincts" must be of a very peculiar character; for he had "considered" purgatory, transmigration through beasts, birds and fishes, the dancing of the soul in bleak winter storms and dark nights over the grave of its dead body, etc.; yet none of these are so "revolting" as the thought of sleeping quietly and soundly till Jesus shall return from heaven to awake us. Really, we think there are not many "instincts" like our friend Clark's; and we rather guess if he was certain he should have to try the beauties of purgatory, transmigration, and dancing in the dark, wintry storms about the grave yard, he might think better of a little quiet 'sleep till Jesus should bid him wake. At any rate, our instinct differs entirely from our good brother Clark's; and we doubt not when he awakes in the resurrection with all the rest of Christ's family, who slumbered peacefully while so many of earth's storms and trials were howling around its inhabitants, he will rejoice to find he has not to wait for one of the glorious family of Christ to end his trials before enjoying their society.

Questions on Immortality.

1.—What is immortality?

Ans.—Deathlessness: from im, not, and mortal,—not mortal, deathless; cannot die.

2.—Who has inherent immortality?

Ans.—"The King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God." 1 Tim. i. 17.

3.—Are not men possessed of immortal souls?

Ans.—No: "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Ezk. xviii. 4, 20.

4.—Is immortality attainable by us?

Ans.—Yes: for though "the wages of sin is death; the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23.

5.—How is this gift obtained?

Ans.—Jesus saith: "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day." John vi. 40.

6.—Does that resurrection secure the person's immortality, or make him deathless?

Ans.—It does: for, "They who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead....cannot die any more....and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx. 35, 36.

7.—Did Plato, or Socrates; or does "spiritualism," as it is called, or nature reveal immortality?

Ans.—No: It is only revealed "By the appearing of our LIFE-GIVER, Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and brought life and IMMORTALITY to light through the gospel." 2 Tim. i. 10.

8.—To whom will God give eternal life, or deathlessness?

Ans.—"To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory, honor and immortality." Rom. ii. 7.

9.—Will God bestow on such this deathlessness?

Ans.—He will give them "eternal life." Rom. ii. 7.

10.—You say to believe in Jesus is the first step toward the attainment of immortality. What more is necessary?

Ans.—To "fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life." 1 Tim. vi. 12. "He that endureth unto the end shall have life." (Syriac). Matt. x. 22.

11.—When are believers put in possession of immortality? Is it at death, or at a subsequent period?

Ans.—"The dead shall be raised incorruptible," 1 Cor. xv. 52.

12.—How will living believers attain to immortality?

Ans.—"We shall be changed." 1 Cor. xv. 52.

13.—When will that change take place?

Ans.—"At the last trump." 1 Cor. xv. 52.

14.—Will this change be gradual or sudden?

Ans.—It will be "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we [who are alive or remain] shall be changed." 1 Cor. xv. 52. 1 Thess. iv. 15.

15.—Will this change include the whole man?

Ans.—Certainly: "This corruptible must put on incorruption; and this mortal must put on IMMORTALITY." 1 Cor. xv. 53.

16.—What scriptures will be fulfilled when this takes place?

Ans.—"Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory." Isa. xxv. 8. 1 Cor. xv. 56; and Hosea xiii. 14; "I will ransom them from the power of the grave, [sheol]; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, [sheol], I will be thy destruction."

17.—Will the wicked dead share in this revival into life?

Ans.—They will not: "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxi. 16. "Drought and heat consume the snow waters: so doth the grave [sheol] those which have sinned." Job. xxiv. 19. "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise." Isa. xxvi. 14. "Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish." "He shall go the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light." "Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them....their beauty shall consume in the grave;" [sheol;] Margin: ["or, the grave being a habitation to every one of them."] Psa. xlix. 14, 19, 20. "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God ABIDETH on him." John iii. 36.

18.—Will not the wicked, then, have immortality—incorruptibility?

Ans.—They will not: for, "These as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and be destroyed....shall UTTERLY perish in their own corruption." 2 Pet. ii. 12. "He that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." Gal. vi. . "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi. 23.

19.—But is it possible to destroy a soul?

Ans.—"Fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" [gehenna]. Matt. x. 28.

20.—But is it not a fact that "nothing can be annihilated?"

Ans.—If God "created all things out of nothing," as theologians say, He can reduce anything he has made back to nothing, if he will, or he ceases to be omnipotent, and hence ceases to be God.

The Long Branch Tent Meetings.

Two new things in the line of religion are being introduced to the people of Long Branch. One of them is a splendid "centenary" church edifice, which is in process of completion by the Methodists, and which is to cost about twenty-seven thousand dollars. The basement vestry, itself good enough for any worshipping assembly this side of the glorified state, was finished some time ago, and has been used by the pastor—now in his third year—for preaching a series of very weak sermons against the truth on the question of immortality. The principal audience room will be completed when the requisite funds can be squeezed out of a society which has already been made to feel that fashionable godliness costs all it is worth. This "centenary edifice," with its towering steeple, is one of the new things referred to above. The other new thing is new to L. B. people only in the sense that they have hitherto been ignorant of it. We refer, of course, to the glorious old apostolic doctrine of future and endless life for the righteous alone, by a resurrection at the last day. This old-new thing is so exceedingly precious, and, as compared with the immortal soul teachings, so tangible, definite and Scriptural that large numbers have been willing to sit on cushionless seats without backs to hear it preached in Br. Wolcott's large tent. Five discussions have been given in the tent on the Life theme, since our last report—one of them by the Editor of the HERALD OF LIFE, the remaining four by his son in the Life Gospel, the writer of this hasty chronicle. The sermon of Br. Storrs was preached before a large congregation on Sunday afternoon—it occupied in the delivery about an hour and a quarter—was listened to with deep attention, and was from first to last a most energetic and conclusive protest against the dominant theology respecting the nature of man, the hope of the righteous, and the doom of those who reject the LIFE-GIVER. The text was, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." John iii. 6. Our meetings commenced on Thursday evening—owing to the rain the congregation was small. But we were not discouraged, and the writer had much comfort in speaking for a little more than an hour to the brethren and sisters from Rev. xx. 12–15. On Friday evening the weather, the attendance and the attention were all excellent. The discourse was founded on John xi. 25, 26. At its close the gentleman of whom we had hired the ground used for our previous campaign expressed himself gratified with the views presented as he had never been with any he had heard under the name of orthodoxy, and then gave a practical proof of this appreciation by offering to furnish a lot in Long Branch if our people would build a good-sized church edifice and keep their views before the community. On Saturday evening Br. Storrs arrived at Oceanport accompanied by Br. A. W. Macdonald—the "W. M." who occupies so acceptably a portion of the columns from week to week By the way, we earnestly hope that all the friends of this paper will read to practical purpose Br. Macdonald's article of last week headed, "The Life and Advent Union." We had hoped to say something ourself on that subject this week, but we have no time to write it, but we say again, read what Br. M. has said, and attend to his useful suggestions. A rainstorm prevented preaching on Saturday evening, and it then looked as if the storm would continue over Sunday. But better things awaited us, for Sunday was a beautiful day. The forenoon discourse was on Acts xxiv. 14, 15. At its close a Presbyterian minister from Ohio, the head of a Female College (his personalia we learned afterward), rose and asked a question on the Rich Man and Lazarus. To this we replied. Then he rose and called attention to the worm that dieth not, and the fire that shall not be quenched. This we also answered. Then he gave us Matt. xxv. 46 to dispose of, and when we had done this we closed the service—at about a quarter to one o'clock. Of the afternoon meeting we have already spoken. In the evening the tent was crowded, and a discourse of an hour and a half was preached from 1 Thess. iv. 13–18. Much interest has been awakened on the Life question, and people in Long Branch will in the future be less and less content with arguments against us that do not "face the music" and grapple with the question fairly. In all our discourses we sought to give emphasis to the importance of studying the Bible daily and prayerfully. On Sunday afternoon we were pleased to learn that one gentleman from Friday to Sunday, read through the gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke, and the very objections he came prepared to urge against the writer (in private) were the ones presented by the minister from Ohio, and with the replies to which our friend was satisfied. We trust that Brn. Wolcott and Welch will be abundantly blessed in seeing the truth multiplying its adherents all about them.

A Short Discussion.

I send you a short discussion that I had today with a Minnesota Senator. I place it in the following form which is, in substance, verbatim.

A.—I would argue man's immortality from these premises:

1st. God never made a mistake.

2d. He made man with a capacity for infinite improvement.

3d. Therefore, he must live forever to infinitely improve.

B.—Allow me to syllogize.

1st. God never made a mistake.

2d. He made man with a capacity to acquire, in this present state of things, a competency of this world's goods; to form a good character; to become intelligent, and happy.

3d. Therefore man will not die until all that is acquired.

A.—But Sir, where did you learn that God intended all of that for man in this present state?

B.—From the same chapter and verse that you learned that God intended that all men should unconditionally infinitely improve.

A.—I haven't time to discuss this subject now.

Spiritualism.

Andrew Jackson Davis, probably the most prominent man among spiritualists, has recently delivered a lecture entitled "Coming Events." His failure during the war to make events tally with his prophecies, taught him a costly and useful lesson; so he avoids a certain course of exposure and censure and deals in safe prognostications this time, having allowed them the unlimited time of their fulfilment to corroborate his sagacity. Speaking about various changes past and going on, he says: "Christianity was a new type that took the place of Judaism. Was it a final type? This was the prevailing doctrine that was preached in the splendid pagodas that were scattered over the Island of Manhattan. This is just as reasonable as would have been the doctrine that Judea was the centre of the universe, or that belief in the existence of a New World was without foundation in the mind of Columbus. The people of this country were in a transition period in religion as well as in politics. We were about entering on a new epoch, and what was commonly known as the Rochester Knockings was the beginning of a new religion."

The speaker dwelt on this idea at some length, and predicted that the present system of Christianity, having served the purpose of its institution, would give way to spiritualism. Even now the introduction of music and ceremonial into religious services showed that the ministers were losing their hold on the people, and the time was approaching when all would acknowledge the truth of the spiritual theory. He is shrewd enough to detect the weakness of modern theological teachings. But the cure will be better than the delusive mummeries that he is seeking to grow rich by and by which he has in several of his speculations, most ignobly flattened out as leader, prophet, and honest man.

Letters and Extracts.

From Eld. B. H. Couch.

CONCORD, N. H., May 30, 1867.

A few thoughts upon a passage in John v. 28, 29. This passage I consider to be translated wrong.

1. Christ never spake to the Jews but by "parables" or figure: as he says in another place, "without a parable spake he not unto them."

When Christ commenced his gospel preaching to one of the officials (of the Jews) John iii. 8, he began in this mysterious parabolic or figurative language, and he always submitted ideas couched in such language to the Jewish people. In John v. 17, Christ began to answer the Jews, by saying "My Father worketh." Here they contradicted this. In verse 19, he began to preach the gospel to them in just such terms as they could not understand, in order that the scriptures might be fulfilled. (That is, they were not to understand). When we strike the 21st verse he doubly presses such language upon them, so that their anger was kindled against him, as is said in verse 18. From the 21st verse and onward, the great subject is life everlasting; not this natural life. Verse 24, "He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life." Now then, did they understand this language? They certainly did not; for they were spritualists, and did not believe in such a resurrection as Paul preached in Acts xxiii. and xxiv.; for here Paul was condemned by them on his plan or manner of the resurrection as he said in Acts xxiii. 7, "I am judged (krinomai) or condemned."

I would like to have any one find one passage in the Old Testament (if there be such) to prove that the Jews believed in the resurrection of the gentile world. It cannot be found. They did not believe in their (gentile) resurrection. They believed in the resurrection of their own people "just or unjust."

But when Paul came to preach a resurrection and life through and in Christ only, it stirred their envy into passionate results. Paul said, "Christ the first fruits, afterward they that are his at his coming." Not one word here concerning the wicked. "It is sown in weakness, but raised in power: sown in corruption, raised in incorruption."

There is nobody raised but what he tells how they are raised. Still, many of our professed Advent preachers deny these words, and say, "They are raised corruptible, and mortal," and to a sinful life coming through him whose blood could not be polluted with sin.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR:—The foregoing has been delayed under a rule we have generally acted on, that when a communication is not complete in itself, but to be followed by another to finish the topic, we do not publish any till the whole is received. We have waited accordingly, for the remainder of the foregoing, and it has not yet come to hand. We reserve the right to give or decline the remainder when we have seen it.

From S. S. Call.

NEWPORT CENTRE, VT., July 14, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—Seeing a notice in the HERALD OF LIFE, that the brethren were requested to respond in regard to the continuance of the paper, and for support to complete the present volume, I will pledge to give two dollars for the continuance of my number to the close of vol. iv.; also, $1 for two copies of vol. v.; one for myself and one for my father, Nathan Call, in Canada. I will send the two dollars soon; and I think I shall be able to get one new subscriber. The doctrine of No life out of Christ is very unpopular here; and none but a believer knows what we suffer. But thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ, his word never fails, though often tried.

I hope we shall not be deprived of the weekly visits of the only paper in the world that appears to give evidence on both sides of the question. God bless the brethren sustaining the paper, for how can many of us spare it? It is the only preacher, or preaching we get. Not a single sermon has there been preached on the life theme here since Br. Bishop left, one year ago last December. I am sometimes led to exclaim, How long, O Lord, how long, before we can hear, by the mouth of thy servants, thy word concerning us? I am sometimes almost discouraged; but through the HERALD I hear from others who are waiting, and feel that in God's own time we shall yet hear. God bless the brothers and sisters scattered abroad. Take courage; continue faithful; we shall yet meet a blessed company where the scoffs and jeers of this life will have ceased to offend.

I am very strongly opposed by all classes of the modern church professors because I do not fall down and worship the image they have set up; that is, their spiritual, omnipotent devil; for he must be omnipotent and omniscient to have such power as they ascribe to him. For instance: he is in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, in America, and in the greater part of mankind at one and the same time; and yet he was the serpent that was to crawl on his belly all the days of his life. "From such turn away." "Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life." Yours for truth and consistency; hoping for life through the LIFE-GIVER.

WM. DELANO, Bangor, Me., writes:—I see by the HERALD OF LIFE that the "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION" is to meet August 23d. And it is to be decided whether to continue the paper or not. I hope the paper may be continued. I will pay $5 for one copy for one year, if it continues to be published. I remain a believer in "No Life out of Christ" and of "no resurrection from the dead out of Christ." Yours in the bonds of love.

Summary of News.

DOMESTIC.

Congress adjourned on Saturday the 20th inst. It is believed that all the bills passed have become laws either by the approval of the President, or passage over his vetoes, with the exception of the bill striking out the word "white" in the existing statutes in the District of Columbia, so as to remove the present discrimination against colored citizens in the election to office, and to seats in the jury box.

A train of seceding Mormons arrived at Julesburg, Colorado, on the 18th inst., bound for the States.

The trial of Surratt is still going on. It has come out during this trial that nearly all of the conspiraters and their friends were Catholics, and also that they relied on Catholics to aid them to escape. Even in Canada, where Surratt fled, shelter was secured for him in a Catholic institution; and now the witnesses who are most active in getting him off are priests and other Catholics. This would indicate, some what, the extraordinary depravity of this system, and the power it wields over its votaries, and how ready it is to sacrifice all principles of right to promote what it deems its own interest.

FOREIGN.

We have never been sanguine that the era of peace and good will among the military powers of Europe was just about to dawn and gladden the world with a millennial spectacle. We believe on the contrary that all earthly kingdoms are to be destroyed and their territory go to form the great and everlasting universal monarchy. We are not, however, disposed to read in every hostile indication a certain harbinger of immediate war, although it shows the chronic disease affecting the governments of the world. The N. Y. Herald of the 22d has this summary of "its foreign news: In spite of the Exposition and the royal visits, the empire seems drifting into war. Horses are being extensively purchased and the military workshops are in full blast. In Frankfort and other financial centres these war appearances are creating considerable distrust. The letters from our special correspondents at Luxemburg, at Coblentz and at Mayence are not more reassuring. Sooner or later a collision between France and Prussia is inevitable. Notwithstanding the doings of the London Conference, spring or early summer may witness Europe in arms, and the two greatest military nations of the day in deadly conflict on the ancient battle field of Europe.

The latest official accounts from Crete give terrible reports of the cruelties of the Turks. The Cretans having inflicted severe punishment upon one of Omar Pacha's spies, this general retaliates by actually crucifying a Grecian priest in order to satisfy his revenge, and at the same time to cast odium upon the christian religion, from which he apostatized that he might become a Turkish General. He next besieged a cavern, in which Greek women and children had taken refuge, and by closing the cavern with stones left them to die of starvation. This renegade is repeating in Crete the scenes of carnage which made him so infamous in Koordistan, Syria and Montenegro. He boasts that he will exterminate the Cretans. The Turkish government, staking its faith in this General, declines for the present to yield to the remonstrances of foreign Powers. It declares, however that it will consult the Cretans' wishes in the event of the revolution not being quelled prior to July 24. It is stated that, as the Cretans are more heroic than ever in their resistance, there is no probability of the success of Omar Pacha.

Juarez had a strong desire to save the life of Maximilian, and according to a Mexican journal "offered his safety to the emperor on condition of the latter taking an oath never again to tread on Mexican soil, and of his signing at the same time his own downfall." Maximilian said in a loud voice that he would accept with pleasure this double condition if the officers and soldiers captured along with him were also set free. He preferred to die rather than accept conditions that would be a reproach to him. His body was delivered to the Austrian government on demand.

Advices from the island of Candia, via Athens report that the Cretans are preparing a squadron of five fire ships, with which they intend to attempt the destruction of the Turkish fleet, which is supporting the army of Omar Pasha.

Vessels from the West Indies bring information of a volcanic eruption having occurred at sea, about nine miles westward of the island of Terceira, and being still in action on the 6th of June.

The Austrian Reichsrath has adopted resolutions in favor of the political equality of religious faiths, and of acknowledging the legality of marriage when performed by the civil magistrate.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For our self, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 8 cents.

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These question are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy"—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: or, THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTER TO A CLERGYMAN; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburgh, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for two cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our expense They will be sold at $8 per 100; but, in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent or 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

The following are 12 mo Tracts, of 24 pages each:

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

All Letters in relation to any of these works must be addressed,

Box 4658, NEW YORK

Special Notice.

It will be seen that we have withdrawn from our CATALOGUE our work on "Man's Destiny;" being the Review of the "Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D.," in support of inherent immortality. We have not a copy of the work left; and the high price of paper, together with the limited demand for the work, forbid expending money in publishing another edition, at present, to say nothing of the lack of funds if we wished to do it.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchaser of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues are hereby revoked.

Poetry.

CHRIST IS MARCHING ON.

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord,
He is tramping out the vintage, where the grapes of wrath are stored;
He has loosed the fatal lightning of his terrible swift sword:
His day is marching on! Glory, glory, hallelujah:

I've seen him 'mid the watch fires of a hundred circling camps;
They have builded him an altar 'mid the evening dews and damps;
I can read his righteous sentence by their dim and flaming lamps:
His day is marching on, etc.

I have read a fiery gospel, wrote in burnished rows of steel,
As you deal with my contemners, so you my grace shall deal.
Let the hero, born of woman, crush the serpent with his heel.
Our King is marching on, etc.

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat.
He is sifting out the hearts of men, before his judgment seat.
Be swift my soul to answer him; be jubilant my feet.
Since the Judge is marching on, etc.

In the beauty of his holiness he is marching with the free,
In the glory of his coming will transfigure you and me.
He died to make us holy that we his face might see,
When he comes marching down, Glory, glory hallelujah.

THE LITTLE BROWN BIRDIE.

As I was retiring from the dinner-table of a friend in the country, one bright sunny day last Autumn, as I cast my eye through the bow-window, my attention was attracted by a little brown birdie, sitting on the ground near a mirror which the coachman had brought from the city that morning, and left leaning against the wing of the house. A group of friends and children gathered around to look at birdie, and with one voice we said it had received an injury, and could not fly; but the next moment we found ourselves mistaken, for it took wing and was off. Very soon, however, it returned, taking its position before the mirror; and by its movements we soon discovered that it was watching its own reflection in the glass—mistaking it for a foe. It gazed a moment, moved its head toward one side, then towards the other; raised its feathers, stepped back a little—the reflection, of course, making the same defiant movements—and then, with all its power, rushed forward to strike its foe. The force with which it struck the mirror, of course, sent it backward. Recovering its position, it would resume the same position and go through the same belligerent movements till exhausted. Then it would fly away for two or three minutes. On returning, it would repeat the same, till again exhausted, with but little variation. Sometimes, before flying away to recruit, it would step behind the glass, as if looking for its foe there. The bird was left undisturbed by the family, though it was closely watched till sunset. I do not think it was absent five minutes at any one time.

The next morning when the family assembled in the dining-room, the first inquiry was for birdie. The mirror having been left in its position, we found birdie at his post, apparently with the motto in his mind, "Never give up." The same defiant spirit, the same belligerent evolutions were acted out, with but a few minutes' recess, till late in the afternoon, when the mirror was removed.

As I watched the little birdie's movements, and saw its persistent, unforgiving spirit, I thought how much this is like the spirit and conduct of many human beings, both of larger and smaller growth. How many, like birdie, are fighting shadows or imaginary enemies; how many think they have defeated an enemy, when if, like birdie, they will look behind that which caused the shadow, they will find that there was no enemy to defeat!—Christian Treasury.

REAL COURAGE.

Boys and girls, as well as men and women, are apt sometimes to mistake prudence for cowardice, and yet no two qualities can be more unlike.

"Pooh!" said a rough boy once to his more gentle cousin; "I do believe, John, you are afraid to go near that horse, just because he isn't tied."

"There is no need of my going near him, Stephen," was the reply; "and there is danger of his kicking any one who teases him."

"Ha! ha!" shouted Stephen, "you are a bravey, now, ain't you? The idea of being afraid of a horse;" and with a taunting look at John, the foolish boy walked up to the grazing animal and poked him with a stick. The horse gave an uneasy start, but continued pulling at the grass.

"See here," said Stephen, growing bolder, if you'll promise not to faint, I'll present you with a lock of his tail in a minute."

John didn't faint, but Stephen did; for, as he stealthily approached the horse in the rear, the animal bounded away, performing a flourish with his hoofs that laid his tormentor senseless in the dust. John tried hard to restore Stephen to consciousness. He loosened his clothing, rubbed his hands and feet, and bringing water in his cap from the pool near by, dashed it on the boy's white face; but all in vain—there was no sign of life. The nearest house was their own home, and a quarter of a mile distant. John felt that not a moment was to be lost. He approached the now quiet horse, and leaping upon his back rode swiftly without saddle or bridle, to his uncle's house for help.

When, after a long illness, Stephen recovered, he was a wiser boy, and told his cousin that he really believed that the horse had managed to kick a little common sense into him.

"What a dunce I must have been, John," he added, "to fancy you were afraid of that horse!"

THE PERSONALITY OF THE DEVIL.

THE TEMPTATION OF CHRIST.

Thousands of years had passed away. The first Adam had been tried and failed to stand the test to which he had been subjected; sin had prevailed on the earth; the judgments of God had been repeatedly poured out; death reigned; the race had almost perished in the deluge. The doctrine promulgated by the devil in the garden of Eden, that man was immortal, had thus been proved to be but a lie, while the truth that he was by nature a perishing, dying creature had, since the fall, met with almost hourly confirmation. By the first Adam's disobedience came death—a condition from which, without the light of revelation, there would seem to have been no way open for revival. From eternity, however, had a glorious plan been devised by which man might, through the perfect obedience, death, and resurrection of another, the second Adam, gain that immortality which the first Adam failed, through transgression, to secure for himself and posterity.

In the fulness of time, the Son of God appeared. In him the divine and human natures were united, and, by the obedience and sacrifice of a perfect man, accomplished through the power of the divine Spirit, which was given to him without measure, he wrought out for man a way by which he might escape death, become a partaker of the divine nature, and attain eternal life.

But there was hostility to the accomplishment of this glorious purpose, and he, who in the garden sought and effected the fall of man, exerted all the powers he possessed to render the plan of salvation abortive. Encouraged by the success of his assault on the first Adam, he did not regard the conquest of the second as altogether hopeless; and, in the fourth chapter of Matthew, we find recorded the severe temptations through which the Son of God passed, while resisting the assaults of this powerful, unholy and personal adversary. For this account, carefully considered, cannot, we think, bear any other construction than that which regards the angels who ministered to Jesus, the Saviour himself, and the devil, as personal, intelligent beings, beings endowed with powers suited to their several natures and capacities. Any one who should read this account for the first time, with a mind unbiased, would naturally regard it as a plain statement of events transpiring, in which more than three intelligent beings, the devil, Jesus and angels, were the actors. It would have been very difficult to have assigned any other explanation than that these events were real occurrences, and not simply the inward struggles and strivings of Jesus against hunger, the disposition or temptation to gratify our appetites at any cost, to be presumptuous, or ambitious to possess wealth, popularity, influence or power.

The narration of the temptation reads thus, "Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterward an hungered. And when the tempter came to him, he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread. But he answered and said, it is written, man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple, and saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down, for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. Jesus said unto him, It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and showeth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and saith unto him, all these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan, for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. Then the devil leaveth him, and behold, angels came and ministered unto him."

Luke, in chapter fourth, gives a full account of the same scene, with some additional incidents.

We consider that this history of an important event in the life of Jesus, teaches the doctrine of the personality of the devil.

The temptation of Jesus was one in which he was subjected to a severer test than our first parents, and the victory he achieved over the temptor, was, in consequence, far more glorious than would have been the case under other and more favorable circumstances. The first temptation was in the garden where nature bloomed in all her loveliness, and teemed with every luxury. Fruits of every description, pleasing to the sight, and grateful to the taste, every where abounded. Man had but to pluck and eat. Hunger could not afflict him, unless he had voluntarily denied himself the gratification of his appetite; and yet, notwithstanding the plethora of food, with the desire of acquiring knowledge which God had forbidden him to seek after, he gratified his appetite, and in doing so sinned against God.

But no such circumstances as these surrounded the Son of God. He was led as Matthew and Luke state, and driven, as Mark says, "by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterward an hungered." Then in the account, as narrated by Matthew and Luke, commences the history in detail of the temptation of Jesus. This did not, however, begin at the end of the forty days, or the period of his hungering, for Luke, in the iv. chap. and 2 verse, says: "Being 40 days tempted of the devil;" and Mark says, chapter first, and 13th verse: "And he was there in the wilderness forty days tempted of Satan." These were probably minor temptations, by which the adversary sought to harrass and wear out the patience of Jesus, and gain an advantage over him in an unguarded moment, and, failing in this, to bear down upon him with greater power when the period of hungering, which he knew to be at hand, should have arrived.

Every thing in the circumstances surrounding Jesus was, as we have said already, favorable to the adversary, and unfavorable to him. He was in the wilderness, nature presented her most gloomy and forbidding aspect, he was surrounded by wild beasts, and hunger, that powerful feeling of our animal nature, was brought to bear in aid of the suggestions of the tempter. He must, about the end of the forty days, have been left by the tempter for a short season, for, at their close, when the account of the temptation in detail is about to be given, it is said: "and when the tempter came to him." It is here stated that "the tempter came to him." In the 11th verse it is said, "and behold, angels came, and ministered unto him." There is no proof that the coming of these two opposing kinds of spirits was not the same—a personal one.

But if it is contended that the word devil has reference to "evil," where was this evil, and how did it tempt Christ? If we say that it was within him, let us take heed that we be not found among the number of those of whom it is said: "All manner of sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewith soever they shall blaspheme. But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost, hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation," and why? Because they said, "he hath an unclean spirit"—a devil. We do not regard those who say that this evil was in Christ, as intending to charge him with the possession of such a spirit as the devil, but as Christ was without sin, we should guard well our language, lest we seem, in any way, to countenance such an idea as such expressions would seem to convey.

After having fasted forty days and forty nights, it is said, Jesus "was afterward an hungered." In this condition of want the tempter comes to him, and requests him to show proof that he is the Son of God, by commanding that stones be made bread; to which Jesus replies, by saying: "It is written, man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Some, who deny the personality of the devil, say that the tempting "devil," or "evil," here spoken of, was hunger. It is said, however, that this devil or evil came to Jesus. If it had been simply hunger, this feeling would not literally have come to him, but would have been something excited or awakened within him. If we say, however, that it was hunger, let us see how it will read. And when hunger came to him, hunger said: "If thou be the Son of God," etc. I am aware that language is often used in a figurative sense, and that such use is made of it in this case by some, but I do not see how any one can here give it any other than a literal sense, for the chapter gives us a history of facts, with nothing to indicate that anything else is the subject of record. To make it any thing else than literal, gives a strain to the narrative, and takes away that clearness which a literal interpretation of the words throws upon the subject.

To this devil, evil, or hunger, is now added another devil or evil: for the first one, or hunger, still continues to tempt Jesus. This last devil or evil takes him up, and sets him on a pinnacle of the temple, and tells him to cast himself down: "for it is written, he shall give his angels charge concerning thee; and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone." To which Jesus makes answer: "It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." The narrative says the devil did all this. Unless we have proof that this was not an actual literal occurrence, we must conclude that the devil really did what he is here said to have done. "Evil," simply, could not have taken up a man, and carried him to the top of a temple. But if the devil was a personal being, the work could have been done, and the narrative be clearer and more easy of explanation than under any other construction of it

If these were merely suggestions in the mind of Christ—thoughts and ideas simply, without any real fact in the case, they would to us appear to be inappropriate in a being possessing the character of Christ. He was not, I apprehend, in every respect like the rest of mankind, though partaking of the same human nature. He was no speculative, imaginative, castle-builder—no trifler. His mind was not occupied with fanciful subjects or questions—a mind drawn every way, revolving useless and foolish themes, conjuring up imaginary dangers, and meeting and overcoming them by the word of God. No, Jesus was a perfect man, every thought of his was brought into captivity to the obedience of his heavenly Father. He was under the influence of the Holy Spirit, with which, as Luke says, he was filled. That a being possessing a mind so well balanced, one so entirely controlled by the Spirit, should allow himself to indulge in imaginary, unreal temptations, mere abstractions which he brushed away by quoting scripture is not likely: in so doing he would have been putting himself in the way of temptation, and manifesting a want of control over his thoughts, not in harmony with his character as a perfect pattern after which we are to copy. And if the temptation was not a fact, but Jesus merely imagined himself to be on a pinnacle of the temple, and from his own heart the suggestion came to throw himself down, trusting in God to save him from destruction, how idle and trifling the thing would appear! He, in a safe place, so far as such danger was concerned, castle-building, and, like a romancer, imagining a scene that had no reality in it. It appears to us like trifling with the word of God to make this any other than a real occurrence; and Jesus would, in allowing his mind to picture such an imaginary position and danger, have put himself in the attitude of leading himself into temptation, and consequently into sin.

But if we regard the temptation, as the narrative clearly shows it to be, as an actual fact—that Jesus was literally taken and placed on a pinnacle of the temple, and a personal evil being told him to cast himself down, and trust in God to save him from death—a course which would have been wrong—then in meeting the temptation by the word of God, and in refusing to carry out the suggestion of the devil, he exhibited the strength of his holy character, and overcame the tempter. For there was here a real danger incurred, and a real victory gained. He was not in a safe place, but in a very unsafe one. Standing on a pinnacle of the temple, even if he had not cast himself down, he might have been hurled from his position at any moment by his designing adversary.

Under such circumstances his refusal to comply with the suggestion of the devil showed strength of mind, a determination to do right, and frees him from all suspicion of suggesting the temptation himself. That this temptation was not witnessed by others, that no one saw Jesus on the pinnacle of the temple, does not militate against the view that it really occurred. The devil is called the prince of the power of the air, and as such might have possessed the power to have so affected it as to have enveloped himself and the Saviour in a mist or haze, thus rendering themselves invisible to the people below, or the temptation may have occurred in the night. Taking all the circumstances connected with this special temptation into consideration, the preponderating weight of probabilities favors the idea that this temptation was a reality, in which a personal, evil being and the Saviour were the actors.

In the last temptation connected with this incident in the life of Jesus, as recorded by Matthew, the devil takes him up into a high mountain, shows him all the kingdoms of the world and their glory, and says: "All these things will I give thee if thou wilt fall down and worship me." To this Jesus replies: "Get thee hence, Satan, for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." In this special temptation, as in the one last mentioned, the same difficulty occurs if we regard it, not as a real occurrrence between Jesus and a personal devil, but as consisting in a struggle in the mind of the Saviour against the lusts of his nature. The devil, if a personal being, certainly possessed the power to take Christ to a high mountain, as much as to place him on a pinnacle of the temple, and on the idea that the narrative describes a literal occurrence, the temptation is easy of explanation. To one starving and in need of every thing, such a brilliant offer as that of all the kingdoms of the world, with their glory, upon the sole condition that Jesus should fall down and worship the devil, was one that held out to him the prospect of a speedy deliverance from trial. If Jesus could have been deceived by the tempter as Eve was, he also would have yielded, but he knew his foe, and rejected the offer, commanding Satan to get hence, or, as Luke says, to get behind him. In doing this he exhibited his faith in the promises of God.

The point or force of this special temptation, seems to us in part to lie in the deception which Satan attempted to impose upon Christ, as he did on our first parents in the garden, which deception was manifested in his claim to have any right or power to bestow the kingdoms of the earth on Jesus; and the strength of the latter lay, or was exhibited, in his not yielding to this temptation to be deceived, but in his exercise of faith in the promises of God. These promises were that Christ should see his seed—be the generative father of a spiritual race, who should be as countless as the sands upon the sea-shore, possess a kingdom and glory, and be heir to all things. Christ looked for these things at the hands of his Father as the reward of his obedience. Hence, if Satan had possessed the power to give him at that time all these kingdoms of the world, with their glory, and Jesus had accepted them at his hands, he would not have received them in the right way. If he had thus sinned against his Father by worshipping a fallen spirit; these honors and glories were to be attained by him only through obedience unto death. In this path he was willing to walk—hence he rejected the temptation of the lying devil with indignation, and commanded him to leave his presence. His answer clearly shows that he was addressing a personal and intelligent being: "It is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." Jesus was willing to worship his holy and heavenly Father, but not an unholy being. By this temptation he was not like our first parents deceived, so that in obtaining this victory he showed the superiority of the spiritual over the animal Adam. When this temptation had ended it is said: "Then the devil leaveth him and angels came and ministered unto him."

An objection has been urged to the literal nature of the temptation of Christ on the mountain that if it was such, he was left there, and at a distance from the place of the devil's first communication with him; and that Matthew Mark, and Luke, state that the whole scene was laid in the wilderness, Christ not being removed from that locality during the whole period of his trial. If such an objection has any weight, then we may with equal force say that Christ was left on a pinnacle of the temple, for, while it is stated in Matthew, that the devil left him after tempting him on the mountain, it is said in Luke, that he left him after setting him on a pinnacle of the temple, the temptation on the mountain being the third in order of occurrence in Matthew and the second in Luke. As he could not have been left in both places, the presumption is that he was left in neither, but brought back to the place from whence he had been taken.

There is no proof, however, that the temptation was confined to the wilderness. Jesus was, it is said, "led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil." Such language does not necessarily imply that, while he was led there, the temptation was confined to that spot. One may go to a certain section of country to transact business, which may require his presence elsewhere also for its full settlement. The fact that he goes to one place, is no proof he does not go to another, before he settles it, and back to the place first mentioned before he returns home. Jesus was led into the wilderness to be tempted—a place where he could become hungry—but in carrying out the temptation, the devil led him to other localities, and as he took him away, he brought him back whence he came. And as he had, prior to these three temptations, of hunger, that on the pinnacle of the temple, and upon the mountain—been tempted for forty days already in the wilderness, he had suffered long enough in that special locality, it was therefore unnecessary to limit the scene of the three remaining temptations to the same spot—one would suppose that to give force to these last, as well as variety, the theatre for their operation would be varied also. And as it is expressly stated by Mark, first chapter and 13th verse, that he was in the wilderness forty days tempted of Satan, the temptation in that locality we think was fully accomplished, and it could be continued elsewhere without impairing the truth of the fact that he was for a period of forty days tempted in the wilderness.

A minute consideration of the circumstances connected with Christ's temptation only serves to show that they were real occurrences; that there was an intelligent, evil spirit moving in the matter, and seeking to gain the victory over the second Adam, as he had over the first—thus endeavoring to thwart the plan of Jehovah, a plan which contemplated the salvation of man through the perfect obedience unto death of the second Man, the Lord from heaven. Let us not, then, belittle the temptations of Christ by refusing to consider the strength which they derive from the fact that they were planned and executed by a subtle and malicious being of large capacities and powers, by meeting and overcoming whose suggestions by the word of God, Jesus has taught us the way by which we also may overcome and share with him the priceless inheritance of "Eternal Life."

Let us guard against having our minds led from the simplicity of the truth by human learning, but exercising the reason which God has given us, and looking to him for light may we receive the aid of that Spirit by which we shall be led into truth; be made partakers of the divine nature, and at last dwell forever with him who is truth—in whom there is no darkness at all, but perfect, cloudless, eternal light.

A MYSTERY EXPLAINED.

If all startling phenomena were promptly investigated by minds free from superstition and fear, occurrences that appear to have a supernatural origin would often find an easy solution. Judge Parsons used to tell with great zest an incident in his travels which would have furnished food for a whole company of village gossips.

His wife, who seemed much agitated, waked him one night at a village inn, and told him there was a woman sitting at the foot of the bed knitting. The judge saw the figure as distinctly as his wife, but having no thought of a supernatural origin of the vision, began to speculate on its real cause. After looking sharply for some minutes, while the woman knitted on with unruffled composure, he was confident that he could see the wall through her, and that she could not, therefore, be substantial flesh and blood. This discovery, which might have affrighted weaker nerves, only roused his curiosity. He at once rose from the bed, and walking to the foot, saw that no one was there; the form had vanished.

Putting his head as nearly as possible in the position where he had seen the woman, the mystery was at once explained. He saw a circular hole in the shutter behind the bed, through which the rays of light were streaming; and going to this hole to look through, saw a woman in a room on the other side of the street knitting. The nerves of the wife were greatly soothed by the discovery, and the inquisitive mind of the judge was gratified by such a simple explanation of the apparition. Many ghost stories could be easily shorn of their apparently supernatural character by a cool and careful investigation.—Watchman and Reflector.

VARIETIES.

The Doctrines of Grace.—At the Unitarian Association recently held in Boston, the Rev. Mr. Hepworth, a leading man in that society, assured his hearers that the "old dogmas of eternal punishment, total depravity, and vicarious atonement were exploded." In commenting on this statement the N. Y. Examiner, the leading Baptist paper in the country, says that this leading minister repeats the old statement "that the doctrines of grace are exploded, and yet the friends of those exploded doctrines are so strong that within forty miles of Boston a man respected by the whole State has been turned out of a State institution because he was a Unitarian. Justice is sometimes slow, but usually very sure."

At a prayer-meeting recently held in the city of Brooklyn, a minister related an incident to show the power of prayer. He said that at a protracted meeting held in an eastern town where he was sojourning, the pastor was amazed at the conduct of a Universalist minister and some followers of his who persisted in disturbing the meeting. After ineffectual remonstrances he thus addressed them. "If you persist in acting as you have done I am going to pray to God that he will either convert you and make you a true minister of Christ, or else that he will take you out of the way, so that you may no longer be a stumbling block to others."

The Universalist persisted, and that night the pastor shut himself in his room and prayed till 3 o'clock in the morning, when he felt he had an answer to his prayer. Next morning the Universalist was found dead in his bed by his wife, "he having died," says the relator, "just at 3 o'clock in the morning."

[P. S. by Editor:—That is the worst kind of murder.]

Perilous-times sermons are now preached weekly in regard to the prevalence of crime in this country. In a discourse in this city Rev. J. M. Buckley said that the frightful prevalence of crime at present is beginning to attract universal attention. The increase of crime, the almost motiveless character of many heinous murders and other offences and their remarkable brutality mark the history of the country at the present day. Another feature is the alarming number of crimes which have taken place in respectable circles of society. The facilities for collecting and disseminating information such as the great competition between newspapers, the cessation of the war, the extension of the telegraph and railroads are undoubtedly greater now than has ever been the case before; therefore no crime can be concealed from the public. But there is no doubt whatever that the prevalence of crime at present in every part of the country takes the form of an epidemic.

THE SIGN OF THE SON OF MAN.

"Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn." Math. xxiv. 30.

What this sign is, has caused much inquiry at different times. It is not our design to state anything with positiveness on the subject, but to suggest thoughts which may afford matter for reflection. The sign spoken of must some time appear, and is designed to be for the benefit of such as "watch and pray."

As an opinion—we have long entertained—we are disposed to believe "the seven last plagues" of Rev. xvi, constitute that sign. Under them "all the tribes of the" old Roman "earth mourn." There is where the prophetic Scriptures have had, or will have a large share of their fulfilment.

The Revelator introduces these plagues to our attention thus: "I saw another sign in heaven, great and marvelous." What was this sign? "Seven angels having the seven last plagues." What is that a sign of? Is it not of the near approach of the Son of man? Why so? Because, "in them is filled up the wrath of God." Must we not then be near the end of this age when those plagues are seen? The sign of the Son of man cannot be something that comes afterward, for the tribes of the earth mourn under the sign; but the wrath is filled up by the plagues; and hence no wrath beyond for another period.

Have these plagues commenced, or are they all yet in the future? To our mind it seems highly probable they commenced with the French revolution of 1789. The first vial of the plagues produced a "noisome and grievous sore on the men that had the mark of the beast." The beast is likely to represent the fourth, or Roman kingdom and its image, papacy. In the French revolution of 1789 the nobility of France had the "mark of the beast"; and the clergy worshipped its image. Then there were about 400,000 clergy in France. Against these two classes—the nobility and clergy—the wrath of the revolutionists was specially directed. They were put to death without mercy. The horrors of those days we need not dwell on: we design only hints for the reader's consideration.

Second Vial.—"And the second angel poured out his vial on the sea; and it became as the blood of a dead man: and every living soul died in the sea." In 1794 began a series of the most bloody naval conflicts the world ever knew. Not only the eastern seas but the Atlantic and Pacific were dyed in blood from wars growing out of the French revolution. The navy of England seemed to delight in shedding blood on the sea.

Third Vial.—"The third angel poured out his vial upon the rivers and fountains of water, and they became blood." This vial may denote the general pollutions of infidelity, and also the devastations of the lesser States of Europe during the revolutionary wars from 1794 to 1801. "Rivers and fountains of waters" seem to indicate the same locality as those ravaged by Attila, prophesied of chapter viii. 10, viz: the river Po and its tributaries descending from the Alpine mountains. This was the region of the horrible wars and massacres of the Papal power on the Waldenses. Napoleon I. seems to have been the instrument of God to accomplish the judgments of this vial. "After three years of bloody war, Napoleon was completely victorious over Austrians and Russians, triumphed in Italy, and made the Pope a captive. Is it a wonder, in view of these judgments on the Popedom, that "the angel of the waters" said—"Thou art righteous, O Lord, which art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus: for they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink, for they are worthy. And I heard another out of the altar say, Even so, Lord God Almighty, true and righteous are thy judgments."

Fourth Vial.—"The fourth angel poured out his vial upon the sun: and power was given him to scorch men with fire: and men were scorched with great heat, and blasphemed the name of God, which hath power over these plagues: and repented not to give him glory."

"The sun" is a symbol of the Imperial power of Rome, chap. viii. 12. Napoleon I. assumed that power, and compelled Pope Pius VII. to travel from Rome to France to perform the coronation service. Napoleon took the coronation oath; but, when the Pope had blessed the crown, the Emperor took it from the altar with his own hands and placed it on his head, instead of receiving it from the "holy father." After this, the Italians sent him a request that he would do them the favor to be crowned their king at Milan. To this he assented; and on the 26th of May, 1805, he placed on his own head the old iron crown of the Lombard kings, uttering the words, "God hath given it to me; beware who toucheth it." The prophecy said, "Power was given unto him"—to do what?—"to scorch men with fire." The history of Napoleon I. and his wars, was a striking illustration, if not fulfilment of this prophecy. It is also true that under those desolating wars—the scourge of a wicked people—they "repented not to give" God "glory." Napoleon had at this time supreme control of a vast empire. The seat of his power was then "the seat of the beast," or fourth kingdom. This leads us to speak of the Fifth Vial.—"And the fifth angel poured out his vial upon the seat of the beast; and his kingdom was full of darkness; and they gnawed their tongues for pain, and blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and their sores, and repented not of their deeds."

The seat of the beast was at that time Paris. Napoleon had crouched so far to the Papacy as to reinstate the Pope in part, and had restored the papal worship in his dominions. This base bowing to that power made him and his kingdom the subject of the fifth vial. Whoever supports that power, whether France, England, the United States, or any other power, will have to drink of some of these vials: see Rev. xiv. 9 to 11; and remember the "seventh vial" is charged heaviest with wrath, and is yet future, or in the incipient stages of its course of wrath. Napoleon had hitherto been almost universally triumphant, but now the scene changes; and from 1812, when he commenced the invasion of Russia, "his kingdom was full of darkness," and disaster followed him, till the imperial "sun" set at the battle of Waterloo, 1815. Then the "fourth beast," or seventh head of that beast, went into "the bottomless pit." Truly "his kingdom was full of darkness, and they gnawed their tongues for pain," and we have the fullest evidence, they "repented not of their deeds."

Sixth Vial.—"The sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared. And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet: for they are spirits of devils"—daimonon, knowing ones—"working miracles, which go forth to the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. (Behold I come as a thief; blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked and they see his shame.) And he" ("these spirits"—so reads the French Testament) "gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon."

"The great river Euphrates," in this text, in our judgment, is a symbol of the "peoples" on which the "harlot woman"—"Babylon the Great"—sat for centuries. This vial dries up "the water," or withdraws the people from her support, and "prepares the way for the kings of the east"—literally, the sun rising, or of the morning, viz: the morning "of that great day of God Almighty," when his wrath on the wicked nations and their ungodly rulers will culminate to its finale, and mark the end of this age.

While these things are going on, under the sixth vial, a note of warning is to be given of the coming of Christ. Has this not already occurred? though many errors may have been mixed with that warning. But we have no design to go into details in these remarks, and pass to the Seventh Vial.—"And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done." Following this, "There were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great."

This vial, then, symbolizes revolutions and convulsions such as were never before witnessed, and will cause such mourning as is to be when the sign of the Son of man is seen in heaven. Is it not highly probable, then, that the seven last plagues are that sign? So we confess it appears to us; and it seems evident the return of Christ from heaven is an event nigh; but we have no sympathy for any attempts to fix on a definite day or year for the event to occur; and we are satisfied all such attempts are useless, and often highly pernicious; as failures of accuracy tend to weaken faith in Scripture prophecy, and give occasion to just reproach, and thus injure the cause of truth. Let all watch and pray, and "keep their garments, lest they walk naked" and their shame appear in that day.

The events of the past twenty years, or commencing with the revolutions in Europe in 1848, and especially the events of still more recent occurrence in France, Prussia, Austria, and Italy, indicate that we may be living under the outpouring of the seventh vial. "The beast that was, is not, and yet is"—or the "scarlet colored beast" of Rev. xvii—is to do his work under this vial, it seems likely. We judge he is performing it steadily; and that the time is near when he will "go into perdition," and the "harlot woman"—papacy—along with him. The event seems impending; for prominent Italians appear to be determined to have the city of Rome as the seat of the Italian government, and the Pope stretches out his hands imploringly to Napoleon III. to help him. If the Emperor gives his aid again to that power—the condemned harlot—it may be the signal for his final downfall, and the high road to the "perdition" that awaits his dynasty. But we must wait for development; and stand fast in the faith that Messiah's "Dynasty" is soon to take its place on earth and "break in pieces all" these present earth-born despotisms. The Lord hasten the day.

OUR PAPER.

We were reminded by remarks of "W. M.," in the HERALD OF LIFE two weeks since, that the "time appointed for holding our annual meeting," is at hand. One question to be settled at that time is, Shall the paper be henceforth published weekly, semi-monthly, monthly, or be discontinued altogether? This, it must be conceded by all, is an important query, and the character of its solution depends wholly upon the feelings of friends as expressed upon the subject before and at that time. It is desirable, therefore, that they who do not expect to be present at Wilbraham, but who desire a continued publication of the paper in its present form, to so write at the earliest opportunity, not forgetting at the same time to mention how much they are willing to do in the way of furnishing needed funds.

Contemplating our approaching "anniversary," in connection with the fact that the future of the paper must then be decided for another year, our thoughts very naturally comprehend within the scope of their range the past and present as well as the future. One year ago some of our friends who were deprived of the privilege of attending the annual meeting sent in communications brimfull of consoling assurances and encouraging promises, together with resolutions of a noble character. Have those promises and assurances been well remembered? those confidence-inspiring resolves faithfully regarded? Have they who cheered not their sympathizing friends with either their presence or their counsel, but with strong supplication invoked the rich blessings of heaven on behalf of our labors, endeavored by proper and consistent efforts to render their prayers effectual? And, too, have we, who in the shade of that venerable tree implored divine assistance and pledged anew our allegiance to the truth, so acquitted ourselves as to realize an uninterrupted evidence of the kind Master's approbation? These are questions which we must all answer for ourselves; and if looking back over our experience of the past twelve months we find it darkened by omissions or short-comings, in these particulars, let us strive to be henceforth more worthy servants of him who has committed to us such precious truths.

It may be asked why has not the paper become self-sustaining? For the simple reason that the truths it advocates are not popular. Not very many years in the past theological reforms were accomplished only amid the most extreme persecution; whereas now the most that opposers of truth can do is to turn their backs upon us and refuse to listen; a thing which is necessarily painful only because it renders more tedious and difficult the work in which we are engaged. True, they may wilfully misrepresent us and speak evil against us; but with the sweet consciousness that we are doing the will of our heavenly Father, and remembering that he who suffered far more for our sakes than we will ever be called upon to suffer for him has said, "Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall speak all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you," we can well afford to endure and patiently forbear. Being so much more favorably circumstanced than those of our predecessors who suffered so greatly for the truth, and were compelled at last to seal their testimony with their blood, how can we withhold aught of those things with which God has in mercy blessed us, that may be necessary to successfully carry forward the work he has entrusted to us? Said our blessed Lord, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." We cannot doubt that there are many disciples of Jesus who are ignorant of the crowning truths to the advocacy of which our paper is largely devoted; and if disciples of Jesus, then our brethren; and how can we better manifest our love to them than by laboring to place in their possession truths that will inspire them with higher and holier conception of the Creator, and consequently better enable them to glorify both Father and Son. Then, too, many of our fellow beings are groping in infidelity, driven thither by modern theological libels upon the character of God, who have only to behold him in his true character, seen through the medium of truth, to be induced to leave their husks and return in penitence to the Father's house. Let us not fail to use every means that a gracious God has placed at our disposal, to carry forward this vastly important work; for the night is far spent and the morning draweth nigh. Soon we will be either summoned to lie down and sleep in Jesus, or called to meet our coming Lord. Let us so live, so discharge all our duties day by day that we can at any moment hail with joy the glorious appearing of our dear Redeemer.

"WHO ONLY HATH IMMORTALITY."

If anything were needed to illustrate the power of prejudice, and more especially of religious prejudice, it might very readily be produced by adverting to the position occupied by the religious world on the question of immortality. Without taking into account the vast body of hypocrisy and irreligion which may be found within the pale of orthodoxy, we are well assured that thousands, who may truly be called "the salt of the earth," are profoundly ignorant of the merits of the question. The weight of this grave charge is almost entirely upheld by prejudice. Not one in a thousand of our opponents can be prevailed upon to throw aside their theological spectacles, and examine the subject candidly and prayerfully.

This state of things forcibly reminds me of a letter written by John Wesley to his friend Joseph Benson. The following is an extract:

"'Child,' said my father to me when I was young, 'you think to carry everything by dint of argument. But you will find, by and by, how very little is ever done in the world by clear reason.' Very little indeed! It is true of almost all men, except so far as we are taught of God.

Against experience we believe,
We argue against demonstration;
Pleased while our reason we deceive,
And set our judgment by our passion.

"Passion and prejudice govern the world; only under the name of reason. It is our part, by religion and reason joined, to counteract them all we can."

"God grant that we, his humble disciples, may educe lessons of candor, moderation and simplicity from the pernicious examples daily set before us. Holy Spirit, assist us, that we may "from this nettle Danger pluck the flower Safety."

One would naturally suppose that a glance at the four words which compose the heading of this article would cause any reasoning person to pause at the threshhold of the subject, and consider their import. But this is far from being the general method. The rash champions of orthodoxy clear this four-barred gate at a single bound, and plunge at once into a discussion of the question of the punishment of the wicked. They act as if the divine revelation were nothing but a bundle of Jove's thunderbolts, and Christ an angel of vengeance poising the forked lightnings above our devoted heads, and anxious for the moment to come when he shall overwhelm us in wrath. "Take away," say they, "the eternal torment of the wicked, and what have we left? Who will come to Christ?" This is the best course they can pursue if the security of their dogmas and creeds be their sole aim and object; but if their sincere inquiry is, "What is truth?" a different procedure will be necessary.

The clause "Who only hath immortality," if taken literally, undoubtedly annihilates the common doctrine; and there has never been given any scripture grounds for anything but a literal interpretation. It has indeed been asserted and reasserted, times without number, that the Mosaic account of man's creation fully establishes his inherent immortality. This, we think, has been triumphantly refuted. But for the sake of any casual reader of this article who may be ignorant of the arguments pro and con., we will briefly recapitulate.

It is affirmed by the upholders of the common theory—

1. That as man was created in the image of God, he is therefore immortal.

2. That when God formed man of the dust of the ground, he breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, or lives—animal or mortal life, and spiritual or immortal life.

3. That the phrase, "man became a living soul," carries with it the idea of an immortal being.

To all which it is responded:

1. The holy scriptures certainly affirm that man was made in the image of God, but they do not affirm that image to be immortality. It more probably consists in the intellectual likeness of man to God, that is, in his capacity to attain knowledge, and consequently holiness of character. But whether this be so or not, there is nothing in the holy scriptures to prove that the image of God is immortality.

2. The phrase "breath of life" is applied to the beast of the field, the fowl of the air, and to every creeping thing, Gen., chap vii., and therefore stamps all of them with immortality as much as man. A writer in the Methodist Quarterly for January, 1860, Rev. E. Thomson, lately elected editor of the C. A. & J. by the General Conference, does not scruple to hint that every living thing is immortal, even "frogs and flies." This is the essence of Spiritualism. It is only by such a position that the above phrase can be pressed into the service of the theologians. The rendering, "breath of lives" does not injure our argument in the least, as that breath which gives life to men, beast, and creeping thing, may properly be called the breath of lives.

3. The term "living soul" does not belong to man any more than other animals. See Gen. i. 30, with the marginal note. Even if it did, it would still remain to be proved that "living soul" means "immortal soul."

There are two Greek words which are translated "immortality"—athanasia and aphtharsia Athanasia occurs in three places, 1 Tim. vi. 16; 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54. Aphtharsia is found in eight places. Twice it is rendered immortality, Rom ii. 7; 2 Timothy i. 10; four times "incorruption," 1 Cor. xv. 42, 50, 53, 54. It is tropically used Eph. vi. 24; Titus ii. 7, in the word "sincerity."

The only word translated "immortal" is aphthartos. This word occues in seven places. It is once rendered "immortal" 1 Tim. i. 17; once "uncorruptible," Rom. i. 23; four times "incorruptible," 1 Cor. ix. 25; xv. 52; 1 Peter i. 4, 23; once, "not corruptible," 1 Peter, iii. 4.

One reading of these texts will satisfy any candid inquirer that there are no scriptural grounds for ascribing immortality to man, except in his redeemed state at and after the resurrection. The words, "Who only hath immortality" are therefore to be taken in the strictest literal sense.

It is common for preachers, when addressing the unconverted, to use such expressions as "Prepare for eternity," "a miserable eternity," "an eternity of woe," and other equivalent utterances which are manifestly improper. The poet Young has the same idea in one of his lines—

"A dread eternity how surely mine."

The word "eternity" occurs but once in our translation of the scriptures, Isa. lvii. 15. "Thus saith the high and lofty one that inhabiteth eternity." Here God ascribes eternity to himself as a peculiarity, and evidently uses it to convey to us the highest conception of his grandeur and majesty. There are other passages of scripture in which he presents the same wondrous attribute: Deut. xxxii. 40. "I lift up my hand to heaven, and say I live forever." Ex. iii. 14—"I am that I am," etc. Instead, then, of quoting the above lines of Young, we may more properly use the succeeding two—

"And can eternity belong to me,
Poor pensioner on the bounties of an hour?"

The late Thomas De Quincy, who was one of the best Greek scholars in England, in an article on "The Supposed Scripture Expression for Eternity," says—

"I separately, speaking for myself only, profoundly believe that the scriptures ascribe absolute and metaphysical eternity to one sole Being, viz., to God; and derivatively to all others according to the interest which they can plead in God's favor. Having anchorage in God, innumerable entities may possibly be admitted to a participation in divine aeon. But what interest in the favor of God can belong to falsehood, to malignity, to impurity? To invest them with aeonian privileges is, in effect, and by its results, to distrust and to insult the Deity. Evil would not be evil if it had the power of self-subsistence which is imputed to it in supposing its aeonian life to be co-eternal with that which crowns and glorifies the good."

Here is the root of the matter. The eternal God offers to impart immortality to all those who will consent to his conditions. They are very plain. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself." How clear, how simple, how unlike the creeds and formulas of men. The gospel of Christ brings the divine plan of life-giving down to the comprehension of all. The world is dying, perishing, and has been for the last 6,000 years.

"All that tread the globe
Are but a handful to the tribes
That slumber in its bosom".

Generation after generation have succumbed to the authority of "the unrelenting death." The tears of the widow, the groans of the widower, the cries of the orphan have alike been unheeded. The combined skill and effort of the wisest physicians have been used without avail. The annals of the middle ages tell us of men who wasted their energies and sacrificed their lives in seeking for the elixir of life. In later times Ponce De Leon sought in vain for the "fountain of youth" in sunny Florida. And notwithstanding the amazing developments of science in our days, we still have to acknowledge that death reigns.

It is true that men do not consider this terrific fact. No doubt this is partly owing to the religious teachings of the age. The Serpent's lie, the pagan fable, the topmost absurdity of the "Roman dung-hill of decretals," the doctrine of man's inherent immortality, has been so faithfully preached and universally credited, that the terrors which naturally cleave to the idea of death have been comparatively dispelled by the awful phantom of never-ending torture. The most vivid imaginations have been taxed to their utmost powers for the purpose of producing images of woe terrible enough to appal the foul fiend himself, accepting the character given him in general by those who revel in these hell-pictures. For an example we quote a passage of Pollok:

"Beneath I saw a lake of burning fire,
With tempest tost perpetually, and still
The waves of fiery darkness 'gainst the rocks
Of dark damnation broke, and music made
Of melancholy sort;  and far as sight could pierce,
Or down descend in caves of hopeless depth,
Through all that dungeon of unfading fire,
I saw most miserable beings walk,
Burning continually, yet unconsumed;
Forever wasting, yet enduring still;
Dying perpetually, yet never dead.
Some wandered lonely in the desert flames,
And some in fell encounter fiercely met,
With curses loud, and blasphemies, that made
The cheek of darkness pale; and as they fought,
And cursed, and gnashed their teeth, and wished to die,
Their hollow eyes did utter streams of woe.

* * * *

And as I entered, I heard these beings curse
Almighty God, and curse the Lamb, and curse
The Earth, the Resurrection morn, and seek,
And ever vainly seek, for utter death."

There are other passages of Pollok that probably surpass even this in horror. Here we see the reason why men think so little of death, and are rather disposed to regard the idea of annihilation as terrorless. The apostolic conception of death is comparatively unknown. The great vampire, glutted with the life blood of millions, has been deified. Death is now

"The deliverer who rescues man!
Death, the rewarder, who the rescued crowns!
Death is the crown of life;
Were death denied, poor man would live in vain;
Were death denied, to live would not be life;
Death gives us more than was in Eden lost.
This king of terrors is the prince of peace.

Oh, blasphemous utterance! The Wonderful, Counsellor, the Father of eternity, the Prince of Peace, has been dethroned, and in his stead now sits "This king of terrors." How long, O Lord, how long shall this infamous usurpation continue? At the peril of being denounced as a rebel against the death government, I affirm my belief in one who hath already emanciated himself, and who promises to abolish death. Glory to God! The Lord Jesus Christ "hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." Let the glad tidings be proclaimed. Carry the news, ye servants of Jesus. Make known the mission of Christ to a dying world.

The whole scheme is compressed in the thrilling words of Paul. "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Here are presented two families of men; those who are "in Adam," and those who are "in Christ." Death is the portion of the Adamic family. Life belongs to the family of Christ. Adam's race are soulical; Christ's are spiritual. The one is earthy, the other is heavenly. The one is flesh, the other is spirit. Naturally we are all in Adam, and consequently the children of death. The only way of obtaining life is by coming to Christ. "For if, through the offence of one (Adam) many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift (of eternal life) by grace, by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many. For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ. Therefore as by the offence of one (Adam), judgment came upon all men (in Adam) to condemnation (to death;) even so by the righteousness of one (Christ) the free gift came upon all men (in Christ) unto justification of life. For as by one man's (Adam's) disobedience many (i. e., all of Adam's nature,) were made sinners, so by the obedience of one (Christ) shall many (i. e., all of Christ's nature,) be made righteous That as sin hath reigned unto death (by Adam,) even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. v. 15, 17, 18, 19, 21.

Here is seen the necessity of the new birth. We must be "in Christ," have Christ's nature in order to obtain life. "Ye must be born again." "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." "And every one that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure." It is "the children of God" who are "the children of the resurrection." Luke xx. 36

Fellow mortal, seek "anchorage in God" if you would participate in his immortality. Neglect or despise this advice, and you are "like the beasts that perish."

With the inestimable prize full in mental view, is it strange that Paul should say, "We look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen"? What is there here to possess! We live in a world of bubbles, and the most of us know by sad experience that to grasp them is to possess wind.

"All, all on earth is shadow,
And all beyond is substance."

Give me Jesus. In him is life, eternal life. Let me be persecuted, proscribed, forsaken, if it is God's will, but give me Jesus. You may have all the world. Give me Jesus.—JOSEPH T. CURRY: Bible Examiner, Aug., 1860.

Not to be Published.

In answer to various inquiries, we would state that the Discussion of several months ago, in the Brooklyn Institute, between the writer and Rev. Mr. Henson, will not be published. It was phonographically taken down, at an expense of ten dollars, but the writing out of the speeches of both speakers (twenty in number), so that they could be revised for publication, would have cost some sixty to seventy dollars more. This additional item of expense it was not thought best, all things considered, to incur; and thus the matter has rested. Had it been determined to have the speeches written out, the reporter wanted to do it while his notes were "warm"—that is, while his recollection of what was said, being fresh, would aid him in reproducing matter in the speeches which one cause and another prevented him from taking down with the desired fulness at the time of their delivery. He would probably be unable at this late day to write out the speeches in an acceptable manner. That they were not written out at all occasions the undersigned little regret, for the reason that he would not have consented to give his own part of the debate the permanence of a book or pamphlet form. All that he would have cared to do in the matter would have been to revise it for publication in successive issues of the HERALD OF LIFE. His speeches were wholly extempore; they necessarily contained much of repetition; some important points in the argument could only be glanced at, while many others could not be referred to at all. These considerations would be in his mind decisive against a book or pamplet. R. W.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, JULY 31, 1867

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Life and Advent Union.

The Anniversary of the UNION will take place under the "Chestnut Tree," in Wilbraham, Mass., nine miles east of Springfield, at 2 o'clock on Friday, August 23, that being the spot where the Union was organized and which gave birth to the HERALD OF LIFE. (An informal meeting at 10 A. M.) The continuance of this paper will be one of the chief topics to be considered and decided on at the coming anniversary. If it is to be continued, there will need to be, at least, as strong an effort to sustain it as has has yet been made; and its friends must not think less exertion on their part will insure its continuance than was put forth at our last meeting. These are not words of discouragement, but simply to put all its friends on their guard against supposing that they can safely slacken their efforts. The paper has been marvellously sustained hitherto; but we shall be in debt on the present volume at our coming anniversary, unless we receive aid before, beyond the means we have on hand. Nevertheless, if all will do their best we shall be able to cancel this debt before we meet, or at the meeting, and obtain pledges that will warrant our going on as we have done for four years past. But in order to this let every one tell us at once what you can and will do for this object. We must hear from you before or at our anniversary meeting, if you wish to decide the matter of continuance as heretofore. If you are not to be at our meeting, do no lay down this number till you have decided what response to make to our statement of the matter, and write us immediately.

The First Temptation.

In our previous article we showed the process of temptation so far as relates to the children of Adam; and we now wish to see if it is probable that the first temptation was carried on in a manner entirely different, as the advocates for a personal devil, hid in the serpent, maintain. That the serpent could not talk, Dr. Adam Clarke admits and contends; and to overcome this difficulty he sets to work to make out that what is called "the serpent" was an ape, i. e., a monkey. That is more rational than the idea that a serpent was employed as a speaking "medium" for a concealed fallen angel. But both positions are suppositions unnecessary to explain the "facts;" and a natural and rational explanation can be given to the process of the temptation without resorting to such speculations.

1. Take the "fact" that "the serpent was more subtle [wise] than any beast of the field," etc.

2. Add the "fact" that our first parents were created "intelligent beings," with the desire or lust for knowledge or wisdom, but were prohibited indulging that desire by partaking of the fruit of a certain tree; and that death would be the result of disobedience.

3. Now add another probable fact, viz., that Eve saw "the serpent" eat of that fruit, and pass unharmed; still living, beautiful, active, and wise above "every beast of the field."

And a 4th fact: "She saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise." Now we are prepared for the mental dialogue, which shows the process by which lust or desire "conceived."

MENTAL DIALOGUE.

1.—Hath not God said, Ye shall not eat of that tree; "lest ye die"?

Ans.—True; but I see the serpent eat of it; and he does not die.

2.—There must then be some mistake in understanding the prohibition; for you see, instead of injury, energy and wisdom is the result in the serpent's case. How can it be possible, then, that the wise Creator has absolutely prohibited eating of that fruit?

Ans.—True; I see that it is so: there must be a "mistake."

3.—"Ye shall not surely die"—that is manifest from what is seen; and it must be that God knew that ye should only get an increase of knowledge, and thus be as Himself: ye will be wiser, and thus be happier. Must ye then restrain yourselves?

By this mental process, the woman was "drawn away" by her "own lust" or desire for wisdom and knowledge, "and enticed." Thus "lust conceived"—became impregnated, and travail commenced.

The next step was the birth itself. "Sin" was brought "forth:" "she took of the fruit, and did eat;" and then the sin was "finished" by the following process, "She gave also unto her husband with her, and he did eat." Not till then was "sin finished:" not till then had the climax been reached which made "death" certain. "Sin is the transgression of the law." But if one transgresses a law by accident, or through misapprehension, that is a mitigation of the offence, and the utmost rigor of the law may not be inflicted on them. But if the transgression was done knowingly and wilfully, the "sin is finished;" that is, it has no plea for a mitigation of the threatened punishment.

In the case of Adam and Eve: "the woman being deceived was" [first] "in the transgression," saith Paul, 1 Tim. ii. 14. "Adam was not deceived," saith the same apostle. Sin, then, was not "finished" by the woman's eating: there was a mitigating circumstance in her case, at first; she was "deceived." But she stops not to plead that circumstance; and by her after course with her husband loses the benefit of it, by turning tempter to him, and leading him to transgress wilfully; for he was not deceived. He let his love of the woman rise above the authority of God, as many of his sons have done since. Now, sin was "finished;" and "it bringeth forth death"—the law will have its course.

It was not "an invisible, intelligent, evil being," hid in the serpent, that talked to Eve: no such "fact" is found in the record in Genesis, nor elsewhere in the Bible; it is a bare assumption, totally lacking in authority. If our explanation is affirmed to be an assumption, also, it has this advantage of the opposite one, it is reasonable, and has universal experience on its side, as every one knows who has at all watched the process of temptation in his own mind; while the opposite theory is unreasonable, impossible without a miracle, and contrary to all experience; and only tends to furnish men with an excuse for their sins, by the idea that their Creator sustains in existence an evil being, a hidden, secret enemy, full of the most exalted skill to entice and lead astray, and suffers this enemy to have access, at all times and in all places, to the minds of all men, to draw them into sin: and allows him to be successful with the vast majority of the human race in bringing about their total and irrecoverable destruction. Our "intellect" perceives neither reason, necessity, nor evidence that God has established or permits such a system of administration in the government of this world. It is asked,

"If all the devil there is is to be found in ourselves, why was the serpent punished at all? That he was, is clearly set forth in the record. 'Because thou hast done this'—beguiled the woman—'thou art cursed above all cattle,' etc."

It is not so clear that "the serpent" was "punished at all." But it is said, he was "cursed." Mark, however, he was so only "above" the other "cattle;" so that "all cattle" were cursed by, or in consequence of, the sin of Adam and Eve; but the serpent "above," or more especially, because he had been the occasion of leading Eve into sin, and it is a natural consequence that the person or thing which is the occasion of leading us into trouble becomes the object of our dislike, hence "thou art cursed above all cattle," only expresses a natural result to the serpent, that it would be a peculiar object of hatred to Eve and her seed; and as the serpent could only "go upon" his "belly," his "head" would be peculiarly exposed to be "bruised." That the curse pronounced had a symbolical significance, we can readily admit; but that it was in the light of punishment, to that beast, we cannot for a moment allow, any more than we can that the soil was cursed for letting the serpent run over it; for God said to Adam, "Cursed is the ground," etc. The whole earth failed, for the time being, of putting on that beauty and fertility which God provided for when he gave Adam the Garden of Eden as a sample of what He wished the earth to be, and said to the first pair, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it:" that is, "I give you Eden as a pattern to work by: multiply a posterity, and let them make the whole earth like Eden." Adam sinned; lost his pattern; and as he had substituted his own wisdom for the wisdom of God, or sought knowledge in a forbidden way, God left him to make a full experiment in himself and by his posterity of their wisdom in the work of subduing the earth without a pattern to work by. The consequence is, "the earth groaneth," under the slow and uncertain work of ever becoming like Eden again, and is said to be cursed: not as its punishment, but as a result of man's disobedience. The serpent is cursed, or his condition is among the "groaning creation," and it is peculiarly unpleasant from the hostile attitude of Eve's children to that "beast of the field."

We have no idea of saying all that might be said on "the first temptation;" nor of presenting all the evidence we have against the many assumptions of the advocates of a personal spirit devil; but something more will be brought out when we come to consider the temptation of "the man, Christ Jesus." Till then all we ask is, a calm and dispassionate consideration of what we have presented, by holding in abeyance our traditionary education till the subject is fairly present.

Our Annual Meeting.

The fourth Annual Meeting of "THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION" will be held under the Chestnut Tree in the vicinity of Wilbraham Camp-meeting, on Friday, August 23d. A general attendance of all who feel an interest in the welfare of the HERALD OF LIFE, as the only existing periodical devoted to the advocacy of Life in Christ, is desired. There will probably be an informal gathering of the friends, for mutual consultation, previous to the regular meeting for the election of officers and the transaction of business. Such an informal meeting was held last year, and was found serviceable in our subsequent deliberations. I was in Philadelphia last week, and saw Br. Jacob Grim, the President of our "Union." He expects to attend the Annual Meeting, and the time above named is that which will suit him best; his business engagements making it impracticable for him to start for Wilbraham earlier than Thursday, Aug. 22d.

RUFUS WENDELL, Secretary.

New-York July 30, 1867.

Come, or Send Letters!

It is greatly desired that as many of our friends as can consistently do so, shall attend the approaching Anniversary, at Wilbraham, in person; and that they shall come prepared to assist in devising the ways and means whereby the burden of continuing our paper, as respects the raising of money, shall be made to rest where it properly belongs. It is also desired that those who cannot attend the Meeting personally, but whose hearts are in the work, shall represent themselves by letter. These may be sent to the writer at Salem, Mass., or to the Editor of our paper. Do not defer the writing of your letter till the last moment, but set about it at your first opportunity. And let us this year have a host of them. Do you want the paper continued as a weekly? If so, are you willing to do what you can to support its publication? If you are, then tell us what you can and will do. Some patrons of the paper prize it exceedingly. A brother, who with his entire household, has recently been excluded from the Baptist Church for believing the doctrine of Life only in Christ, told us the other day that he would not for ten dollars miss of seeing a single issue of the HERALD OF LIFE. It seems desirable that persons who feel like that should not be compelled to lose the paper altogether. But if it is to go on, who will help meet the expenses? That's the question. What is your answer? R. W.

What is Death?

CRUDEN, in his Concordance, under the word Death, thus expounds its meaning, and the nature of the curse which Adam has transmitted to his posterity.

"Death," he says, "signifies the separation of the soul from the body,—this is temporal death. A separation of soul and body from God's favor in this life, which is the state of all unregenerated and unrenewed persons who are without the light of knowledge, and the quickening power of grace,—this is spiritual death. The perpetual separation of the whole man from God's heavenly presence and glory, to be tormented for ever with the devil and his angels,—this is the second death, or eternal death. To all these kinds of death Adam made himself and his posterity liable, by transgressing the commandment of God in eating the forbidden fruit."

This strange and unnatural definition of the scripture word death, is that which is generally held by modern Christian teachers. Can such extravagances fail to shock the understandings of an intelligent and truth-seeking people? Who can be surprised that such teaching should furnish a theme for the severest sarcasms of the skeptic, and enable him to point the finger of scorn at the Christian profession? If the above be the definition of the scripture term death, then it must be applied, to be consistent, to other passages where this word occurs. "We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man." Heb. ii, 9.

According therefore to the definition given by Cruden, Christ must have suffered this threefold death. 1. Temporal death, or the separation of soul and body. 2. Spiritual death, or the separation of the whole nature from God's favor in this life. 3. Eternal death, or the perpetual separation of the whole man from God, to be tormented for ever with the devil and his angels! Can any one believe that Christ suffered this? Of course not; not even the "orthodox" believe this, though in consistency they should. They urge a commutation theory to remove their difficulty.

In the following passage the word death occurs three times. "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their life time subject to bondage." Heb. ii, 14, 15.

Now the common-sense principle of interpretation requries us to understand that the death mankind feared, the death the devil had the power of, and the death which Christ died, are all the same. If, therefore, it is the threefold death which Satan had the power of, and mankind feared, Christ must have suffered this threefold death. But this would have made redemption impossible, because one element in this death is eternal torment in a state of perpetual banishment from God! Modern theologians and scripture are as much at variance, on this topic, as their theology is at variance with common sense. The passage just quoted, moreover, obliges the conclusion that death in the apostolic age, and prior to that period, had no such mystic sense as that which now has the accredited seal of popular theology, viz: a separation of the conscious and immortal soul from the unconscious body; that, on the contrary, it was regarded as a complete and dreaded dominion over the entire conscious humanity, which blasted the hopes, froze the energies, and broke the spirits of the race so far as no clearly defined views of a future life by resurrection were possessed. Under such circumstances, its melancholy anticipation sat like an incubus upon the life-loving heart of humanity—it was a "bondage" which clung with dismal and oppressive tenacity to them all their life-time, and from which they could only be effectually delivered by a sure and certain hope of resurrection from the dead, through the resurrection of Christ. Surely, it was the fear of this all-engulfing death, not of the threefold death of modern theology, which begat the "bondage" of which the text speaks.

"Are the Wicked finally Annihilated?"

Under the above caption a writer in the Oberlin Evangelist, a few years since, professed to be "seeking light," and endeavored to show the Scriptures are against an affirmative answer to his question. We saw only his article "No 4." His first argument in that, is drawn from our Lord's words in relation to the sin against the Holy Ghost. He said:

"Mathew records it—'Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world nor the world to come.' Mark has it—'He that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation:' i. e., is held to—bound over to eternal damnation."

On this presentation of our Lord's words the writer proceeded to say:

"We are seeking light from the words of Jesus in regard to that 'world to come;' especially we wish to know whether the wicked—e, g., those who have blasphemed the Holy Ghost—are existing, or have utterly ceased to be. The Saviour solemnly assures us that in that world they shall not be forgiven. Is it supposable that he knew they would be then and there mere non-entities? Is it supposable that he affirmed respecting blank nothing, that it should never be forgiven—that its sin—the sin of one now become nothing—could never have forgiveness? Did he teach that a blank non-entity is held under eternal damnation? When he said of the blasphemer, his sin shall not be forgiven in this world, did he not assume that the blasphemer of whom he spake, existed? And when he adds, 'neither in the world to come,' did he not equally and as much assume the existence of the blasphemer there?"

Our friend professed to be "seeking light from the words of Jesus;" and as he wrote under the bright shining of the Oberlin Institute, it may be thought presumptuous in us to attempt to help him to what he seems not to have obtained at that Institute; yet we can not refrain from offering him our feeble aid.

1. Had he consulted Dr. BLOOMFIELD's Critical Notes on the Greek New Testament, edited by Prof. STUART, he would have been saved from some of his difficulties. Dr. B., says on Math. xii: 32, "neither in this world neither in the world to come,"—"According to a common proverb, never. See the Rabbinical citations in Recens. Synop. For presumptuous sins, like this, no expiation was provided, even under the Jewish law."

2. This writer overlooked the fact that our Lord was not speaking of this life and a future one; but of this aioni—this age—the Jewish age in which he spake; and that age to come, viz, the Christian age, or dispensation. In neither of these ages was there any provision for the forgiveness of the sin which is characterized as blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. Had our friend seen this light he would have been saved all his questions, which he put forth with so much apparent sincerity. Oberlin Institute ought to have given him this.

3. Would our friend be willing to "assume" that any sinner will have forgiveness "in the world to come?" meaning, as he evidently does, the life to come? If not, then it is no more true of a "blasphemer" than of any other sinner, that he "hath never forgiveness;" and our Lord's words are deprived of their force, which is to show that a peculiar sin is never forgiven, while other sins, even "against the Son of man" may be forgiven. Our Oberlin friend will not, we presume, assert that sins against Jesus may be forgiven "in the world to come." Yet our Lord's words expressly declare, "Whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him."

4. Will our friend read Mark iii: 28, 29 entire, instead of his partial extract? and also, read Luke xii: 10? If he will, he will discover he is in error as to what is meant by "the world to come," or else our Lord's words, as recorded by the three Evangelists, show that "all sins" except the one named, may be forgiven in "that world." Is he willing to grant so much to the Universalists? Did Dr. WATTS express a Bible truth when he said, "There are no acts of pardon past, in the cold grave to which we haste"?

The Resurrection: Anastasis.

We have often in times past referred to Dr. BLOOMFIELD's critical notes on the Greek New Testament, edited by Prof. STUART. Recently in looking at his remarks on the question of the Sadducees and our Lord's reply, relating to the resurrection, we observed some important statements, or admissions. On Matt. xxii. 23 he says:

"There is little doubt but that the phrase anastasis ton nekron, or anastasis, denoted, in common parlance, and agreeably to the general doctrines of the Pharisees, the resurrection of the soul as well as the body, and the reunion of both in a future state. Though, at the same time, the ideas of the Pharisees themselves (and still more the people at large) as to the nature of that future life were very vague, and occasionally founded on the notions of the heathens. So that our Lord's reply was, in wisdom, so framed as not only to refute the Sadducean doctrines, but remove the misconceptions of the Pharisees; and thus to benefit not only the unbelievers of the doctrine of the resurrection, but the misbelievers."

On the foregoing statement of Dr. Bloomfield, we remark, first—The resurrection of the dead—anastasis ton nekron—"denoted, in common parlance," or discourse, even with the "Pharisees," not a resurrection of "the body," merely, but "of the soul." In other words, it embraced whatever constituted the man—the entire manhood. Let this fact be remembered; and it follows, that when Christ and his apostles speak of the resurrection of the dead, "in common parlance," the soul is included, whatever that soul is. No matter what the Pharisees meant by the immortality of the soul, so long as they maintained it must have a resurrection in order to a future life; they clearly had no idea of a future life to disembodied human souls.

Second: The Pharisees, it seems, held to a "re-union" of souls and bodies in a future state; hence it was that they taught the transmigration of souls; i. e., the passing of their fancied immortal souls into other bodies at death; without which those souls would have no resurrection, and could not live, in their estimation. Their notions "as to the nature of that life were very vague, and occasionally founded on the notions of the heathens," says Dr. Bloomfield. It is evident from all this, that the Pharisees were ignorant of the true nature of the resurrection, though in words they held to a resurrection. This Dr. Bloomfield admits by saying, "Our Lord's reply [to the Sadducees] was so framed as" .... "to remove the misconceptions of the Pharisees," who were "the misbelievers." They professedly believed in "the resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust;" but their views were false and erroneous in several particulars. First: The resurrection they advocated was a necessary result of the supposed immortality of the soul, which, leaving its present tenement behind at death, must have another body to enter, in order to its continued life; such was their resurrection of body and soul, and "re-union in another life."

Another error of the Pharisees' doctrine of resurrection was, that it embraced "both the just and the unjust." The unjust, however, with them, included only the Jews, and not men of other nations. If a man was a literal child of Abraham, through Isaac, he would be saved, or have a resurrection, though he had been unjust; such was Pharisaic pride and error. Dr. Bloomfield says—"Our Lord's reply was, in wisdom, so framed as not only to refute the Sadducean doctrines, but to remove the misconceptions of the Pharisees; and thus to benefit not only the unbelievers of the doctrine of the resurrection, but the misbelievers;" that is, those who did not believe aright on the subject. The Sadducees denied that there is to be "any resurrection of the dead," either of the good or bad. Jesus refutes them by showing that there is to be a resurrection of the good, and at the same time refutes the Pharisaic notion of the resurrection of the wicked dead; for he teaches distinctly that the resurrected ones "are as the angels of God in heaven;" which could not be said of the wicked dead if revived into life. And Jesus gives "Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob," as the samples of those "which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world" [the future life] "even the resurrection from the dead;" Luke xx.

With the two-edged sword of truth our Lord hews in pieces the Pharisees' false notion of the transmigration of souls and the resurrection of the wicked dead, while he demonstrates to the Sadducees the resurrection of the righteous dead. Thus, truly, did he "refute the Sadducean doctrines," and "remove the misconceptions of the Pharisees," and correct their misbelief. But they were "fools and blind," and did not profit by his teaching. Bound up in their "own traditions," like thousands in these days, they still adhered to their errors, as we learn from Paul's testimony, Acts xxiv. 15, where he states that his Jewish accusers "allow there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust," while they found fault with him for maintaining the resurrection of Jesus, and of those who "fall asleep in him."

Paul's doctrine of the resurrection was one which was an object of "hope;" not of fear or dread. He never speaks of any other resurrection of the dead, to be looked for, but that of such as fall "asleep in Christ." For preaching this he was accused of the Pharisaic Jews; yet they themselves allowed there would be a more extensive resurrection than Paul contended for; even of "both the just and unjust;" for such an extensive resurrection Paul never said one word in all his preaching or epistles; but, on the other hand, he proclaimed the resurrection from the dead as an object of "hope," to be sought for most diligently, and to be bestowed only on those in Christ; hence he saith, he labored and suffered "if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Phil. iii. 11.

How to judge of "Heresy."

"We have a right to judge of the truth of any doctrine by its relations to vital godliness in the world.....Is it not a fact that all great religious reformers, as Luther, Calvin, Wesley, Edwards, and many more, have been firm believers in the immortality of the soul, and the certainty of future retribution? And have not all marked instances of religious awakening been promoted by making these very doctrines the special burden of religious instruction and exhortation? Do not our modern revivals occur exclusively in those churches in which these tenets are professed?....We are not prepared to grant that the holding and teaching of error is the best way to save souls; and yet we must so believe, if we hold the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and future judgment to be untrue." —Abel Stevens, D. D.

We remark first, on the foregoing—"Luther" was not a "firm believer in the immortality of the soul;" and he ranked that doctrine among the "Roman dung-hill decretals;" at least, such was the fact in the early part of his life. In his defence, (published 1520,) which was condemned by Leo X, he states—"I permit the Pope to make articles of faith for himself and his faithful; such as that he is Emperor of the world, King of heaven, and God upon earth—that the soul is immortal, with all those monstrous opinions to be found in the Roman dung-hill of decretals."—See Luther's Defence, Proposition XXVII.

As to Dr. Stevens' not being "prepared to grant, that the holding and teaching error is the best way to save souls," and that "our modern revivals occur exclusively in the churches in which" his views of immortality are held, we have only to say, it does not tally very well with his own and some of his friends' affirmations, that the doctrine of "annihilation, in its recent manifestation, originated among some of the victims of the Millerite delusion." Can he show, from the history of "modern revivals," a greater attention to religion, and more "souls converted" than were converted under that same "delusion," as he calls it? He says, he is "not prepared to grant that holding and teaching error is the best way to save souls;" yet what he calls the "Millerite delusion," produced one of the most "marked instances of religious awakening" of modern times. Where are the records of an awakening, under preaching, that equals that of the "Millerite delusion?" Does he say—"The souls converted then were only frightened into religion and were not stable." The same may be said of thousands in any of the "modern revivals." The records of the Methodist E. Church will show, that in the year of the greatest excitement under what Dr. S. calls a "delusion," more souls were added to the Methodist E. Church, than any previous or subsequent year of its history, in the United States. We think the "Minutes" of that church, in that year, give one hundred and fifty thousand additions; and this, as is undeniable, was largely the result of a "delusion," if we credit Dr. Stevens.

He is "not prepared to grant that the holding and teaching of error is the best way to save souls;" and yet facts prove this very way has promoted the greatest revival of "modern times," if Millerism was a "delusion." We do not say whether it was such or not; it is of no consequence to our argument. It is shown, out of the Doctor's own mouth, that a great "religious awakening" may be produced by what he calls a "delusion:" therefore, the fact that such revivals have been produced by preaching the immortality of the soul, etc., is no evidence that such doctrine is true, and may be evidence that the doctrine he defends, as truth, is a "delusion!" The effect of any doctrine in producing excitement, even if it be on religious subjects, is no evidence of its truth, and may be evidence of its falsehood. The preaching of our Lord Jesus Christ produced no such excitement as these "modern revivals," nor did the preaching of his apostles, if we except that of the day of pentecost, which was by an outpouring of the Holy Spirit for the special confirmation of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. The general work of turning men from sin to serve God, even in the days of the apostles, was as unlike "modern revivals" as a calm, sober action, produced on persons enlightened by truth, is unlike much of the "modern" excitement, caused by an unnatural stimulus, which often blazes like a meteor, to make darkness deeper; and which makes the victims callous, ever after, to all truth, and fits them for open or secret infidelity: because, when the excitement is passed that called them out, few are found having any enlightened principle of action. It was not truth that made them converts, but excitement—the passions aroused, but not balanced by an enlightened understanding. Such is the character of many of these "modern revivals," which Dr. Stevens says are produced "exclusively in the churches" holding the "tenets" he advocates on immortality.

While we concede the fact, that some, who profess religion in these "modern revivals," are truly converted to the service of God, we do not admit that many such were the fruits of preaching the immortality of the soul and endless torments. For the most part, it will be found, that the genuine converts were brought to Christ by a previous training in the knowledge of the love of Christ, either by their parents or Christian friends. Those who are aroused by the excitement of the moment, without this previous training, are seldom found to abide long after the excitement is past. The credit of this spurious action, and the "falling away" that follows it, we are quite willing to acknowledge does "occur exclusively in those churches in which" the doctrines of immortal souls and endless torments "are professed" to be believed; but we have yet to learn that the "professors" of those doctrines strive more to live in conformity with the will of God, than some of us whom they revile.

Moreover, not a single inspired speaker or writer ever used the phrase "immortal soul," or "deathless spirit." This fact, of itself, shows that Bible revivals differed essentially, in the doctrines which produced them, from these "modern revivals:" a large portion of the subjects of these show themselves bigots, instead of loving the truth.

Letters and Extracts.

From T. W. Vaughn.

MIDDLE BASS, OHIO, July 6, 1867.

TO CORRESPONDENTS: Dear Brethren:—My letter, written Oct. 6, 1866, should have appeared in the HERALD OF LIFE soon after, in order to allow me the idle winter months to answer such inquiries as might be expected, to redeem my pledge. But not appearing until March, the busy scenes of spring toil deprived me of the pleasure of answering the numerous, and I doubt not anxious, correspondents which the letter invited.

As it was, several long letters were sent in answer to the subject; but of course could give but a faint outline of the grand theme proposed.

Inasmuch as we are fully committed to the belief that "The meek shall inherit the earth," Matthew v. 5, and also to the time when Psalm xxxviii. 9, 11, 22, 34, etc., shall be fulfilled, we should naturally form some opinion of the inheritance, not doubting but that it was complete in all its parts when God gave it to Adam, declaring it to be "very good." Gen. i. 31.

The questionable position arrived at by modern geologists, to say nothing of their contradictory opinions, led me some twenty years ago to "read the rocks" for myself; and I find that they speak a different language from that "taught in the schools." Geology, like theology, has drifted from safe moorings. Allow me to refer you to one or two instances in proof of this. Professor Louis Agassiz, in his lectures a short time ago in New York and other places, in referring to glacial action, starts from the Alps, arrives in Scotland, finds its track there next in Nova Scotia, then the United States; and in South Carolina finds infallible signs of "vast fields of ice" covering the land with its desolating presence, in silence for ages!!

We next find him under the Equator describing a mammoth glacier covering the whole valley of the Amazon, at least twelve hundred miles in diameter beneath a vertical sun. It requires a mind very, very passive to digest such stuff. But again, the Professor finds this vast field of ice, moving over this almost level plain sufficient to "grind the surface" of the ground throughout this plain, according to his professional eye. This, of itself, ought to put credulity to its utmost tension. Now, what are the facts in the case?

According to the U. S. survey by Lieut. Herndon, we find the same phenomena 200 ft. below the surface, described as "glacial action" by the Professor.

In my examination of those grooves, and other signs of drift, I find an abundance of positive evidence, first, that the moving mass was quite elastic, or a semi-liquid substance, mingled with detached blocks of stone, partly petrified, as also those sheets over which they moved; in fact, the earth was "destroyed, perished." Compare Gen. vi. 13, vii. 11, with 2 Peter iii. 6.

Second, that the laws of gravitation or the centripetal and centrifugal forces were suspended or neutralized during that awful period when "God shook terribly the earth." And thus we find the earth at present in a ruined condition.

Again the Professor astonishes his hearers by an account of man's probable origin.

He thinks Dr. Barnes and others may be correct in supposing the human race to have descended from the ape; but he is quite sure the "different races of men have sprung from the different races of apes."

I presume the Professor was thoroughly confirmed in this opinion while wandering over the pampas of Brazil, where the races of men and apes are to be found returning to their normal condition; but what about the immortal part in these hybrids, where begin and end?

But let us endeavor to ventilate this subject a little. Whatever geology may teach of man, we shall find a superior race. We can only judge from original specimens, but it is presumed that the first man was not less than eleven feet high; probably much taller. As to his physique, it must have been sublime and glorious, inasmuch as the gentile nations retained traditional impressions of the majestic glory of the Son of God. Dan. iii. 25; Job xxxviii. 7; also see Daniel vii. 9, 10.

This evidence is strengthened from the fact that all created beings receive a luminous radiance from the near approach of the Deity. Exodus xxxiv. 29, 35.

Of the intelligence of the first pair, it is only necessary to add that God was their Teacher.

It has become evident to my mind that infidelity is rapidly spreading its poison in every department of science, and by those professing to instruct the masses. "But, brethren, ye are not in darkness"—"walk while ye have the light"—"beware of men" claiming distinguishing titles; but "let God be true and every man a liar."

To those who have wished for my evidences as above I would say, be patient with me for a time; my hands are tied with excessive labor; not talking or writing, but working with my hands to supply nature's demands. As winter returns I shall probably be at liberty again; and if so, I shall try to meet your expectations.

There is no theme so cheering to my heart as the contemplation of the future as God will have it; and the best point of observation I find, in order to obtain a correct idea of it, is to learn God's purpose in creating the earth a paradise. He will restore it. "Thy kingdom come." Your brother, waiting for the LIFE-GIVER.

From Thomas M. Redhead.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., July 29, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—Enclosed I send you five dollars to help make up the deficiency of the HERALD OF LIFE for this year; and I cheerfully subscribe five dollars a copy for two copies for next year, and will also give ten dollars as a donation.

My appreciation of the dear HERALD OF LIFE is such, that I would not take ten dollars and miss seeing a single copy.

From Helen Robertson.

PHILADELPHIA, July 21, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—I last wrote you, just before leaving Alexandria, and told you I had engaged to be Matron of the Rosine Home, in Philadelphia. When I was here in April I made arrangements, if the Lord was willing, to come when my time would expire in the South. I did hope that the former Matron would stay two or three weeks longer, and give me an opportunity of going North before entering on my new duties; but she did not; and I had to come right away. I intended to have written you sooner, but could not. This is the first I have written since leaving Alexandria. My duties here are many and varied, and seem to occupy my whole time; but hitherto I have had the Lord's blessing, and all under my charge has gone right. I greatly feel the need of the wisdom which cometh from above, which is profitable to direct. But, bless the Lord, I know where to go for that wisdom, and also know that I don't go in vain. I find it good to feel myself one of Father's little children, and thus feeling that I am nothing, and have no wisdom of my own, I go to Father for daily and hourly supplies. O, the precious secret of casting all our care upon the Lord, believing that he cares for us, simply performing ardent and important duties, yet feeling that these duties have no weight upon us. Why? Because we neglect them? No: but because we have cast our burden on the Lord, and he bears it so entirely that it don't rest a feather weight on us. Truly, the secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; and he that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. How good to know this secret place, and to dwell in it. There we find all we need, and are satisfied. In his presence is fulness of joy, and at his right hand are pleasures forever more. Since we have such blessings and peace here, what will it be to be with him, like him, and see him as he is? I long for the happy day, and pray, Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly. Yet pray in perfect submission; willing patiently to wait his own time. How good and happy to have no will of our own; but leave all with Father, contented to take whatever he grants or denies, feeling that he knows best, and will always give us what is for our highest good.

On my way north I spent one day in Washington, and two or three in Baltimore. Got a new subscriber in Baltimore, and shall inclose the address with the two dollars for one year. Peace be with thee, and with all the Israel of God. Your sister in patient hope.

From H. K. Whitcomb.

CORINNA, ME., July 17, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—Enclosed find $2 for the HERALD, which I have received on credit since last September. I have been sick since last December: have not done an hour's work; that is the reason I have not sent before. I would gladly send more money if I could; for I prize the paper highly. I hope it will continue. I mean to be in the field as soon as health will permit, trying to do the will of my Father in heaven. We are having some strange preaching here, just at present. The "time" is, or has been, the leading theme; but at present a new doctrine of election is taking the lead (all timeists), which is said to be spreading very fast. I will give you some of the leading points as I gather from hearing.

There are two distinct classes (literally) which compose the human family: i. e., Cain is a son of the devil and a head of a race doomed to destruction of necessity. Seth, son of Adam, also, is a representative of those called "the elect." But I cannot stop to write particularly about them at present, more than this, that the two classes are fully shown in Israel and Ishmael; and those of their literal seed constitute the two classes, and that God made them so; and they could not help themselves. It is preached with as much zeal as ever the "time" was. I fear that out of this will grow something as fatal as the "shut door." It is a twin doctrine to definite time; or a result of that doctrine. May the God of heaven save us from fanaticism.

REMARK BY THE EDITOR.—We trust such folly and madness, as that you speak of, will soon exhaust itself. "Be sober; be vigilant," is an exhortation we all need in these days when men cannot live without "excitement." When this takes the lead, there is no knowing what fanaticism will result from it. Woe to him who is ensnared by it.

REUBEN CADWELL, Cortland, N. Y., writes:—BR. STORRS, I expect to be able to send you one hundred and fifty dollars by the first of September, to aid in the publication of the HERALD OF LIFE. You may put me down this amount for this purpose. I am as anxious as ever that our good paper should be issued weekly.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We are glad to get the above response from our aged brother, who is, if we mistake not, our senior in years. May our covenant God guide him safely to his kingdom and glory.

MRS. ANN M. DICKINSON, Cleveland, Ohio, writes:—As for the support of my only preacher, the HERALD OF LIFE, I feel bound to do what I can. The Lord willing, I will send you three dollars the 15th of September. May the Lord raise up friends to sustain the only paper that advocates the truth as it is in his word. Our Saviour saith, I am the way, and the door. Yes, more; he has power in the morning of the resurrection to bring his children from the enemy's land; and as they come forth they can shout and say, O death, where is thy sting? O grave, were thy victory?

S. COOPER, Windsor, Conn, writes:—Enclosed you will find $3 for the HERALD, or for such purpose as you see it is most needed. Relative to the paper, or "times and seasons," I have but little to say: have no fault to find: hope the paper will be sustained. I expect, if the Lord will, I shall be able to pay $10 for a copy of it for the coming year, if time rolls on. Can't say that I believe or hope it will, but desire to have my heart purified, my loins girt about, my lamp trimmed and burning, ready to hail with joy our Saviour and LIFE-GIVER when he comes. Yours in love and hope.

G. H. DANFORTH, Norwichtown, Conn, writes:—I see the annual meeting is close at hand; and I desire to do something for the cause of Christ and his truth; so, I pledge $10 for one copy of the HERALD OF LIFE. I will do something more, if possible, but dare not pledge any more at present. The HERALD OF LIFE I consider most essential: it must be sustained at all hazards.

A. L. ALLEN, Somers, Conn., writes:—If man is mortal (and I verily believe he is) the principle of "No life out of Christ" is in perfect harmony with the Bible, and with common sense. I never could see the use of bringing dead men to life just to take their life again. In political economy it would be called cruel. I look upon the resurrection of the righteous, only, as a true and beautiful doctrine.

This summer has been one of the coolest known for many years in this section. The rain has been excessive for over two months past. The potatoes are generally blighted owing to this state of weather. The reports of the last few months about an abundant crop of all kinds of grain and fruit are being verified in the harvesting of them now going on.

Summary of News.

BY W. M.

DOMESTIC.

Since the adjournment of Congress, politicians have been devoting their entire attention to the South. It is now universally accepted that the policy known as that of Congress, is to prevail in the settlement of the late Rebel States; even President Johnson has come to that belief. The whole matter will finally end, as we have often stated, in a general amnesty to all political offenders, with the acceptance of impartial suffrage. The most influential Democratic journal in the country, the World, says "it is not just to state that our party is opposed to granting equal civil and political rights to the colored man, because it has opposed some of the pernicious measures of the radical Republicans." The power to control the destinies of the country being in the hands of the Republican party, and the pacification and reinstatement of the late Rebel States in the Union being essential to the maintenance of that power, it must seek the aid of the leading rebels, who are the only men who can accomplish that work. They embrace all the brains and whatever social worth existed in that section. They can exercise an influence for good, as they did for evil, whenever they are satisfied it is the only hope for them and their prostrated country. The best of this class having already signified their willingness to co-operate in the restoration of their States to the Union, in accordance with the laws lately adopted, the rest of the work seems clear and simple. Of course, there will arise difficulties and troubles to embitter the stages of transformation. In Tennessee, riots and bloodshed are expected in the election to take place on the 2d August. So it will likely be in other States; but the good sense of the country will yet come to judge rightly, and acquiesce in the policy so happily inaugurated.

FOREIGN.

Rumors are continually passing over the cable that trouble is brewing among the nations of Europe. Now it is France against Prussia, then Prussia against France. Austria is again made a party and then Russia. Austria is not endowed with a superfluity of christian grace, and may therefore be understood as only abiding her opportunity to pay back Prussia for the humiliation the latter power inflicted on her last year. Napoleon, with no more grace, can hardly be expected to overlook the ignominious attitude in which Bismarck has placed him on several occasions. The latter astute statesman has also his little account to settle for the part Napoleon took in compelling him to back out rather ingloriously from Luxemburg, by appealing to the powers of Europe.

Western Mission.

We regret to find that BR. HANFORD cannot arrange his affairs so as to go west this summer. He says, in a note to us:

"I have purposely delayed an answer, hoping the difficulty might be removed; but the Lord seems to order otherwise, and I yield. Let Brn. Billings, Walter, and Lewis grasp the sword of the Spirit, and take the shield of faith and do battle for the Lord valiantly; for soon he will say, 'It is enough: come up higher.' In hope of speedy redemption, I remain, as ever, your brother in Christ."

Of the money pledged to support Br. H. in his visit west only $16 have been paid in. Unless otherwise directed by the donors, we will apply that amount for books and tracts to send to the brethren named by H. above. If more of the pledges should be sent us, we propose to apply it in the same way.

APPOINTMENTS.

I will preach at NEW BRITAIN, Ct., Sunday, Aug. 4. PLYMOUTH, Mass, Sunday, Aug. 18 and 25.

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS, Price, 20 cents, Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These question are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy" —more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS.—Price 5 cents.

No. 4. THE SOUL SAVED OR LOST. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS.—Price 5 cents.

No. 5. MORAL DEPRAVITY: by GEO. STORRS Price, 5 cents.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: or, THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTER TO A CLERGYMAN; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by DR. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburgh, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for two cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but, in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent or 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

The following are 12 mo Tracts, of 24 pages each: MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

All Letters in relation to any of these works must be addressed,

GEO. STORRS,
Box 4658, NEW YORK.

Special Notice.

It will be seen that we have withdrawn from our CATALOGUE our work on "Man's Destiny;" being the Review of the "Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D.," in support of inherent immortality. We have not a copy of the work left; and the high price of paper, together with the limited demand for the work, forbid expending money in publishing another edition, at present, to say nothing of the lack of funds if we wished to do it.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1; in paper cover to 70 cents; and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchaser of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues are hereby revoked.

Poetry.

A PRESENT SAVIOUR.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

We may not climb the heavenly steeps
  To bring the Lord Christ down;
In vain we search the lowest deeps,
  For him no depths can drown.

But warm, sweet, tender, even yet
  A present help is he;
And faith has still its Olivet,
  And love its Galilee.

The healing of the seamless dress
  Is by our beds of pain;
We touch him in life's throng and press,
  And we are whole again.

Through him the first fond prayers are said
  Our lips of childhood frame;
The last low whispers of our dead
  Are burdened with his name.

O Lord and Master of us all!
  Whate'er our name or sign,
We own thy sway, we hear thy call,
  We test our lives by thine.

THE SAILOR BOY OF HAVRE.

A French brig was returning from Toulon to Havre with a rich cargo and numerous passengers. Off the coast of Bretagne it was overtaken by a sudden and violent storm. Capt. P.———, an experienced sailor, at once saw the danger which threatened the ship on such a rocky coast, and he gave orders to put out to sea; but the winds and waves drove the brig violently toward the shore, and notwithstanding all the efforts of the crew, it continued to get nearer land.

Among the most active on board in doing all that he could to help was little Jacques, a lad twelve years old, who was serving as cabin-boy in the vessel. At times, when he disappeared for a moment behind the folds of a sail, the sailors thought that he had fallen overboard; and again, when a wave threw him down on the deck, they looked around to see if it had not carried away the poor boy with it; but Jacques was soon up again, unhurt.

"Mother," said he, smiling, to an old sailor, "would be frightened enough had she seen me just now."

His mother, who lived at Havre, was very poor and had a large family. Jacques loved her tenderly, and he was enjoying the prospect of carrying to her his little treasure—two five-franc pieces, which he had earned as his wages for the voyage.

The brig was beaten about a whole day by the storm, and in spite of the crew, they could not steer clear of the rocks on the coast. By the gloom on the captain's brow it might be seen that he had little hope of saving the ship. All at once, a violent shock was felt, accompanied by a horrible crash; the vessel had struck on a rock. At this terrible moment the passengers threw themselves on their knees to pray.

"Lower the boats!" cried the captain.

The sailors obeyed; but no sooner were the boats in the water than they were carried away by the violence of the waves.

We have but one hope of safety," said the captain. "One of us must be brave enough to run the risk of swimming with a rope to the shore. We may fasten one end to the mast of the vessel, and the other to a rock on the coast, and by this means we may all get on shore."

"But captain, it is impossible!" said the mate, pointing to the surf breaking on the sharp rocks. "Whoever should attempt to run such a risk would certainly be dashed to pieces."

"Well," said the captain, in a low tone, "we must all die together."

At this moment there was a slight stir among the sailors, who were silently waiting for orders.

"What is the matter there?" inquired the captain.

"Captain," replied a sailor, "this little monkey of a cabin-boy is asking to swim to the shore with a strong string round his body to draw the cable after him; he is as obstinate as a little mule!" and he pushed Jacques into the midst of the circle.

The boy stood turning his cap round and round in his hands, without daring to utter a word.

"Nonsense! such a child can't go!" said the captain, roughly.

But Jacques was not of a character to be so easily discouraged.

"Captain," said he, timidly, "you don't wish to expose the lives of good sailors like these; it does not matter what becomes of a little monkey of a cabin-boy, as the boatswain calls me. Give me a ball of strong string, which will unroll as I get on; fasten one end round my body, and I promise you that within an hour the rope will be fastened to the shore, or I will perish in the attempt."

"Does he know how to swim?" asked the captain.

"As swiftly and easily as an eel," replied one of the crew.

"I could swim up the Seine from Havre to Paris," said little Jacques.

The captain hesitated; but the lives of all on board were at stake, and he yielded. Jacques hastened to prepare for his terrible undertaking. Then he turned and softly approached the captain.

"Captain," said he, "as I may be lost, may I ask you to take charge of something for me?"

"Certainly, my boy," said the captain, who was almost repenting of having yielded to his entreaties.

"Here, then, captain," replied Jacques, holding out two five-franc pieces wrapped in a bit of rag; "if I am eaten by the porpoises, and you get safe to land, be so kind as to give this to my mother, who lives on the quay at Havre; and will you tell her that I thought of her, and that I love her very much, as well as all my brothers and sisters?"

"Be easy about that, my boy. If you die for us, and we escape, your mother shall never want for anything."

"O, then I will willingly try to save you!" cried Jacques, hastening to the other side of the vessel, where all was prepared for his enterprise.

The captain thought for a moment. "We ought not to allow this lad to sacrifice himself for us in this way," said he at length; "I have been wrong. I must forbid it."

"Yes, yes," said some of the sailors round him; "it is disgraceful to us all that the little cabin-boy should set us an example of courage; and it would be a sad thing if the brave child should die for old men like us, who have lived our time. Let us stop him!"

They rushed to the side of the vessel, but it was too late. They found there only the sailor who had aided Jacques in his preparations, and who was unrolling the cord that was fastened to the body of the heroic boy. They all leaned over the side of the vessel to see what was going to happen, and a few quietly wiped away a tear which would not be restrained.

At first nothing was seen but waves of white foam, mountains of water, which seemed to rise as high as the mast, and then fell down with a thundering roar. Soon the practised eye of the sailors perceived a little black point rising above the waves, and then again, distance prevented them from distinguishing it at all. They anxiously watched the cord, and tried to guess, by its quicker or slower movement, the fate of him who was unrolling it.

Sometimes the cord was unrolled rapidly; "O, what a brave fellow!" they said, "see how quickly he swims!" At other times the unrolling of the ball of string stopped suddenly; "Poor boy," they said; "he has been drowned or dashed against the rocks."

This anxiety lasted more than an hour; the ball of string continued to be unrolled, but at unequal periods. At length it slipped slowly over the side of the vessel, and often fell as if slackened. They thought Jacques must have much difficulty in getting through the surf on the coast.

"Perhaps it is the body of the poor boy that the sea is tossing backward and forward in this way," said some of the sailors.

The captain was deeply grieved that he had permitted the child to make the attempt; and, notwithstanding the desperate situation in which they were, all the crew seemed to be thinking more of the boy than of themselves.

All at once a violent pull was given to the cord. This was soon followed by a second, then by a third. It was the signal agreed upon to tell them that Jacques had reached the shore. A shout of joy was heard on the ship. They hastened to fasten a strong rope to the cord, which was drawn on shore as fast as they could let it out, and was firmly fastened by some of the people who had come to the help of the little cabin-boy. By means of this rope many of the shipwrecked sailors reached the shore and found means to save the others. Not long after all had safely landed they saw the vessel sink.

The little cabin-boy was long ill from the consequences of his fatigue, and from the bruises he had received by being dashed against the rocks. But he did not mind that; for, in reward of his bravery, his mother received a yearly sum of money which placed her above the fear of want. Little Jacques rejoiced in having suffered for her, and at the same time in having saved so many lives. He felt that he had been abundantly rewarded.—Selected.

BILLY HIBBARD.

If the doctrines of Methodism were not new in the world, they certainly were new to some of the communities in New England to whom they were preached at the beginning of this century. "Thou bringest certain strange things to our ears," was then a frequent response to the preaching of the itinerants. The doctrines of Calvin formed the religious creed of most of the "standing order" of that part of the country. Nor was this creed a loose and undefined statement: it was very distinctive, boldly avowed, and gave complexion to the experience and practice of the people. The "five points" of Calvinism constituted the chief corner-stone of their religious fabric. Calvinists did not attempt by any gracious gloss to hide the prominence of these points. They boldly said "God fore-ordained from eternity whatsoever comes to pass; that he had chosen a few to life, and predetermined the rest of mankind to eternal death."

These and kindred doctrines, were considered radical truths, and required to be openly professed in order to be saved. To question their truth was regarded as rank heresy. When, therefore, our fathers taught that the Bible offered a free and full salvation to all who believed, and that the grace of God enabled all to believe and to be saved, they were accounted as the teachers of rank error, if they were not the agents of the devil. And when they said that men might know their sins forgiven, and that it was possible for a Christian to fall "finally as well as foully" from a gracious state, they were denounced as deceivers of the people who ought to be opposed. And this opposition met them at every turn, and in every form. It was the dessert served up to them at the close of their public ministrations. It attacked them in individual contests. It sought to destroy their influence by slander and misrepresentations. It rose up to resist them in violent prejudices. And he who was best prepared to carry on this pentagonal controversy with success, did a work that entitled him to the championship of the truth. Billy Hibbard had some claim to this honor.

We do not propose to give a historical sketch of him, or to notice the many qualities that made him a good preacher; but to confine our notice of him chiefly to his readiness and ability to refute the errors of Calvinism. He was a very fair preacher. He was a cheerful, entertaining companion. He had remarkable conversational powers. By his affability and amiability he secured the affection of all around him. But he was specially "at home" when showing off the absurdities of the "five points;" and he did not fail to do this on all occasions. It is said that an old Scotch preacher had such an aversion to bishops that he could not preach but he would give them a thrust. One of his hearers thought he would give him a text where the poor bishops would be spared, and asked him to preach from "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." The old divine complied; but he began his sermon by saying, "So, you see, my brethren, there is nothing said here about making bishops; God never made bishops; it's not a divine order." We think if Uncle Billy, as he was commonly called, were to select any text in the Bible, he would find in it something, both positively and negatively, to show that the "horrible decrees" were anti-scriptural and unreasonable. It was natural that he should bear no very good will toward these "decrees," for they had greatly perplexed him in his early religious experience. For several years, when quite young, he was kept from enjoying the liberty of a son, by the bondage in which he was held from the fear that he was a reprobate; and it seemed, after he was brought into light, that he owed his old master a debt that he would pay, full "twenty shillings to the pound."

His mental constitution was peculiar. His powers of mind were above the ordinary standard, and in their exhibition he was inevitably facetious and pungent. This was shown in his ordinary life; but, when employed to foil or overthrow an antagonist, he was demolishing; he scattered the ruins all around. Tradition, through all the regions where he travelled, tells of his encounters and his triumphs. Beside his autobiography, he published an Address to the People of New England, under the name of Philom. The chief object of the latter was to expose the errors of Calvinism. An incident connected with the publication of this address shows his readiness for an ingenious and humorous turn whenever he thought it proper. There was then a rule of discipline that forbade any preacher publishing a book without the approbation of his Conference. Uncle Billy was arraigned for violating this rule. The bishop asked him if he knew who wrote Philom. "I do," said he. "Who is he?" said the bishop. With great gravity he replied; "Philom is a very dear and personal friend of mine, and I could not disclose his name without betraying his confidence—I beg to be excused from telling." The Conference smiled, and the bishop did not press the question further.

His quickness and sharpness at repartee seemed to be irrepressible. On one occasion he had a verbal controversy with one of the advocates for "sin remaining in us," who was also a doctor of divinity. His opponent apologized for the popular practice of dancing, saying it was a very innocent amusement. As they progressed in debate, he also insisted that there was sin in our holiest devotions, even in our prayers. "Well," said Mr. Hibbard, "if that is so, and dancing is innocent, the sooner you stop your prayers, and go to dancing, the better." The audience were convulsed with laughter, and the learned divine was confounded.

How often the most witty and humorous men have been very devout and earnest, even to demonstration in their religious exercises! It was so with him. The shouts of the believing and happy saint mingling with the cries of the troubled sinner, was no confusion of sounds to him. He believed in a heart religion, and often said the people should not sleep under his preaching—that they had better cry or laugh; and they usually did both. Though he knew how to confound gainsayers, and how to make pretenders ashamed, he was always zealous in calling sinners to repent, and in directing them to the cross for hope. For nearly thirty years, while he was in effective service, there were revivals attending his labors—some of them very extensive ones. And hundreds will at last ascribe to him the honor of being instrumental in their salvation. —The Methodist.

REMARKS BY EDITOR OF HERALD.—Believers in "Life only in Christ," in these days, have to meet about the same kind of treatment that the early Methodists did in New England. We now have to attack some things which Methodists and others hold, which we regard as no better than the "Five Points of Calvinism." The doctrine of "an inherent immortal soul in eternal torments," or "the wicked raised from the dead to be tormented awhile and then killed again," we regard just as horrible and blasphemous as anything Calvinism ever promulgated; and we feel as much "at home" in "showing off the absurdities of" such doctrines, as ever "Billy Hibbard" did in his work; and we look upon the doctrines we oppose as of the same "horrible" character as "Billy" and the Methodists generally did the "horrible decrees," which they fought so nobly against; and just as unscriptural.

WORSE THAN ASLEEP.

The present condition and doctrine of the church prove that the Lord's injunction to "watch" is disregarded. Many words are not needed here, nor is it any pleasure to us to refer to the confusion of tongues that prevails in the ecclesiastical world. Oneness of speech on minor points we do not expect, but errors that affect the foundations of faith, the way of salvation, the honor of God, the trustworthiness of scripture, and the character of the adorable Redeemer, are zealously propagated by men bearing clerical credentials—as far as their fellow men can give such credentials—and enjoying clerical status and emolument. Time was when skepticism was a foreigner and an alien, a thing outside the church, which could not, from the very nature of the case, have any sympathy with the professed followers of the Saviour. It was a foe, an enemy, to which the loyal could give no quarter, but against which they set their faces as a flint, exposing its pretences and sophistries, and showing the extreme danger to the best interests of humanity with which its dismal dogmas were fraught. But all this is strangely altered now. We have become so wonderfully polite, so excessively charitable, that our arms are open to receive all comers into a "broad" fellowship, that shall embrace Judas and John with equal readiness. Rationalism has become the critic of the Holy Spirit, dissecting and rejecting his utterances at pleasure—admitting only such of them as square with its judgment, and affirming itself as truly inspired as was Isaiah or Paul. A large portion of the Bible has evaporated in the crucible of these reverend purifiers of the faith, and holy men of God have been charged with palming upon the credulity of the ignorant, myths and impositions, which the high intellectualism of the present advanced age must regard with contempt.

Side by side with this sacrilegious arrogance, we witness the humiliating spectacle of men who have sunk down into drivelling copyists of the pagan priesthood. The first class have dethroned God to exalt reason, the second have dethroned reason to exalt idolatry. The first worship self, the second adore a wafer. Rationalism robs religion of all that is superhuman: Ritualism robs it of all that is superpagan. Very sad, very mournful, all this is. The great apostacy of the last days has thus entered by two different doors, in accordance with two of its most prominent aspects—pride and superstition; the pride which will culminate in atheism, and the superstition which will do homage to the Antichrist, and there—in the service of the predicted man of sin—both extremes will meet and coalesce! It is an awful prospect. But let no one scornfully say that we are prophesying, for we are no prophets; we only believe what inspired prophets have foretold.

Nor are these departures from the truth confined to any particular section of the nominal church, although they are more numerous and conspicuous in one than in others. In taking a broad view of christendom at the present time—making all grateful allowances for the genuine children of God scattered through the churches—we are compelled to echo the Saviour's painfully suggestive question: "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" For his coming the majority are not looking. His injunction to watch is disregarded. Faith in the glorious event is scorned as fanaticism, as an evidence of mental weakness, or as foolish sympathy with a baseless tradition of Judaism. For other things men look, but not for the return of him who graciously said: "I will come again and receive you unto myself." For money, for influence, for intellect, for eloquence, they look, and expatiate on the splendid results which must inevitably follow the consecration of these to the Lord. We, too, plead for money, influence, intellect, and eloquence; the Lord has a right to all these, and everything else that gratitude and love can devote to his most blessed service; but when these are substituted for him, in other words, when it is forgotten that we are to occupy with these in the expectation of his coming, we depart at once from the spirit and the letter of his teaching and that of his apostles on this great subject.

Among the errors which have crept into the church in consequence of the "sleep" into which she has fallen in relation to her Saviour's return, are the following:

1. "His second coming was at the destruction of Jerusalem." It was not.

2. "His second coming is at the death of his people individually." It is not.

3. "His second coming is to be understood spiritually." He did not so intend it.

4. "At death the saint is perfected and enters into glory." Scripture says at the resurrection, which takes place at the Lord's coming.

5. "Christ is on his own throne now." No, not until he comes in his glory and all the holy angels with him.

6. "The church and the kingdom of Christ are the same thing." Indeed they are not!

7. "It is the mission of the church to convert the world." If so, it is not revealed. It is her blessed privilege to preach the gospel of the kingdom to all nations for a witness, and her glorious destiny in resurrection life to "RULE" them, in association with her divine Head.

8. "We want nothing but the Holy Spirit to evangelize the whole world." But it is the Holy Spirit himself that instructs us to pray, "Come, LORD JESUS!"

Christian readers, are these things so? Is it the fact that these and many other utterly unscriptural things are proclaimed in ten thousand pulpits on the first day of every week from the beginning to the end of the year? If so, is the prevalent confusion to be wondered at? Error in the pulpit is darkness in the pew and disorder in the church. Let us lift up the voice of warning and entreaty. Let us urge a re-examination of the inspired word. For the truth's sake we beseech the reader to help in this work. Let not the standard droop. We are ready to serve the great cause as long as we can wield the pen. Stand by us, and the result may be great, while your reward is certain, for it is distinctly understood that in contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, we are engaged in a work upon which the blessing of our adorable Lord and Master will most surely come. And the day is not distant when it will be found that what was done for his sake was the only thing worth doing at all.—The Rainbow.

PAYING LIKE A SINNER.

Several years ago, in North Carolina, where it is not customary for tavern keepers to charge the ministers for lodging and refreshments, a preacher presumingly stopped at a tavern one evening, made himself comfortable during the night; and in the morning entered the stage without offering to pay for his accommodations. The landlord came running up to the stage, and said, "there is some one in there who has not settled his bill." The passengers all said they had, except the preacher, who said he had understood that he never charged ministers anything. "What, you a minister of the gospel, a man of God?" cried the innkeeper. "You came to my house last night, you sat down at the table without asking a blessing. I lit you up to your room, and you went to bed without praying to your Maker, (for I staid there until you had undressed); you rose and washed without saying grace: and as you came to my house like a sinner, you have got to pay like a sinner."—Selected by L. C. T.

PRACTICAL MEMORY.

A minister, walking near a brook, observed a poor woman washing wool in the stream; which is done by placing it in a sieve, and dipping it in the water repeatedly, until it is white and clean. He engaged in conversation with her, and, from some expressions of regret and gratitude which she uttered, was induced to ask her if she knew him. "O yes sir," she replied, "and I hope I shall have reason to bless God for you to all eternity. I heard you preach at W—, some years back; and hope your sermon was the means of doing me great good." Indeed, I rejoice to hear it, pray what was the subject?" "Oh, sir, I can't recollect that; mine is such a bad head." "How then can it have done you good, if you don't even remember it?" "Sir, my poor mind is like this sieve; the sieve doesn't hold the water, but it runs through and cleanses the wool; my memory does not keep the words, but, blessed be God, he made them touch the heart; and now I don't love sin; I go whenever I can to hear of Jesus Christ; and I beg of him every day to wash me and cleanse me from sin."—Selected by L. CURE FOR HYDROPHOBIA.

Dr. Buisson, says the Salut Public, of Lyons, claims to have discovered a remedy for this terrible disease, and to have applied it with complete success in many cases. In attending a female patient in the last stage of canine rabies, the doctor imprudently wiped his hands with a handkerchief impregnated with her salvia. There happened to be a slight abrasion on the index finger of the left hand, and, confident in his own curative system, the doctor merely washed the part with water. However, he was fully aware of the imprudence he had committed, and gave the following account of the matter afterward: "Believing that the malady would not declare itself until the fortieth day, and having numerous patients to visit, I put off from day to day the application of my remedy—that is to say, vapor baths. The ninth day, being in my cabinet, I felt at once a pain in the throat and a still greater one in the eyes. My body seemed so light that I felt as if I could jump to a prodigious height, or that, if I threw myself out of a window, I could sustain myself in the air. My hair was so sensitive that I appeared able to count each separately without looking at it. Saliva kept continually forming in the mouth. Any movement of air inflicted great pain on me, and I was obliged to avoid the sight of brilliant objects; I had a continual desire to run and bite, not human beings, but animals, and all that was near me. I drank with difficulty, and I remarked that the sight of water distressed me more than the pain in the throat. I believe that by shutting the eyes any one suffering under hydrophobia can always drink. The fits came on every five minutes, and I then felt the pain start from the index finger and run up the nerves to the shoulder.

"In this state thinking that my course was preservative and not curative, I took a vapor bath, not with the intention of cure, but of suffocating myself. When the bath was at a heat of 93 deg. 3 min. 5 sec. Fahrenheit, all the symptoms disappeared, as if by magic, and since then I have felt nothing of them. I have attended more than eighty persons bitten by mad animals, and I have not lost a single case. When a person has been bitten by a mad dog, he must for seven successive days take a vapor bath a la Russe, as it is called, of 57 deg. to 68 deg. This is the preventive remedy. When the disease is declared, it only requires one vapor bath, rapidly increased to 37 deg. centigrade, then slowly to 63 deg; the patient must strictly confine himself to his chamber until the cure is complete."

Dr. Buisson mentions several other curious facts. An American had been bitten by a rattlesnake about eight leagues from home; wishing to die in the bosom of his family, he ran the greater part of the way home, and, going to bed, perspired profusely, and the wound healed as any simple cut. The bite of the tarantula is cured by the exercise of dancing, the free perspiration dissipating the virus. If a young child be vaccinated and then be made to take a vapor bath, the vaccine does not take.

RESIGNATION AND DAMNATION.—A clergyman called to visit a woman who calmly awaited her departure. She expressed her resignation to depart. But, said the minister, "Are you willing to be damned forever for the glory of God?" "No, sir," she softly whispered; "I cannot say that." The afflicted husband, who stood by the bedside listening to the conversation, moved by the impulse of his nature, stepped up to the interrogator, and said, "are you willing to be thus damned?" "Yes," was the reply. "Then, sir, there is the door, go and be damned, and let my wife depart in peace."—Christian Inquirer.

RELIGION AND REASON.—Man is not at all settled or confirmed in religion until his religion is the self-same thing with the reason of his mind; that when he thinks he speaks reason, he speaks religion; or when he speaks religiously he speaks reasonably, and his religion and reason are mingled together; they pass into one principle; they are no more two, but one. Just as the light in the air makes one illuminated sphere, so reason and religion, in one subject, are one principle.—Whichcote.

CHANGE OF SCENE.—I have heard a very distinguished physician, Sir Henry Holland, say that such is his conviction of the beneficial influence of even slight nervous stimulus, that when the patient can not have change of scene, change of room is of some advantage—nay, even change of furniture, if there cannot be change of room!

RELY UPON YOURSELF.—Never ask a favor. It is better to suffer than to supplicate; and asking a favor of your nearest friend, or your nearest relative, is only a mild form of supplication. Get what you want by your own unaided exertions, or go without it. There is more dignity in penury, no matter how abject, coupled with independence, than indolent comfort gained through the grant of a favor.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For our self, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price. 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 8 cents.

THE PERSONALITY OF THE DEVIL

THE TRIAL OF JOB.

The existence of a personal evil being—a wicked spirit called the devil and satan, is clearly taught us in the history of Job. This man is said to have been very rich in possessions of cattle, to have had "seven sons and three daughters, and a great household, to have been the greatest of all the sons of the East. As to his moral character, he is declared by inspiration, by Jehovah himself, to have been a perfect and upright man, one that feared God and eschewed evil."

It is stated in the record that on a certain day the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and satan, or "the satan," as the original has it, "came also among them." Being asked whence he came, he replied that he had been going to and fro in the earth, and walking up and down in it. The Lord then calls his attention to Job, speaks of his high character as a perfect and upright man, one that feared God and eschewed evil; to which satan replies: "Doth Job fear God for naught? Hast thou not made a hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land. But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face." The Lord in answer to this places everything that Job possesses in the hands of satan, with the single condition that Job himself was not to be in any way injured by him. Satan departs and inflicts upon Job a series of sudden, severe, and closely connected disasters. In one day he is stripped of all his wealth, nearly all his servants are slain, and his children are destroyed by a great wind from the wilderness, which, smiting the four corners of the house in which they were feasting, involved them in one common ruin. Job meekly bows beneath the rod, and sins not, nor charges God foolishly.

Such is the substance of the narrative of Job's trial as contained in the first chapter of the book of Job. In the second chapter the history of Job's afflictions is resumed, and the continued assaults of satan are recorded. This evil being is stated to have presented himself again, on a certain day, among the sons of God. The Lord again calls his attention to Job, who still preserved his integrity, notwithstanding the trials he had suffered. In reply satan says: "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life. But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face." To show that Job was sincere and unselfish in his piety, the Lord places him in satan's hands to afflict him, only stipulating that he should preserve his life. Satan goes forth and smites him with a grievous skin disorder, productive of great distress of body and anguish of mind. We will not proceed further in the history of Job, as our sole purpose is to show the existence of a personal evil spirit, and we have brought forward enough of the narrative to serve as a foundation for the remarks we shall make on this subject.

It is very evident that the satan, or adversary, here spoken of, was not God. God was not talking to himself—he had not been wandering to and fro, or walking up and down in the earth. It was a being who is emphatically said in the original to be "ha—satan," "the satan," or the adversary, thereby designating him as the chief of evil demons. We are told by Dr. Clark that "the word satan, or devil, is not to be found in the originals of the Old and New Testaments in the plural number." The inference from this is that there is one chief devil who stands at the head of other and evil spirits, being more wicked and mighty than the rest.

But as God was not the satan, devil, or evil here spoken of, so neither was this satan, devil, or evil in Job. It was not the lusts of his nature that were clamoring for gratification—he was not wicked—he was not trying himself by these judgments—it was not any devil or evil in himself that was bringing about this scene of trouble and disaster. No, God had said he was a perfect and upright man. This satan, devil, or evil was outside of himself; the part which he bore in the trial was that of suffering, that which satan carried out was to bring upon him suffering and anguish in order to tempt him to sin against God, and impugn the justice and goodness of the Almighty.

That it must have been an evil spirit is very evident if we consider some points conconnected with this trial of Job. Had he been a good spirit he would have had no wish to subject Job to any test to satisfy himself of the truth of God's assertion with respect to his moral character, or have desired, or been willing, to prove it by inflicting upon him such terrible trials. Had he believed God, he would have accepted his testimony as expressive of Job's real character, without requiring any proof of it. God, it is true, permitted all this, but he designed, as in the case of our first parents, out of these afflictions to accomplish good. He left to satan the choice of means by which to prove the patriarch, whose life was to be spared, though he was to be subjected to severe bodily affliction, and suffer the loss of all his worldly substance, nearly all his servants, and all his children.

The agent in inflicting these evils must not only have been an evil but an intelligent being. The Sabeans, who slew some of his servants and carried away his oxen and asses; the Chaldeans, who in three bands fell upon the camels and carried them away, and slew their keepers; the fire of God which fell from heaven and burnt up the sheep and the servants who took care of them; the whirlwind that came from the wilderness and smote the house in which Job's children were feasting and destroyed them and the servants who waited upon them, did not come by chance, but were agents in the hands of an intelligent power, and fulfilled their work of destruction, leaving but one person, out of each of these varied but terrible calamities, to escape and tell the sad and terrible tale, who, one by one, came and informed Job, giving shock after shock to his afflicted heart, crowning the work by revealing to him in the last communication that which undoubtedly filled him with the deepest anguish—the loss of his children. All these repeated blows, the story of which was communicated to him one after another, were designed to give him the greatest pain and suffering possible, and by their suddenness and rapidly increasing severity, wring from him some exclamation of dissatisfaction and anger with the Being, who, while revealing himself as a God of love, had been the apparent, though not real, cause of his sore calamities. In all this, intelligence, art and plan were manifested, and we have already shown that the being so intelligent was also evil.

By any possible mode of rational interpretation, can we conclude that this satan or devil was nothing more than Job's lusts warring and craving gratification? If all the devil there is, as some say, is in us, such must have been the case. If so, then Job was his own satan, and voluntarily brought down upon himself all the terrible evils recounted in the narrative. A real hypocrite he was, also, and a gross libeller of the Almighty, to bow down meekly beneath the shock and say, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord," when the Lord had nothing to do with it, and the patriarch only was accountable for the severe losses and trials of which he had been the subject. No—turn which way we will, this subject is characterized only by confusion—is an unintellible jargon on any other view than that there is a personal evil being whom God, in his all-wise providence, permits to try the children of men, and who is at last to be destroyed by him, of whom it was promised he should bruise the serpent's head, after he had bruised his heel. This was the work of satan, an intelligent evil being, called, also, in other places in scripture, the devil.

JOHN FONDEY, M. D.

Philadelphia, July 12, 1867.

Dr. Fondey will excuse us for dividing his article at this place, as he has brought out, thus far, his argument for the existence of a personal evil spirit devil, so far as the case of Job is concerned. The remainder of the article is only an answer to some supposed objections to the idea of such a devil as he contends for. The consideration of those objections properly form an article by itself; so we have deferred them to be presented at another time.

We received two articles last winter on the "History of Job," which we thought not best to publish then, because we judged it not expedient to agitate the question of the satan of Job. But as Dr. Fondey, after two long articles on the main question—the temptation of Adam and Jesus—has introduced Job, justice to the writer of the other articles demands that we let him now speak so far as his reasoning relates to who and what was the satan there presented. The writer is S. E. Hoffman, of Minnesota. He had in his first article given the history of Job's trial as recorded Job i, and onward. This we omit, and give only the second article, as follows:

HISTORY OF JOB.

BY S. E. HOFFMAN.

The last trial we left Job in, was that of his wife's discouragement. The next trial is that of his three friends. But before we proceed further, we must answer an objection brought against this history by infidels, and which orthodoxy dreads to encounter. The question comes up, not only by the infidel, but by every candid, thinking mind. Where is the propriety; the justice; or the necessity, of afflicting such a perfect man; such an upright man; a man that feared God, and shunned evil? What, they ask, was Job afflicted for? There is but one answer that can be given, on the theory of a fallen-spirit devil, viz., To convince satan that Job was not serving God for temporal things. Now the issue is this, If this satan was an angel, once holy, who fell from God's heaven, Did such a being need any conviction? If he needed conviction, as a matter of fact, he must have been still in a state to find salvation. But suppose orthodoxy to be true with respect to this angel, then we have the all-wise God trying to convince this devil; and even afflicting an innocent man, both outwardly and inwardly, with the most severe and excruciating suffering that man is capable of bearing, for the very sole purpose of convincing that fiend, according to their view of eternal torments. What a hypothesis! Is that a just God to afflict such innocence for the sake of satisfying, [did I say? yes,] not only convincing, but satisfying the lusts (if true) of such a fiend! Where then is the propriety in the afflictions of this good man? According to the orthodox notion of a devil, the whole transaction would be foolishness; for such a devil, all admit, could not be saved.

All the attempts of orthodoxites, or others, to reconcile this history with the theory of a fallen angel devil, are vain. But now comes in an other difficulty, in the minds of some, and that is, Does it not say that satan afflicted Job? and if he was not some supernatural being, how could he do that? To which I answer: If you take the history altogether, you will find that it was God's direct and immediate hand in the whole concern.

Let us notice the agencies employed in taking away his property. The first agency was, the Sabeans. The second was, the fire of God from heaven. The third was Chaldeans made out three bands. The fourth is, a great wind from the wilderness. Could anything short of God's own hand produce fire from heaven? Could anything short of God's own hand produce a tornado, to hurl a house into atoms? But to settle this question, let us go to Job's own testimony about it, chap. i. 22. "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away."

Surely, if the Lord took it away, the devil did not do it. Again, chap. iii. 23. "Whom God hath hedged in." Chap. vi. 4. "For the arrows of the Almighty are within me; the poison thereof drinketh up my spirit; the terrors of God do set themselves in array against me." Chap. x. 8. "Thine hands have made me and fashioned me together round about: yet, Thou dost destroy me." Verse 10. "Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and curdled me as cheese?" Chap. xiii. 15. "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." Chap. xvi. 12. "He hath broken me asunder; he hath also taken me by my neck and shaken me to pieces, and set me up for his mark." Chap. xix. 6. "Know now that God hath overthrown me." Verse 9 "He hath stripped me of my glory, and taken the crown from my head."

We will only notice one more testimony; and that, I think, no one will dispute.

The Lord himself says, chap. ii. 3, "Although thou movedst me against him, to destroy him without cause." God then did the whole of this affliction on this good man. Now, if it was to convince a satan like Peter, to whom Jesus said, "Get thee behind me satan;" or, if it was some infidel devil, like Judas, of whom Jesus said, "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" then we could see a propriety in this affliction of Job; then we can see justice in it; then we can see, in some degree a necessity for it to satisfy the ungodly that it was no priestcraft in Job that led him to serve his God.

In proof of what has been said, let us examine Job's three friends. There we discover their entire argument is to try to convince Job that he was a wicked man; for, if he had not been wicked, God would not have afflicted him as he did. Let us just notice a few of Bildad's arguments. Chap. viii. 6. "If thou wert pure and upright, surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous." So this whole chapter teaches that prosperity entirely depends on righteousness. "Behold God will not cast away a perfect man, neither will he help the evil doers." Verse 20. "They that hate thee shall be clothed with shame; and the dwelling place of the wicked shall come to naught." Verse 22. To this language Job replied, but not as applicable to himself, "I know it is so of a truth." Then Job goes on to show the wisdom of God; and although he was not able to see wisdom, at that time, in God's dealings with him, yet, he attributed it all to wisdom in some way. Here we see a character as pure as the sun ever shone on, under that dispensation, loaded down with falsehoods, trying to defame him, making him out a hypocrite, possessing a false hope, like the spider's web, charged with cheating and robbing the widow and fatherless; and his three friends had all the weight of evidence on their side. That is, in argument; because Job's case was a singular, out of the way providence. But amidst all these trials, sufferings, mockings, and even arguments that he was constrained to acknowledge, we hear him say, "Till I die I will not justify you; and when he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold." There is one thing yet that is most strikingly manifest in the character of Job; and that is, From the commencement of his afflictions he was kept entirely in the dark for what purpose the Lord was thus afflicting him. Add to that, that he was living in a dispensation when God's people were always favored with temporal prosperity. Could he have seen at the start the design of the Almighty, first, to teach "wicked and ungodly" men a lesson; second, to bring him forth as gold; third, to be handed down to all generations as an ensample; this might have been some mitigation, and reconcile him to his lot. But these being hid from him, during the most part of his trial, makes his character shine forth with lustre not surpassed in Bible history.

Middleville, Min., Jan. 10, 1867.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—It is quite evident that the satan of Job. i. ii. is a symbolical representation of "wicked and ungodly" men, living in the flesh, who saw Job's uprightness and faithfulness to God, but enviously attributed it to God's prospering him in worldly matters; and though themselves mingling with "the sons of God," in their assemblies, talked of Job as a hypocrite. These revilers of Job were afterwards manifested in the persons of Job's "three friends;" just such "friends" as the king found at the marriage feast, to whom he said, "Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having on a wedding garment?" Math. xxii. 12. Such were some of Job's friends, who, after his trial came on, fancied they now had the proof that Job was a hypocrite. This point Br. Hoffman has made sufficiently evident. It is a fact worth noting, that after chap. ii., we hear of no other satan—adversary—except Job's three pretended friends. They were the satans that God called to humble themselves before Job. See Job xlii. 7–9.

FISHER'S CATECHISM.—No. 3.

We desire once more to call the attention of the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE to the positions held by the time-honored Presbyterian church. We hope to be corrected if we write with the slightest unfairness toward that church, as we have no such purpose in our heart.

Not forgetting that Mr. Fisher teaches that "death temporal, spiritual, and eternal" was "threatened upon disobedience," we beg leave to refer to him again. We quote now from chapter entitled "CHRIST AS A PRIEST."

Q.—How often did Christ offer up himself a sacrifice?

A.—Once only, Heb. ix. 28, "Christ was ONCE offered to bear the sins of many."

Q.—Why could not this sacrifice be repeated?

A.—Because, as once dying was the penalty of the law, so once suffering unto death was the complete payment of it, in regard to the infinite dignity of the sufferer. Heb. ix. 27, 28.

Q.—For what end did Christ once offer up himself a sacrifice?

A.—To satisfy divine justice. 1 Pet. iii. 18.

"Once dying," according to our author, "was the penalty of the law." Once dying was the "complete payment" of the debt due the law. Once dying satisfied divine justice. And this debt must be paid. This satisfaction to justice must be made. Did Christ pay this debt? Did he satisfy Divine justice? Our author declares that he did. If he did, he did it by "once dying," and that death, as we tried to show in our first article, was neither spiritual or eternal death. Then, it logically follows that spiritual and eternal death was no part of the penalty. But we quote further from Mr. Fisher:

Q.—What did the honor of justice require as a satisfaction?

A.—That the curse of the broken law be fully executed upon the sinners themselves, Ezek. xviii. 4, or upon a sufficient substitute. Psa. lxxxix. 19.

Q.—What would have been the effect of executing the curse upon the sinners themselves?

A.—The fire of divine wrath would have burned continually upon them, and yet there would be no satisfaction to avenging justice. Isa. xxxiii. 14.

We see in this to what straits good men are driven who advocate a three-fold death penalty, and the doctrine of eternal suffering. The "honor of justice" required that "the curse of the broken law be fully executed either upon the sinners themselves or upon a sufficient substitute;" and yet Mr. Fisher declares that as an effect of executing it upon sinners themselves, "there would be no satisfaction to avenging justice." Suppose a Saviour had not been promised—that Adam had been left to the law—what would have been the result according to the theory of this expositor of truth? Simply this, God gave Adam a law and affixed a penalty for its violation, the execution of which would have been "no satisfaction to avenging justice." It does seem to us, who are not learned in theology, strange, that the execution of God's own penalty, still leaves avenging justice unsatisfied!

In human law it is not thus. The man who serves his full term in prison goes out free as any other man. He has paid the penalty, satisfied justice, and the majesty of the law is vindicated. It may be that while Jefferson Davis lives there will be those who will declare loudly that avenging justice is not satisfied in his case. We feel this, at times, ourselves. But let Mr. Davis be tried, convicted, found guilty of treason and sentenced; what then remains for the full satisfaction of justice? Only that the sentence be executed. If it be death, his death will completely satisfy avenging justice. Suppose some one should claim, after he had been executed, that justice had been cheated because of the greatness of his offence. Any child would answer that if the penalty of the law for his crime was death, "once dying" was the "complete payment" of that penalty.

In concluding our review of these positions of Mr. Fisher it may be well to state that we believe they are, in the main, endorsed by nearly all the orthodox churches. And yet, the positions taken are not at agreement with the truth; are not logically tenable. Why this confusion? Only because the simple penalty of death is so entirely misunderstood. And this misunderstanding grows out of erroneous views of the nature of man. Spiritual death, an inevitable result of Adam's transgression, is confounded with the penalty. Eternal death ensues to the sinner from the fact that he rejects Christ, who alone has power to bring him out of the state into which the penalty has placed him. In this world the sinner lives under sentence of death, dies out of Christ, and perishes. He has no union with the life-giving Christ. He is not a branch of the living vine. His life is not "hid with Christ in God." And so "death feeds upon him." Death becomes eternal, not because eternal death is the penalty of the law, but because death, which is the penalty, must be eternal, in the very nature of the case, "unless arrested by the divine power in the production of a new life."

We trust that the day is not distant when a better understanding of these great truths will obtain among our dear christian brethren in all the churches. We love them as brethren, and because we love them we commend to them the consideration of the glorious truth of "Life only in Christ."

JAY.

Albany, N. Y.

DO GOOD.

"But to do good and to communicate forget not, for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." Heb. xiii: 17.

The Christian is so constituted that his element of happiness consists in well doing, or in blessing somebody: he is like the sun, which by its rays is ever imparting vitality and heat: he is the embodiment of benevolence, like the great sea from which vapor is continually arising, to be returned again by its innumerable rivers.

The great secret of christian prosperity consists in the vigorous and healthful manifestation of this imparting principle. It is not the amount of service rendered, or multitude of good deeds performed; these may be more or less according to circumstances; but it is the purity of that service. It is not the size or gorgeousness of the temple, but its sanctity, which invites reverence. Be the heart and its means ever so small, yet if the Holy Ghost is there enshrined, if it is purified by faith, all its offerings are holy to the Lord; feeble and unnoticed though they may be by man, yet their record is on high, and God will reward with grace and glory.

I consider goodness as an element of God, a good desire being the promptings of the Holy Spirit, or that Light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world. This fire of divine kindling is increased immeasurably, or repressed by man's volition. The way to do so is plainly set forth in the word. Our text hints at one of those ways, communicating to others. The greatest philanthropists are the happiest men; the richest in moral goodness. Would you become rich toward God, go to work for God, do something, bless somebody or something; if nothing better offer, be good to the dog or cat; love the birds; speak pleasantly and affectionately to them, you will be the better for it. If things or folks look cross and hateful, look at something else; don't fret at or about them, it only brings you into a contaminating atmosphere, you inhale the same poisonous and intoxicating gas.

This God-given principle, like the instinct of the bee, always seeks for sweetness, reciprocity, objects which appreciate affection; for every effectual effort for good must be appreciated.

Watch the workings of things, and see where and when the holy effort is accepted. If accepted, the object becomes a mirror and your effort is thrown back with increasing lustre to bless and cheer you. To those who feel limited in means and ability I especially say, study this subject well; don't throw away your ammunition; fire low, try short distances first; begin on things too small to name. If you have only a handful of meal and cruise of oil let it be consecrated to the Lord, he has equally the disposal of things for you as with those things of yours.

I have no idea those examples of good deeds and commands to love and give, so prevalent all through God's word, are unmeaning, or will go unnoticed by their great author. But, ah, those things are esteemed by most, as Naaman did the prophet's direction for his healing, insignificant, and so a disease more direful in its effects clings to them.

O my brethren, let us be simple. Of what avail all this knowledge without the holy refining fire burn in and radiate forth from our hearts? The Lord bless you! I believe in a religion that is communicative, a warmth and expression which may be known in the shake of the hand, or the look of the eyes.

I do admire knowledge, scriptural research, deep theological exposition; all these are very good, yet these should be done, and not leave the other undone. Don't think you can palm these off on God or man as godliness. Many beautiful flowers lack sweetness, and the bee soon finds it out. We may admire beauty, but we love goodness. It is better to be good in a little than beautiful a great deal. I don't know much about the personal beauty of Christ. The prophet speaks of him as one of a sorrowful visage; but he was lovely; his heart melted and his eyes wept over human woe. Let us love more and paint and varnish less. I don't mean to be hard or condemnatory; but let us all sit in judgement on ourselves and see that we are approved of God: then shall we be prepared for his soon coming kingdom, and have an abundant entrance therein.

P. S.—I can do but little in a pecuniary way, but you have my warmest sympathies in the cause in which you are engaged. I hope we shall see the HERALD OF LIFE sustained till JESUS comes. It is my paper, and I shall do what I can for it.

A BEAUTIFUL SIMILE.

The pious Jonathan Edwards describes a christian as being like "such a little flower as we see in the spring of the year, low and humble on the ground; opening its bosom to receive the pleasant beams of the sun's glory; rejoicing, as it were, in a calm rapture; diffusing around a sweet fragrance; standing peacefully and lowly in the midst of other flowers." The world may think nothing of the little flower—they may not even notice it; but nevertheless it will be diffusing around a sweet fragrance upon all who dwell within its lowly sphere.

NEW EARTH RULERS.

The earth is to be gloriously peopled with "the nations of them which are saved." Righteousness and glory will reign everywhere. The glory of God and of the Lamb, which is to be the brightness of the New Jerusalem, will illuminate also the remotest regions, so that their inhabitants will "walk in the light of it." Surely it will not be said to contradict the received view concerning the eternal state, if we thus suppose that nations, with their kings and divers orders of authorities and powers will then exist. It may. But certainly the bible leads us to believe that it will be so, nevertheless. "The nations of them which are saved" and "the kings of the earth," are spoken of in the plainest terms, as being co-existent with the New Jerusalem, and as bringing their glory and honor into it. Rev. xxi: 24–26. Indeed to think it will be otherwise, would be to think that the order of things in the New Earth will be different from that which has (so far as the inspired word teaches us) existed in any part of the Lord's kingdom, and to contradict all analogy. How frequently we read about "the principalities and powers in heavenly places," the "thrones" also, and "dominions," the archangel, crowned elders, angels, cherubim and seraphim. There is evidently a diversity of order and power among those who have their part already in the realms of glory. There are the great ones bearing rule, and there are those who bow beneath their sway. Nor can this orderly arrangement in a kingdom where no sin exists, disturb the happiness of any, but the opposite; it needs must minister to the increased happiness of all. For ourselves, shall we complain, if on the throne of that celestial nation in which our everlasting dwelling may be fixed, the Crown of Government be borne by Paul or Peter, James or John? Nay, shall we not rejoice exceedingly concerning this, and yield them gladly the obedience which is due? And what if Mark, or Timothy, or Barnabas, or Silas, occupy the seat of honor next in rank or authority,—shall we oppose our voice? Or shall we think that there would be unreasonable dealing on the part of God towards us? Nay, do we not ourselves, as taught by our Redeeming Lord, look forward to possess authority? If we have wrought for Him with long and earnest service, using well the talents which the Lord has given us, do we not expect accordingly, to have dominion over ten, or five, or two cities as the case may be?—Rev. J. G. Gregory, A. M.

BR. STORRS:—The time draws near when the friends of bible truth must decide whether the HERALD OF LIFE shall live another year: if our LIFE-GIVER shall tarry so long.

The mind of the writer is, that we cannot in these days of error afford to do without our paper.

The truths it advocates are of vital importance to those who would make advancement in the knowledge of the scriptures. We do not mean to say, our paper is preferable to the Holy Scriptures; but we do say, the HERALD OF LIFE is to us one of the best helps to bible knowledge we were ever acquainted with, notwithstanding some call it a "hobby-riding paper." By the way, such narrow-contracted, hide-bound bigots are riding their own "hobby"-horse to death in trying to ride others down; so we (or they) go!

The paper has been a blessing in the past; we pray the Lord will bless it in the future; although I fear I cannot be with you at the annual meeting under the "Chestnut Tree."

I give the following vote, viz, Continue the H. of L. one year in weekly visits, for which I pledge $5 for one copy, also $10 to help sustain it, and more as the Lord prospers me.

"Life only through Christ" is a precious truth. How lovely it makes the God of love appear.

He will even do the best he can for the ungodly. They "shall utterly perish in their own corruption." That is the animal nature they received through Adam, begotten by the law of natural generation, which is a corruptible one; they must therefore "utterly perish;" but the life which is to come, we receive through a union with Christ. "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by (or because, marg.) his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii. 11.

Hence those raised to life again, can die no more; for "the dead shall be raised incorruptible," by the power of a supernatural agency and not by the law of a natural agency, which is a corruptible one; therefore when man dies in his sins, he receives "the wages of sin," which "is death."

Query—Will the God of love bring the dead sinner to life and then compel him to sin in that life for the purpose of killing him again?

The advocates of a future life for the ungodly must, to be consistent, either admit the doctrine of eternal torments or universal salvation. May God our Father bless and prosper you in your declining days. Yours, living in hope of a better life.

BR. STORRS:—Again I am favored with the visits of "our paper," and I feel more eager for it than ever. You know I was a few weeks without it, and did miss it. I see there is considerable said in the last issue about its continuance. Whether it shall be continued as a weekly, monthly, semi-monthly, or if at all. I heard one of the bitterest opposers of "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST" say, last Fall, that it could not be continued another year in present form. The reason he gave was, because its circulation was so small, and its friends would get tired supporting it. We know its circulation is small, but ought this to discourage us? We think not. It ought rather to have the opposite effect; for we know that truth was never popular: pure unmixed truth; and the purer it is the fewer followers it will have.

But truth has always had friends, tried and firm, who would stand by it to the last; and is it going to fail in these last days? No, never. It canot fail. Why, if we hold our peace, the very stones would cry out; for "Life only in Christ" is a precious truth, brought to light in the last days, and now it never can be covered up again. It must be, and shall be, like a city set on a hill which cannot be hid. Brethren and sisters, instead of slackening in our work or reducing the frequency of the visits of our precious paper, let us double our diligence, and make every effort to have it well supported, and increase its circulation. If we cannot induce people to subscribe, let us deny ourselves in something, and send it to them. The battle cannot be long now; let us press it to the gates of the enemy to the last. Only he who endures to the end shall have life. The heavenly country seems to be coming into view. Don't let us fall in sight of it. Present light and strength are what we need. These are supplied to us daily. Let us use up our daily supplies, keeping just up with the light, neither lagging behind nor trying to run ahead. Both these positions are dangerous. Let us be wise and understand.

I hope we shall have a large representation of our friends at the Anniversary under the old "Chestnut tree." The Lord willing I hope to be there, and mean to do what I can. It is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not. My heart rejoices in anticipation of meeting the children, and spending a week with them; for no associations on earth are so dear to me as those of father's family. And what will it be when we get into the heavenly. O, it fills my heart with joy, and I say, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God be with thee at all times. Amen. Your sister, seeking the better country.

Lord Bacon beautifully said: "If a man be gracious unto strangers, it shows he is a citizen of the world, and his heart is no island cut off from other lands, but a continent that joins them.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 7, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Anniversary Meeting.

Who of the members of our "UNION," and all its friends, do not feel that in bringing them to the knowledge of the truth God has blessed them beyond measure? Shall we not, then, do all in our power to place the truth in possession of others? We shall thereby "show forth the praises of him who hath brought us out of darkness into his marvellous light." Will not all, therefore, who can do so, be present at the approaching anniversary meeting, and come with hearts overflowing with praise and thanksgiving to the great Giver of all good gifts, resolved to do our part in carrying forward the glorious work? Will not they, too, who cannot be present, send up their petitions to the throne of grace that divine assistance may be signally manifested?

If we all do this, and back our prayers and resolutions with material aid in proportion as the Father of mercies has blessed us, the work will be carried triumphantly forward and the word "have free course and be glorified." Thus shall we honor and praise both Father and Son, and secure a continuance of heavenly favors.

L. C. T.

The Temptation of Jesus.

The apostle Paul saith, He "was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." If the popular notion is true, that Jesus was tempted by a personal spirit-devil, holding audible conversation with him in a dialogue, as is affirmed, then Paul must have been entirely mistaken in his statement that he was tempted in all points like as we are; for we were never tempted in the manner referred to. We have before stated that every reflecting mind is conscious in itself, of the process of temptation by an internal dialogue, revolving suggestions that arise from our desires and opportunities for their gratification. A lawful course is marked out by our CREATOR for the temperate gratification of every desire that he has endowed us with. The process may be slow, and must be attended with care not to depart from the appointment of God as to the manner and extent of the gratification. Within such limits there can be no sin, because such a course is in harmony with the divine will and appointment.

The gratification of each of our natural appetites is a privilege which the CREATOR has granted to the works of his hands; "Of every tree of the Garden thou mayest freely eat," only, a proper restraint, symbolized by one tree forbidden, was imposed to teach man self-government and subjection to his MAKER's will. There is no evil in any of our natural appetites or desires; that is, there is nothing morally evil in them; but as free and accountable beings, any of them may become a source or inlet of evil, else we would not be free nor accountable—neither rewardable nor punishable; we would be only creatures of necessity and the Creator alone responsible.

We have considered the temptation of the first parents of the human race, and we trust established the fact that no personal spirit-devil was concerned in the first temptation; that being as useless as the idea is baseless and without foundation in the record.

The temptation of Jesus cannot be totally unlike that of other men, if he "was in all points tempted like as we are." He must have had all the natural appetites incident to our human constitution; for "he took on him the seed of Abraham," and "was made in the likeness of sinful flesh." The first temptation related to the appetite for food. He had fasted till distressing hunger was felt. The providence of his Father had placed him in circumstances that no food was at hand. He knew he could not work a miracle to relieve his hunger; and how natural the suggestion—"Command this stone that it be made bread." The suggestion was not evil in itself. The only question to settle was, Is it the will of my Father in heaven that I should thus relieve my hunger? God is to be obeyed, and his will consulted in all things; for "man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." If he commanded or had given Jesus permission to convert the stone into bread, then he could have done it without sin; but till such permission was granted, to have put forth such power would have been to call in question the fatherly care of God; and hence would have been a sin.

We illustrate the idea. A man is suffering with hunger, and sees no prospect of relief: he sees food belonging to another, and the thought involuntarily arises, "Take it without leave: you are starving:" i. e., "steal it." The thought in itself is not sin; but if he determined to carry out the thought, then desire has "conceived," and sin is the result. But, if instead of this, he had met the thought with the command of God, "Thou shalt not steal;" and said to himself, "I will die rather than disobey God," would he not have overcome the evil, without supposing that he had been conversing with a personal evil spirit outside of his own nature? Of "like" character we regard the first temptation of Jesus.

In proof that it was a personal devil that tempted Jesus, we are told that "It is said that this devil came to Jesus," and it is argued that "If it had been simply hunger, this feeling would not literally have come to him," etc. We might respond, and say, If it was the personal spirit-devil of "orthodoxy," he would not literally have come to him; for it is affirmed of that devil that he is everywhere, tempting every body, at all times, and in all places. If so, he cannot come to any body, for he is always with them. But the language, "came to Jesus," imports no more than the temptation now arose, or commenced; and we are told in what it consisted: it was the idea of supplying hunger by an act of power for which he had, as yet, no authority from his Father, though he was "the Son of God:" the suggestion Jesus repels, and determines to wait his Father's pleasure. Let us learn the blessed lesson, and trust in God under the most trying circumstances.

We come now to the temptation on the "pinnacle of the temple." It is said:

"The devil takes Jesus up and sets him on a pinnacle of the temple, and tells him to cast himself down: 'for it is written, he shall give his angels charge concerning thee; and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.' To which Jesus makes answer: 'It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.' The narrative says the devil did all this. Unless we have proof that this was not an actual literal occurrence, we must conclude that the devil really did what he is here said to have done. 'Evil,' simply, could not have taken up a man and carried him to the top of a temple. But if the devil was a personal being, the work could have been done, and the narrative be clearer and more easy of explanation than under any other construction of it."

The "proof that this was not a literal occurrence," to our mind, is clear and full. 1. No man was ever tempted in "like" manner. 2. To "have been taken up" by a literal, personal devil, and "carried to the top of a temple," implies either weakness in Jesus, i. e., inability to prevent it, or else consent on his part to let the devil carry him; either of which suppositions is not "easy of explanation," and we think will not stand before a true and rational "explanation" of the history.

The same advocate for a personal spirit-devil writes as follows:

"That this temptation was not witnessed by others, that no one saw Jesus on the pinnacle of the temple does not militate against the view that it really occurred. The devil is called the prince of the power of the air, and as such might have possessed the power to have so affected it as to have enveloped himself and the Saviour in a mist or haze, thus rendering themselves invisible to the people below, or the temptation may have occurred in the night."

The idea that Jesus was tempted to cast himself down from the pinnacle of the temple with no one to witness it, and that special pains was taken by the devil to have the matter done in "a mist," or "in the night," is incredible. It represents Jesus as submitting to a series of trials just to satisfy satan—"a fallen angel." We believe the temptation related to a higher and nobler end, viz., that of convincing the Jewish people that he was the Son of God.

Keep in mind the fact that Jesus was tempted in "all points like as we are;" and consider that he desired his testimony should be believed; and to this end the people should have every possible satisfaction that he was their Messiah, and we shall see a reason for this temptation.

Finding himself walking on that high part of the temple which overlooked a valley so deep that the bottom could scarcely be seen, and many people there to witness whatever he might do, how natural the suggestion, "Throw yourself into the valley below, and being unharmed, the people cannot fail to recognize you as the Son of God, and God has promised you his sure protection." We say, such a suggestion was perfectly natural, and was no sin in itself; but the act would have been to take the matter of Messiah's manifestation out of his Father's hands, and Jesus would have been his own "satan," as he said Peter was on another occasion; i. e., he would have "savored not the things of God, but the things of men;" for men were continually calling for "signs and wonders" to make them believe. Though the thought arose of performing this wonder, of throwing himself from the top of the temple, and thereby compelling belief in his being "the Son of God," yet he had no authority from his Father to do that thing; hence he repels the idea as an undertaking in which he could not claim protection, and therefore it would be a trial of God's care which he had no right to look for. By it we are taught the lesson never to "do evil that good may come." Keep to God's order, and in the path God has marked out for us, though the way may seem to be a slow one, while we desire to hasten the work, which may be good in itself, but evil would come from our putting our devices and plans in the place of God's, even though we had the same end in view that he has: we must be content not only to do God's work, but to do it in the way and by the means he shall appoint.

In our next we shall examine the temptation relating to the possession of the kingdoms of the world.

A Question.

Does not Rev. i. 7, prove that the wicked Jews who put Jesus to death must be made alive from the dead at his second coming? It reads, "Every eye shall see him, and they also that pierced him."

C.

The expression, "they also which pierced him" can hardly be understood in a literal sense, for the reason that one only literally "pierced" Jesus, and he a Roman soldier. Yet we find figuratively it is spoken of persons who rejected Christ, as Paul speaks of some who crucified "the Son of God afresh," Heb. vi. 6. So in Zechariah xii. 10, there is a time spoken of when the Lord saith, "I will pour upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and supplication: and they shall look upon me, whom they have pierced," etc. Thus, it seems, an act of one is spoken of as if done by all: or, rather, the act of one is, by a figure of speech, taken to represent the conduct of such as reject Christ. It is not therefore necessary to suppose that the persons living and acting at the time of Christ's actual death are made alive to see him; but that not only "the kings and priests unto God shall see him," but "they also" who have rejected or "pierced" Christ by refusing his service—who are alive when he returns to the earth—shall "see him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him:"—epi; because, about, concerning, or on account of him. The living wicked, or rejectors of Christ, will find an end to their mocking and scoffing, so characteristic of these days, and to increase till Christ shall come and bring their scoffing to an end, and turn their laughter to mourning. An awful day to the living wicked; but nothing hinted or intimated of the wicked dead being made alive to witness the scenes of that day, any more than the wicked dead were made alive in the days of Noah.

Shall the Church Advance?

ORANGE SCOTT, founder of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in the United States, said in 1846:

"The plainest principles of the gospel have slumbered for ages.

"The Church is as deeply infected with a desire for worldly gain as the world. At least there is no perceptible difference. Professors of religion are emphatically worldly-minded.

"The Church are making a god of this world.

"Most of the denominations of the present day might have been called Churches of the world, with more propriety than Churches of Christ.

"The Churches are so far gone from primitive christianity that they need a fresh regeneration—a new kind of religion.

"They have gone over to the world and have opposed what the world opposed.

"The world will never be converted by such a religion.

"Christians pray for the union of the churches, but fight against it.

"The fact cannot be disguised that the ways of Zion mourn."

Such sentiments are worthy of him who uttered them. We knew O. SCOTT well. He never would, we are persuaded, had he lived, have taken ground against the great life theme we have so long labored to promote. He gave us encouraging words at the outset, and wrote us afterwards that he could "not come out against" us. He often said to others—as we have been informed—"If you can refute Bro. STORRS' arguments do it—I cannot."

It is a solemn truth, if "the world" were to "be converted" it never could be done "by such a religion" as that which goes under the name of "orthodox" in these days. Thought is not to be crushed by the dictation of Creeds and Priests. Thought, free, must and will reject the creedized notions of God and his government of the souls he has made. The churches must change their ground, or be swallowed up with the coming flood. Let them learn to give such representations of God and his government as shall commend itself to the understandings and consciences of intelligent beings. Will they do it?

After SCOTT's decease, which occurred some twenty years since, the leaders of the Wesleyan church took strong ground against our life views, which seemed at one time to be getting among them. Their opposition to advancement in that direction kept them in a state of stagnation, and some of them got the unenviable title of "D. D." Where are those leaders to day? They have abandoned the Wesleyan church and returned, if we mistake not, to the "mother," the M. E. church, and left the Wesleyans to toil alone, having found it hard to battle in an unpopular organization. Whether they have done right or wrong we do not undertake to say; but this we are sure of, if they had heartily embraced the Life Views, we contend for, they would not have been likely to have received the titles that come from men, nor have let "the plainest principles of the gospel" which "have slumbered for ages," continue to sleep till the churches "are emphatically worldly minded," and infidels find sufficient ground for ridicule, when they see these churches holding such "horrible" doctrines, as are prevalent in regard to man's nature and destiny, and yet live as if they "are making a god of this world." Do they not "need a new kind of religion?"

A Reminiscence.

The following extracts from letters that passed between us and a former associate in the Methodist E. Church, about eleven years ago, may be interesting to some of our readers. We had sent him some of our works; particularly our Review of Dr. POST on immortality. He writes:

If you thought enough of me to send the pamphlets, you may be willing to receive a letter from me. I therefore send you my salutation of peace and fraternity, as a fellow pilgrim to the "realm of shades"—in poetic language—but to our Father's home, according to the bible.

And I am obliged to think of you as far on the journey. I look back to when I saw you first, a strong man in every sense, in the prime of life, an influential member of the N. H. Conference, myself a stripling. Then Scott was a leader. He has gone. Perkins has gone. J. A. Merrill and Horton are gone. Hoes, too, is gone. Lee is looking old: and I am obliged to think of you as on the shady side of life, notwithstanding your writings seem vigorous as ever.

I hope Christ is precious to you; and even with your views of death, so complete and strong in faith, that, though death is depressing, it is not fearful. I hope you can say, "I know whom I have believed and that he is able to keep that I have committed to him, unto that day."

In one thing we agree. I have no hope out of Christ—and if I do not misread you, you have none. I do not refer to your views about immortality, but I mean as a sinner, condemned by God's just and holy law. And I rejoice that, agreeing here, we shall agree in all else, when you or I—or rather you and I—have lost our errors, and see no longer darkly, but face to face. For your theory I have no sneers; and for yourself only respect and love. My brother, let no doctrine get between you and Christ. You understand me. Was I by you, I would like to talk over our Saviour's conversation with Martha, John xi. Bear in mind, he is attempting to console his afflicted sister. What does he say?

Christ.—"Thy brother shall rise again." Exactly, you say.

Martha.—"I know he shall rise in the resurrection."

Christ.—"I am the resurrection.... He that believeth in me though he were dead yet shall he live. And whoso liveth and believeth in me shall never die; believest thou this"—Martha? Now what does that mean? Barnes says, shall not die ever or forever. But that he said before, and Martha said she believed it.

Some think those alive when he comes will not die, but that was not adapted to the end—to console Martha, by instructing her about death in respect to the righteous.

Does not Christ utter two truths of infinite moment, and suited to his object?

1. The resurrection. (I say of the body.)
2. That no believer comes absolutely under the dominion of death. Death therefore—Martha—is not as fearful as you think.

The question, "believest thou this?" after Martha declared her belief in the resurrection, shows that he was uttering a new and additional truth.

But, then, you will say, the christian is dead and yet alive at the same time! Precisely so. All that absurdity I believe.

But I am not writing anything new to you, nor do I propose to argue any points.

Fraternally yours.

To the forgoing we responded as follows:—

I thank you for your kind letter. In return, for your christian salutation, I say—"Grace, mercy and peace, from God our Father and Jesus Christ our Lord" be unto you, through the "Lord Jesus Christ, our hope."

You do right in thinking of me as "far on the journey," for so I am; nor do I wish that journey more distant; yet I hope to endure patiently all our Lord's will.

You have mentioned a few of my cotemporaries who have fallen asleep; but there are numbers more, who, I suppose, are also in the same state. For a long time I had no access to the Methodist papers. Thus I have but an imperfect knowledge of what has become of all my old associates.

Though I have no wish to die—as no perfectly sane person can have—yet even "with" my "views" of the state of "death," to the believer, there can be no cause for depression or fear. To such, the instant of death is, in fact, the instant of the resurrection from the dead, to "honor, glory, and immortality." A million years in that state is no more than the quiet sleep of a single night upon our bed. And I have this advantage over the common belief, that of not remaining in a half-glorified state for a distant period to arrive; nor to witness the sorrows and sufferings of those I may leave behind in this vale of tears. Besides, in my view, the moment the believer falls asleep in Christ, brings him, in fact, at once into the society of all the redeemed family, from Abel until the last saint that will ever thus fall asleep; and all are glorified together, i. e., at one and the same time. Surely this thought is full of consolation.

I have "no hope out of Christ" either for the forgivness of sins, or for a future life at all. Out of Christ, sin holds its dominion; and hence, "he that believeth not in the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." "The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law." Jesus Christ is the only medium through which God has ever promised to give "the victory" over sin and death.

I thank you for the exhortation—"Let no doctrine get between you and Christ." Through the grace and mercy of God, I intend that nothing shall do that. Remove Christ, or take away my union with him, and I have nothing left; all would be dark and cheerless as the most dismal dungeon. No language can describe the value I see in Christ for me and for a dying world; all would be eternal night without him.

On the subject of our Lord's discourse with Martha, John xi., possibly it is not worth while that I should enter into a discussion with you on paper; yet, perhaps, I may as well say a word.

1. "No believer comes absolutely under the dominion of death," you say. So say I. Here we are agreed. The wicked only come thus "under the dominion of death." "Lazarus is dead," said Jesus to his disciples; but he was not "absolutely under the dominion of death," for then he could not have been awaked.

2. Martha was to be "consoled" not merely "by instructing her about death to the righteous," but by teaching her that Jesus had power to raise from the dead now, as well as "at the last day." Hitherto she seems not to have understood, or thought, that after her brother had been "dead four days" Jesus could make him alive. She said, despairingly, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." Jesus said—"Thy brother shall rise again;" evidently meaning, immediately. But this thought did not seem to have taken hold of Martha's mind; and her reply shows that while she believed in the resurrection of her brother "at the last day" she had overlooked, or had not sufficiently considered that life and resurrection were both in Christ's hands, and that if he please to exercise his power and right over the dead, who believed in him, he could make them alive now as well as "at the last day." This was a "new and additional truth;" and a most cheering and comforting one to Martha if she would receive it. To this statement of Jesus', I think, it was, he asked Martha—"Believest thou this?" As though he said, "You believe your brother will rise at the last day: but the life of the dead saints is in my hands, and I can therefore raise up now those that are dead. Believest thou this?"

That such is the meaning of our Lord, seems evident from Martha's answer. "She saith unto him, Yea, Lord: I believe that thou art that Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world."

If the question of Jesus had been, whether Martha believed that Lazarus was now actually alive—though dead—it seems to me, she would have given entirely a different answer. She would have expressed some surprise and joy at the discovery of this "new and additional truth" as to the state of the dead. But nothing of the kind appears; but when the question is viewed as relating to the power of Christ to raise now, one who had been dead "four days"—when, among the Jews, all hope of a revival was past, there is a propriety in her answer. Does she answer—"O, Lazarus is happy now?" No: but she expresses the fullest confidence that Jesus is the true Christ, and therefore can raise her brother from the dead now, if he will: and having said this, she went immediately for her sister.

I might greatly enlarge upon this topic, but as you have been brief, I say no more at present.

Yours, truly, in hope of eternal life through Jesus Christ alone. GEO. STORRS.

Nature makes us poor only when we want necessaries, but custom gives the name of poverty to the want of superfluities.

"The Awakening Begun."

Under the above head, we published an article in the Bible Examiner, Aug. 1853, which we have thought it might be well to reproduce, now that the Independent seems to be drifting somewhere from the old channel of Calvinism and "horrible decrees." We would that its awakening might be to an understanding of man's real nature and destiny; but we have our fears lest in escaping from some of the old worn-out and disgusting features of the theology of the past centuries, it should retain the poisoning and corrupt root of all theological errors and corruptions of the word of God, viz., Inherent immortality, combined with or inhering in a supposed spiritual nature in man "formed of the dust of the ground." Here is the fountain whence have arisen the foul streams that have defiled the pure waters of life and converted the God of love into the most hateful of all tyrants.

The article we refer to is the following:

THE BIBLE EXAMINER has for five years uttered a note of warning to the churches, that unless they awoke from their slumbers and reformed their theology, skepticism and infidelity would overwhelm them, and sweep them as with the besom of destruction. But we have as often been met with scorn and sneers. At last, however, there seems to be one symptom of a waking up on this subject. Under the head of "Modern Skepticism," the Independent, of this city, for July 7th, has an article that gives signs of the revival of common sense against the traditions and superstitions of past centuries. The Independent is "Conducted by Pastors of Congregational Churches," and published weekly. The article before us opens with a lament that "teachers are sometimes those who know least about the public mind." It then proceeds to say:

"We believe that a great change is preparing in religious opinion, of which these and many of our best men know nothing. To those who are thrown into the currents of life, it is evident that men's minds are in unusual working, and that the very foundations of religious belief are rotten and shaking. Among all the earnest-minded young men who are at this moment leading in thought and action in America, we venture to say four-fifths are skeptical even of the great historical facts of Christianity. What is told as Christian doctrine by the churches is not even considered by them. And furthermore, there is among them a general ill-concealed distrust of the clerical body as a class, and an utter disgust with the very aspect of Christianity and of church worship. This Skepticism is not flippant; little is said about it. It is not a peculiarity alone of the radicals and fanatics; many of them are men of calm and even balance of mind, and belong to no class of ultraists. It is not worldly and selfish. The doubters lead in the bravest and most self-denying enterprises of the day. It is not an unbelief to be laughed, or hooted at, or hunted down. It is calm, abiding, earnest, sorrowful. Not much is known of it above: but it underlies now all the strongest and external movement. There are, however glimpses of it. You see it in the daily diminishing influence of the pulpit, and the increasing influence of the press; in the lessening number of strong and original minds who take hold of Theology, and the tone of the men who are leading American thought. It speaks in these strange longings for new revelations, and in the occasional denunciations of the old. To us it seems strange that those Christian men should be boasting about church-organizations and technical dogmas, or be troubled about consistency with orthodox standards and catechisms, or anxious about the question of pastors' salaries, and what not, when the very ground and basis beneath our Christian Church is trembling to its depths—to be squabbling over uniforms and rations, when the very citadel is being sapped! For ourselves, we watch all this with painful suspense. Is the fate of Germany before us? Will the Unbelief creep out from the better minds who have held it among the masses, drying up all humane, and generous, and religious action, as it has done there? Shall the American mind sweep past the great anchorage-ground of humanity—the belief of God and an endless life—or shall it work out to a purer Christianity? Of these doubters and "Infidels" we could never speak harshly. To them often is their belief a sorrowful, solemn thing, even more than to us."

The article then proceeds to state some other facts of the development of this skepticism, and says: "As religion has presented itself to them, (the skeptics,) it is repellent and disgusting; and they would rather go into the blank future, lonely and faithless, than violate their own instincts by receiving it." The writer then proceeds to inquire, "Why all this?" Among other things he says:

"The curse to the American mind, as we believe, has been the aspect presented in a portion of our theology of DEITY. The God of some of our theologians is not a Being whom the human heart could either respect or love. Men have ascribed acts and feelings to HIM which they would utterly revolt at in themselves or their fellows. We are not overstating. We know those to whom the memory of family prayer, early religious teaching, and Sabbath sermons is so entwined with the picture of a hateful and repellent Deity, that they loathe and reject, in consequence, the whole religion of their childhood. To them always the first unconscious thought which enters the mind concerning God, is the dread thought of the God of their Theology. Along with this, on every side weakening human faith, is the Formalism of present Christianity."

We would ask our friend of the Independent, how anything else than "Formalism" can grow from the "picture of a hateful and repellent Deity," such as he admits theologians represent their God—a God who has brought unnumbered millions of intellectual beings into existence, under the dreadful and fearful liability of an endless and eternally increasing torment and torture? Such a God deserves to be hated; and nothing but formalism can be practised in the professional approaches to him, unless you can shut out from the intellect such a horrid representation of his character. Never did satan oppose so effectual an obstacle in the way of the sincere and fervent homage of the heart to God, as the lying representation we have just spoken of. Says Bishop Newton, in his "Dissertation," No 60, "On the Final State of Man," "God is love, and he would rather not have given life, than render that life a torment and curse to all eternity. * * * Imagine a creature; nay, imagine numberless creatures produced out of nothing * * * delivered over to torments of endless ages, without the least hope or possibility of relaxation or redemption. Imagine it you may, but you can never seriously believe it, nor reconcile it to God and goodness." Such was the utterance of a great and good man, burdened with the theological representations of God and his purposes concerning man. This utterance is skeptical: but skeptical concerning what? of the truth of Christianity? No: but of the theological dogma of endless torments. And what mind not as hard as adamant, or as superstitious as the most servile Papal or Protestant devotee, would not be skeptical of the theological blasphemy of which we have spoken. Truly it is "The curse of American mind," and of all Christendom—that such "has been the aspect presented in a portion of our theology of DEITY:" and we are glad our friends of the Independent are waking up on the subject; and we entreat them not to stop in the branches of the poisonous tree, but go down to its roots: they will find them in the lying utterance, "Thou shalt not surely die."

Knowing the Time.

BR. GRANT:—In looking at the sayings of Christ respecting his second coming, I have failed to find anything to indicate any definite time, only of being "near, even at the doors." It is said that none but the Father knoweth the time; but notwithstanding this, I believe that every child of his who has the seal of adoption will know the time of his deliverance a short time, at least, previous to the parting of the heavens. In all the instances where God has visited the earth with judgment, he has had a special care for his people. We may refer to the flood, the destruction of Jerusalem and Sodom, and other events recorded in scripture; and we believe that this God is our Father also, and that at the proper time he will reveal to us the time of our deliverance.

I think we stand in relation to this subject very much as Elijah did just previous to his ascension. The time was revealed to him; as he spoke almost positively respecting it. He said to Elisha, What good thing shall I do unto thee before I am taken up? If thou seest me my mantle shall fall on thee, etc. Elijah had no history or chronology to consult, but direct revelation from God. I think that, independent of all prophetic dates and chronological and historical research, we shall know the definite time of our deliverance, and it will be revealed to those only who live in daily communion with God, and his Son and Spirit.

D. N. SMITH.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR OF HER. OF LIFE.—The foregoing, from the World's Crisis, is the most sensible thing we have seen on the subject of knowing the time. We do not indorse it; but if the definite time for that event is ever known, we are of the opinion this writer comes the nearest to the truth of anything we have seen on the subject. It is known to all our readers that we do not believe the definite time for the second advent of our Lord, day, month, or year, is revealed in the Bible. To those who live in a prepared state, God may, perhaps will, make known, at the important moment, by a special revelation, the time of their change. But of this we say nothing positive. Let all so live as to be always ready. "What I say, I say unto all, WATCH," saith Jesus.

New Jersey.

BR. STORRS:—Br. Wendell called to see us for a few moments on his way home from Paterson. He had spent two Sabbaths there. The cause of truth has good foothold in Paterson, and there are those there capable of holding up and spreading the light with great credit. We hope to have the benefit of their counsels at the coming Annual Meeting of the L. & A. U., at Wilbraham, on the 23d inst.

New Jersey is an inviting field for spreading the Life views. We were at the Long Branch meeting the other week, and were surprised at the gathering there. The large tent recently got up by Br. WOLCOTT of Oceanport, was filled, and the most of the company seemed, in appearance, like the same class that have gathered together to hear the word of the Lord since he first presented it in person by the Sea of Gallilee. The enterprise of Br. Wolcott is beyond all praise. At his sole cost he has provided one of the finest tents we ever saw. With this, he is very desirous to evangelize New Jersey; and, we doubt not, God is impelling him to the work. Br. Wendell felt so encouraged by the generous reception he met with at Paterson, and the candor of the people who came to hear what the import of his message was, that he concluded it was his duty to accept the urgent invitation of Br. Wolcott to spend a few weeks with him in travelling with the tent and preaching in that State prior to making his journey to the far West.

Br. Wendell, in our opinion, has already spent too much of his time officiating at Salem. He is gifted for an evangelist. We deem it his place to be engaged in localities where the ground is new and not burnt over, as it is where many of our friends have been wasting their time to little profit. He and Br. Wolcott, carrying the word through New Jersey, with the divine blessing, we expect to hear of the most perfect success. We wish that the enterprise had been undertaken ere we came together at the Annual Meeting, as we should then have had sufficient evidence that such was the work, in addition to sustaining the HERALD, that the energies and means of friends should be devoted to.

Foreign Correspondence.

"G. B. D.," of Paterson, N. J., has gone to Europe for a few months. Before he left, we engaged him to give us a weekly communication of his observations and such incidents as might be of interest here. The following is the first received, and more are expected to follow.—ED. HER. OF LIFE.

DUBLIN, IRELAND, July 24, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—We left New York, Thursday, July 11th, in the steamship Union, of the North German Lloyd Line, for Havre. Our little party were unaccustomed for the most part to Foreign travel, and prepared to receive whatever enjoyment is incidental to novitiates. After kindly partings with our friends, and some delay for the West India Mails, we steamed down the Bay, out of the Narrows, and, before the first darkness closed around us, were out of sight of land. The passage was for the most part without incident. Captain Von Santen, a hearty, plethoric German, seemed to understand himself and his duties, better than we understood him. The officers were courteous and all the attendants, attentive as could be desired.

To landsmen, sea-voyaging is not specially conducive to thought. Occasionally we took to our bibles, but the brain had too much sympathy with the epigastrium, and we received but little profit from the study of the word. Nor did we attempt to do much good. Our fellow passengers were mostly Germans, and many of them of Abrahamic descent; whose conversion, by the warning of the failure of so many home and foreign socities, we did not undertake. Left to ourselves, we passed the time as best we could, and lived a purely carnal life for nine days. Dreamily we watched the restless waves; and the flitting clouds sank and rose drearily with the roll of the ship; sauntered to and fro, noting our course by the compass, or computing our distance from Europe by each day's bulletin in the gangway. Occasionally we explored the bowels of the Leviathan, a modern steamship, and always wished that we might have a safe and speedy voyage. And we were gratified. The dawn of Sunday 21st disclosed to our view the white Cliffs which give England its pretty name of Albion. The Isle of Wight on the one side of us, and the main land on the other, richer and darker in their green foliage, than, apparently, the woods are at home, were welcome sights. The sun was breaking through the mists, and the channel was glassy with stillness when the Union anchored just opposite the Southampton Water. A low black steamer puffed along side, and the London and Paris passengers, the great stacks of mail bags, a dainty little pile of silver bricks and gold boxes, from San Francisco, were speedily deposited on her deck, and we splashed away for Southampton. "More beautiful than the Hudson," said one of our party, as we glided past the castle on the point, the pleasant homes of the titled and the rich, the low green meadows and the well-wooded hills, the great pile of the Victoria Hospital, and the antiquated ruins of Notley Abbey to the stone wharf. The custom-house officials passed us with a simple inquiry, and we were in England. Our sensations, upon realizing ourselves to be on the soil of the mother country, were of course novel. Our faculties by common consent resolved themselves into a committee of eyes and ears. As soon as we could refresh ourselves, and wash away the rust of shipboard, we sauntered around the city, which proved the cleanest and neatest of any we had ever visited. There is certainly more government in England than in America; and if exercised in no other direction than the promotion of public cleanliness, there would be little ground for complaint. In the evening, we attended service in the Independent Chapel on High street, and listened as we could to a sermon from Mr. Carlisle, the assistant pastor. The preacher was elevated, midway to the ceiling; the pews were straight-backed and cushionless. Listening, therefore, was attended with difficulties. The text was, "And Stephen being full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people." Stephen was one of the seven deacons chosen to attend to the temporalities of the Infant Church. He aimed, however, to accomplish more than was comprehended in the official work assigned to him. He had a holy ambition which led him to the performance of miracles. The agency through which he did these were faith and the Holy Spirit. Faith is the gift of God, and is possessed in degrees. We ought to have it in such intensity as to become a power. It should be sound, strong, healthy, unyielding, and always in exercise. We should believe in Christ; in the doctrine of the atonement, and in the promises of Jesus. The work to be performed in this day through the agency of faith and the spirit is the salvation of souls. The want of conversions is evident of the weak faith of professed believers.

Such were the principal points of the sermon; and though orthodox, we questioned very seriously whether it could be New Testament truth. If faith is the gift of God, why expect us to believe who may not have received the gift? Or why should we pray for that in which we do not believe before we pray? How can faith save souls? Stephen's faith saved no souls but his own. He wrought miracles and wonders; and many doubtless were induced by them to believe that Jesus was the Messiah; but no faith to-day would suffice to perform miracles. The moral power of faith alone remains, and this moral power is scarcely worth estimating. The Mohammedan and the Papist believe more intensely than Mr. Carlisle; but their faith does not make converts. There is a darkness about this whole subject which Mr. Carlisle's congregation feel, but cannot define. Though he exhorted them strenuously to have the powerful faith of Stephen, it is very certain that they believe now as intensely as they ever will, and that no similar results will ever occur through their increased faith. Stephen's wonders and miracles did the work. And so long as we are unable to reach them, we cannot predicate the rest of Apostolic language, on the present church of believers. Why will teachers try to make the New Testament experiences harmonious with church experiences, when the church is shorn of all New Testament facts?

You see, we left the chapel, in High street, not only with stiff necks because of looking straight up at the ceiling, but with spiritual stiff necks, because of thinking that the preacher had not caught the key note of Divine Truth. We believed in the immortality of the human soul, and a present spiritual, instead of the coming kingdom of the anointed; and with such foundations, it is scarcely a possibility to build a faith which will agree with the doctrines of St. Paul.

The following Monday we started early by rail for London, having agreed to defer our visit to the Continent till we had seen Ireland—the attracting magnet to your old friend, Mr. Jackson. Through well-cultivated fields in the valley of the Itchan, past villages and towns without suburbs, among gorse and hether bells, along a narrow sluice, called a canal, we spirit to the Great Metropolis. Without much tarrying, except to take a hasty glance at St. Paul's, we shifted to the North Western Railway and were booked for Dublin. We are devoting a day to Parks and Zoological Gardens, Catholic Cemetery and Daniel O'Connel, Dublin Castle and Irish character. To-morrow we propose to move northward, and D. V. will stop in Sligo.

From S. Cooper.

WINDSOR, CONN., July 28, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—I must confess I was not a little surprised at an editorial remark in the last column of the last HERALD OF LIFE, which is now before the public, and may astound others as well as myself; and which may require a little explanation or vindication. The remark is this: "That is the worst kind of murder." An inquiry immediately rose, How can that be? Did not Elijah pray, and it rained not for the space of three years and six months? Again: Did not Elisha pray, "Let fire come down from heaven and consume thee, and thy fifty," and repeat it? Was he a murderer of the worst kind?

David prayed, "Let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end, but establish the just;" and my whole being often says, Amen. Again, he says, "Let them go down quick into hell" (sheal.) "Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more." Whether this is language of David in prayer, or prophetical, I think it equally murderous with that of the man whose prayer was answered in the death of the Universalist, whose influence was ungodly, and destroying or taking peace from the earth, as all ungodliness tends that way. If the Lord saw that he would not be converted, why not let him and all such be removed? Doubtless the greatest desire of the man who prayed was, that if possible he might be converted and useful; but if he would not, then let him be taken out of the way. Was it in hatred? No: never will God hear and answer the prayer of hatred to another. But "If we ask according to his will, we know that he heareth us, and we have the petition desired of him." Will God answer prayer that is not according to his will? I trow not.

Your brother, wishing to see all things in their true light.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We are "not a little surprised," but a thousand times more "surprised" than he can be, at the idea that any man, professing to be a follower of "the meek and lowly" Jesus, should be guilty of praying such a prayer as that we condemned. The references of Br. Cooper do not mitigate, in the least, the blasphemy of that prayer, which was notoriously intended to be understood as the procuring cause of the death of the Universalist; and then for it to be heralded about as "an answer to prayer!"

We shall not at this time go into an explanation of the texts Br. Cooper has referred to, which he seems to suppose justified the prayer we condemned. Will he look at our Lord's instructions: "Love your enemies ....pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you." Does that mean, "pray till three o'clock in the morning" for the Lord to kill them? Then look again. The disciples once felt as this praying murderer did, and said, "Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, even as Elias did, and consume them?" What said our divine Master? Hark: "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of: the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives but to save them."

If any man make such a prayer as that which was the occasion of our note, he had better keep it within his own knowledge, and not boast of it before men as being answered in the death of one whom he believed would go immediately to eternal torments. Such praying, and such pretended "answers" to such prayers, are a scandal to Christianity. Had we seen the article before it was in type, and in the form, just going to press, we would not have consented it should have gone into the HERALD OF LIFE, at all. As it happened, all we could do was to enter a solemn protest against such monstrous perversions of the privilege of prayer. We have no confession to make for that note.

From Elder J. Lewis.

OTTO, ILLS., Aug. 1, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—Our meeting at the Tottin Prairie was well attended. There is evidently a deep anxiety in the minds of not a few, to know the truth. Some have already embraced it, and concluded to come out of Babylon, which has set others at war with us. But this does not move us; so we let them shoot, knowing the splinters will recoil upon their own heads. We say but little, pro or con, unless in preaching the truth: then their errors must and will be exposed. Glory to God for increasing light in his blessed word, and for the prospects ahead: hope to see the time when we can stand alone. Brethren, pray for us; for ours is an uphill business, with four times more work before us than we shall be able to accomplish. I expect to preach the first, second, and third Sundays in this month on the old battle-field, called Tottin Prairie; and we will have the Tent there, with the full expectation of help. We hope to see a goodly number from all parts. Come one; come all; and come praying, and God will bless the effort. We pray that the dear HERALD OF LIFE may live until the LIFE-GIVER comes. But simply praying and not doing is not what God requireth of us; therefore, I will send my pledge for ten dollars for the next volume; hoping that all the friends West will try and do something. Remember that when the Lord comes to gather his saints, he says it is those that have made a covenant with him by sacrifice that will be accepted. May the Lord help us all to be found in the line of duty, so that he can say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." Amen.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The reason we have not sent the papers you desired, is, we have none left. We will send you some pamphlets and tracts, to Otto, in a few days.

We should give as we receive, cheerfully, quickly, and without hesitation, for there is no grace in a benefit that sticks to the fingers.

"The Theology of the Bible."

GEO. W. YOUNG has removed from 35 Ann street to No. 25 Chambers street, near Centre street, this city, in the store of Asa L. Shipman & Son. Mr. Young will furnish the above-named work to any one in the city or who may call at his place of business, at $3 per copy. Persons wishing the work sent by mail should send direct to the author, "Hon. O. S. HALSTED, 417 Broad street, Newark, N. J;" who will send the work, on the receipt of $3, free of postage.

The work can also be had of W. S. OLMSTED, Hartford, Conn.

BOOKS, PAMPHLETS, AND TRACTS can be had at the Editor's residence; of GEO. W. YOUNG, at Shipman & Son's Store, 25 Chambers St., New York, also at the Store of W. H. & L. C. Throne & Co., 58 White St.; and likewise at 37 Park Row, Room 40.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These question are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy"—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS.—Price 5 cents.

No. 4. THE SOUL SAVED OR LOST. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS.—Price 5 cents.

No. 5. MORAL DEPRAVITY: by GEO. STORRS Price, 5 cents.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: or, THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTER TO A CLERGYMAN; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburgh, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for two cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our expense They will be sold at $3 per 100; but, in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent or 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

The following are 12 mo Tracts, of 24 pages each:

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

All Letters in relation to any of these works must be addressed,

GEO. STORRS,
Box 4658, NEW YORK.

Special Notice.

It will be seen that we have withdrawn from our CATALOGUE our work on "Man's Destiny;" being the Review of the "Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D.," in support of inherent immortality. We have not a copy of the work left; and the high price of paper, together with the limited demand for the work, forbid expending money in publishing another edition, at present, to say nothing of the lack of funds if we wished to do it.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchaser of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues are hereby revoked.

Poetry.

AN INQUIRY.

Tune: "Do they miss me at home?"

Have you heard how on Calvary's mountain,
A Lamb for poor sinners was slain?
Did you know that in Judah a fountain
Was open to cleanse from all sin?
Have you heard of the glad proclamation?
Have you seen the bright banners unfurled?
Have you seen the blest car of salvation,
In majesty move through the world?

Did you know that the Saviour had risen,
First fruits unto God from the dead?
Did you know tha the grave was a prison?
Man enters its portals with bread.
Did you know that the voice of God's thunder
Will shake the broad plains of the earth?
The prison house doors burst asunder,
That the just might receive their new birth?

Did you know that the Saviour's appearing,
As promised, would surely take place?
Have you felt that the goal we were nearing
Would soon tell the doom of our race?
Have you heard the deep groans of creation;
Have you heard any rumors of war?
Is nation now striving with nation?
O, what are the tidings afar?

Has your heart ever melted with pity,
Or sighed at humanity's woes?
Have you told dying souls of that city,
That heaven one day will disclose?
Have you told them of life's flowing river,
That every disease can destroy?
Have you told them they might live forever,
In a world of ineffable joy?

If you've not thought of these, fellow mortals,
Why do you not wake and prepare—
When heaven shall open its portals
A crown of bright glory to share!
When the conqueror's palm shall be given,
And the story of triumph be told,
May we enter the Kingdom of Heaven,
And walk the broad streets of pure gold.

A SERIOUS JOKE.

Boys often think it a very smart thing to get one of their number into a temporary difficulty, thereby causing an embarrassment of behavior which greatly excites their mirth and ridicule, though often the poor boy who is the victim finds, like the frogs in the old fable, that although it is sport to them, it is death to him; in other words, being the butt of his fellows wounds his feelings and makes him truly wretched, while the enjoyment that arises from the suffering of another is indeed fleeting pleasure.

Two years ago the writer of this article attended a pic-nic where the children were ranged around tables and waited upon by kind ladies, who furnished them with an abundance of good things. All seemed happy and contented except one little boy, who, sad and silent, stood apart from the rest. "He has been forgotten," I thought, and drew the attention of a lady near me to the child.

"There is a little boy who looks wistfully at the cakes and pies," I said, "but he seems to be eating nothing."

"Why, do you not know he cannot eat?" the lady asked, in evident surprise; and then she told me his sad story. Here it is:

Two boys were playing together in a back yard of a dwelling where one of them lived. They had everything to make their lives pleasant—friends, fortune, health, and no future was brighter than theirs. As they ran through the yard, one of them stopped a moment before a vat of dark, clear liquid, and asked his playmate what it was.

"I know," was the reply; "taste it."

"Is it good?"

"Yes, real good; taste it."

The little fellow put his mouth down and took one swllow of the liquid. It was strong lye, and it shrunk the membranes of his throat and destroyed his palate, and from that day to this he has never eaten of solid food. Bread, broth, or sugar and water is all the nourishment his feeble life receives. The story is true. It was a cruel joke, and the boy that perpetrated it will bitterly repent it, for it will yet probably cost a human life.

Some boys were playing on a frozen pond that had several spots of weak ice. One of the boys tied his skates together and whirled them to the centre of one of them, where he left them lying. "Just wait," he said to the boy near, "till Joe Burke comes down, and we'll have some fun."

Joe was a small, poorly dressed boy, who suffered much at the hands of his elder and more knowing companions. When he came to the pond, the boy to whom the skates belonged was sitting on the ice, looking quite forlorn.

"If I only had my skates I'd go home," he was saying. "Maybe you will just run over and get them, Joe, like a good fellow; there they are," pointing to the spot.

Joe, who was possessed of an accommodating spirit, ran briskly to get them, and, as the other boy had planned and forseen, broke through the ice, that was only strong enough to bear the skates, and got a thorough wetting. There was great laughter at his rueful face as he scrambled out; but he was poor, and had no clothes to exchange for his wet ones. The cold and dampness struck into his feeble frame, and he died in less than a month, of typhus fever, the physicians said, but the drenching "for fun" sowed the seeds.

I have related two practical jokes with the results. They were not so very funny, after all. Even if they had not ended so fatally, you have only to imagine what your feelings would be in such positions, and avoid an amusement that has for its foundation even the temporary unhappiness of a fellow being. There are a thousand sports that involve no peril or suffering. Embrace them all, to the entire exclusion of such questionable pleasures as practical jokes.—Christian Times.

WISHING FOR GRANDFATHER'S EYES.

Never was little Myra better pleased than when going a walk with her grandfather; for he was so kind and gentle, and talked about the things they saw in so pleasant and cheerful a manner, that it was quite a treat to her.

If they saw any ants at work, "Oh! oh!" he would say, "what makes you so busy, when none of you have any rent or tax to pay? But I see how it is: you are at work for one another. Remember, Myra, we must not be idle; for when we have nothing to do for ourselves, we may always help other people."

If they saw a bee winging his way from flower to flower, he was almost sure to speak of it. "Well, Mr. Buzzabout, will you tell us what you are doing? But we understand it very well, and will learn a lesson from you. Mind, Myra, that as the bee gets honey from every flower, you and I get good from everything."

In this way Myra used to be entertained by her grandfather, who likened her to a fresh bud that would soon burst into a flower, and himself to a faded leaf which was almost ready to fall from the tree.

One day, after Myra had had a pleasant walk with her grandfather, she sat down to do a little sewing with her mother, and then they talked together in the following manner:

"I wish I had grandfather's eyes, mother."

"Do you, dear? I hardly think that he could spare them. But what can you possibly want with the eyes of your grandfather, Myra?"

"Oh, if I had his eyes I should see all that he sees when we are walking together; but now I cannot see half as much as he does."

"No! that is very strange when you are young and he is old. He often says that his sight is not what it used to be, and then, you know, though the bible is in large print, he is obliged to use spectacles."

"Yes, mother, but for all that he can see more than I can."

"Tell me what you mean, love, for I cannot at all understand you."

"Why, when we walk out in the fields and lanes, let us look at what we will, he says he sees God's goodness in everything."

"Ah! Myra, it is not grandfather's eyes, but grandfather's faith that you want. Pray to God to open the eyes of your understanding, to give you a heart to love and trust him, and you will then see him, not only in all the works of his hand, but in all the events of life."

"SUMMER REST."

Gail Hamilton has written a popular work this year with the above title. We saw it soon after its issue, and our attention was called by our daughter to a chapter under the head of "Larva Lessons," and we determined to give an extract from it to show that the views we hold on the immortality question are making advances outside of our immediate friends. We lost sight of the book, however, and had neglected to hunt it up till reminded of our delay by seeing the matter we intended to give in the Voice of the West. For the lack of the book itself we copy from that paper. Let us be thankful that the light enters, by any means, into the public mind on the subject of immortality. The dialogue is as follows:

....We have speculated much this summer, and about caterpillars as well as other things. Halicarnassus is disposed to take a desponding view of the matter, "What right or reason have we," he asks, "to endow ourselves with an immortality which we deny to them?', They are to us a disagreeable incident, which we quietly put out of the way as fast as possible; regarding only our own convenience, and often only our own feelings, and all their pleasure or profit. Why may it not be that we hold to a higher race of beings the same relation which this holds to us? Why may it not be that our lives are relatively as transient and unimportant, and that we perish as entirely and as unregarded?"

"Well," I answer, "I don't know why, only we don't."

"But are you so sure of that? As far as we see, man goeth to the grave, and where is he?"

I.—But he goes to his grave by the law of his own nature. He dies or is killed by his kind. He is not brought into contact with any higher race, and the caterpillar is. His higher race is close about him. He sees it and feels it. Our higher race, if we have any, is invisible and impalpable. It never gives any sign, and I don't believe in you (defiantly, in case any of them should happen to be within hearing.)

H—Very just reasoning; yet if that group of caterpillars yonder should happen to be a debating society, in which two philorophers like us are discussing the question of a higher race, they use, unquestionably, the same arguments which you have advanced, and will arrive at just as decided a negative.

I.—You do not mean that they do not see us nor hear us?

H.—They do not see us. To them we are only obstacle, danger, accident, not beings.

I.—Very true. When I crush an insect under my foot, I suppose he does not suspect it is the foot of his superior that crushed him.

H.—Certainly not. He will always think he died in a fit.

I.—When we kill them by the bucketful, they do not know it is "we" or a "bucket."

H.—No, they probably call it an earthquake, an avalanche, the operation of natural laws. And when the French soldiers were writhing in Victor Hugo's pit at Waterloo, they called it a pit, and not a higher power.

I.—But they knew they rushed in, and the caterpillars must have known, if they knew anything, that they did not walk into that bucket by any will of their own, even if they did not perceive the existence of any higher will.

H.—Some higher power may have acted on our circumstances just as directly, if not just as perceptibly as we act on a caterpillar's. Perhaps, when we grope out among the stars, or feel down into the earth after the fossils and the fire and all the old time's secrets, we crawl into their domain just as obnoxiously as the caterpillars do into ours, and so they contrive ways to rid themselves of us.

I.—But we have faculties, feelings, thoughts entirely above and beyond them. They have not even the germ of what we have in full flower, and there is no analogy between us. We are an entirely distinct race, and you cannot reason from them to us.

H.—So is the dog and so is the cat an entirely distinct race from the caterpillar; they have thoughts and feelings which the most cultivated and highly developed caterpillar never attained to. Yet their great sagacity does not immortalize them.

I.—But they have no intellect, no conscience.

H.—Pardon me, I think we have evidence of both. They reason, and they distinguish right from wrong. When Rory is sleeping on the kitchen mat before the fire, she does not stir for your approach; she only raises her head sleepily, or perhaps puts up her nose for a caress. But when she has surreptitiously crept up stairs and bestowed herself on the best bed to take her after-dinner nap, no sooner does she hear an approaching footstep than she leaps off and scuds down the back stairs. There, it seems to me, you have memory, conscience, reasoning, and prudent action; and often dogs and cats show these and other high human qualities in far more intricate forms.

I.—Yes, but their reasoning never goes beyond a certain limit. It is confined to concrete personal matters. They never reason on abstractions, and even their conscience is, I apprehend, a purely physical one. They have no notion of right as right. They know that such a thing is followed by punishment and such a thing by caresses. That is all.

H.—And that is all a small child knows. He distinguishes right from wrong, but has no conception of right or of God, while in point of intellect he is far beneath the dog.

I.—But he is susceptible of unlimited cultivation, while no dog was ever educated into a knowledge of holiness or mathematics.

H—Certainly there is a difference in degree, but it still remains that you have in the dog the germs of his master's qualities. Now the point is, why do we affirm that those beings in whom the germ exists must die, while those in whom it is a little more developed shall live? What element of life exists in a quart of intellect that does not inhere in a thimbleful? If the cultivation of faculties is the crucial test, many a man will be in evil case as compared with his dog. With a capacity of becoming godlike, he does meaner things than even his dog can do. His dog is faithful to his bad master; his master is faithless to his good wife and his innocent children. The dog lives an honest and enlightened dog life. The man perverts his powers to brutal and worse than brutal uses. Why is he to be permitted to live forever—a blot upon creation—while the high-hearted dog must go back to darkness and dust.

I—Yet Dr. Kane, who must certainly have seen very low if not the lowest types of human kind and some of the highest types of animal, said he considered the lowest man higher than the highest brute.

H.—We should need to inquire what precisely he meant by "low" and "high."

I.—My dear, this is all nonsense. You know perfectly well that there is an essential difference between brute and man; and that this—whatever you call it—soul, spirit, heart—this in which the essential difference consists—is indestructible.

H.—How do I know it?

I—You know it from the bible.

H.—Where does the bible say so?

I.—I do not know that there is any one verse where it is said in so many words; but the whole bible goes upon the assumption that the soul is immortal. The incarnation of Christ is presumptive evidence of it. The means would be disproportionate to the end, if the Son of God had died to redeem creatures whose lives were to stretch over but a few years—a mere point of time compared with the boundless eternity.

H.—Pardon me again, but you are speaking from the midst of confusion. You are mixing up theories which are entirely separate. You say, first, that man and beast are essentially different, and therefore man is immortal. I dispute your major premise. Man may have an element of character or of nature, if you will, entirely distinct from, and indisputably higher, than the animal; but it need not, for that reason, be immortal. What the essence of immortality is, what that quality is whose very existence is its guaranty of eternity, I do not know. I certainly do not see any reason for supposing that humanity, which in its naked infancy is visibly but earthiness, is that quality. If the bible should, as you think, give us God's word for it, that would be enough. But, so far from assuming any such thing, it seems to me to assume quite the contrary. The bible continually represents the soul, not as inherently, but only as contingently immortal. Eternal life is not spoken of as an inheritance, but as a boon. "By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God." Immortality is something to be sought after, and that which is to be sought is not a thing which we should have in any case. "To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life."

I.—But in the converse, it does not promise to the bad eternal death, but "indignation and wrath," tribulation and anguish.

H.—It does not, however, deny eternal death; and you must distinguish between a non-assertion and a denial. God's indignation and wrath, man's tribulation and anguish, are not incompatible with final death. Rather, we might suppose, death must result from them. At any rate, the bible predicates immortality of God alone. "Who only hath immortality." Now, supposing man to have been originally made capable of living forever, but by some sin to have forfeited this ability, would it not be a divine work, one worthy of the to devise a scheme by which this forfeited life might be restored? Does it seem a little thing for millions of beings, with so great capacities, to be rescued from nothingness and redeemed to bright and ever brightening life, becoming more and more like him, and enjoying him and themselves forever? I rather think, if it was a glorious thing for God to make the world, it was a far more glorious, as it was a far more difficult thing, for him thus to make it over.

HOW TO FIND LIFE.

I was travelling on the Midland Railroad some time ago. Among my fellow passengers were a commercial man, an aged general, a major, an aged lady, a sister of mercy or nun, and a young girl, who, from her agitation, I feared was being tempted from her home to take the vail. A more sad face than that of the unhappy looking nun was seldom seen. As I looked at her I thought if she had but peace with God, oh! how her misery would be turned into joy. I sat longing for an opportunity to tell her of the work of Christ. By-and-by she felt for her ticket—she could not find it. I helped her to seek it. At last she found it, after much excitement, in her cloak sleeve. I then said, "It would be a fearful thing at the end of the journey of this life to find that we were without the passport to life eternal." "Indeed it would," she replied. I said, "Can you tell me what the passport is to life eternal?" "A good conscience," she replied. I said again, "God says in his word that 'there is none righteous, no not one,' that 'there is no difference, for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God.' Will you then tell me how a sinner can have a good conscience?" The nun was quite at a loss to know how to answer this question. "I should think you ought to know," said the aged lady to my left, and pointing to the word of God in my hand, she said, "That book will tell you." "You are quite right," I said. "This book tells me that 'the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth me from all sin,' that every believer has 'boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus.' It tells me my sins are forgiven for his name's sake, that believers have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of his grace, (Eph. i: 1–7,) that God is infinitely righteous in thus justifying a poor sinner, and that without works." Rom. iii: 19–28.

"What!" said the major, "you do not mean to say that a man may know in this world that his sins are forgiven? I cannot think that a man can be quite sure of that." "Certainly, major; and now let me give you an illustration in your own line. Suppose your regiment in rebellion, and you give yourself up to make reconciliation for your men, telling them that if you do not succeed you shall never return, but that if you do return, they may be quite sure of their pardon the moment they see you, that the reconciliation will then have been made. Now suppose you do thus make a complete and satisfactory reconciliation—you do return; and you call your regiment on parade and announce a free pardon to every soldier, and now a man steps up and says, 'I suppose your honor, I must not be quite sure that what you say is true.' Now major would you not consider that an insult?" "That is right," says the old general.

"And, now, if it is an insult to doubt the word of a fallible man, what is it to doubt the testimony of the infallible God? Has not the blessed Jesus given himself the propitiation of sin, 'to make reconciliation for the sins of the people?' 'He died for our sins,' according to the Scriptures, 'and he was buried, and he rose again the third day.' (1 Cor. xv: 3–5) He never could have returned from the cold chambers of the dead if the reconciliation had not been perfectly made. But believers can say with triumph, 'He was raised from the dead for our justification; therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ.' Do you not see, major, your return to your regiment would be a proof that reconciliation was made? And the resurrection of Christ is God's proof that the atoning work of Christ is finished. And if your own word should be enough for your men to believe, what can I want more than the word of God? God hath raised up that very Jesus who groaned and bled on the cross beneath the weight of my sins and guilt. And that is not all. That very Jesus is gone up on high, and sits at the right hand of the Majesty on high. This is what gives me the answer of a good conscience, as Peter says, 'And be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you, a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear, having a good conscience.' But how? By good works? No, these will do before men, 'but the answer of a good conscience toward God (is only) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ, who is gone into heaven,' etc. 1 Peter iii: 15–22. The sacrifices of the law could never make a conscience perfect, much less can the bloodless sacrifices that men pretend now to offer. But the offering of Jesus on the cross—his one offering of himself—perfects the conscience forever, so perfects it that there needs no more sacrifices for sin. Heb. x: 1–23.

"Major, would you not be happy now if you knew your sins forgiven?" "Oh yes, indeed, nothing on this earth could make me so happy." And then addressing the nun, I said, "And would not you be happy, if you also knew, like the believing Ephesians, that God had for Christ's sake forgiven your sins?" She said, "I do not know how to answer you." The commercial man now spoke: "I have no doubt that a man is justified, as you have said, by faith; but will you tell me when a man may conclude with certainty and safety that he is justified?" "That is a very important inquiry," said I. "Many make a fatal mistake by concluding, because they have passed through a religious excitement, that they are justified. There is no safety in such a conclusion. Neither can a person be sure he is accepted of God by fasting, and prayers, and works of kindness. No, there is sin mixed up with it all. Neither dare the person conclude that he is justified by keeping the holy law of God; for the more sincerely he strives to keep it, the more miserable and desponding he is, for he finds an evil heart that is still breaking it. But when a person sees himself so great a sinner that there is no remedy for him but death and that God has met his need as a sinner in the death of Christ, and that being risen from the death the sinner deserved, he is now his justification and life;—in plain words, when stripped of all dependence on himself, he is brought by the Spirit of God to trust alone in Christ, he may then conclude with certainty and safety that he is justified."

But it may be asked, since the bible declares that the true believer must possess a certain character, how can any one think that he has true faith so long as he does not behold in himself the qualities and fruits of faith? Let me answer this question with an anecdote by Cæsar Malan. "I was preaching," said he, "in a garrisoned town. The generals and other officers, with brilliant epaulets, sat before me. I had occasion to show that divine works are, in the believer, the evidence of divine faith, that is, they are the operation of the Holy Spirit in the heart which he has purified; and the better to show that faith must necessarily precede works, I suddenly said to them, "Am I not right, gentlemen? You do not receive you epauletts before your commision, but your commission before your epaulets? The soldiers smiled assent. God blessed that question; for the same evening, a colonel said to me, "Thanks to God, I now understand that I was colonel before I wore the uniform. I believe God, who tells me he has pardoned me: 'even' added he, 'though I can scarcely yet perceive the epaulets of my rank.'"

Yes, my reader, nothing can be so sure as the word of the living God. "Be it known unto you that through this risen man, Christ Jesus, is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins, and by him all that believe are justified from all things from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses." "Are justified"—not may be after death. No, the believer is now justified, Jesus having died for him and risen again. If you are brought to give up self-righteousness, and as a lost sinner to receive Christ as your entire salvation, you may most certain you are justified. A person may be deceived in doing and enduring anything to save himself, but no man will trust alone in Christ, but by the Holy Ghost. If this is your faith, you may be certain it is of God. You may be certain, therefore, you are accepted of God. If you are trusting partly in Christ and partly in something else, you never, on that ground, can find life. It must be all Christ, or no Christ at all.—Sel

Pious Brigands.—Signor Pollini, who was captured a short time since by Papal brigands, has been set at liberty. He reports that he experienced harsh treatment only for the first few days, but was afterwards treated very kindly. He says that the brigands repeat the rosary every night before going to bed. On leaving he gave them his watch as a souvenir, and got a prayer-book from them in return. In Sicily, when Mierolawski was campaigning there, a brigand was brought before him and charged with being a spy. The brigand fired up with indignation and shouted: "I a spy! I am a brigand, a Catholic, and a patriot."

At a church fair, held in New Haven, the following inducement was held out to the public to get them to attend: "The young people of the Howe street church will hold a fair and festival in the City Hall, State House, on Monday evening, July 1st. The object is a most laudable one, and no pains will be spared to make it worthy of public patronage. In connection with the many other attractions is the quaint old gipsey, Meg, with her attendants and fairies. She has been procured for this special and interesting occasion, and her very singular and grotesque mode of dress and living will be an object of interest to all who call to see and consult with her regarding the past, present and future."

Security of National Bank-Note Holders.—General Spinner, United States Treasurer, has addressed an official letter to the cashier of a national bank, in New Hampshire, in which he states: "After the failure of a national bank all its relations are changed; as a bank it has nothihg more to do with its notes, whether mutilated or perfect. The United States, as the legal endorser, in effect becomes the maker of the note, and undertakes to redeem all the notes of such defunct or defaulting national banks as may be presented at this office for payment. This obligation is conclusive upon the government, whether the securities lodged for the purpose with the Treasurer are sufficient or not. I, in effect, become not only the cashier of such defaulting bank, but become the trustee of all its creditors, and am compelled to see that the interests of its creditors and of the government are fully protected. Such notes stand in the same relation to the public as notes issued by the United States, and will be subject to the same rules in their redemption."

Universalists, Spiritualists, Swedenborgians, beside Catholics and the Advent Herald accept the following as sound doctrine; we take the extract from the Universalist Ambassador: "I say we, and I mean by this to confine our identity as persons to our spirits. The body is not the man. It is simply the house he lives in while connected with material things. You may sever my hands, arms, all my limbs indeed, but you have not touched me. These bodily organs belong to me: I do not belong to them. These words give the true postulate for sound reasoning on the great question." The bible says, "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground."

The World.—The world; it is all title page; there are no contents. It is all vexation, in getting, in keeping, in losing it; and whether we get or lose, we are still dissatisfied. It is only a tedious repetition of the same things. It will yield us no support or consolatian when we most want it—in the horrors of a guilty mind, and in the approaching terrors of death. It is fickle, variable, and unstable as the wind; it is always fickle, always changeable, always unstable. There is no steadfastness in its honors, riches, pleasures; it is all a vanity, all a lie for ever.—Ryland.

Rev S. H. Tyng, Jr., of this city, has been presented before the Standing Committee of the Diocese for having, it is alleged, violated a section of the canons of the church by officiating in a Methodist church at New Brunswick, N. J., without the consent of the minister of that parish and against his remonstrances.

"THE GREAT RED DRAGON."

Our old friend, D. T. TAYLOR, in the World's Crisis, after stating the opinions of others on this power, gives his own, at some length, which is as follows:

We regard it primarily and mainly a representative name and hieroglyphical symbol of the devil himself, in proper person; the added heads and horns seen in Rev. xii., in the first vision of him, being the symbols of Pagan Rome, the great evil world-power, behind which he had ensconsed himself, and through whom satan acted in his subordinate government of the world; while afterward, when Pagan Rome had passed away, satan gave the Papal Roman world the supreme earthly dominion, which he ever claimed (Luke iv. 6; Rev. xiii. 2,) and the dragon, divested of his kingly appendages, appears in his proper form a pure symbol and representation of the devil, Rev. xvi. 13, and xx. 1. This view is as easily proven as that twice two make four, and is seen true at a glace.

In proof, we remark, that the Greek word rendered "dragon," found thirteen times in Revelation, and in no other place used, is drakon, a word defined by all the lexicographers as denoting "a huge serpent," or "a large kind of serpent," having a fiery red color and keen eyes. And Homer, Plato, and Josephus are referred to as classical authorities. In the New Testament the Dragon is neither a crocodile nor a whale, but a veritable snake, basilisk, or serpent. This dragon serpent existed in John's time in the form and under the name of the Boa. This Boa-Serpent was among serpents what the lion or elephant was among quadrupeds. Their usual length was forty or fifty feet. Jerome in the fourth century calls this species of Draco or Dragon, and declares they would lay waste nearly a whole province. It was not venemous, but was very devouring. Its color was red. Men, wild beasts, and all fell a prey to its greedy attacks. Livy and Pliny both mention one of these monsters which opposed the Roman army under Regulus, at the river Bagrada, in Africa. It devoured several of the soldiers, and so hard were its scales that they resisted darts and spears. At length it was as it were besieged, and military engines were employed against it, as against a fortified city. The huge creature was captured and killed, and its skin measured one hundred and twenty feet in length!

Now we claim this to be the exact creature that John had in his mind and saw when he describes "the great red (drakon) serpent." And this symbolic serpent or wonderful "sign" was plainly and unequivocally explained to the seer in the unfolding of the vision as being "that old serpent (Gen. iii.) called the devil and satan." Rev. xii. 9. The addition of seven crowned heads and ten horns, of course belong not naturally to the snakey prodigy, but are appended, to exhibit the universally prevailing political medium of satanic action, which was Pagan Rome. The whole symbolic representation in the chapter, touching the dragon, is twofold. It has a foreground and a background fulfilment. The front and open action is in the civil and political world; its secret action is in the spiritual world. The heads and horns of a corrupt, barbarous, pagan and idolatrous government, are pushed into vision to devour Jesus and destroy the church; while the veritable devil himself stands in the rear hounding them on. They are his worldly working tools; he is the backer. The devil and his devil-ish agent—as everywhere in the bible—take the same name. Who can fail to see satan, the evil one, here?

Rome passing away, the Dragon-Serpent still exists; and in the present century appears still on earth as the head and chairman of a trinity of evil powers, sending out, commissioning, and spreading the demons for the puppose of gathering the nations to the last battle. Rev. xvi. 13. Still existing on earth when Christ comes, "the Dragon, that (same) old serpent which is the devil and satan," is bound a thousand years, and thrust into the abyss. This is the devil and no mistake. But if the devil has any earthly representative world-power on earth now, it is the huge, idolatrous empire of China, which is, numerically speaking, the mightiest nation in our world, containing four hundred millions of souls, or nearly one third the whole population of the globe, and whose entire religious system is the worship of idols and demons, with an atheistic tendency. And not a little remarkable is it that the dragon is the national symbol everywhere, and that the emperor's seat is styled "The Dragon's Throne." Here satan has almost sovereign sway. And in China, Spiritualism began in the year 1844, which is three years earlier than in the United States. The president of the horrid trio takes the lead, and pushes on his lieutenants to originate the last age of devilishness. Rev. xvi. 13.

That the drakon or serpent-devil, could not represent Rome only, and nothing more, is seen in the fact of his existing long after Pagan Rome came to an end, while the heads and horns forbid its symbolizing nothing but the devil. As the Boa was red, so does satan love blood. He carries the red flag of war. As the boa serpent devoured everything before it, so does the devil walk about "seeking whom he may devour." Rev. xii. is an enlargement of Gen. iii. 15. And just as truly as "the ten horns are ten kings," or as "the woman is that great city," or as the reliving of the martyrs "is the first resurrection," etc., so truly "the dragon, that old serpent," "is the devil and satan." Thank God the gates of the great abyss are ready to close upon the vagabond angel—the monster state prisoner. Lord, bind him speedily. D. T. T.

REMARKS BY THE ED OF HER. OF LIFE.—We have given Br. Taylor a chance to speak fully to our readers. So far as the history of the "dragon-serpent" is concerned, we thank him for the information, though it is not entirely new; but we differ from him, in toto, with respect to its being a "symbol of the devil himself," meaning, as he clearly does, a personal, fallen spirit, invisible to men. That it represents worldly governments, and personal rulers in those governments, we have inspired authority for saying. Thus: "Thou didst divide the sea [the Red Sea] by thy strength: thou breakest the heads of the dragons in the waters." The rulers of Egypt. Psa. lxxiv. 13. Again: "In that day the Lord....shall slay the dragon that is in the sea." Isa. xxvii. 1. Once more: "Thus saith the LORD God; Behold I am against thee, Pharaoh, King of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers," etc. Ezk. xxix. 3. The term dragon is not found again till you come to Rev., and we must have something more than assumption that it is used there in any other sense than as a symbol of persecuting governments, or bodies of rulers. So it is clearly used in the Old Testament to represent great and persecuting earth-born powers. With Br. Taylor's view of the matter, we conclude he must relapse into the idea of the "eternal torment" of this "personal devil," who is to "be tormented day and night forever and ever." Rev. xx. 10. If such a devil as he and others of like belief maintain has existed, with such awful power, for more than six thousand years, and has grown stronger instead of weaker, and is to be eternally tormented, then evil will never have an end, and our hope of such an event is not to be realized. Br. T.'s reference to Gen. iii. is no authority in proof that the dragon power is a personal devil. He says, "This symbolic serpent.... was unequivocally explained to the seer" [John] "....as being 'that old serpent (Gen. iii.) called the devil and satan.'" Now, "that old serpent, Gen, iii.," was not so called in "Gen.," nor in any other book in the bible, unless Rev. be an exception; and if it is so called in that book let it be proved, and not assumed. That the spirit of opposition to God, his truth and people, has been in the world from Adam's sin, we admit; and it has been embodied in various organizations; especially in earth-born governments and their rulers; who have been the great oppressors of the holy people, and will be till evil is made an end of by the "kingdoms of this world" becoming "the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ:" then the dragon, or persecuting power, will cease, and be known no more.

"THE REGENERATION."

What is implied in the promise: "Ye shall sit upon twelve thrones?"

There is implied the fact that "The kingdom of heaven" or "the kingdom of God," is to be a real and regularly organized kingdom on this earth, renewed. It is certainly wondrously strange what vague conceptions and indefinite ideas individuals, the world at large, and even the professed Christian Church have respecting "the kingdom of God," and the future state. "The kingdom" is supposed to be "grace in the heart;"—"the gospel Church;"—and its existence hereafter,—a transfer of the Church from earth to heaven above,—constituting "a sky kingdom," or kingdom beyond the skies! And thus "the kingdom" which the bible describes to be an "everlasting kingdom, under the whole heaven;"(Dan. vii: 27) and "which shall fill the whole earth," (Dan ii.: 35) is made to be above the whole earth—and beyond the whole heavens! Intelligent men, certainly, with no mean intellects, capable of reasoning upon all other matters with a great degree of wisdom, betray, when they reason upon theological subjects, the least judgment and common sense conceivable! With all their knowledge of astronomy, they talk of a "heaven beyond the bounds of time and space," which of course must be outside of the universe and immensity! With all the facts before them of a universe of material worlds innumerable and vast, they scout and ridicule the idea of the saints hereafter inhabiting such a material globe! And tell us, "God despises materialism;" and say, "what does he care for a material world, and a material city?" They describe the saint's inheritance to be "spiritual," "eternal," "invisible," "intangible," "a spirit land,"—"spirit world!" and thus make the future of the righteous to be a subject for the ridicule of skeptics and infidels. As says Dr. Dick, "Infidel scoffers have been led to conclude that the Christian heaven is no object to be desired, and have declared that 'they could feel no pleasure in being suspended forever in an etherial region and perpetually singing psalms and hymns to the Eternal.'" And it is incomprehensible also that a sensitive being should exist, furnished with all the organs and functions requisite for animal life, and yet of a size "ten thousand times less than a mite."

The scriptures are plain upon this subject of the kingdom and the future inheritance. They do not leave us to imagination, and fancy, and wild vagaries; and to be so befogged and be-fooled by short-sighted and perverted human reasonings. The Christian Church in these "latter times," has been led astray from "the truth" into "fables," by adopting the allegorical and figurative method of interpretation introduced by Origin, of whom Jerome said: "Origin is a heretic in most things." And of whom Chrysostom writes: "Who can hear Origin with patience when he strives to convince us that the 'coats of skins' were human bodies into which souls were confined as in prisons, graves and sepulchres,—when he denies with specious arguments, the resurrection of this flesh; and who can bear Origin giving us a Paradise in the third heaven, and transforming to heavenly places that Paradise which the scriptures describe as belonging to earth; and so allegorically understanding the scriptures. The words of Origin are adverse and hateful, and repugnant to God and his saints."

The tendency of the age to this method of interpretation may be seen from this remark of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher,—"I know not whether the second advent of Christ is at hand or not. I know not what even the meaning of it is. That there is to be a literal visit of Christ to the earth again they may believe who are wedded to physical interpretations. I do not so read the word of God." Now for Mr. Beecher as a man, I entertain the highest respect. My charity covers many of his defects as a man and Christian minister; and I honor him for his talents, wisdom, and love for our fallen race. With him personally, I have no controversy; but I do say that such language of unbelief respecting a great cardinal doctrine of the word of God clearly and distinctly announced and revealed, to me is unaccountable, and I regard it as being reprehensible in a Christian minister with an "open bible" in his hands. He must believe in "physical interpretations" (if he believes at all) respecting the fulfilment of the scriptures in Christ's first advent,—his personal ministry,—sufferings and death on the cross,—actual resurrection and ascension to heaven. And if the testimony of angels (Acts i: 9–11,) and of an apostle (1 Thes. iv.: 16) concerning his second coming, is to be believed why ignore "physical interpretations" concerning that second advent and kingdom? Are we to follow "physical interpretations" of Scripture in the first "visit" of the Messiah, and allegorical and figurative in reference to "the second advent of Christ?" By what rule of exegesis?

I repeat, this "kingdom of God" in which Christ, the Messiah, is to be enthroned, will be a real, organized existence on this earth on its re-genesis, and the return of our Lord and King. There can be no kingdom without a king, subjects, officers, territory, capital and laws. And "the kingdom of God" has all these essential requisites. Christ is to be its everlasting king; the saints of the Most High are to be its subjects and officers; the earth renewed is to be its locality; and the Holy City, New Jerusalem, its capital; while the laws of God are to be supreme and observed.

2 There is also implied in the text all that is affirmed—literally: The chosen "twelve Apostles," "shall sit upon twelve thrones," etc., in the full glory of that heavenly kingdom, and heavenly world,—its chief princes or executive officers with Christ. It is written "Behold a King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment." Isa. xxxii.: 1. This is in the "restitution" as will be seen from verses 13, 15–18. "The King of kings and Lord of lords" will be the supreme, universal Lord and King over all the earth;—and "his dominion" coextensive with "the ends of the earth." Zech. xiv.: 9; ix.: 10; Psalm 72d. The "princes" first in authority and power under him will be the twelve Apostles of the Lamb. They shall "sit upon thrones" coronated,—in dignity, dominion, and power next the throne of the Holy One; and be rulers over the saved of the twelve tribes of Israel. This was typified in the theocracy under Moses and the kingdom of Israel under David.—Advent Herald.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR OF HERALD OF LIFE.—It must not be supposed that we endorse every expression in the foregoing article; for we differ materially in regard to the "subjects" to be governed; but the main view, as it relates to a real, tangible, earth kingdom, or the kingdom of God on earth, "under the whole heavens," we fully agree with. The writer is "Rev. O. R. Fassett." The "orthodox" intangible kingdom is made up of fancy, pride, and fanaticism, spun out of the immortal-soul theory, the mother of "Spiritualism" and other vagaries of a corrupted Christianity. May the vail soon be removed.

THE FATHER'S HOUSE.

[The following article is the best we have seen on the subject. We copy it from the Prophetic Times:]

"In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also."—John xiv. 2, 3.

Probably, nowhere has more nonsense been written than in the interpretation of these verses. Some assert that the Father's house is the third heaven, and the mansions the abodes or stations of the righteous there. Others think that the house is the universe, and the mansions the various planets or worlds. Others say that the house is the central part of the universe around which all planets revolve, and the mansions positions for the saints in that centre. These conjectures are shaped and varied as the fancy or astronomical knowledge of the person may suggest; but all violate some of the principal laws of interpretation. The fact is, that many of these vagaries are the productions of Popish doctors, or the faithful forerunners of the Papacy, and have been received and entertained by many Protestants without examination, not knowing that it ever has been the policy of Rome to crush everything, directly or indirectly, connected with our hope. Comparatively few Protestants are aware how much the current theology and the interpretation of scripture is affected by the taking for granted dogmas the history of which shows that they were produced by men addicted to the most outragous spiritualistic and allegorizing system upon which the Papal throne was erected, and through which the dark ages were ushered in.

Let me then pass over this passage and endeavor to ascertain its meaning, not by adopting, without mature examination, some view of it merely because it has been eloquently and powerfully expressed by human imagination or reason, but, by comparing scripture with scripture, and by especially regarding this utterance of Christ in the light of other doctrines, clearly taught, which he, the infallible Teacher, certainly does not contradict in this place. I will take it up clause by clause.

I. "In my Father's house." What is meant by this expression? Do we read of the Father's house in any other place? We have only to turn to Isaiah ii. 2, 3, and Micah iv. 1, 2, to read of "the Lord's house," "the house of the God of Jacob," that is to be established in "the last days." Just as the word "house" is used to denote a dwelling-place, a kindred, one body, the church of God, a kingdom, so it is employed to denote the future coming kingdom of God and Christ, which saints are to inherit. A few thoughts will make this evident.

1. We know from express declarations that down to the second advent those millennial predictions of Isaiah and Micah will never be realized. They inform us that this "house" shall be supreme over all other kingdoms, but this, according to the prophets, only occurs when the Son of Man comes in the clouds of heaven at his second advent. They again tell us that "war" shall be utterly abolished in this "house," but revelation teaches in the most distinct manner that war shall exist down to Christ's coming. Hence this "Father's house" is identical with the millennial "house" so often described in God's word.

2. In the introduction to Micah's millennial description he says that "the mountain of the house" shall be desolate, but immediately adds that in "the last days," "the mountain of the house of the Lord" shall be established. Now, Jesus, in strict conformity with Micah, says (Matt. xxiii. 38, 39; Luke xiii. 35,) that a "house" is to be "left desolate" until he comes again. What "house" does the Prophet and Saviour refer to? Evidently to "the house" of David, the kingdom fallen down, which at the "return" of Jesus is to be "rebuilt." Acts xv. 16, 17; Hos. iii. 4, 5; Jer. xxiii. 5, 8; Jer. xxx. 7–24; Ezek, xxxiv. 11–31.) This Davidic "house," which, in virtue of Christ being the seed of David, the appointed heir, and the one who re-establishes it, is sometimes called the kingdom of Christ, but especially in view of the covenant made by God to establish and prosper it, is denominated the Father's house, the Son inheriting it being his Son, the power, majesty and durability of the kingdom being conferred on that Son because of the work that he accomplishes.

3. After the Lord's Supper was instituted, we find (Luke xxii. 29, 30,) that the Saviour told his apostles: "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." No one doubts but that the fulfilment of this promise is to be witnessed in "the Father's house." The kingdom appointed by the Father is "the Father's house," or as the prophets phrase it, "the mountain of the Lord's house," the latter denomination intimating the grandeur and extent of this kingdom, as well as the fact this kingdom is under the sway of the kindred of God, the faithful heirs of Abraham and co-heirs with Christ. Let the reader now refer to Matt. xix. 28, and he learns that the period when this kingdom is to be enjoyed is after the "regeneration," after the advent, when Christ is seated on his throne. "When the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." This kingdom and the Father's house are identical.

4. It is admitted that this "house" the saints are to inherit. The millennial descriptions expressly speak of this house that "this is the heritage of the Lord," that "mine elect shall inherit it," etc. More than this, in order clearly to show us that this kingdom and glory is to be revealed here on this earth, they assert, in predictions containing the same language applied by John to the New Jerusalem state, that "they shall inherit the land forever," thus corroborating the statement of Jesus, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." To appreciate the appropriateness of these expressions it becomes us to no notice what so many misapprehend, the peculiar phraseology of the apostle Peter (1 Pet. i. 4, 5, 6, 7,) who, after declaring that the saints shall receive an inheritance which is now reserved in heaven, in perfect harmony with the prophets, declares, that it is "ready to be revealed in the last time." And that he refers this "last time" to the time of "the appearing of Jesus Christ," and "the revelation of Jesus Christ," is evident from the seventh and thirteenth verses where this is expressly stated. The millennial kingdom of Christ, the Father's house, the inheritance of the saints are but synonymous terms. Take any expression relating to this Father's house, suggestive of the relation the saints sustain to it, or the enjoyments or blessings they receive in it (such as "dwelling" in it, obtaining "rest" in it, etc.,) and we will find the corresponding phrases, the identical language employed, the same promises given.

5. Such blessings as freedom from death, sorrow, tears, suffering, evil, the presence of God, etc., which we know will only be enjoyed in his Father's house, are also connected with this Lord's house, to be established in the last days. Indeed, there is no blessing promised to the saints that is not directly applied in the millenial songs to this coming kingdom of Christ.

The conclusion to which we must, therefore, arrive, from these and other considerations, is, that "the Father's house," inherited after the second advent, and "the Lord's house" which is to be established at the same time, are one and the same. We find from Genesis to Revelation no other promise. By comparison of scripture we ascertain when, where, and how it is to be established. Had a prophet, instead of Jesus, given us this passage, the phraseology would have been identical with that of other prophets, but when the Son speaks, in view of the relation that he sustains to the Father in the plan of salvation, he calls it the Father's house. We are then to understand by this expression, the predicted, still future, coming kingdom of God and Christ, to be erected under the personal reign of Christ and the saints, into which the kindred of God are gathered. Consequently, we find it called "the house of David," because David's Son and David's Lord reigns over it; it is called "the Lord's house," and "the house of God," because God establishes it; it is called "the Father's house," because it is a reappointing of the old theocracy in a more glorious form: it is governed and administered by the adopted kindred, the children of God; it is an abiding dwelling place of God; it is to be under the especial care and protection of the Almighty; it is a glory bestowed by the Father upon the Son in view of his obedient suffering.

Before passing on to the remaining clauses of this passage, it may be well to remark that this view is the only one that harmonizes scripture, making the promises, predictions, and doctrines consistent with each other. For it alone corresponds with the New Jerusalem state as described by the prophets and the apostles; with the new heavens and new earth which are the present heavens and earth purified and renewed; with the establishment of Christ's kingdom at his appearing; with the reign of the saints on the earth; with the covenant promises made to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and confirmed to David; and with a plan of redemption that restores to man all that he had forfeited. It makes the promises of God consistent, referring them to one period, one place, one glory; for the bible, in portraying the future happy state of the saints as kings and priests, does not mean several states in various localities. We are not driven to the miserable shifts of our opponents in order to sustoin our position, such as, for instance, separating the millennial predictions, referring one verse or a part of a verse to be fulfilled in the third heaven; another verse, or part of it, to a fulfilment here on the earth, when they most certainly describe one period and one scene.

II. "Many mansions." What are they? Commentators tell us that the word translated "mansions" may denote either the act of dwelling or the place where one dwells, or a position occupied therein. In verse 23, the same word is rendered "abode." It is of little consequence which idea is intended, for they all imply that in this "house," or kingdom, the saints will dwell, occupying stations of honor and glory. "Many," gives us the assurance of a sufficiency for all, and also, perhaps, denoting, in view of their number, a variety, differing in degree or glory.

III. "I go to prepare a place for you." 1. "I go." By this Christ referred to his death, and final ascent to heaven. Without this, such a kingdom could never be prepared. By his death he makes the necessary provision to meet all that man incurred by the fall. By his death and resurrection he not only obtains power over death to rescue those who shall participate in his reign, but he becomes such a David's Son, immortal, as can meet the terms and fulfil the covenant. By his ascension he obtains the power of intercession, guiding, controlling, and gathering the saints This going was necessary, for by his death, resurrection, ascension, intercession and exaltation, he can now perfect us, and fulfil the covenanted promises.

2. "To prepare a place for you." This includes the preparation of the New Jerusalem, which, called new in contrast with the old Jerusalem, is to be the portion of the saints. Jesus is its builder, its divine architect. Within its gates and walls, and along its golden streets are the mansions of the blessed. No one doubts, I suppose, but that the New Jerusalem state (whatever it may denote) embraces this Father's house and its mansions. At least, so much is conceded by those who reject our opinions. Let such, however, ponder this: when all things are ready and the time has fully come for the manifestation of the Father's house, we read in Rev. xxi. that this same Jerusalem prepared by Jesus "comes down from God out of heaven," here upon this earth, and here it remains, for we never read of its removal. The conclusion is so apparent that it needs no mention.

But in this preparation we are also reminded that those who inherit this house are to be kings and priests. These, in view of their lives, we are informed, differ in degree or rank, some having more honor and authority than others. Whilst we are all saved by grace, yet our future condition is proportioned in proportion to our works. This is clearly taught. Jesus, in preparing this place for us, determines the position or station that we shall occupy in his coming kingdom. When the period of manifestation comes, it is Jesus who makes "all things new;" that removes the curse under which creation groans; creates the new heavens and new earth; rewards every man according to his works; bestows the beauty, happiness, and glory of our inheritance, fulfiling all the predictions of God's word. He comes, in virtue of his "going," clad with authority to fulfil the covenant. Consequently, all things, under the supervision of our Saviour, are now, at this very time, as they have been since his ascension, tending to the fulfilment of these promises. He is still engaged in preparing the place.

3. "And if I go and prepare a place for you I will come again." When the place is ready, then will Jesus come. Not one day sooner or later. This will not take place until the last saint of the present dispensation, who is to reign in the coming one, is gathered; not until the covenanted land has passed through its stipulated number of Sabbaths; not until the gathering out of the nations of a people for his name, the ordained times of Jewish exile, of Mohammedan power, of Popish sway, is accomplished. The preparation of this place includes a long period of time and a variety of objects. But when the period at last comes for the saints to enter this Father's house, Jesus comes again. Entry into this house is conditional on that coming. This is not only intimated in this passage, but distinctly taught by a variety of texts; so that with the utmost confidence it can be stated, that unless Jesus comes again, we can never enter into this house or enjoy these mansions.........Can a single passage be adduced which teaches that prior to the advent the saints obtain their inheritance? It is Christ's second coming that brings salvation, the inheriting of the kingdom, the entrance into New Jerusalem, etc., so that, whatever the condition of the saints may be in the intermediate state, we are constantly exhorted to look forward to the second advent as the great object of faith, "the blessed hope" of the believer? When the apostles endeavor to console the friends of departed ones, they do not point, as many now do, to their being in possession of, or even within the Father's house; but invariably refer them either to the second advent or to consequences resulting from that advent.

4. "And receive you unto myself." This confirms the preceding, since the dead saints arise and the living are translated at the second coming. Hence in 2 Thess. ii. 1, 2, etc., "the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering unto him," are united.

5. "That where I am, there ye may be also." We know where Christ will be after his Second Advent. Many predictions and promises teach that he comes again to the earth to remove the curse, and to reign gloriously in Jerusalem. And there we shall be, with him, in his glory. Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly!

Dr. Litch on Daniel XII. 2.

In a recently published exposition of the last five chapters of Daniel, striving to prove that a "Syrian Prince, and not Napoleon III., is the Antichrist of the last days," the Rev. Josiah Litch gives a brief exposition of Daniel xii: 2. He says:—"Verse 2. 'And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life.' This may refer to Jewish saints, or it may refer to all saints of all races; probably particularly the former. For it was Daniel's people of whom the angel spoke.—'Some to shame and everlasting contempt.' That learned Hebraist, Prof. Bush, rendered this passage, 'These'—'the awakened'—'to everlasting life.' 'Those'—the 'unawakened,'—'to shame and everlasting contempt.' This he did in the face of the blow it gave his Swedenborgian views, as an honest translator of God's word. It teaches the doctrine of the resurrection of the just at the end of this age, and like the new Testament, leaves the rest to be raised at the close of the thousand years."

I do not give the above because it is a new view to believers in Life in Christ alone; but regard it as important coming from the acknowledged leader of one branch of adventists. How fully this view may be endorsed by others of the same belief, I do not know. But Mr. Litch himself abandons the only text in the Old Testament which has had any weight in proving the resurrection of the wicked dead. He does this unmistakably, for he indorses Prof. Bush "as an honest translator of God's word;" and adds for himself, that "the rest—the wicked—are left "to be raised at the close of the thousand years." In this last, I think he is "wise above what is written;" but perhaps it contains the reason for this unexpected view of the passage under consideration. It evidently proves too much for his post-millennial resurrection of the wicked; for, if it proves their resurrection at all, it makes it simultaneous with that of the righteous. This will not do at all; so Dan. xii: 2. does not raise the wicked, but merely leaves them to be raised at some future time.

Faithful to their Trust.

In this part of Christendom the "immortal souls" are not unlike their predecessors; but are faithful to the trust committed to them by the Bishops. My wife is a member of an organization gotten up by men, called "Methodist Church;" and one of their temples is being repaired; and out here it costs "something to be fashionably religious." Well, a mortal soul (man) was called upon to give something for the enterprise. "Fifty dollars" was suggested. I agreed to comply with their wishes on the condition that when the Temple was not in use by them they should allow any Christian gentleman to preach in it. I think I said, "one of my preachers;" and I insisted that he (the preacher) should manifest his christian spirit. He informed me, that as the trustees would be in session that evening, he would submit my proposition. I have heard nothing from them: suppose the (sanhedrim) council would not submit. Deliver me from such bigotry, superstition, and oppression as this. Christians indeed, will not refuse to hear, and "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good" and true. But truth is mighty and will take hold of the people. I am convinced more and more every day that they resist the truth as their fathers did.

Note by Editor.—Better have no strife with them, but use the "$50" to scatter what you believe is truth. Our friends should not waste money to help what they believe to be error. We fear some do it, so as to embarrass themselves in the work of helping the truth. These things ought not to be.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 14, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Temptation of Jesus.

We are now to consider the temptation by the presentation of the kingdoms of this world; nor are we to lose sight of the fact that Jesus was tempted in our nature—not in the divine—and that he was "tempted like us we are." Let us, also, understand that he was born under the promise and oath of God that "the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David," and that "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth"...."Yea, all kings shall fall down before him: all nations shall serve him." See Luke i. 32, and Psa. lxxii. 8–11, also other scriptures.

"The kingdoms of this world," then, were to be possessed by the Christ. Shall he receive them on the principles which worldly wisdom and worldly men would suggest, or in the way the wisdom of God should appoint? A thing lawful in itself may be obtained in an unlawful manner; i. e., in a way not approved of God; while the same object gained in accordance with God's will, or a way of his appointment, may be pleasing to him.

To illustrate. The desire to possess a competency of the things of this life—food, raiment, and a habitation—is lawful and right; but there are two ways in which these may be obtained; one, by a disregard of others' rights, overreaching and defrauding them in various ways, such as worldly men often practice, and strive to justify themselves. The other way is by honest, patient industry, and prudent and careful attention to a lawful calling, in which all the rights and interests of others are respected. Can we doubt which of these ways of obtaining the object is the one approved of God? Certainly the latter; yet worldly-wise men, in haste to be rich, often choose the first, and claim they have a right thus to use their skill, and that others must look out for themselves: thus they "worship the devil;" that is, they exalt worldly wisdom, which is their satan, above the wisdom of God.

Jesus, be it remembered, was tempted as man—as the Son of David. When he arrived at that age—"being about thirty"—which made him eligible to the throne of David, and to have "all nations serve him," what more natural than the temptation that he now passes through. What was it? It was the suggestion to take the world-dominion—which was his by promise of God—by the wisdom which worldly men bring into use, viz., proclaim himself King, and immediately perform such signs and wonders as would have led the Jewish people at once to acknowledge him as their Messiah, and as would have overawed the Roman authorities and led the Gentile people everywhere to accept him as their sovereign; and thus have possessed himself of universal empire.

The possibility of such a course cannot be questioned; and such a course the Jews looked for, and worldly wisdom would have highly approved: such a course would have suited Peter, when informed that his Master was just going to suffer death, and he said, "Be it far from thee, Lord; this thing shall not be unto thee." For this worldly wisdom Jesus said to Peter, "Get thee behind me, satan....thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men." The very same words that Jesus used to the tempter, in Luke iv. 8, when offered "the kingdoms of the world," if he would take them by worldly wisdom; "Get thee behind me, satan," was his language then: just such a satan as Peter was, and ordered to the same place; "behind" Jesus: that is, "Out of my way"—"I will obtain my glory and my dominion, not in the way of man's devising, but in the way of my Father's appointment."

Jesus, the Anointed—the Christ, then, in the temptation under consideration, saw, so to speak, an easy way to possess the kingdoms of this world, and to secure by it worldly honor and fame; but it required him "to savor the things of men," or to do homage to worldly wisdom, which would be to "worship" it: i. e., to trust in it, and practice accordingly. To induce him to such a course, he saw that an opposite one—that is, to follow his Father's will in possessing himself of the kingdoms of this world—was to be attended with shame, insult, awful suffering, and death itself. Why not avoid all this, and take the world by a pleasant route! Because that would be to "savor the things of men, and not the things of God;" and hence Jesus saith to the temptation, "God only is to have supreme homage and obedience, whatever be the sufferings attending such a course."

Such is the sum and substance of this temptation. Jesus determined not to accept the dominion of this world in any other way than God his Father should appoint, whatever it cost him. But as a man, "tempted like as we are," he could not help seeing how differently that dominion might be gained by an exercise of worldly wisdom; yet no sooner is the scheme presented fully to his mind than he rejects it, and does homage to his Father's wisdom and appointment, and thus worships "only the Lord thy God" and serves him. He passes on to meet the sorrows, sufferings, and scorns that awaited him, even death itself: and none of the Peter satans or Judas devils could turn him from his course of perfect subjection to his Father's will.

With such a presentation of this subject, an "orthodox," or "fallen spirit devil," is seen to be a mere superstition, to frighten the ignorant; and only useful to help Romish priests to sponge out of their victims their money to keep off the devil with "holy water," or deliver them from him, if their "immortal souls" should happen to get into the devil's "purgatory" after death; thus leading thinking men to conclude that a religion which teaches such things for revelation is beneath the attention of men of sound mind and understanding. We will here note a statement made by a believer in a personal spirit-devil. He says:

"The devil, if a personal being, certainly possessed the power to take Christ to a high mountain, as much as to place him on a pinnacle of the temple, and on the idea that the narrative describes a literal occurence, the temptation is easy of explanation."

The notion that a personal spirit-devil had "the power to take Christ"—the idea being previously expressed of "taking up Christ"—and carrying him to a pinnacle of the temple, and now to a high mountain—is one extremely difficult "of explanation." In the first place: This devil could not have done it without Jesus' consent, unless he had more power than our Lord, which is not to be admitted. Second: If Jesus did consent to let the devil "take him up and carry him," he must have reposed a confidence in the devil which amounted to worshipping him; that is, he believed the devil would treat him fairly. In the third place: If this spirit-devil was as dishonest and deceitful as he is represented to be, he manifested himself as having lost all the "wisdom of the serpent," or else when he had Jesus in his power, carrying him through the air—as this assumption supposes—he would have made short work with his load by dropping it in some deep valley on his way to the pinnacle, or to the mountain top: how then could Jesus have claimed a promise to be kept from being dashed to pieces, seeing he had "tempted the Lord thy God" by allowing the devil to "take him up and carry him?"

On the whole, we see no evidence of a personal spirit-devil in the account of our Lord's temptation. He was "tempted like as we are," and overcame by trusting in his Father's love, wisdom, and will, and by waiting his Father's time and way to accomplish all his promises. Let us learn to act in like manner under all the trials of this our pilgrimage; knowing that "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him." James i. 12. We might greatly enlarge on this topic, but we think it unnecessary.

Seeing Angels.

We can believe in the existence of things which we have never seen or felt; but that there is no difference in the proof of the existence of evil spirits or angels, and good ones, we cannot admit. If we have not seen holy angels, others have, and the Bible testimony is not equivocal on that subject. But that a fallen spirit, called the devil and satan, was ever seen or felt, is what remains to be proved. That there are texts from which it may be inferred, we admit; and so there are texts from which it is inferred that man has an immortal soul, and that sinners will be eternally tormented. But we want and must have something more than inferences to establish faith. Traditions haunt our minds on religious subjects, and become often times ghostly realities; but all such things must give place to the demand of a "Thus saith the Lord," and the criticisms of that guarding faculty which God has given us, called "Reason." A man might as well be an idiot by birth, as to make himself one by not using the power to reason his Creator has bestowed on him, and which He calls on us to exercise, saying, "Come now let us reason together, saith the Lord." He that despises or neglects the use of this power deserves to live and die in the meshes of human traditions, and be the sport of fancied ghosts, hobgoblins, and spirit-devils.

The scriptures abundantly testify that holy angels have been seen and conversed with, face to face. The Old Testament is clear on this point, and the New is, if possible, still more so. "Gabriel, the angel that stands in the presence of the Lord," came to Zacharias, as he ministered in the temple, to inform him of the birth and work of John the Baptist. The same angel appeared to Mary, being "sent from God," to give her information in relation to the birth and work of Jesus. An angel came to the shepherds at the birth of Jesus, and proclaimed glad tidings, and immediately "there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God." The angel of the Lord rolled away the stone from the sepulchre of Jesus and sat upon it; seen of the Roman soldiers, before whom they trembled and became as dead men; but to the women, who came, the angel bore testimony to the most comforting truth, "He is not here: he is risen, as he said." But we need not multiply instances of holy angels having been seen and conversed with: the proof is abundant; and there is nothing in the statements to shock reason, though our reason could not have reached the fact without revelation or unquestionable testimony.

But where is the revelation or testimony of the existence of "fallen angels," who are called devils? We have a right to ask, Who has ever seen them? The fact that such have never been seen, or held open conversation with men, and that the bible gives us no account of such beings, is evidence that there are no such existences: or if there is, it is none of our concern to inquire after them. That there is something that is called, "the devil" and "satan," we do not question; and that that something may lead to evil, and is to be watched against and resisted, is a truth we defend and maintain. But that it is a personal spirit-devil—a holy angel, or angels that fell from heaven, we fail to see the proof of; and for the lack of it, our reason rejects the idea as a fable that has done and is doing immense evil to the cause of pure christianity, leading to make this devil the "scape-goat" for all their sins; thus stifling the voice of conscience, which charges home their guilt upon themselves; and by this course, they virtually charge their sins on God himself, who sustains this imaginary devil in existence, and allows him a kind of omnipresence, so as to be everywhere, and to practice all sorts of deceit upon unsuspecting victims, etc. Reason revolts at such thoughts of the government of the God of love, who willeth not the death of the sinner, and who "so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." That this God keeps such a devil, as "orthodoxy" holds to, alive, giving him such power and liberty, as their theory maintains, let those believe who can; we reject the idea as unscriptural, opposed to reason, a cloak for hypocrites of all sorts, in the churches and out of them, and a scandal on christianity, answering the purposes of the days of superstition, when it was "death for the common people to read the Bible," lest they should discover "the cloven foot" was only an invention of corrupt priests to sponge money from an ignorant people. Those days are passing away.

As to the influence of angels, good or bad, on our thoughts, that is a matter of opinion. That angels are sent forth to minister to them who are to be heirs of life, is no proof that they have access to our minds; and we have need to heed the apostolic injunction to "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind." It is this notion of angels suggesting thoughts, good or bad, into our minds, that has prepared the way for the "fleshly mind" of these last days, to work out what is called "spirtualism," which is in fact animalism; nothing more, and nothing higher. It is the work of the "fleshly mind," and a lying delusion, sent in righteous judgment on men who hate or pervert the truth; and are, for this, given over "to believe a lie," and so make it manifest that they are justly "damned," i.e., condemned to death, because they had "not pleasure in the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness:" i.e., in the works of the flesh.

We know of no one who "confounds temptation with temptation yielded to." A man may be tempted ever so strong; so long as he refuses to yield to it there is no sin. The strength of temptation may depend on the strength of the natural desire for an object; so that some are more strongly tempted than others in a particular direction: yet none are "tempted above what they are able to bear;" and if they look to God for strength, "He will make a way for their escape." We are led into the commission of sin, then, when tempted, by not seeking Divine aid, which we can have by asking—"Ask, and it shall be given."

Our Anniversary.

The anniversary of the Life and Advent Union is to take place next week, on Friday, at Wilbraham, Mass., the Lord willing, under the old "Chestnut Tree" where it had its birth. We expect it will be the largest assembly of its friends that has ever yet met together. Our meetings have never been otherwise than harmonious, and characterized by a spirit of love and good will. Such we trust it will prove to be this year. May the honor of God and our Life-giver be the controlling spirit of our assembly, and no spirit of self-seeking find place among us. A preliminary meeting will be held at ten o'clock in the A. M.; at which it is desirable as many should be present as possible; but the regular business meeting will commence at two o'clock P. M. Persons coming from the west to this meeting should purchase "Camp-meeting Tickets" at Springfield, which will enable them to go and return at a reduced expense. The place of meeting is nine miles east of Springfield, Mass.

The Devil—Mine Opinion.

Sweet Home, August 5th, 1867.

Br. Storrs:—Is it amiss to relate the sequences of certain notions which are cherished as revealed truth by some of your correspondents? Who is the devil? what is he? his character? The notions of him, according to some writers, lead me to the conclusion that he acted, in the garden of Eden, as a ventriloquist. Eve did not see him. He made her believe a lie, i. e., that she should not surely die. It was the devil and not the serpent that spoke!

Ridentem dicere verum, quid vetat?

To punish the serpent that had never uttered the words "ye shall not surely die," appears to be gross injustice, it it was all the ventriloquism of the devil. The mystery of iniquity is great, and great absurdities are uttered in attempting to explain that which is inexplicable. It is said by some that a certain great reformer was so intimate with the devil that he had eaten a bushel of salt with his satanic majesty. I do not wish to criticise the vagaries of those whose fancies are published as true expositions of what no man fully comprehends. And I must solemnly say, that, with all kindness toward such writers, the tendency of their efforts to throw light on revelation turns the truth of God into a lie, and casts reproach upon Him who is Love.

I need not repeat all the fanciful and erroneous conceits which some cherish concerning a personal devil, invisible, in the air, in the heart of every mortal—a ubiquitary, acting as a ventriloquist, and causing all to sin, dooming them to destruction, torturing and tormenting them in a lake of fire; charming, mesmerizing them in this mortal life, etc.

I most seriously and solemnly believe that such a personal ubiquitary, the devil, is most foully slandered by both sinners and professed saints; and that the mass of all the professed christian nations attribute to the devil the crimes or sins which each of them has committed.

Ridentem dicere verum, quid vetat?

To conclude, I should like to hear any one say, whether or not, he (when under conviction and truly penitent) attributed to the devil, as a tempter, any sin he ever committed. Procure the experience of every christian, and if you find one truly enlightened and taught of God, who blames the devil for his wrong doing, or his sinning, previous to or after his conversion, I promise, hereafter, on so serious a subject, never to quote the words of Horace:

"Ridentem dicere verum, quid vetat?"*

Meekness of Henry.

It is well known, that many of the most eminent ministers of Christ, during the seventeenth century, were the subjects of great persecution. Among others who were cruelly treated was the excellent Mathew Henry; but when maligned and reproached, he showed great meekness and patience; and instead of rendering evil for evil, requited it with good; ever seeking to improve such occurrences for his own advancement in christian virtue. "How pleasant it is," he would say, "to have the bird in the bosom sing sweetly." Selected by L. C. T.

Sermon for Dr. Manton.

Dr. Harris relates, that while Dr. Manton was minister at Covent Garden, he was called on to preach before the Lord Mayor, and the companies of the city, at St. Paul's. He studied for the occasion an elaborate discourse, and was heard by the most intelligent part of the congregation with great admiration. But as he was returning home in the evening, a poor man pulled the sleeve of his gown, and asked if he was the gentleman who had preached before the Lord Mayor in the morning. On the doctor's replying in the affirmative, the man added, "Sir, I came with the hope of getting some good, but I was greatly disappointed; for I could not understand much of what you said; you were quite above me." The doctor wept, and replied, "Friend if I did not give you a sermon you have given me one; and by the grace of God, I will never again play the fool, in preaching before my Lord Mayor in such a manner."—Selected by L. C. T.

Sympathy for the Erring.—Of how much of our indignation against even a deliberate wrong would we be disarmed, if we could know for ourselves a tithe of all the sorrow, and trouble, and disappointment the poor erring heart had passed through! What efforts are made in youth to stand up against the pressure of the world, and how, when fallen, from miscalculation, or an over confiding nature, or want of tact, it bravely rose up and tried again; and when hard necessity came and drove it to the wall, how it looked around for help, and waited, still striving to stand upright, and fell while striving; and even when fallen, how it yearned for one more chance to rise and be a man, how loth at last to give up all for lost! Could we but see a thousandth part of these struggles, as they rend our brother's bosom, and almost break his heart, how should it disarm us of our vindictiveness, and incline us even to run to him, and raise him up, and stand by him, and with god-like forgiveness bid him, "Try, try again!"—Selected.

"The Theology of the Bible: Itself the Teacher, and its own Interpreter."

Five versions of the Old Testament and four of the New compared with the originals: By ex-Chancellor Halsted, of Newark, New Jersey.

A second issue of this work is out, the first, of 500, being exhausted. It has a much fuller Index, and also an Appendix to be read as an introduction, and Notices of the book at the end.

It will be furnished on the same terms as the first issue: mailed and postage paid, on request by letter, enclosing $3, addressed to the author, 417 Broad St., Newark, New Jersey.

Newark, N. J., Aug. 10, 1867.

Geo. Storrs: Dear Friend:—I hope to be able before long to make compensation, and to do something toward sustaining your invaluable paper. And from the signs of the times I hope and believe it will soon become self-sustaining, not only, but highly remunerative. The admissions in the article in the Independent, from which you quote in your last issue, show that the American mind (the same may be said of the European) is fast ridding itself of a theory of which Bishop Newton says: "Imagine it you may, but you can never seriously believe it." No man ever did seriously believe in reference to himself that he could do, or omit to do, in this inch of time, anything that would make it just in his Maker to hold him in an eternity of conscious misery; though some fanatics may fancy they think it would be just in God in reference to others. The first branch of the sentence proves that the universal sense of mankind, in the exercise of the faculties God has given them, is against the orthodox theory. If any man pretends to believe it, it is either hypocrisy, or self-delusion, or fanaticism.

Br. Storrs:—As the time for holding the annual meeting of the "Union" is approaching, and more means are required for the propagation of the gospel hope by a continuance of the Herald of Life, and as circumstances prevent me the pleasure of meeting the brethren at the place appointed, I avail myself of giving you the pledge of my mite, hoping I may be able to do more by and by. For I know that whatever we give toward this glorious object is lending directly to the Lord, and though little it be, if His blessing goes with it, much good will follow. If I begin to look at the glorious promises made unto us by the Lord, and take the whole into consideration, only for a moment, I cannot but be persuaded in my mind and conscience, that for all we can do, even if we give all our pecuniary gains unto the service of the Lord, we are, nevertheless, all of us, unprofitable servants still; for verily we have not only the first fruits of the Spirit, but also the promises that we shall reign together with the Lord as kings and priests, standing together as saints in the lot with the apostles and prophets, at the time of the crowning of eternal life. What a glorious incentive, then, for us to stand up for the oracles of truth, battling bravely, with Paul's armor, against a stiff-necked and preverse generation, whose religion is in their pride, and whose worshipping is by an order of ceremonies the systems of men, and whose every zeal and effort is that of persecuting God's people, and an ardent alliance with the kingdoms of the world, for the maintenance of which they will fight to the last, if by any means they might prevent the coming and glorious establishment of our Lord's kingdom; in which all they who know the Lord Jesus have their citizenship registered. O Lord, hasten the day when all men will see that the friendship of the world is enmity with Christ's kingdom; and that all followers of the meek and lowly Jesus ought cheerfully to bear the cross of being aliens and pilgrims in this world until the Lord sets up his kingdom, wherein all christians pretend to become subjects. Brethren, though we be but weak and unprofitable mortals, and servants, let us by all means keep up the tilling of God's heritage by sustaining the angel messenger, that is able to carry the gospel tidings wherever desired, until the Lord himself shall come and bid us enter into the millennial rest. For how shall we get along if we cease the publication of this valuable medium of proclaiming the gospel hope of Life from the dead, and the Lord's coming and glorious reign on the earth? It will be almost like folding up in a napkin the knowledge which God has been pleased to bestow upon many of the leading brethren; and which our paper has been the means of shedding abroad among the weaker ones; and in many cases upon others whose minds are in total darkness concerning the glorious salvation of the Lord. O Lord, open thou a way, for I fear through weakness and want of faith, the work will drop from our hands; and have mercy upon every one of us, in giving us all grace sufficient, that we may be so minded that we seek not our own, but thy wisdom, at all times, in doing thy work as humble servants until the Lord returns. The time is certainly shortening; and for all we know, it will perhaps be the last time that we will be called upon to contribute to the Lord's cause in this way. Let every one of us do all we can most cheerfully, so that our conscience will not reproach us before the appearance of our Lord to raise us to that glorious state of immortality for which we are looking so earnestly.

Pray for me, that God may bless me with knowledge and wisdom, that I may remain steadfast in the truth, and be accounted worthy of eternal life, at his coming; for I can see nothing in this world worth having or laboring for. Time's effacing fingers are wasting away everything we can look upon, but Christ and his salvation endureth forever.

From Clamor Franke.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Aug. 5, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—I see the time is fast approaching when it will be determined whether our dear "HERALD OF LIFE" is to live on, as it has done since its birth, or whether it is to breathe at longer intervals or cease breathing altogether. As far as I am individually concerned, the thought that I might be deprived even of its weekly visits, is a painful one to me; much more it it should come to pass that it had to be discontinued altogether for want of necessary means of support.

My trust, however, is in our gracious covenant God. I have the utmost confidence he will order all things well with respect to our paper, and that the dear followers of our blessed Lord to whom is committed this sacred trust of Life in Christ alone can no more suffer this, the only medium in the world that proclaims this glorious boon to dying men, to go down, than they can go back to that corrupt system of religion from which they have just emerged. No, I am persuaded even better things than these of you, my brethren.

I have no fears that our weekly visitor will fail to greet us in his new dress, (Vol. V.) but, moreover, that he will continue to come in his wonted joyful mood, his face beaming brighter with the glad tidings of life, until he that shall come, has come, and "there shall be no more death, and he shall wipe away all our tears." Yet, a little while only, and our hopes will be realized. Let us, therefore, not get weary in well doing. Let us be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, inasmuch as we know that our labor is not in vain in the Lord.

I send you enclosed $5 to help pay arrearages of Vol. IV, and pledge $20 for 2 copies of Vol V. Yours in bonds of love.

From Thomas J. Harris.

HARRISBURG, PA, Aug. 4, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—I have for some time wished to be present at the annual meeting at Wilbraham, Aug. 23d; but I cannot tell you whether I can go or not; but if I cannot go, I will say I will pay at least $10 for one paper of Vol. V. I have been a subscriber since 1842 for the Bible Examiner and since for HERALD OF LIFE, and it will not do to give up the ship now that land is almost reached. I hope the paper will continue to be issued weekly; but if not, it would be better to issue it monthly than not at all. It would be deplorable not to receive any tidings of the scattered flock. Besides we would not increase in knowledge so fast if left alone. If two heads are better than one, one hundred is better still. Some of us must double our subscriptions rather than have no paper.

I have seen some of the brethren try to explain how Christ could be the everlasting Father, the mighty God, etc., at the same time be Prince of Peace. I have always thought that when a Prince becomes a King, he is no longer a Prince. I think there must be a mistake in the translation of Isaiah ix. 6 I have heard that Mordecai M. Noah, a learned Jew of New York, now dead, said it ought to be translated thus: "For unto us a child is born; unto us a Son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulders: and He, the Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, called his (Son's) name, The Prince of Peace." This would seem to be more in accordance with the rest of the Bible; and Christ never claimed to be the Father. God says, Gen. xvii. 1, "I am the Almighty God;" Isa. xliv. 6–8, and "Besides me there is no God.... I know not any." I wish some of the brethren would examine the Hebrew, and give us the correct translation of Isa. ix. 6, and also Phil. ii. 6, "And thought it not robbery to be equal with God." I have seen in a German paper (Ger. Ref. Messenger) that Goethe, a learned German, translates Ph. ii. 6 thus: "And did not lightly esteem himself equal with God." I think if we give Christ all that he claims for himself, we shall do well, and not exalt him above what the scriptures teach, as a Meth. Min. did here, and say, "Christ is the very and eternal God."

Br. Lingle says he will pay $5 for one number of vol. v.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We think the great difficulty in regard to what Christ is, is that all parties to the controversy seem determined to tell us just who and what He is, and have not sufficient consideration of the words of Christ himself, who said, "No man knoweth who the Son is but the Father." Luke x. 22; Math. xi. 27. Let us receive whatever the Bible saith of him, and cease all speculations which have to be expressed in language not found in the record. When all Christians will do this, the wrangling in the churches, about who Christ is, will cease, and not till then.

DAVENPORT, IOWA, Aug. 8, 1867.

TO THE BRETHREN OF THE "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION:"—I would say I would greatly rejoice to meet with you under the memorable "Chestnut Tree," and take part in your deliberations; but this cannot be: circumstances forbid it. But my heart and mind will be there, and my prayer on that day shall be that the Redeemer of our life may greatly bless and prosper the good cause in which you are engaged; and that the HERALD OF LIFE may be fully sustained, and its circulation largely increased; and that the pagan delusion of inherent immortality may be cleared away. If men were only as eager to secure an inheritance in the kingdom of our Lord as they are to acquire property in this world, what showers of greenbacks would pour into your treasury. Hoping that the time is not far in the future when this mortal shall put on immortality, and we shall all meet in the long-deferred kingdom, and rejoice together in the full and complete development of the great mystery of godliness, and the completion of the great scheme of redemption, I subscribe myself your brother in Christ.

SEYMOUR, CONN, Aug. 8, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—While reading the HERALD, this evening, the many truthful and soul-cheering epistles, my mind frequently reverts to the old "chestnut tree," the spot which gave birth to the best paper I know of in the world; and for one prizing the truth, as I do, I feel deeply interested in the doctrines advocated through its columns. I felt one year ago, when, previous to the annual meeting, so much was said about publishing it monthly or semi-monthly, that I could not be reconciled to the idea of issuing it less frequently than had been done. And now if possible, I feel stronger determined than ever to do all I see to be my duty, to help continue the paper in its present form, and as a weekly. If the Lord will I intend to be at our annual meeting this year: but if I should not be, I will say now, that I will give as much as I did last year, $5, and perhaps more, to help sustain the HERALD. Inasmuch as it is impossible to smother the God-honoring truth of "Life only through Christ," I think by all means the HERALD should be published. We realize that much of its support comes through a few, and we, who have not much of the things of this world, feel thankful to our heavenly Father that there are a few who are willing, while prospered, to help in so noble a cause. Brethren, while we are blest with the visits of such a messenger, you are sure of your reward.

NEW BRITAIN, Conn., Aug. 8, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—Long continued sickness in my family, engrossing all my time and strength, has prevented my writing to you, or doing anything for our paper. My interest in, and for it, is unabated, and I have often desired, while passing through this season of affliction, to acknowledge the love, faithfulness and goodness of the Lord to me, in graciously granting me so much of his presence, and enabling me to rejoice in hope. And such a hope as we have to sustain us! It grows brighter and brighter; revealing more of its blessedness as earthly hopes are blasted and earthly helpers fail. How strong the arm we have to lean upon; how precious and sure the promises in which we trust.

O, that all who profess to love the Lord, and to be his, knew more fully the strength and sufficiency there is in him, and the great privileges all true believers enjoy of reaching out after, and claiming for themselves, all that is needful. In other words, of walking by faith, not by sight.

"How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord,
Is laid for your faith in his excellent word;
What more can he say than to you he hath said,
You who unto Jesus for refuge hath fled?"

And then how blessed to know that we are in harmony with the truth of God, and as the light increases on the word to follow it, even as did ancient Israel the cloudy pillar which was sent to guide them all the way in which they were to go. What a tower of strength is the word of God to those who trust in it! What a rock of support to all who will test its stability by fearlessly and firmly planting their feet upon it!

But I had forgotten I was only writing a hasty note, and will return to my subject—the paper. I have had many things in my mind I would like to have said to the children, but could not; it was evident my duties were in another direction. One thought has been a comfort to me, that is, that, from the establishment of the paper I have done what I could toward its support, according to the time, strength and limited ability and capacity granted me. Do you suppose all who profess to be interested in it can say as much? Many have done nobly; but I know there are many others, far better capable of interesting and edifying the church of God than myself who have, for some reason, withheld their influence. This has been a source of anxiety and sorrow to me.

I trust the HERALD will be sustained. I believe that time is very short, and for that reason, instead of slackening our efforts, we should double our diligence and use every means to get the truth before the people, so that, if possible, some may be induced to turn their attention from the all-absorbing scenes and cares of this life to the glories of the future, and lay hold on eternal life. It is my prayer, that "as every one hath received the gift, even so," we may "minister the same, one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God." The Lord will bless such efforts. Yours in hope.

From Emeline T. Hobbs.

CAMBRIDGEPORT, MASS, Aug. 9, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—I enclose a poem clipped from one of the daily papers, describing, I think very beautifully, and scripturally, the glory of that kingdom for which we pray when we say "Thy kingdom come."

I heard Br. Rufus Wendell once say, that it had been said to him, that the idea of the future, as presented by the preachers in the pulpits of to-day, is vague, unsatisfactory, and therefore fails to interest or attract people. And is it not true? Heaven is described as a beautiful place somewhere, which eye hath not seen; and this is all that can be done in the absence of testimony from any one who has ever been there. But a child can understand the glory of Christ's kingdom as presented in the bible.

I hope to see you once again under the hallowed shade of the "Old Chestnut tree."

My hand is so unsteady I cannot write as long a letter as I intended. I am very tired and my health not being as good as formerly my nerves are unsteady.

With my warmest wishes and unchanging affection, I am yours in the hope of the gospel.

From W. H. H. McAllister.

ST. ALBANS, VT., Aug. 8, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—It has been a long time since I wrote you, but I have not forgotten my brethren and sisters in Christ, or lost my interest in the grand peculiar truths to which we hold. The HERALD OF LIFE is a constant visitor; and that and my Bible are almost my only sympathizers here.

I shall try very hard to be at the annual meeting of the "Life and Advent Union." I expect now that nothing will prevent. I certainly desire to do so.

One reason, and the chief one, of my long silence has been sickness in my family and increased cares consequent upon it.

Still, in all this, the Lord has been merciful to us. He has restored my wife to comparative health; and further, I have completely recovered from the effects of my old wound, and have now an artificial leg, on which in due time I hope to walk quite well.

You may say for me to the brethren, that I am still trusting in the Lord: thankful for his mercies; opposing, as occasion offers, the man-made doctrines of the present day; and though I meet with opposition and am avoided, slighted, and pointed out as an unsafe religions teacher, yet I am rejoicing in the Lord, and accepting thankfully the reproaches I have to bear in Christ's name. Yours in Christ.

From S. S. Call.

NEWPORT CENTRE, VT, Aug. 11, 1867.

BR. STORRS, and brethren of the HERALD OF LIFE:—As the anniversary is close upon us, what we do must be done quickly. I have been thinking how we should feel if the HERALD should stop; then what would we not give up, to get the paper. I for one feel that I can't give up my welcome weekly visitor, and I will make an effort in behalf of my paper. I therefore pledge ten dollars, in addition to my former pledge: half the first six months and the remainder the next three months. We must not give up the only paper that declares the whole truth of life only in Christ. We can all do something, and we would if it was lost to us, if by so doing we could get it back. Think of it, and act accordingly, and the paper will be continued. Your brother in Christ.

BENJAMIN MELLOR, Rockdale, Pa., writes:—Inclosed are $5 to help complete the present volume of our excellent paper; and hold me responsible for $20 for the next volume. My paper comes sometimes eleven days after date, but it is none the less welcome. It is the only medium I have of holding fellowship with brethren and sisters of like faith. I am living in a community which have the form of godliness, but I fear lack the power thereof. I have tried to introduce the paper by lending it to several of my neighbors; but all seem to look upon it with a jealous eye. There is no wish to see the coming King. I hope and pray that your life and health may be preserved, and that the paper may be sustained to the day of his coming, and that we may soon see the King in his beauty. Yours, in the "blessed hope."

J. HAMILTON, Fredonia, N. Y., writes:—I desire the continuance of the HERALD OF LIFE weekly, and will do all my duty to help support it. We are poor in this world's goods, far advanced in this mortal life, and my wife has not been able to walk, except on crutches, since last October. My health is poor, and my labor as a carpenter and joiner is our dependence; therefore we cannot do as we would be glad to, but are willing to make great exertions to sustain the paper; for we feel that it heralds forth the truth of God's word on the glorious plan of plan of life through the resurrection from the dead. Inclosed are $5 for the paper.

E. D HUTCHINSON, Corinna, Me., writes:—I should like to be at the anniversary of the "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION" very much, but cannot. As there is to be a decision as to the continuance of the paper, I would say, Let it be sent broadcast over the land. Continue it, by all means. It is the only paper that I know of that advocates the doctrine of no life out of Christ; that glorious light. I will pay $4 for Vol. V.

BARZILLAI BROWN, Fairfield, Conn., writes:—I send $1, which is due the HERALD OF LIFE. I wish I were able to send ten times the amount to sustain the weekly issue. My prayer is that our blessed God will raise up those who have the means to sustain it; and, also, that he may give you health and strength to continue to occupy your present position till Christ shall come to give you the reward he has promised to those who endure unto the end. Your brother, in hope of eternal life through Jesus Christ.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The prayers of our fellow travellers are riches above all mere pecuniary aid; but both are essential to the success of the cause we love. "The widow's mite" was not overlooked by the "blessed Jesus." Whatever we do, therefore, let us do it heartily as to the LORD, and leave the result with him.

A. F. CRESSY, Seymour, Conn., writes:—I send $3, the balance due on the HERALD OF LIFE. I hope and pray it may be continued weekly. If the Lord will, I intend to be present at the annual meeting, where I hope to see a goodly number of those who believe that God is the sinner's friend, and that he hath no pleasure in the death of him that dieth. I shall try and do what I can for the paper another year. Yours in hope of life only in Christ.

JOHN MARSH, McKean, Pa., writes:—I want the paper weekly, and will give $5 for one copy of Vol. V. I will do what I can to obtain new subscribers. I send one new one herewith, with $2 for same, and $2 more for two copies of "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST" to be sent him.

Obituary.

DIED, in West Newport, Vt., July 25, 1867, of consumption of the lungs, JOHN AUGUSTINE SWETT, aged thirty-seven years, six months, and twelve days.

Thus death has laid its cold and icy hand upon a kind companion and an indulgent father. His sickness was very severe, which he bore with great patience, especially as he drew near his end. And as death stared him in the face he calmly said, Not my will be done, but the will of God. And knowing the hour of his death had come, he called his companion and children around him, and taking her by the hand, lifted his voice in prayer, committing them all into the hands of God, praying God to help her to bear her affliction with fortitude. We feel God heard and answered, as he ever does if we believe we have the things we ask him for. When asked, if he had any thing more he wished to say, his answer was, No more, only hold on to the faith and meet me.

While we stood by his bedside, and saw him fall asleep in Jesus, we rejoiced that death, to the righteous, was not an eternal sleep, but that there was only a short time for him to sleep, and the Master would return; then we should behold him, not as he went down, frail and helpless, and of the earth earthy, but, oh! the change; how great and how grand; and far beyond my description; made immortal; never to waste away by disease; but to ever live with all the saints which will come then to receive their reward.

We listened to a comforting discourse, from a Baptist minister, from 1 Thess. iv. 14. May the arms of him who is able to carry all who trust in him safe through this world of gloom be underneath the family of mourners and bring them into the land of rest which is promised to all the finally faithful. Although the way sometimes looks dark and we hardly know why God deals thus, yet his thoughts are higher than ours, as the heavens are higher than the earth. May this console the afflicted, and cause them to rejoice and faithfully pursue the paths of peace.

A New Work on the Sabbath Question.

The following is the title of a new and important work to be issued about the middle of August:

THE FIRST-DAY SABBATH: clearly proved by showing that the old covenant, or ten commandments, have been changed, or made complete, in the Christian dispensation. In two parts. By T. M. Preble, author of "Two Hundred Stories for Children," "Three Kingdoms," "Two Adams," etc. "The Sabbath was made for man." (Jesus.) Buchanan, Michigan: Published by the W. A. C. P. Association.

The author of this work has adopted a plan in treating upon this long-controverted question so different from other writers who have heretofore written upon it as to make it a valuable book for all classes of readers.

1. It is shown conclusively, by a plain Scriptural argument, that the old Jewish law, or covenant, has been "done away:" not in the sense of annihilation, but in the sense of being made "perfect," or "complete," under the "new covenant."

2. It is also clearly proved, that in the Gospel dispensation there has been a change of days for the observance of the Sabbath. But the Sabbath, as an institution, is not changed. Neither can it be; for it "was made for man"—for all mankind. This is a point of much importance in settling the Sabbath question. The Sabbath as an institution for septenary rest, is one thing: but the particular day of the week on which this rest is to be observed, is quite another thing.

3. In confirmation of a change of days, from the seventh to the first day of the week, full and complete extracts are given from the early Christian Fathers, from eminent historians, and the earliest and most able writers upon the Sabbath question, proving that the early Christians did observe the first day of the week for the Sabbath. This forms a chapter of great value to all persons who desire correct historical information upon this long-controverted subject.

It is also proved by copious extracts from ecclesiastical history, that the Waldenses, or true Church of Christ, observed the first day of the week, or Lord's day, all the way through the "dark ages," from the days of Constantine the Great and Pope Sylvester until the Reformation.

5. A review of U. Smith, a recent writer in favor of the seventh-day Sabbath, in which it is shown that he has perverted the truth.

6. Also a review of J. N. Andrews' pretended History of the Sabbath, in which it is proved that he has unwisely deceived his readers.

Orders for the above work are solicited, and will be promptly filled as soon as the book is published.

To ministers we make the following offer: Any minister sending us the names of six subscribers for the book, with the money, shall receive a copy post-paid.

The book will contain nearly 500 pages. The retail price will be $2. Sent by mail, post-paid, on the receipt of the price.

Address all orders to JOSHUA V. HIMES, Buchanan, Mich.

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These question are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy"—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS.—Price 5 cents.

No. 4. THE SOUL SAVED OR LOST. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS.—Price 5 cents.

No. 5. MORAL DEPRAVITY: by GEO. STORRS Price, 5 cents.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: or, THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTER TO A CLERGYMAN; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburgh, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for two cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our expense They will be sold at $3 per 100; but, in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent or 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

The following 12 mo Tracts, of 24 pages each:

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

All Letters in relation to any of these works must be addressed,

Geo. Storrs,
Box 4658, NEW YORK.

Special Notice.

It will be seen that we have withdrawn from our CATALOGUE our work on "Man's Destiny;" being the Review of the "Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D.," in support of inherent immortality. We have not a copy of the work left; and the high price of paper, together with the limited demand for the work, forbid expending money in publishing another edition, at present, to say nothing of the lack of funds if we wished to do it.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchaser of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues are hereby revoked.

Poetry.

THE KINGDOM COME.

The following is from the new volumne of Jean Ingelow's poems:

Thy kingdom come,
I heard a Seer cry: "The wilderness,
The solitary place,
Shall yet be glad for Him, and He shall bless
(Thy kingdom come) with his revealed face
The forests: they shall drop their precious gum,
And shed for Him their balm: and He shall yield
The grandeur of His speech to charm the field.

"Then all the soothed winds shall drop to listen
(Thy kingdom come,)
Comforted waters waxen calm shall glisten
With bashful tremblement beneath His smile;
And Echo ever the while
Shall take, and in her awful joy repeat,
The laughter of His lips—(Thy kingdom come);
And hills that sit apart shall be no longer dumb;
No, they shall shout and shout,
Raining their lovely loyalty along the dewy plain;
And valleys round about,

"And all the well contented land, made sweet
With flowers she opened at His feet,
Shall answer; shout and make the welkin ring,
And tell it to the stars, shout, shout, and sing:
Her cup being full to the brim,
Her poverty made rich with him.

Her yearning satisfied to the utmost sum—
Lift up thy voice, O Earth, prepare thy song,
It shall not yet be long,
Lift up, O Earth, for he shall come again,
Thy Lord; and He shall reign, and He SHALL reign—
Thy kingdom come."

THE KIND-HEARTED TANNER.

The following incident is so beautiful and touching, that it should be read in every household in the country. It develops the true active principle of kindness. How many an erring mortal, making his first step in crime might be redeemed by the exercise of this sublime trait in the character of the kind hearted Quaker:

William Savery, an eminent minister among the Quakers, was a tanner by trade. One night a quantity of hides were stolen from his tannery, and he had reason to believe that the thief was a quarrelsome, drunken neighbor, called John Smith. Next week the following advertisement appeared in the country newspaper:

"Whoever stole a quantity of hides on the fifth of this month, is hereby informed that the owner has a sincere wish to be his friend. If poverty tempted him to this false step, the owner will keep the whole transaction secret, and will gladly put him in the way of obtaining money by means more likely to bring him peace of mind."

This singular advertisement attracted considerable attention; but the culprit alone knew who had made the kind offer. When he read it his heart melted within him, and he was filled with sorrow for what he had done. A few nights afterwards, as the tanner's family were about retiring to rest, they heard a timid knock, and when the door was opened there stood John Smith, with a load of hides on his shoulders. Without looking up he said: "I have brought these back, Mr. Savery; where shall I put them?"

"Wait till I get a lantern, and I will go to the barn with thee," he replied, "then thou wilt come in, and tell me how this happened. We will see what can be done for thee."

As soon as they were gone out, his wife prepared some hot coffee, and placed pies and meat on the table. When they returned from the barn, she said, "Neighbor Smith, I thought some hot supper would be good for thee."

He turned his back toward her, and did not speak. After leaning against the fireplace in silence a few moments, he said in a choked voice: "It is the first time I ever stole anything, and I have felt very badly about it. I am sure I didn't once think that I should ever come to what I am. But I took to drinking, and then to quarrelling. Since I began to go down hill everybody gives me a kick. You are the first man that has ever offered me a helping hand. My wife is sickly and my children starving. You have sent them many a meal. God bless you! but yet I stole the hides. But I tell you the truth when I say it is the first time I was ever a thief."

"Let it be the last, my friend," replied William Savery. "The secret lies between ourselves. Thou art still young, and it is in thy power to make up for lost time. Promise me that thou wilt not drink any intoxicating liquor for a year, and I will employ thee to-morrow on good wages. Thy little boy can pick up stones. But eat a bit now, and drink some hot coffee; perhaps it will keep thee from craving anything stronger to-night. Doubtless thou wilt find it hard to abstain at first; but keep up a brave heart for the sake of thy wife and children, and it will soon become easy. When thou hast need of coffee, tell Mary, and she will give it to thee."

The poor fellow tried to eat and drink, but the food seemed to choke him. After vainly trying to compose his feelings, he bowed his head on the table, and wept like a child. After a while he ate and drank, and his host parted with him for the night with the friendly words, "Try to do well, John, and thou wilt always find a friend in me." John entered his employ the next day, and remained with him many years, a sober, honest, and steady man. The secret of the theft was kept between them; but after John's death, William Savery sometimes told the story to prove that evil might be overcome with good. —Sel.

ROME, AND HER DESTRUCTION.

The destruction of Rome cannot long be delayed. Every thing in the scriptures relating to that power points directly to this time. The political condition of the Roman earth in itself is ominous. The child of God comparing the two makes assurance doubly sure. We know that the ten Kings, that had received no power as yet, were to receive power as kings one hour with the beast. For a long time they had been divided, and the great powers of Europe, taking advantage of their division, ruled Italy. But God hath put it into the hearts of these ten petty powers to agree and give their power to a leader, or head. What for? To fulfil the words of God. What words? "These (ten united in one) shall hate the harlot (Papacy) shall eat her flesh (resources, wealth, power) and burn her with fire." It is well for us to note the position of this prophecy which is fulfilled, in order that we may thank God and take courage. "These shall hate the harlot." Garibaldi has recently shone fresh signs of life upon the Roman question. Several letters have been published, addressed to different societies and personal friends, in which he renews the expression of his undying hostility to Rome and the priesthood in Italy, generally. With the latter, he will have no truce, no compromise. To use his own words, he would have the people "utterly sweep away the abominations of the priestly shop." Again: "When shall this people cease to kneel at the feet of impostors? and when shall they lose the fear of hell and become worthy of the great destiny to which Providence has called them?" In reply to the students of the university of Belogne, under date of May 28, 1867, he says, "My dear friends, your generous resolution is worthy of all praise, and I thank you for your subscription to the loan for the Roman insurrection. God grant that your noble example may be followed by the rest of Italy—and it is a sacred duty to follow it. All my gratitude is yours for the happy augury of contributing to level with the dust that tabernale of corruption and lies which calls itself the Papacy."

"Eat her flesh." It is well known to all that the Italian kingdom has laid its hand upon the wealth of the Catholic Church—has turned monks and nuns into the street, bidding them work for a living. Depriving Bishops and priests of their income, annexing the largest portion of the patrimony of St. Peter (or states of the church) to their kingdom; depriving the Pope of his revenue, compelling him like a beggar to send throughout all the world for Peter's pence. Witness the extraordinary effort to shove the Papal bonds in every country, in order, if possible, to keep breath in the old carcass, and say whether or not "this is that spoken of by" John the revelator. The latter part of this prediction remains to be fulfilled, namely, "and burn her with fire." Is this to be fulfilled literally? It seems quite probable that it will be. The Italian liberals are mustering; they have made a demonstration against Rome. Garibaldi, their mouth-piece, declares that he will not rest until Rome is taken, and the vile priests dethroned. The Pope predicted that "those grievous wolves would come to Rome." In this, if in nothing else, he will probably prove himself to be a true prophet. The republicans are hovering about that city. The Pope becoming alarmed entreats Napoleon to save him. It is intimated that French troops will be sent back. If they are, they will doubtless find a united Italy ready to oppose them. If a battle should be fought at that place there will be a good opportunity to fulfil the words of God, namely, these ten haters of Rome shall "burn her with fire." It may possibly occur to the republicans that if they had laid the city in ruins when the French troops strangled the Roman republic in 1849, there would have been no disposition on the part of foreign troops to stand guard over those ruins for seventeen years. But we will suppose that the Garibaldians burn that city, and lay it even with the ground. Would that fulfil the scriptures? We think not. It is evident that nature works with man in the overthrow of Rome; that the volcanic fires which have been burning for over two thousand years in a sulphuric soil, must have undermined a large portion of the peninsula; that an immense gulf of burning lava, or fire and brimstone, must be found there: and if there is such a place as an orthodox hell, it will be found in this place. As an evidence of the activity of those subterranean fires, we would mention the fact that some distance from Italy, yet in that section of the world, to wit, in the Grecian archipelago, an island went down within the past year, and another came up. And to show the state of the underworld, it will only be necessary to say, that before the island appeared, the entire gulf was made to boil like a pot. The stones upon the island when viewed at night, resembled red-hot coals. Upon the island that was settling down, openings were seen from which flame issued to the height of from fifteen to forty feet.

Not far from this place we have mentioned, is the land of Israel, in which God has said, Ezek. xxxviii, there shall be a great shaking, so that the fowls of heaven and the fish of the sea, and all the men that are upon the face of the (land) earth shall shake at my presence. Zach. xiv. declares that at the same time, the mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof, and a very great valley formed which extend toward the Mediterranean and Dead seas; water flows both ways from Jerusalem. It is evident that those geographical changes will be brought about by an earthquake. The scriptures point out the fact, that at the revelation of our Lord there will be an earthquake such as there was not since man was upon the earth, so mighty and so great. It is very important for us to note the fact, that just at this point "the cities (or city) of the nations (Rome) fall, and great Babylon came in remembrance before God."

How is all this to be brought about? We answer by natural laws. It is a fact, that a large portion of the dust of Italy has been turned into brimstone. It is according to natural law that when fire comes in contact with brimstone it will burn. Just this thing has occured in Italy. The subterranean fires have been burning in that peninsula for over two thousand years, fulfilling the word of God found in Deut. xxxi. 22, "And set on fire the foundations of the mountains," etc. Only imagine an immense gulf or ocean of liquid fire beneath the city of Rome and of the entire country. You know that there is a large body of water on both sides of this narrow neck of land. There must be an embankment of sulphur, or earth between the fire and water. The partition must be wearing away by the action of the fire. The time must come when the embankment will be too weak to sustain the immense pressure of the waters: it will give way; the flood of waters will flow down into an ocean of fire; and, according to natural law, when fire and water come together the product is steam. It is our belief that there will be steam enough generated in this case to cause the mightiest earthquake the world has ever beheld. In that earthquake Rome will be lifted like a millstone in the air, and cast with violence into an ocean of fire. The waters of the mediterranean will close over her. "She shall be found no more at all." See the destruction of literal Babylon, also Sodom and Gomorrah, which are types or "ensamples," as Peter says, of them "that after should live ungodly," 2 Pet. ii. 6, Jude adds, "are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." Query: Will it take the destruction of several cities to give an "example" of how a wicked man is to be destroyed? Must not the anti-type be grater than the type? Jude. "For certain men have slily crept in (the church) who were formerly (margin, before written) ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men, who change the grace (love or favor) of our God into dissoluteness, and deny the only Lord, and (or even) our Lord Jesus Christ. Now I wish to remind you, though you once knew it, that the Lord having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed the unbelievers." Whiting's translation. "Wo unto them; for they have gone in the way of Cain (killed millions of their brethren) and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, (through hell, purgatory, and the immortality of the soul—feigned, or untrue words, they have made merchandise of you) and perished in the gainsaying of Core." A most fearful type of the destruction of Rome. Let us turn and read Mumb. xvi. "Separate yourselves from among this congregation, that I may consume them in a moment.... Depart, I pray you, from the tents of these wicked men, and touch nothing of theirs, lest ye be consumed in all their sins." (How much like Rev. xviii. 4, "Come out of her my people.") "If these men die the common death of all men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men, then the Lord hath not sent me. But if the Lord make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth and swallow them up with all that appertain unto them, and they go down quick into the pit, then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the Lord.... And it came to pass....that the ground clave asunder that was under them, and the earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up and their houses and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods." ("For in one hour so great riches have come to naught;" Rev. xviii. 17.) "They and all that appertained to them went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them." Numb. xxvi. 10, "And they (Korah and company) became a sign." Question: A sign of what? We are living, we are dwelling in a grand and awful time; in an age on ages telling, to be living is sublime.

THE PERSONALITY OF THE DEVIL.

OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED BY JOHN FONDAY, M. D.

But we are met here by the question, propounded by some skeptics, who, with illy concealed derision and contempt cry out, "Who ever saw this devil?" Because you have not seen him, is that any proof that he does not exist? You live each moment by breathing the air of heaven. It expands your lungs, it imparts its vitalizing principle to your frame; you live, you move under its quickening, life-giving power. Did you ever see this air? Because you never saw it, will you be so presuming, and exhibit so much ignorance as to say that there is no air? You know that there is air by its effects. You see the leaf move and hear it rustle; you feel the breeze as it gently fans your brow; you inhale something which if pure gives you a feeling of comfort and strength, and if impure of weakness and oppression; you hear its gentle sigh on a summer's eve, its moanings when winter wraps the earth in her snowy shroud, and nature seems to mourn the death of her offspring that bloomed so beautifully for a season, and then decayed and died; and see the whirlwind as it sweeps on in its majestic and destructive power, marking its path by desolation and woe; you feel the soft breath of loved ones as they breathe out words of tenderness and affection; you see them, as they pass away, in fainter and fainter gaspings yielding up that breath which caused their organism to manifest those powers that constitute man a living soul, and place him in a condition to fulfil, while here, the end for which he was created. You know that there is such a thing as air by its effects, by these manifestations.

And so with satan. Your eyes never rested upon one of those pure spirits who burn with love around the throne, and with alacrity haste to execute the will of the Almighty, those ministering spirits sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation. They ministered to Jesus in the garden, and in the wilderness; they watched over his tomb, and as they waited upon him, so do they watch over the children of God, guiding and guarding them, though unseen by mortal eyes, and influencing them to pursue that course which is in accordance with the will of the Almighty; and who will finally gather the "elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other," and escort them to meet Him who will come to bestow on them the reward of eternal life.

Those angels you never saw, and yet holy writ reveals the truth of their existence, and of their work and duty in reference to the redeemed from among men. You have felt their influence while unconscious of their presence. When unholy desires and impulses have been awakened in the heart, when doubts, and fears, and unbelieving thoughts have sprung up in the soul, when you have almost plunged into gross iniquity, but were restrained, it was these waiting messengers, these faithful guardians, who influenced you to do what was right, and under the direction, and by the aid of the divine truth and spirit, directed your wandering feet into the strait and narrow way that leadeth unto life eternal.

So too with evil angels, with the devil. You have not seen them, you never saw him, though you have often felt their influence and power. The impure thought that suddenly darted into your mind, while engaged in holy duties, giving pain, and causing godly sorrow, the irresistible impulse to do wrong, almost leading you, against your judgment, and in spite of your earnest prayers and endeavors, into gross iniquity; perhaps the very scoff, which you utter against the existence of evil spirits, are but the promptings of satan and his hosts, who would even seek to lead you to doubt their existence, the better and more readily to accomplish their work of temptation and destruction. And the word of God is not less clear as to the fact of the existence of such evil beings, than it is with respect to those that are pure and holy.

You have not seen satan, but you have, although unconscious of it, felt his influence and power. He has tempted you, but you have referred the temptation entirely to the workings of the lusts of your nature. You quote the declaration of James that, "Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed." You understand this to mean that when a man is thus tempted he has yielded to sin. You confound temptation, with temptation yielded to, or sin. James certainly does not intend to convey the idea that temptation is sin. If he did, then Abraham sinned when, in obedience to the command of God, who, it is said, "did tempt Abraham," he lifted up his hand to slay his son. If temptation is sin, then the holy son of God sinned when he was tempted of the devil, and every man sins when even an evil suggestion arises in his heart, although, from the very first moment of its entrance there, he may resist it with all the strength of his soul, while ardently imploring divine grace to remove it. No, James meant no such thing. He meant simply that man was tempted when his lusts were acted upon, and they were directed or drawn away towards the object of lust, becoming fixed in contemplation of these objects and thus enticed. He does not use the term "enticed" in the sense of yielding to the temptation, but in the sense which is warranted by the definition of the term, of being attracted or directed carnally towards the object of lust. Temptation up to this point is not sin. This we regard as but the incipient stage of temptation in which there is no sin—nothing but that state of the mind in which it is strongly attracted toward or fixed upon the temptation without yielding to it. There is no sin in having the mind so strongly fixed on an object of temptation as to realize clearly and fully the nature of the temptation—it may lead to sin, but does not necessarily do so—we cannot indeed get a correct idea of the temptation unless we suffer our minds to dwell upon it long enough, and with sufficient attention to understand its true character. Thus Eve, in considering the temptation presented to her, did not commit sin—this was but the incipient stage of the temptation—it was only when she made up her mind to disobey God that she sinned, a purpose of soul speedily carried into execution when she took the fruit and ate it.

It is temptation in its matured state that develops, or results in sin. In the verse above quoted, James speaks of the first stage of the process of temptation, in which as yet there is no sin, and in the next verse he speaks of the second stage in which sin has become developed. "Then when lust hath conceived it bringeth forth sin, and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." Here the act of temptation is complete. The heart, attracted, or enticed, or allured by the object of temptation, has closed in with it, the seed of wickedness has been deposited, lust has conceived, and sin is the fruit. In the first verse nothing is said about lust conceiving, but, in the one last quoted, sin is spoken of as the result of the conception. For temptation to become complete, so as to constitute sin, the heart must embrace it and make it its own. So long as it refuses its assent and co-operation, the heart preserves its integrity, and is free from all iniquity.

Temptation then to become sin must be accepted or embraced by the heart, it is there that the real work is completed. But the temptation itself is not always limited to the heart. It may originate there and be independent of any other agency, but is often associated with other agencies by which the work is rendered more effective. The temptation may indeed be contrived and planned by another, and afterwards suggested to, and urged on, the subject of it by the contriver. More than one intelligent agent may be combined in this work of tempting man, and more than one motive be brought to bear upon the tempted one to bring him under the power of some special temptation. This we see in the history of the race, this we observe daily in our personal experience, Hence the fact that temptation may originate in ourselves from the motions of our own lusts, is no proof that other agents, among them wicked spirits, may not be active participators in the work. And, in the history of the temptation of our first parents and of Christ, we see that an influence emanating from an intelligent and evil being, was brought to bear in the work; while, in the case of Job, the trials and sufferings to which he was subjected, and which were designed to be the means of leading him into sin, constituted a temptation of a severe and aggravated character, and were the work of a being who had no faith in the declarations of the Almighty with reference to the integrity of the patriarch's character, and was not satisfied on the point until he had subjected him to the sorest and most terrible trials and sufferings.

THE IMMORTALITY QUESTION.

I.—Yet the belief in immortality is universal. Not only the educated and religious, but the low and vile, savages and barbarians, to whom the Gospel has never been offered, who, certainly, according to your theory, must have forfeited their immortality for their own selves, even if Adam had never done it for them, and who had never so much as heard that there is a chance for its recovery, and who therefore ought to know nothing about it—even they have their theory of a future life. No nation or tribe has ever been found, I have read, so degraded as not to have some notion, however gross, of a God and of immortality; and this instinct of immortality is, I should surely think, a premonition of immortality. And besides this inborn instinct you have the creeds of all Pagandom and all Christendom. It is impossible that a belief so wide-spread should be utterly baseless.

H.—I do not know which will be the strongest answer—to deny your facts or to account for them. You may have your choice.

I.—I will have both, first one and then the other.

H.—First, then, I will deny them, and declare that the belief in immortality, so far from being universal, is rare. Even at the present time our own people hardly believe in it, let alone the old Pagans. Religious persons think it is wicked to talk of a future state out of meeting. Speak of heaven as a place where there is real life, actual talking and walking and working and playing and planning and laughing and loving, and they are shocked, and think you irreverent. In a future solemn, pale, passionless dream, they believe perhaps, but not in a future life. For a life without functions is no life. If you have not the same capacities in another world that you have in this, you are not the same being, it is not a resurrection that has occurred, but a new creation. Most of the persons whom you and I know do not entertain a belief in heaven or hell sufficiently vivid to influence materially or apparently their dealings with their fellow-men.

I.—There I think you cannot judge. You only see how people live. You do not know how they would live if they had no such belief. You might say people do not believe in law, because there is so much thieving; but if they believed there were no law, there would be nothing but thieving.

H.—Your case is not quite parallel, but it can easily be made so, and it will at once turn against you. The point on which a thief is doubtful is, not the existence of law, but the possibility of eluding the law. The point on which the world is doubtful is, not the possibility of eluding unending wretchedness but its existence. All agree that if it is, there is no escape for him who is doomed to it. If a thief should avow that he believed there was no escaping the law, and yet after a theft he should seek to escape it, we should at once infer that he believed it might be escaped. So when men say they believe there is a future life, yet act as if there were none, shall we not believe their acts rather than their words? The price of gold is a much better national barometer than fine theorizing about prosperity. And if we who have lived under centuries of the Church doctrine of inevitable immortality have so faint a belief in it, I question whether it is so deep-seated or so wide-spread in Pagandom as is generally supposed. The old poets, indeed, describe a posthumous life with great minuteness; but undoubtedly they intended it should be received as a work of imagination, not a narrative of fact. Milton would not wish his account of Pandemonium or the battles in Heaven to be taken as parts of his creed, nor did Virgil intend Octavia to receive the account of Marcellus as a faithful narrative. When the Greek and Latin poets express their own actual every-day belief, it is chilling and uncomfortable to the last degree. And even their poetical conceptions were scarcely attractive—viewless shades, realms of night, unsubstantial all. It was

"Death, and great darkness after death."

All that Patroclus's sad shade could ask of Achilles was prorer burial, that he might pass through the gloomy gates of Hades. Nothing is more touching than the calm, hopeless bravery of the ancient men, looking upon death as the end of all, yet cheering each other on to meet it as brave men should. It was according to nature; it was inevitable. To fear it was unmanly; and so they gathered their mantles around them, and slept the iron sleep, But there was no joy, no hope, no anticipation.

The sole consolation that Horace could bring to Mæcenas was, not a prospect of future reunion, but that the same day should bring death to both—ruinam, how meaning a term! and all beyond the tomb were but fabulæ manes: Cicero was to find comfort for Tullia's death in remembering that there were no youths in Rome worthy of being her husband. Christ seems never so bright and blessed as when he brings life and immortality to light through his Gospel—brings the warm sun of heaven for the ghostly, ghastly twilight of these old sepulchral worlds. The best and wisest among the ancients seem never to have got beyond a perhaps.

I.—Plato had arrived at the doctrine of immortality.

H.—Plato reasoned out a doctrine—

I.—We have good authority for saying that he reasoned well.

H.—Poetical, not logical authority. Because the soul does not depend upon the body, he inferred that it could exist without the body—a groundless assumption, though a wise man made it. For no man knows what the principle of life is.

I.—Still, death is the greatest shock that we know of; and if death does not destroy the soul, if, as you admit the soul is independent of the body, how do you know that Plato was not right in predicating of it immortality? If it survive death, why may it not survive anything? If it live after that, why may it not live forever?

H.—Plato was right in reasoning thus from what he knew. I should be wrong, because I have light that Plato never had. Plato saw only by his inward light. I have the word of God saying the soul that sinneth, it shall die. There is another hero of the old world, Marcus Aurelius, the noblest Roman of them all; yet he can only say "about death: whether it is a dispersion, or a resolution into atoms, or annihilation, it is either extinction or change," and, at best, his change is only every part of him being reduced into some part of the universe, and that again changing into another part of the universe, and so on forever. And when his great heart stoops to take in some "vulgar comfort" for the dread doom it is not in considering the goodness of those he is going to meet, but the badness of them he is going to leave. Do you find here any such belief in immortality as you can well build a system on? and these, you must recollect, are the high-water marks. These are the opinions of the foremost men of all their time. Where, then, will you be likely to find the rank and file?

I.—In Valhall and Vingolfa I should be sure to find them.

H.—Sipping mead, not to say blood, from the skulls of the foes they had slain in battle.

JOHN LOCKE ON IMMORTALITY.

It has been affirmed that Locke held the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, Great names are of little use to any one who is willing to learn of the Bible alone. John Locke, however, cannot with truth be claimed on the side of natural immortality. That he believed all men candidates for it, is true; and that is exactly what we believe and have maintained these twenty-seven years. Locke's "Reasonableness of Christianity," is a work we read near fifty years ago; and though we were deeply impressed with his views on immortality, as lost through Adam's fall, and only recovered by faith in Christ, yet the strong current of the times in favor of the common view, prevented our settling down on Locke's position for more than twenty years after, nor do we adopt or hold all his positions now; but the general position that death is death, and not life in torment; that Adam lost the means of immortality, by losing Paradise and access to the tree of life; and that all his posterity, therefore, by natural generation, are destitute of immortality, and can only attain it through union with the second Adam, we do firmly believe. In Locke's essay on the "Resurrection and its Sequences," in his Life by King, pp. 316-322—Bohn's edition, he says;—

"They" [the wicked] "shall not live forever. This is so plain in scripture, and is so every where inculcated—that the wages of sin is death, and the reward of the righteous is everlasting life—the constant language of scripture in the current of the New Testament as well as the Old, is life to the just, to believers, to the obedient, and death to the wicked and unbelievers—that one would wonder how the reader could be mistaken where death is threatened so constantly, and declared every where to be the ultimate punishment and last estate to which the wicked must all come. To solve this, they have invented a very odd signification of the word death, which they would have stand for eternal life in torment. They who will put so strange and contrary a signification upon a word in a hundred places, where, if it had not its true and literal sense, one would wonder it should be so often used, and that in opposition to life, which in these places is used literally, ought to have good proofs for giving it a sense in those places of scripture directly contrary to what it ordinarily has in other parts of scripture and every where else.

"But leaving this interpretation of die and death to shift for itself, as it can in the minds of reasonable men, there are places of scripture which plainly show the different state of the just and the wicked to be literally life and death, wherein there is no room for that evasion. I shall name one or two of them. Luke xx. 35, 36. Our Saviour tells the Sadducees that they who are accounted worthy to attain that world in the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels, and the children of God being the children of the resurrection. Where Christ plainly declares of the children of God alone, who have been accounted worthy to obtain the resurrection, i.e., the resurrection before the others, that they are like the angels, and can die no more."...."Another text that declares the death and final end of the wicked is Gal. vi.7, 8—'Be not deceived: God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap; for he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.' In other places, say these interpreters, 'by everlasting life, is meant everlasting happiness joined to life; by death, is meant eternal sufferings and torments without death.' But here corruption and everlasting life are opposed.

"Now phthora, corruption, signifies the dissolution and final destruction of a thing, whereby it ceases to be; but corruption can by nobody be pretended to signify the endless sense of pain and torment in a being subsisting and continued on to eternity. Corrpption is the spoiling anything, the divesting it of the being it had. Accordingly St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv, uses incorruption for an indefinable [unending] state of immortality. That which gives some color to their understanding by death an endless life in torment is, the everlasting fire threatened by our Saviour to the wicked. Math. xviii. 8 and xxv. 41-46. 'But it may suffice to say, that everlasting, in a true scripture sense, may be said of that which endures as long as the subject it affects endures,' etc.

"Isa. xxxv. 10, everlasting joy, i. e., that continued as long as they lived. A like expression is that of hell fire, Mark ix. 43, 44, that never shall be quenched, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched; an expression taken from Isaiah lxvi. 24, which, though we translate hell, is in the original Gehenna, or the Valley of Hinnom; where was kept a constant fire to burn up the carcases of beast and other filth of the city of Jerusalem, where, though the fire never was quenched, yet it does not follow, nor is it said that the bodies that were burnt in it were never consumed, only that the worms that gnawed and the fire that burnt them were constant, and never ceased till they were destroyed. So, though the fire was not put out, yet the chaff was burnt up and consumed, Math. iii. 12; and the tares, xiii. 30; in both which places and the parallel, Luke iii. 17, the Greek word signifies to be consumed by burning, though in our bibles it is translated 'burn up,' but in one of them, Math iii. 12. Taking it then for evident that the wicked shall die and be extinguished at last," etc.

THE REGENERATION.

We gave an article last week on this topic. The Editor of the Advent Herald gave another on the same subject from the manuscript of a former editor—SYLVESTER BLISS—presenting the views of many eminent writers on Math. xix. 28, which we insert as valuable testimony. Mr. BLISS says:

On this passage, the London Quarterly Journal of Prophecy says: "No critic or commentator in our day will be found asserting that in Matt. xix. 28, it means the new birth. All agree, or almost all, that it certainly means the Renewal of all things, the Renovation, Restoration, Restitution of all things to the state elsewhere spoken of as the New Earth."

The Greek and English Lexicon of DR. E. ROBINSON has this remark: "In the New Testament, of the complete external manifestation of the Messiah's kingdom, when all things are to be delivered from their present corruption and restored to their spiritual purity and splendor."

G. CAMPBELL renders the passage: "I say unto you, that at the Renovation, when the Son of man shall be seated on his glorious throne, ye my followers, sitting also upon twelve thrones, shall judge the twelve tribes of Israel." He also says of it: "We are accustomed to apply the term regeneration solely to the conversion of individuals; whereas its relation here is to the general state of things... The principal completion will be at the general resurrection, when there will be in the most important sense, a regeneration, or regeneration of heaven and earth, when all things shall become new."

JOSEPHUS uses the same Greek word when he says, (Ant. xi. 3-9) of the Jews' return from Babylon: "They betook themselves to drinking and eating, and for seven days they continued feasting, and kept a festival for the rebuilding and restoration of their country."

ALFORD says of this Scripture: "He tells them prophetically that, in the new world, the accomplishing of that regeneration which he came to bring in, he should sit on his throne," etc.

STIER says, "The regeneration, as appears from the explanatory clause that is added respecting the glory of the Son of man, is the renewal of the world, of the earth, (hence the Persian translation has it directly, in 'the New World,') a restoration of the primitive state of things on the whole."

KINNOEL has a long note to show that the verse expresses the happy state of the kingdom of Messiah when Israel shall be restored and the whole earth brought to a new condition.

DR. MURDOCK, in his verrion from the Syraic renders it: "Verily, I say unto you, that, as for you who have followed me, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory in the New World, ye also shall sit on twelve seas, and shall judge the twelve tribes of Israel."

WESLEY has it, "You who have followed me, in the renovation, when the Son of man shall sit," etc. And then in a note he explains the term "renovation" to mean, "the final renovation of all things."

DR. WHITBY, who dissents from their view, and thinks it identical with "the new state of things under the gospel," makes the following admissions: "I know that Justin Martyr and Irenæus speak of a paliggenesia, regeneration, or renovation. which relates to their supposed millennium, and others would refer this to the stoical renovation of the world after its conflagration." "I grant the paliggenesia here mentioned may be referred to the consummation of the world and to the 'new heavens and earth' of which the prophets speak;" and "Moreover the Greek interpreters have generally said, 'regeneration signifies the resurrection.'"

DR. CLARKE, in placing a comma after the phrase, "Ye which here followed me," says, "the punctuation which I have observed here, is that which is followed by the most eminent critics: the regeneration is thus referred to the time when Jesus shall sit on the throne of his glory, and not to the time of following him, which is utterly improper. Some refer this to the time in which the new heavens and new earth shall be created, and the soul and body united. The Pythagoreans termed that paliggenesia, when according to their doctrine of the transmigration, the soul entered into a new body and got into a new state of being. Clement, in his epistle to the Corinthians, calls the restoration of the world, after the deluge by the same name." He also adds, Others "are of opinion that the regeneration means the conversion of men by the preaching of the Gospel.. But I confess I do not see the propriety of this application of the terms, as the following verse seems to fix the meaning mentioned above."

DR. DODDRIDGE in his gloss on this passage, understands the regeneration to be "The great renovation of all things, when all the children of God shall, as it were, be born anew from their graves; when created nature shall put on its fairest forms to receive them, and the Son of man, presiding over that august assembly, shall "sit on the throne of his glory." He adds: "It seems plain to me, that our Lord refers in the following words to the time of final retribution, which he elsewhere mentions as that in which he should sit on the throne of his glory," Matt. xxv. 31, 32.

DR. BURNET deduces a labored argument from this passage, to prove the renovation of the earth at the millennium. He says: "I know, in our English translation, we separate the regeneration from sitting upon his throne, but without any warrant from the original. And seeing our Saviour speaks here of bodily goods, and seems to distinguish them from everlasting life, which is to be the final reward of his followers, this regeneration seems to belong to his second coming, when the world shall be renewed or regenerated, and the righteous shall possess the earth." Theory of the Earth, Vol. 2. pp. 143-4.

REV. GEORGE TOWNSEND, in his notes on the New Testament punctuates the passage thus: "Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit, etc," He says: "There is a diversity of opinion about this punctuation; Griesbach puts a comma before regeneration; Knopp before and after it as in the text." But he makes the regeneration to be only the present new dispensation of the Gospel.

WAKEFIELD punctuates it with a comma before and after, but has no note upon it.

DR. BONAR states that the Italian version in the Polyglott, the French, and Spanish also, render "regeneration" in the sense of the New World; while the Vulgate leaves it doubtful.

BENGEL makes it synchronous with the resurrection.

DR. SCOTT says that the word regeneration, "may, and probably should be joined to the subsequent clause; and then it refers to the time when the apostles would receive their full recompense; even when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, (xxv. 31.) Then he will make all things new."

BISHOP HALL applies it to the day of the great restoration of all things, when the elect shall enter on a new life of unspeakable glory, even in that great and dreadful day, when the Son of man shall sit upon his throne of majesty, to judge the quick and the dead."

MR. BARNES says, "It refers to that great revolution; that restoration of order in the universe; that universal new birth when the dead shall rise, and all human things shall be changed, and a new order of things shall start up out of the ruins of the old: when the Son of man shall come to judgment."

The foregoing authorities are conclusive though not all consenting to it, that the word regeneration should be connected with the clause following and not with that which precedes; that it does not signify the new birth, and that it must signify the universal restoration or regeneration of this earth, in the final restitution of all things.

THOUGHTS ON LIFE AFTER DEATH.

"But IF the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall ALSO quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii. 11.

What does this scripture mean? That God "raised up Christ from the dead" is abundantly evident to all bible readers. It is equally evident from this text that the "mortal bodies" of those in whom the Spirit of Christ dwells shall also be quickened or made alive. The word "also" teaches us that the quickening of Christ's people implies their being raised up from the dead as Jesus was. Just as literally and clearly as Jesus rose, will be the resurrection of those in whom his Spirit dwells. All this is plain and sure. Yea, and still more is equally plain from this text. As one who desires to be honest before God, I must break loose from former views and prejudices and own, that if a language expresses any thing, conditions are plainly expressed in this text, upon the fulfilment of which depends our hope of a resurrection to a future life. But what are the conditions?

"IF the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you"—not otherwise—"He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies," etc. Now what if this Spirit does not dwell in us, can we hope to be quickened, or in other words to be raised "up from the dead" as Christ was? But I have formerly thought, that all would be quickened, or made alive, irrespective of any conditions. But if those who have not the Spirit of Christ and are "none of his," are to be quickened, as well as those who have his Spirit and are his, what can this text mean? I am unable to tell.

No man has ever shown, nor can any one ever prove that without a Saviour there could have been a resurrection for any of the human family. All prospect of future life, plainly depends on Christ. Had there been no Saviour sent into the world, nothing seems plainer to me, than that the whole race of Adam would have terminated their career in the grave—would have been locked in the silence of unending death.

But Jesus came—blessed be God—and "brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." But what shall we say of those who reject him and his offer of life? Who have no union with him? Are they not in the same condition they would have been, had Christ never came? To illustrate: suppose 300 men are placed upon an island and are destitute of food, in a starving condition. A ship visits the island with ample means to rescue them all, and offers to supply them with food and passage on the condition of their entering the ship. A party only accept the offer, while the others foolishly reject it and remain. Are not those who reject the offer left in the same condition they were in prior to the offer? It is precisely so with those who reject Christ and his great offer of life to the world. Unless it can be shown that the dead would have been raised to life, had Jesus never came as a Saviour, I think it cannot be shown, since Christ has come and the offer has been made, that those who reject him and his offer will ever live again. Such have only the nature of Adam, upon which the doom of death, unbroken by a resurrection, is in full force. If rescued at all from this doom, it must be done "through Christ." But him they have rejected. His offer to save them from their impending doom, they have spurned. Therefore they die without hope, without Christ, and must necessarily "remain in the congregation of the dead," and "be as though they had not been."

And, again, our Lord's words in Luke xx. 35, 36, not only confirm this view, but seem to teach it in the most emphatic manner. "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world," (i. e. the world to come,) "and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

Now if all are to be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, this text, to a common reader, would be meaningless. One thing is certain, those who are "accounted worthy to obtain....the resurrection from the dead," cannot die again; for saith Jesus, "Neither can they die any more." That all will not obtain the resurrection from the dead is also evident from the fact that a part only are "accounted worthy" to obtain it. It is on the account of worth or worthiness that any one is premitted to obtain it. It follows then, those deficient in these qualifications will most surely fail of it. Again, those "accounted worthy" are "children of God, being the children of the resurrection;" from which it appears those not "accounted worthy," etc., are neither children of the resurrection nor of God. The very idea that some are "accounted worthy" of these immunities presupposes there is a class unworthy of them, and who will, therefore, fail to participate in them. This class shall "not see life;" "they are extinct;" "like sheep they are laid in the grave. They shall never see light." "They go to nothing and perish." "They shall lie down together, they shall not rise." So reads the word of the Lord. And who objects? Have I a bitter enemy, one who seeks my injury to the extent of his ability? At length he dies. Would it be a christian spirit in me, to raise him from a state of unconsciousness to avenge myself upon him? If possessed of the requisite power to raise him, it looks as if it would be God-like and Christ-like to say, Let him "remain in the tomb," as said Job. Who would wish to awaken a handful of dust, under such circumstances, to sorrow, pain, misery, or to die again? None but the hard-hearted Surely, it seems to me, God is too good and merciful to do it. But, says the objector, "Some portions of Scripture seem to teach that the wicked dead will live again." Very well. But a little more study and careful thought may show you that in this you are mistaken. Perhaps you feel bitter prejudice against the idea of the "perpetual sleep" of the wicked dead. I felt thus for a long time and for that reason I could not receive the truth. It may be so with you. If so, the Lord pity you, and help you to overcome prejudice, and believe "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

JOB AND THE DEVIL.

BY Z. CAMPBELL.

Having of late seen, in the HERALD OF LIFE several articles on the above personages, and different views advanced, I think to present a few ideas for others to improve on. But I do not think the subject of as much importance as some others. I have a friend in Fishkill who at one time seemed much concerned about a personal devil, whether such a being existed or not. To this end he wrote to me to know my opinion. In answer, I replied, that our salvation does not depend on our faith in a personal devil, but on our faith in Christ.

But after all, I now say, there are such creatures as personal devils, many of them, all around us and in our midst, and the wickedest person is the biggest devil generally. Such devil or devils afflicted Job. But how did they afflict him? Did the Sabeans really take away his oxen and his asses? and did they really kill his servants? I do not think it must necessarily have been so. It must be borne in mind that the devil was dealing with Job in the persons of his messengers; each one, after relating some sad catastrophe, closed by saying, "I only escaped to tell thee."

Now, were not these messengers lying devils? If so, they all lied to Job, and no such things ever happened as they related. Nor was there any need of their happening; for so long as they had the craftiness to make him believe them, it was as real to Job as though all these things did really happen; for men think, feel and act just as they believe.

Tell a man that his house, wife, children, and all his property were destroyed by fire, and make him believe it without a doubt, and it is to him a reality, whether it is so or not. And it seems this might have been so in the case of Job, who, after he got out of his afflictions, and again into clear sunshine, found himself in possession of twice as much as he had before, having fourteen thousand sheep, six thousand camels, a thousand yoke of oxen, a thousand she asses, "seven sons and three daughters."

Surely this does not look as though his messengers told the truth; but it does look as though they very cunningly played a possum game on the good old man, and made him believe his children and flocks and herds were all dead, while, as yet, no harm had happened to any of them.

So there is no difficulty in finding the real devil that afflicted Job, and hereafter, if the Lord will, I will try to find the real devil that disputed with Michael about the body of Moses.

Meanwhile, let us all pray, "Thy kingdom come."

HEBREWS IX. 27.

BR. STORRS:—I venture to send you, for the HERALD, the following, which is a somewhat enlarged copy of a letter sent to H. L. Hastings, shortly after he was at our place, and at the dedication of a new chapel preached some six sermons—because I think it contains a few hints at the true exposition of a text which has been much abused by most religious teachers, and I was surprised to find that such a man as Hastings was among the abusers of this text.

H. YOUNG.

Pittsfield, N. H., Aug. 14,

PITTSFIELD, Aug. 9, 1867.

BR. HASTINGS:—It may seem out of place for me to write you, as I am about to do, and this unpleasant task would be declined if duty did not require it.

As I listened to your several, otherwise excellent, discourses, while you were at our place, and while reading many of the hundred tracts we bought of you, we noticed one text more frequently quoted than any other, and always quoted wrong. The text is Heb. ix. 27. It begins with the words, "And as," and ends with only a colon mark of pause, and the verse following it begins with "so," thus showing that this is a text which should never be quoted separately from its connection. But we do not particularly find fault with its separate use; but with your wrong quotation. Now, in speaking and writing this text, you frequently leave off the two first words, and you always change the word "men" into man, and end the verse with a full pause, thus—"It is appointed unto man once to die, but after this the judgment." But the true reading is as follows: "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment." Now, sir, all this must not be; the plural noun "men," in the text must not be changed into the singular noun "man," for this would give this text too wide a sweep. This singular noun, without an article to limit it, would of course be taken in its widest sense, and so the entire race would be then embraced. And I have no doubt but that this is your intention and view of the subject: and it is to correct this view that I now write, or at least, to show you that you cannot have this text to support your view of a general judgment of men who have been once dead. And, my brother, can you fail to see that you have not yet altered this text enough to fit it for the use you would make of it? I have gathered from your many writings that you believe the wicked will die twice: that their first death is a total cessation of life and being, and that their second death will be a final—as well as total—extinction of being. Now, then, you will see that this text, before it is fit for your use, must be made to read something as follows: "It is appointed unto wicked men twice to die, and between their deaths their judgment." But had we not better let this text stand unchanged in its own connection, and let it teach us just what its author intended it to teach? which is that the "men," in this verse, are priests after the order of Aaron; and let this text and its whole connection teach us that as the death of these priests was a divine appointment, and that after they had entered the most holy place, "with other blood," (which was yet but a symbol of their own, as well as of blood more precious than either their own or of bulls and goats,) I ask, why not let this text with its connection teach us, that as these priests by this symbolical death were fitted to judge the waiting people of their time, "so" Christ having "once" died, shall come again and judge and acquit his people who look for him? Tell me, brother, why not let this text teach us this? Why, by changing it and wresting it from its connection, try to make it teach what neither this nor any other text of scripture was ever designed to teach? Can we expect our preaching and writing will be profitable to the hearers, unless we speak and write according to the oracles of God? Why, sir, your hearers will be "able to gainsay and resist" much of what you say, unless you are more careful to "speak according to this word." The world is in darkness, and perishing for want of light. But we shall do nothing, as religious teachers, to remove this destructive darkness unless we speak according to God's word; "for if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." We may think that what we speak is truth, and so think we are giving light to the world; but we must, by a careful examination of the word, and by the witness of that Spirit which indited the same, know that we speak only "the things that become sound doctrine." This is the high privilege of every one who is sent of God to preach his word, and when they fail to speak thus they are his servants no longer, but only servants of those they speak to please.

Respectfully,

H. YOUNG.

ABOUT MISSOURI.

BY CATHARINE C. WILLIAMS.

BUTLER, Bates Co., Mo., Aug. 1, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—The letter I wrote you after we had been in our Missouri home a while, I learned, afterward, was published. I found it out by receiving letters from different patrons of the HERALD, asking information about this distant region. My paper was then sent to our late home in Iowa; so I did not see it. I answered all the letters received, though, not having lived here long, I felt to speak with reserve, not knowing how experience would lead to decide. It will soon be a year since we left Iowa, but the North has not ceased to be very dear. However, so for as the country is concerned, I can truly say, it is a fair country. The season thus far has been very favorable to the the growth of crops, likewise very healthy. Still since August came in, some sickness of a bilious nature is around. We have thus far escaped, I am thankful to be able to state. Thus far I think the summer has been more beautiful than our northern summers. I have not realized anything like the unpleasantness expected from the annoyance of insects and vermin. Though living near the edge of timber, we are comparatively free from such pests; as much so as ever at the North, with the exception of wood-ticks, so called; they are quite numerous, but not very annoying. On the whole, I think it preferable to the North in climate and productions. It is filling up very rapidly with a tolerably fair population. It is a good deal to be delivered from the dread of northern winters; but whether this deliverance, not only for human but brute kind, and some other considerations, will counterbalance the opposite scale fully, must be left to time and fuller experience to decide; and every one who proposes to make the trial, must do the same. I should not like to decide for them.

PAYING DEBTS.

One of our religious exchanges has the following strong remarks on this subject. They drive the nail to the head and clinch it: "Men may sophisticate how they please. They can never make it right, and all the iniquitous laws in the universe cannot make it right for them not to pay their debts. There is a sin in this neglect as clear and as deserving church discipline as is stealing or false swearing. He who violates his promise to pay, or withholds the payment of a debt when it is in his power to meet the obligation, ought to feel that in the sight of all honest men he is a swindler. Religion may be a very comfortable cloak under which to hide, but if religion does not make a man deal justly, it is not worth having."

The Jaffa Colony.

The last scene of that fatal delusion, the colonizing of Palestine, we trust, has been witnessed in the cry of distress just sent over to this country by the survivors of the ill-starred project of setting up a colony at Jaffa, to which we have several times already adverted, and from its conception, in protest to it as a dangerous undertaking to the well-being of all engaged, either as emigrants or as backers of the project. In their address calling for aid to deliver them from their state of suffering that they may return to their old home, they give an account of the manner they were drawn into the scheme. There were about 150 persons, 17 of whom died, the rest, excepting 16, including Adams' family, have already got back, or are seeking so to do. They say—

"The originator of this emigration scheme is one G. J. Adams, the President of the colony of the 'Church of the Messiah,' a so-called church founded by him. He always pretended great enthusiasm in all that concerned Palestine, and used all his powers of persuasion to teach us to believe that its restoration to fertility, wealth, and glory had begun. One year previous to our departure for the Holy Land, we authorized and paid Messrs. Adams and A. K. McKenzie to visit Palestine for the purpose of examining the condition of the country, its government and people, and with the strictest truth and conscientiousness to report all they had seen with their own eyes and heard from the best authorities among the residents there, so that we might be able to judge whether we could obtain a livelihood or not, before we risked all in such an enterprise. Mr. Adams, on his return, gave us the most wonderfully glorious and brilliant accounts of Palestine, telling us exactly the contrary of the real truth, which he had wilfully refused to see and hear while travelling in this country. Beguiled by his delusive reports and influenced by his constant exhortations and fair promises, we made immediate preparations for our voyage hither. Leaving our comfortable homes and dearest kindred, selling all our property on his peremptory injunctions, mostly at half price, and depositing nearly all of our money in his hands, as he required, for providing land and all the necessaries for our settlement in Palestine, on the 11th of August, 1866, we set sail from Maine (America) for Jaffa (Syria) where we arrived September 22 following."

After depicting the harrowing scenes of sickness, death and destitution through which they had to pass, beside learning they could not cultivate the soil there to get back the seeds they planted, they beg the sympathetic to extend relief to them ere they perish, and say:

"May the Lord bless our poor words, and open the hearts of many that they may give freely whatever they can spare to relieve their brethren in need. Truly, the Lord will reward them abundantly, and their memory shall be cherished by a grateful people. A list of the gifts and names of the contributors will be published.

"Charles Hale, Consul-General and U. S. Agent for Egypt, H. V. Beaubouchér, Consul-General at Jerusalem, (Syria,) H. Loewenthal, U. S. Vice-Consul at Jaffa, J. A. Drisko."

PITTSFIELD, N. H., Aug. 18, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—I had hoped to be able to attend the anniversary meeting at Wilbraham this year, but concluded that I must save the expense of this so as to be able to do as much for the support of the HERALD as possible, out of my limited means and adverse circumstances. I am, if possible, more interested in the truths it promulgates than ever before. But am decidedly of the opinion that this medium of truth will never become self-sustaining, much less "highly remunerative," unless it shall abandon the truths it now advocates, or shall refuse to advance as new truths present themselves. But my prayer is and ever shall be, Lord, save the HERALD from such a fate! God's means are ample; he can and will support his own cause. I shall order two copies of vol. 5; one for myself, and one for John Tucker, Pittsfield, N. H., for which I shall pay the same as last year, five dollars each, half of which I now enclose.

The present Pope has surpassed all his predecessors in the number of saints he has canonized.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 21, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Paper Next Week.

It has been usual to omit the issue of our paper the week following our anniversary; but we shall not this year; yet it may reach you a day later than usual. We know that many of our friends, who cannot be with us on Friday next, will be anxious to hear of the result of our meeting, as it is evident a deeper interest is felt for the paper this year than ever before. All seem to feel that the HERALD OF LIFE must be sustained; and from present indications there seems but little doubt that it will be. Let all its friends, therefore, gird themselves to work and pray for it in earnest. Be resolved that its subscription list shall be doubled to commence the fifth volume, the first of October. It can be done. Let each of its friends say, IT SHALL BE, and we shall not be disappointed. Farewell till next week.

Self-seeking.

The Apostle to the Gentiles once made the sorrowful complaint, "All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's." Phil. ii. 21. This declaration was not absolute, for he makes an exception of "Timotheus." That such should have been true of most professed ministers, in Paul's day, seems strange. Men charged with a mission, before which an earthly monarch's position is as the small dust of the balances, belittling themselves and their high profession by making it an occasion to exalt themselves, or to serve their selfish ends, is such a monstrous sin as is most unaccountable. Let us all see to it that we are purged from every taint of such an abomination. Even "Christ glorified not himself to be made a high priest." How much less should any of us seek our own glory or self-exaltation. Let Christ be in the fore-ground of all we do or say; and let us "abstain from" the very "appearance of evil," by seeming, even, to be "seeking our own" instead of "the things which are Jesus Christ's." Time is short: the Judge standeth at the door. Soon our state for eternity is to be fixed. O, let us keep Christ, his name, his cause, his glory, his reign and kingdom always so in view as to sink ourselves to a willingness to be even a door-keeper, if Christ may be honored thereby.

No Holiness without Honesty.

"The Earnest Christian and Golden Rule," is a Monthly Magazine specially devoted to the promotion of holiness. In the August No. we find the following Editorial remarks:

"The foundation of personal holiness is righteousness. Unless based upon this, it can never stand. No amount of appropriating faith can answer as a substitute for personal integrity. You must be honest if you would be holy. If you have property in your possession, dishonestly obtained, there is no use in your attempting to 'claim the promises,' unless you do the best you can to make restitution. All the praying that all the saints can do in your behalf, will never induce the Almighty to honor the claim. This is also true, if through bigotry, or party zeal, or prejudice, or misrepresentation, you have taken a wrong position against another person, and thus injured his reputation or crippled his influence."

In the sentiments of the foregoing extract we fully concur. We fully believe "You must be honest if you would be holy:" and no profession of holiness is of any value where strict honesty is lacking. With the above statement of the EDITOR of The Earnest Christian and Golden Rule, we were not a little amazed that he should select and place in his magazine such an article as the following:

"THE SLEEP OF THE SOUL."

The dreary thought of sleeping after death till the day of judgment—the idea that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob became insensible at death, and that the last thing which Jacob, for example, knew, was Joseph's kiss, and the next thing he will know, will be the archangel's trump, the interval of many thousand years being a perfect blank in his existence—is so unlike the benevolent order of God's providence in nature and grace, that it can not gain much credence with the believers in the simple representations of the Bible. What a mockery Elijah's translation seems upon that theory! Whither was he translated? Did the chariot of fire, and the horses of fire, convey him to a dreamless sleep of a thousand years? Was that pomp, that emblazoury, all that fiery pageant, a deception signifying nothing but that the greatest of earthly prophets was to begin a stupid slumber, which, this day, under a heaven with not one redeemed soul in it, and in a world where there is everything to be done for God and men holds him and every other dead saint in a useless suspension of their consciousness, and, indeed, for so many ages, annihilation?—Watson.

What we specially call attention to is, the unfairness and "misrepresentation" of this article. Shall we call it wilful? We dare not, because that would be to "judge" our brother by presuming him to be more knowing than he really is. But we fear such a statement may have been made "through bigotry, or party zeal, or prejudice, or misrepresentation;" for it certainly has "taken a wrong position against" believers in the sleep of the dead. What has the case of "Elijah's translation" to do with the state of the dead? The topic with which the article starts is "sleeping after death." Did Elijah die? Was he not—like Enoch—"translated that he should not see death?" What right, then, has an "honest" man to introduce his case to ridicule those who "honestly" believe the scriptures teach that "the dead know not anything;" that "the dead praise not the Lord;" and that "in death there is no remembrance of Thee?"

"What a mockery Elijah's translation seems upon" the "theory" that "the dead know more than all the world," and that "the disembodied soul is more free out of the body than in it." What did Elijah gain by a translation, not to see death, if he would just as certainly have been consciously with the Lord without his body as with it? Why this parade of surprise about Elijah's case, as if our view of the sleep of the dead involved the sleep of one "translated that he should not see death?" Is that "honest?" It certainly does not import intelligence in him who uttered it, nor in those who repeat or indorse it.

If such a course has been taken ignorantly, we shall expect to see "honesty" enough, now that attention is called to the "misrepresentation," to make confession and "restitution." Certainly God expects us not only to teach the way of "holiness," but to practice what we teach. The case of Elijah, introduced as it is, is a clear case of "misrepresentation," accompanied by ridicule altogether unwarranted; for, while we believe the dead are asleep, we never hinted that Enoch or Elijah, who are not dead, are asleep, or "in a stupid slumber."

As to the sleep of the dead saints, till Christ's return from heaven, we shall not now go into the argument; but we will say, that men might as well find fault with God's administration because they were not born some thousand years sooner, as because he lets the dead saints sleep a "dreamless sleep of a thousand years" before glorifying them with immortality and eternal life, or before Jesus fulfils his promise, "I will raise him up at the last day." Why leave his saints in an "unclothed" state, and consequently an imperfect state, for "thousands of years," if God's "benevolence" forbids their quiet and unbroken rest in a dreamless sleep for the same period? Can our opposers answer this question? The fact is, their view has a natural tendency to displace the great and grand bible doctrine of "the resurrection of the dead," by making it appear a useless affair; for, if the saints have an entrance into heaven at death, and are perfectly happy—far better off than while in the body, which was always a burden and a hindrance to their happiness—what need of the resurrection of the body? and must not the very idea of putting it on again be repulsive? Is it not a truth, that the believers in "going to heaven at death," fail to make prominent, as the apostles did, the resurrection at the last day? And do they not, also, fail to give that importance to the "return" of Christ "from heaven," that is found in all the preaching and writings of the apostles? Let "honest" men think on this neglect of great bible truths. Why is it so?

Man's Origin and Nature.

The notion that man, by creation, is possessed of an immortal entity called soul: and that he was created holy, orignally, we think, is the foundation of nearly all the theological errors and superstitions that have bewildered, blinded, and made infidels of, a large part of christendom, or those where this corrupt theology has been promulgated.

The account of man's creation, as given by Moses, is very simple and easy of comprehension; and when duly considered commends itself as the only rational account of man's origin and nature: especially when we gaze on the facts in man's death, or disorganization.

Man's origin is the same as that of any other of the animal creation. Compare Gen. ii. 7 and 19. "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground."...."And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air."

Thus it appears the origin of man is precisely the same as that of other living creatures on the earth. The only real difference is this—Man's organization made him capable of a higher intellectual development than any other of the animal creation; and for this reason he was placed at the head of all the others, and to have "dominion over" them.

As to holiness, there is no evidence in the Mosaic account that man was in possession of any such quality more than other animals. "God saw everything that he had made, and behold it was very good:" Gen. i. 31. All were alike good, but not a word of the holiness of any of them. Holiness is not a creation—it cannot be created—but it is a development. As such it can only be produced in a created being by trial. In order to its development there must be law to which the creature is required to yield obedience; and there must be intelligence sufficient to comprehend that law, without which no law can have any claim to active obedience. Where such intellectual capacity does not exist—whatever the nature of the life in possession—there can be no claim for moral obedience, and hence neither holiness nor sin has any existence in that being—the thing is impossible.

Man, of all the animal creation, alone, so far as we know, had intellectual capacity sufficient to understand law, requirement, or prohibition—addressed to mind; or a capacity to determine from words addressed to his understanding what his course of conduct should be. This capacity was the basis or foundation for the development of a moral character above that of a mere animal. But such development could not be made without a law addressed to man's intellect; and that law must be adapted to his understanding or comprehension. As yet he is but an animal, and can only be approached as an animal man. Hence the law must relate to the action of his animal nature. In harmony with his fact we find this CREATOR thus approaching him, having provided for the new formed creature "every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food." He placed man in the midst of these delights and bid him regale himself without restriction with one exception. That one exception constituted the law—a law the highest of which man's nature was then capable, and yet the most trifling that it was possible to give. This law was addressed to man's intelligence, and related to the regulation of his animal appetites; or was addressed to him as an animal, such as he really was.

Hence he was tested, or tried as an animal for the development of a moral character; which trial, if man obeyed his CREATOR, would have raised him above a mere animal—or above the government of animal appetites—and would have constituted him holy. It would have developed a mind having a supreme regard to his MAKER's will. This is holiness. Such a development would have—if persevered in—proved him worthy of continued life; hence would have secured him access to the "tree of life," and he would have "lived forever."

But a contrary development would unfit him for life by making him out of harmony with the CREATOR, preferring his own will to that of God's; hence the propriety of its being distinctly stated to the man, that if he did show himself determined to make his own will supreme he should "surely die:" discord under the government of God could not be tolerated. Everything that has life must come into harmony with God or discord be eternal. Hence, when Adam developed the fact that he chose to give the supremacy to himself, or to his animal being, rather than to his CREATOR, he, in fact, chose death rather than renounce animal gratification. Thus Adam had "life and death set before" him. He chose the latter—fell under his animal nature, and shared the fate of all other animals; but death was just as much more to be dreaded by him as his intellect was greater than theirs. Not, however, because he had any sufferings to endure "beyond the grave," for his CREATOR made no such communication to him: It was, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." So far as we have any inspired authority, such was to be the end of the animal man. In unbroken and eternal death and silence he was to remain.

In the whole account, man is spoken of, treated as, and his destiny decided as, a unit: not as part mortal and part immortal. Such a position is a pure, unfounded, unscriptural, and mischievous assumption: and has filled christendom with superstition, notions about purgatory, ghost-worshippers, worshipping the dead, spirit-rappers, doctrines of demons, and infidelity; all the natural result and offspring of corrupting the word of God in relation to man's origin, nature and destiny.

Adam's posterity are on trial as animal beings like as he was. They are indeed, under another and different dispensation. His failure was final by one transgression, and the penalty certain to follow; admitting of no remission. His posterity have been subjected to death "in hope." That is, though they die their death may be abrogated or abolished by a union with the second Adam, Jesus, the Messiah. The animal nature must be subjected, or brought under "subjection" to an intellect purified by the Spirit and word, or will of God. The dispensation we are under admits of repentance toward God for past failures, and remission of past sins, through union with the second Adam—the LIFE-GIVER—so that death may be abrogated or annulled. By this union with the second Adam the Spirit of God is received, the intellect or mind becomes in harmony with God, and is subjected to his will, denying the animal nature, keeping it under and bringing it into subjection to the will or word of God. See Rom. viii. 9–15; 1 Cor. ix. 26, 27. Thus living—thus dying—death cannot hold them; it cannot prevail to keep them under its power; they are members of the second Adam, and must share in his revival into life, clothed with incorruptibility and immortality.

It will be seen that men are still dealt with as units, and as animal beings; naturally subject to mortality, corruption and death; and that in order to escape these, the animal, or flesh, is to be mortified—made to keep its place as a servant, while the will of God is to be supreme, and the animal be made to give way wherever it sets up a plea opposed to the will of God, as revealed in his word of truth. Those who thus act during their probationary state, continue to be temples of the Holy Spirit, which dwelleth in them, and whereby they are sealed unto the day of redemption. See 1 Cor. vi. 19; 2 Tim. i. 14; Eph iv. 30. "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii. 11.

The great work of redemption is to redeem or deliver men from sin—the dominion of the flesh or animal nature, and from corruption, or death. To puzzle men with metaphysical and theological notions about immaterialism, immortal souls, undying souls, half alive and half dead, part in the grave and a part in heaven, or hell, or purgatory, and all such anti-scriptural fancies, is to "shut up the kingdom of heaven against men" by bewildering their minds, and making the impression that religion is all fancy, about which the priest alone has any concern; and in the final result to land men in utter indifference to all religion. Shall men continue to be thus deceived by traditions?

Preachers and Preaching.

[Eleven years ago we made the following remarks on the above subjects, and we see no reason to alter them to-day. There is clearly a great and pernicious evil connected with the notions and practices of many on these points in these days.—ED.]

PREACHING AND PREACHERS.—We may differ very much in our views on these topics from some of our respected brethren. We fully agree with DR. MCCULLOH, that the Scriptures do not sustain the idea of any particular "persons having a divine commission to preach the gospel," since the days of the apostles. It is setting up this claim that has exalted these self-styled "Ministers" above the bible. But says one, "The Gospel must be preached." We ask—What is the gospel? and where is it? It is in the bible, and to be found there, or it is not. If it is there, then the bible is the Minister or Preacher, and is "divinely commissioned" to make known the gospel; and to pretend that there are men specially called of God, in these days, to "preach the gospel"—as that phrase is usually understood—is to suppose the bible gospel is imperfect, and not "a sufficient rule both of our faith and practice." The claim, therefore, set up that some men have a special or supernatural "call to preach the gospel"—i. e., to travel from place to place, or to be "settled" in one place, to tell men what the bible means—is, we are persuaded, a mistaken notion; and opens the door to divisions, strife, discord, and a corrupting of the word of God.

The apostle Peter in addressing the "strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia," saith to them all—"Ye are a royal priesthood," etc. See 1 Peter i. 1, and ii. 9. Such are all true christians. No one in particular—since the Canon of Scripture was filled up—is any more a divinely appointed minister than another. All are bound to use their gifts and graces in the best and most efficient manner that their time and circumstances will permit; and each is equally bound to "provide for his own, specially those of his own house," or "he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel." See 1 Tim. v. 8.

How then can any man say, God has given him a "special call to preach the gospel," in these days, while such a work, as commonly understood, may oblige him to leave his wife and children, or dependants unprovided for, and perhaps to suffering and want? We have no faith in such calls: they are much more likely to be a delusion than a reality: and we know the idea is the occasion of much delusion and fanaticism. The experience and observation of the last twenty years have made this demonstration to our mind. These special-called preachers succeeding one another at different times and places, often times preach a gospel as diverse one from the other as the language of Babel; yet all professing they have a "divine commission to preach the gospel!" Some of them, surely, must be mistaken. All of them, we think, are mistaken in one thing, viz: the nature of their call. They have no such call from God as they suppose. Hence it is useless, if not impious, for them to blame the church, and denounce its members, for not supporting their families while they are guilty of neglecting to "provide for their own houses:" the apostle Paul saith, such "walk disorderly," and he exhorts, "that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread." See 2. Thes. iii. 6–12.

Piety is first personal, toward God. Second, social, beginning with our own households, toward which every duty enjoined in the gospel is to be strictly regarded and faithfully discharged. Next comes the relation to community around us; "especially unto them who are of the household of faith." See Gal. vi. 10. Here our obligations are mutual. Each member of Christ's body—the church—is bound to do all that his time and circumstances will permit for the edification or building up of that Church and its individual members. In the exercise of the various gifts in the body it will doubtless be found that some will possess gifts more frequently called into use than others: and the Church may desire to make use of that person's gifts more generally or constantly than consists with his obligations to his household. If this is the case, it is the duty of that body to relinquish their desire or make such provision to meet his obligation to his family as shall be satisfactory to him and them. They have no right to use the gifts God has bestowed on any member of their body so as to cause him to violate his first social relation and obligation.

But for an individual to affirm he has a supernatural call from God "to go abroad to preach the gospel," and set up the claim that the church must support him and his family or "be damned,"—while he leaves them—seems to us to be lording it over God's heritage in a way that may endanger the person's own eternal life. If persons thus go out, the church are at perfect liberty to withhold support from them, if they choose. But if these persons, or others who pretend to no such special call, are invited to visit places at a distance from their homes, then those who invited them are bound, by all principles of honesty and religion, to pay their expenses and give them an ample compensation for their time, whether they are pleased or displeased with the ministration. Not to do this would be dishonesty and robbery. But it is quite another matter when one goes unasked and uninvited. Then those who hear him must be their own judges whether the gospel requires them to help him to continue his travels.

We maintain the bible is the testimony of the only divinely called and commissioned preachers of the gospel. Where that has not been sent, let it be done; and let it preach. If men will "not hear Moses, the Prophets," nor Jesus Christ and his Apostles, "neither will they be persuaded though one rose from dead;" nor are we to expect that God will "divinely commission," in these days, a set of men to tell the people what he means by the words of life he has sent unto them. They may offer any help their time and circumstances will permit to aid in the work of leading the attention of men to the words God has given; but let them beware of claiming for themselves to be teachers by special authority, or divine appointment; such place themselves between God's truth and those to whom God has sent that truth.

Toleration and Investigation.

All men desire toleration: why then should they not tolerate others? Why abuse a man for giving up an old theory or opinion? He might as well abuse us for retaining it. If this be unjustifiable in him, it is equally so for us to treat him in that way. The man who seeks after truth, and is led to alter his opinion, and tries to give others a part in his joys, by making known his discoveries, deserves our thanks instead of our censure. He who is really deserving censure is the man who will not take pains to find truth; or having found it, will not impart to others lest he should suffer reproach or loss. It has often been the case that men kill their benefactors and reward their plunderers. The Jews killed Jesus and released a robber. Many do the same in some form or other. They blame the Jews, but act out the same spirit: it was an intolerant spirit. They would not bear to have Jesus disturb their customs, creeds, and traditions: it was bringing in causes of division, and lessening the reputation of those who wished to be thought wise and learned. He was regardless of the effect of his teaching on the established order of which the Scribes and Pharisees were so tenacious, and on which their popularity depended. He sought to make men wise and holy, though it might overturn all the schemes of the popular leaders of that age, and break down all their doctrinal theories. He proclaimed the selfishness, hypocrisy, and pride of those leaders in such a manner as roused all these unholy principles into action. They would not tolerate him, and hence put him to death. They would not endure one who boldly denounced their corruptions of truth, and sent the people direct to "search the scriptures." That would be admitting the people to some sort of independence in their theological investigations which might lessen the popular estimation of the usefulness of the Scribes and Pharisees.

We hardly need a stronger proof of the truth of the gospel history, than the fact that men now, who attempt to follow truth wheresoever it may lead—regardless of its effects on themselves among men—are treated as Jesus and his followers were by the popular leaders in their day. The treatment he met with is so perfectly like what men now manifest toward any who do not sustain their traditions or doctrines, that we cannot doubt the truth of the whole gospel history—it is natural as life: men in general never did give up their old opinions and customs without first persecuting those who have tried to bless them by showing a better and more truthful way. Jesus was a real person—he was from God—he was a teacher and regenerator of mankind—he was treated as the gospels say—he could not have been treated otherwise in such a world as this; and the gospel is as certainly true and divine as that light and truth exist in the universe. If any one would wish further proof of this, let them follow out their convictions of truth; boldly utter them, and live them out as did Jesus: let them sit at Jesus' feet and learn of him in this matter, regardless of the opinions and traditions of popular leaders and popular applause, and see if they do not become satisfied of the truth of the history of Jesus.

We do not ask you to deal in fancies, excitement, or fanaticism in any form. Be thoroughly concerned to know the truth, and soberly, but decisively make it manifest in your utterances and in your life, regardless of its consequences on your reputation and worldly prospects—make truth, the truth relating to the kingdom of God, and life only through Christ, the controlling theme, and act accordingly, and see if you are not satisfied, that whatever else may be false, the gospel of Christ is true. Live Christ-like—labor for the same objects in the same unvarying, steady, persevering course,—live simply to learn and to practice the truth, and thus honor God and bless men, and you will soon find yourself in circumstances not unlike those Christ was in—you will drink of his cup, and be a partaker of his sufferings, and share in his lack of reputation.

A clear knowledge of truth and duty will always be the result of a hearty, thorough, persevering obedience to the light already given—to the dictates of our judgment—to the revelations of truth and duty made known to us by God.

Some people are afraid to inquire after truth lest they should fall into infidelity. Such persons are already in effect infidels: i. e., are blind believers; and what are such better than infidels? He only is a true believer who is convinced of the truth of christianity in such a manner that he can give a reason, to every man that asks him, of the hope that is in him. Let our faith be founded in the wisdom and word of God, and let it go out in living action, and all the errors that have ever cursed the world will not shake it—it is founded on a rock. But if our belief stands only in the wisdom and traditions of men, the farther we keep from the light of investigation the more sure we may be of an easy down-hill journey; but it may land us into perdition. "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." "Search the scriptures." Eternal life is therein revealed, and that most of all things concerns us, who find ourselves dying creatures.

Pledges from the Far West.

[On my return home from New Jersey I found that the following letter had been forwarded to me in N. Y.; it was returned to me by Br. Storrs, unopened, and now I send it back that it may go into the paper, and stimulate others to imitate Minnesota zeal. R. W.]

LAKE CITY, MINN., July 28, 1867.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION:—The undersigned, in behalf of the scattered ones in and around Lake City who love our Lord Jesus Christ and his appearing, and look to him as their only hope of a resurrection and future life, greeting: May grace, mercy, and peace, from God our Father, through his Son Jesus, be with you at your annual gathering; and may the blessing of heaven be upon your labors. Though we cannot be with you, you have our prayers. We think there can be but one opinion with regard to the HERALD OF LIFE. Brethren, we must have it. Its weekly visits gladden too many lonely ones to let it die. We feel thankful for the noble efforts of our brethren in the East, in sustaining it thus far; and especially do we thank God for his goodness in giving our Editor health and strength for his labors. May he yet be spared to us, is our united prayer. There are none of us in this locality rich in this world's goods, but we feel like dividing our last loaf rather than see our paper die. The following sums are pledged for its support during the coming year; and all that is here pledged will be paid some time during the year.

J. M. Williss	$50
Dr. John Kelly	10
H. H. Arnold	10
Thomas Brown	5
A. G. Hudson	10
Jacob Libby	10

You can safely rely on something over one hundred dollars from this place, as there are some others I have not seen that love the paper. Yours in hope of life,

A. G. HUDSON.

Letters and Extracts.

From Eld. S. L. Walter.

GRAFTON, ILLS., August 12, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—I am quite unexpectedly at this place. I had arranged, in my mind, to have been on my way to Fulton Co., to try and do something toward making up the disappointment of the friends there, occasioned by Br. Hanford's not being able to come. I am very sorry that he can't come, for I expected to have been refreshed by his coming, comforted by hearing the word of Life, which is the gospel of God to perishing men. The promise is, that "all things shall work together for good,"etc.

The reason why I am here is, that my wife was taken ill, with bilious fever on the 3d, and has been very sick ever since; so that it was doubtful whether she would get over it. We think she is better this morning; thank the Lord for his mercies to us; and we are hopeful. It is quite unpleasant to be away from home; but our host is very kind. I hope the Lord will reward them in this life with peace, and plenty of the good things of earth, and life eternal in the new earth. I am in hopes that I shall soon be relieved from this employment of attending on the sick. Thank the Lord, that Christ the LIFE-GIVER came to give us, and all his afflicted children, a more excellent life; one freed from corruption, pain, affliction, sorrow; a life without any more death.

I preached at Carlinville, in the Court House: had quite a good hearing for the first time. Dr. C. W. Hinchman lives there, and a Dr. Lavance. He belongs to the Christian order, and is a minister, but is in the faith of "No life out of Christ;" is not quite as popular as he would be, were it not for his peculiar views, as they call them. I preached three times, about three and a half miles from town in a school house, in which the Advent Christian Church worshipped: had a good attendance. I tried to show that there was life from the dead only to God's dear children. One of the brethren said, that I ran it so close, that he should believe that the wicked dead would not live again, if it were not for that one text, "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." That text is their "Alpha and Omega." One said, if there was not a second death she would not care for the first. They were very kind, and one Br. gave me the needful to sustain my wife. It looks dark at times how we are to get along; but the promise is, "Verily thou shalt be fed." I'll trust my Father in the darkness of earth.

I am in hopes that I shall be at Lewistown, or Otto, about the 25th of the month, or where Br. Lewis may appoint. Br. Lewis can leave a note at either of the above post offices, saying where I can find some of the brethren, and where he has appointed meetings. Yours in the hope of life.

MILTON, ILL., Aug. 13, 1867.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS:—You that feel an interest in the prosperity of the HERALD OF LIFE, we would say for your encouragement that the cause is daily gaining ground. An interest in the life theme is taking hold of good minds. They are anxious to get books and tracts, such as Bible vs. Tradition, Six Sermons, Watch Tower, Life only in Christ, etc. Some of the preachers are reading; and from what we hear, if report be true, we shall have some in the field before long to help back up the truth. Some young men have become interested, and talk of posting themselves so as to preach; and we have no doubt but that the West will soon send out some as able preachers as the East. Let us be patient, therefore, and soon we shall reap, if we faint not. As it regards ourself, we feel to praise God that he cast our lot in Ills., where the life theme was not known; now there are hundreds; and we doubt not but there will soon be thousands; and, notwithstanding we have had some "hard rowing against wind and tide," we think we have about weathered the point; and though there is still opposition, it amounts to nothing, and only turns in our favor. We shall be able to send you a goodly number of subscribers for the dear HERALD OF LIFE as soon as they learn that it will be continued. O, we can't harbor the thought for a moment that it will be put to death or crippled so as not to make its weekly visits. O, no, no, brethren, you have done well in the past; and may you be filled with joy and heavenly zeal in the support of the only paper in christendom that is not afraid to speak out boldly for the truth of life in Christ alone. Br. Hanford's note in the last HERALD was a damper to us for the time being; but we know that all things work together for good to them that love God; therefore we submit to the will of our heavenly Father. Br. Walter is wanted in the southern part of the field, and the brethren and friends should see that he is sustained there; though we would be glad to have him here, for the Macedonian cry is coming from every quarter for help. The tent is here, and we shall pitch it as soon as we get help. We expect to have a three days' meeting on the land of Charles Key, on Friday, the 23d, and hold over the Sabbath, and we hope the good Lord will send some one to help.

Now, brethren, believe me when I tell you, I am with you in the good cause, resolved to spend and be spent therein. When you are gathered together on the consecrated ground, under the old chestnut tree, remember me.

From Peter Kemp.

NEW YORK, Aug. 17, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—Please find enclosed $5 to help close up the accounts of the present volume of our invaluable paper; and in view of its continuance another year I shall be most happy to contribute the same amount as last year; and, should emergency arise, I should not be backward in coming to the rescue. I have recently had an opportunity to introduce it among friends of the cause who have seen some of your writings, but had never seen or heard of our paper, from whom I am in hopes to hear a favorable report. I am really ashamed that I have been able to do so little for our paper in this way; and I mean to make such an effort as I have not yet attempted, by the help of God. I should be delighted to meet with you at our coming anniversary; but my time is not my own (in a sense,) and the season of the year forbids it in my case; therefore, I pray God that his presence may be with you, to lead and to guide you in your deliberations, to the adoption of such a course as shall be most productive of good to his people and the spread of the glorious doctrine of "Life only through Christ" to all such as by a patient continuance in well doing seek for it. Yours in hope.

From Lucretia B. Lamb.

ST PAUL, Minn., Aug. 11, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—I would like to express my wishes in regard to the HERALD OF LIFE for the coming year. I can hardly think of doing without its weekly visits, having no other preacher of the kind except my bible. I do not know of any believers in the life theme in this city aside from my children, and therefore much prize the weekly visits of the HERALD OF LIFE. I feel that it ill becomes me, who have done so little toward the funds necessary for its support to urge my own wishes; still to express them may give encouragement.

Enclosed you will find five dollars toward my number of the HERLAD and Jeremiah B. Lamb's. I purpose to send five more, the Lord willing, in the course of the year.

You can hardly imagine how much I desire to participate in the anniversary meeting—and feel to implore the Divine blessing on all that do, and that infinite wisdom may direct your deliberations and mark out your future course. The gold and silver are the Lord's, as well as the cattle upon a thousand hills; and His Spirit can awaken the heart to devise liberal things, and therefore may we seek in confidence, and rest in His power and love. How richly does the power and wisdom of the Creator appear in this beautiful country: its broad prairies, bluffs, lakes, and rivers, seemingly whisper, God made all this; and the believing heart feels to worship and adore. How discordant are the sounds of dissipation, revelry, the sight of corruption and sin every where so prevalent. The eye of faith can view this fair heritage cleansed, and the glory of the Lord covering it, as the waters of the Mississippi the portion through which they run. Thrice blessed hope. May it soon be reached. Your sister, in expectation of the coming One, who will make all things new.

From LaFayette Norris.

CAMPTON, IOWA, Aug. 4, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—Your account of the prospects of the HERALD OF LIFE has filled me with sorrow, lest it should be discontinued. O, I do hope the brethren and sisters will come to the rescue and sustain the paper in its weekly visits. I think you had better make the minimum price at least $2.50; for some, though they like the paper, will pay no more than they are obliged to.

I will pay four dollars for the next volume. I hope to do more in a year or two, when I get a little more of my farm opened. But I will not anticipate the future, but give what I can at the present. My enemies, (theological, I mean,) stir me up to greater diligence. The leaders in the different sects try to stop my mouth as much as they can; and I am called a very dangerous person, the preachers say that these professed christians who won't join any church are very suspicious characters; while I have the gratuitous information that they would not have me in their churches, for I would do them more harm than good. To-day our lesson in the bible class was on the last of Rom. vi. After the teacher had told the class what the "death" was, I desired to say a few words on the subject, which I proceeded to do in a quiet way, when I was told that I was going into litigation, and the teacher left the class; nevertheless I gave them some scripture to think upon. This is a fair sample of the way I am treated in a Union Sunday school; they try to stop my mouth entirely. My spiritual warfare, I assure you, is a difficult one. All that bears me up, is the firm belief that I am right.

I greatly desire to spread the truth, but I feel that my way is greatly hedged up. I sometimes get discouraged, and feel like giving up trying to spread the truth. My prayer is, that God may direct, and that if any in this vicinity can be reached by the truth, I may find the way to open it to their minds.

I wish you could preach to this deluded people a few sermons.

My love to all the dear brethren and sisters who love the truth.

JAMES AND REBECCA HERBERT, Herbertsville, N. J., write:—BR. STORRS: Enclosed is two dollars to help the HERALD cancel its debt, or otherwise. Tis but a little; like the widow's mite. We will send two dollars more, the last of next month, for the same purpose; this "we will do." We will also give four dollars for our paper another year. We do hope it may be continued weekly. If all Israel would come up to the help, as they did for Moses, and bring more than enough, it would be pleasing. We can't attend the meeting in person; but are with you in spirit; and shall pray for Divine assistance to aid in carrying forward the work as may best please and glorify God. May the blessing of peace and grace be with you, forever, from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Your brother and sister, waiting for the redemption of our bodies, at the appearing and kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. Love to all the beloved of Jesus.

WM. H. SPENCE, Bristol, R. I., writes:—I believe God has called you to the important work of destroying the fables of the present day, and to set up the true gospel banner of light, which alone has brought life and immortality to light; and that the whole race of Adam is mortal, and under the condemnation of death, from which there is no deliverance except through Jesus Christ, the LIFE-GIVER, the only way into a future life. I hope that your good paper will live and prosper, and not die.

MRS E. M. HOPKINS, Prattsburgh, N. Y, writes:—I feel a great interest in your anniversary meeting, and would be glad to be there, but cannot. I must content myself with praying for and doing what I can. Many are willing to read your pamphlets that treat of life only in Christ; and I have reason to think that some believe, yet are unwilling to bear the reproach attending an open confession of the truth. Still the pamphlets, I believe, are doing a work that will tell in the future; therefore I wish more to distribute. Please send me a few SIX SERMONS; and LIFE FROM THE DEAD, or the Righteous only will live again.

Summary of News.

DOMESTIC.

The President has made a change in his cabinet owing to opposition he met with in regard to the reconstruction measure. Mr. Stanton, who favored the military bill, has been superseded by Gen. Grant as Secretary of War. Gen. Sheridan is also to be removed as one of the five Southern Military Commanders. Judge Advocate Holt is another obstacle who is to be removed and probably these will not end the number of decapitations.

The rains that have prevailed in this locality for nearly two months still continue. The most severe one occurred on Thursday of last week, prevailing over the entire Atlantic coast, and doing great damage to hay and other crops. In England there have been similar rain storms, doing immense damage to crops.

There is reason to fear a yellow fever season on the Gulf coast. It has broken out at New Iberia, Louisiana, New Orleans, Pensacola, and rages in Galveston, Texas. September is the month to be dreaded. The cholera has also been ravaging the State of Kansas, and the distant Plains.

The Jury, in the Surratt trial, stood eight for acquittal to four for conviction. Of the eight, seven were born at the South, and one at the North; of the four, two were Northern, and two were foreign born. He is to have another trial.

FOREIGN.

The question of peace or war between France and Germany agitated the Continent. Nopoleon, replying to an address from the foreign commissioners to the Paris Exhibition, again declared his wish for the "peace of the world;" but the effect of the assurance appeared to be neutralized in the minds of the surrounding peoples by the vast standing army maintained in France and the number and the efficiency of its reserves.

The French election for members for the Councils-General of the empire resulted in a heavy gain for the opposition party. Napoleon's policy toward Rome displeases Italy, and it is said that Victor Emanuel will ask for a revision of the treaty of September, 1866.

The relations between the Governments of Italy and France have for some time been unfriendly, the former having demanded explanations as to the mission of Gen. Dumont to Rome, and the speech made by him to the Antibes Legion. A Cable dispatch now informs us that Italy demands a change in the Franco-Italian Convention of September, 1864.

From the vote on the important bill concerning ecclesiastical property in Italy, it appears that only 15 votes were cast against it—a small number in a House that numbers over 440 members. As the bill virtually confiscates the property of the church for the benefit of the nation, and as the church has threatened with excommunication all who in any way aid in the confiscation of church property, the bill clearly shows to how small a number the Catholic party in Italy has been reduced.

His Imperial Majesty, the Grand Turk, has safely completed his journey through Western Europe, and reached his capital. He has already announced that the result of his journey will be the opening of an era of reforms and general progress. The first act of the new era is the refusal of the Turkish Government to consent to the propasal of the Christian Powers for an investigation of the shocking condition of Crete. It is to be hoped that the proposed investigation will now be made without Turkish consent.

Telegraphs have of late been extended in all parts of the civilized world with marvelous rapidity. The total length of the telegraphic lines of the world was, according to a German statistician, at the beginning of the past year, about 45,000 German (180,000 English) miles, of which 11,325 were in the United States, 6,062 in Germany, 4,916 in Russia, 3,998 in France, and 3,484 in Great Britain.

The English Reform bill has received the assent of the Queen, and is now the law of the land. Thus the masses of the English people see themselves, for the first time in the history of their country, endowed with the right of suffrage, and admitted to a great share in Parliamentary Government. The result of the next election will be looked forward to with intense interest.

Admiral Farragut and the ships under his command, having paid a visit to France, have now found an anchorage in Russian waters. Such naval visits used to be made by England only.

The story of the Indian famine of last year, which the English journals are now raking up, is about as horrible as anything in history. One million five hundred thousand unhappy wretches perished of starvation. Living skeletons crawled to the water's edge to drink, and fell in from sheer exhaustion. Cannibalism prevailed in every variety. An idiot was discovered dining off a dead man's body. Another famine-stricken native picked the corpse of a child out of the river, took it home and boiled it for tiffin. Mother and son were discovered feasting together on the body of a dead infant. Children, in fact, seem to have been the staple article of diet.

In the Allocution pronounced by the Pope to the four hundred and ninety Romish prelates on June 26th, he makes the following vague allusion to the calling of an Ecumenical Council: For a long time past we have had in mind a design which has already been made known to many of our venerable brethren, which we hope to put into execution as soon as we find the opportunity which we so earnestly desire. This design is to hold a sacred Ecumenical Council of all the bishops of the Catholic world, wherein, with the assistance of God, and by the union of advice and solicitude, may be formed necessary and salutary remedies for the evils which afflict the church. We have the greatest hope that by the help of this council the light of Catholic truth may be infused into the midst of the darkness which obscures souls, and may lead them, by the grace of God, to the true understanding of salvation and righteousness. At the same time the church, like an invincible army drawn up in battle array, may repulse the assaults of her enemies, break their efforts, and in triumph spread abroad and propagate the reign of Jesus Christ upon earth. The reply of the four hundred and ninety bishops on the 1st of July "expresses joy at the proclamation of the speedy assembly of the Ecumenical Council, from which the bishops expect abundant fruit."

The Life & Advent Union.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death,—3. Who will live again? These question are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy"—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS.—Price 5 cents.

No. 4. THE SOUL SAVED OR LOST. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS.—Price 5 cents.

No. 5. MORAL DEPRAVITY: by GEO. STORRS Price, 5 cents.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: or, THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTER TO A CLERGYMAN; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburgh, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for two cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but, in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent or 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

The following are 12 mo Tracts, of 24 pages each:

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

All Letters in relation to any of these works must be addressed,

GEO. STORRS,
Box 4658, NEW YORK.

Special Notice.

It will be seen that we have withdrawn from our CATALOGUE our work on "Man's Destiny;" being the Review of the "Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D.," in support of inherent immortality. We have not a copy of the work left; and the high price of paper, together with the limited demand for the work, forbid expending money in publishing another edition, at present, to say nothing of the lack of funds if we wished to do it.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchaser of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues are hereby revoked.

Poetry.

IS MAN IMMORTAL?

Is man immortal? Theology replies,
"He is, and came so from his Maker's hand,
With two-fold nature; when the earthly dies,
The form ethereal must e'er expand."

Is man immortal? "Yes," tradition cries,
"And bliss or woe eternal is his doom;
The gem must dwell in darkness or the skies,
While the frail casket moulders in the tomb."

Is man immortal? false Philosophy
Affirms he is, nor gives a reason why;
With bold assumption utters her decree—
"The soul—a part of Deity, can't die."

Is man immortal? Mesmerism, too,
Presumes at once to give the question rest,
And thinks she rends the vail that hides from view,
To hold her converse with each shadowy guest.

But ask man's nature, ask where is the part
That's proof against the universal foe?
What fraction of his being 'scapes the dart,
When the grim monster strikes the fatal blow?—

And nature sighs her answer, "there is none
Of all this wonder of creation plan,
But shrinks and shudders when the shaft is thrown,
That executes the curse on fallen man."

Then ask the Word of God, which plain reveals
That man is mortal, destined to the clay,
From whence he sprang; all that he thinks, or feels,
Or knows, to death's dark shade must pass away.

It tells us, too, that immortality
Is God's great gift, through His victorious Son,
His resurrection's pledge—that He May raise His people when He takes His throne.

A GOOD JOKE.

"What a capital joke it would be to play on the girls when they come back," said Philip to a group of boys who were standing around him. "It will be grand fun. They have gone past Deacon Frost's to look for wild flowers, so it will be nearly dark before they can get back, and as they come out of the woods yonder we can start up just from behind those low bushes and trees, and all run and shout at them. They will never suspect us, and will be frightened out of their wits. So, boys, let's do it,"

"I don't see much fun in it," said Thomas, while several of the others exclaimed,

"Hurrah! Yes, it will be capital fun to see them all run back screaming into the woods. Of course they can soon tell who we are."

"No harm done," continued Philip, "and I'd just like to pay off Tilly Morse for getting above me in the mental arithmetic class to-day. I've been head two weeks, and if she had only told me about that nasty fraction, she wouldn't have gone up head. I've been there two weeks, and tried so hard to keep there for a month."

"Tilly wants to keep head a month too," said Thomas. "I don't see the use in frightening the girls; and I'm off."

"I don't think I shall stay to hear them scream," said another; "I have heard them scream before, I believe—all of them."

This threw a slight damper upon the plan, but some were of Philip's opinion, and concluded to stay, while others sauntered off with Thomas in the direction of home, leaving their companions to while away the time that must elapse before the girls returned.

The hour, with the aid of all their amusements, seemed very long and tedious, and the sunlight with its shadows had faded before they heard the voices of the girls in the distance, and the boys grew restless and impatient.

"Pshaw!" said Philip; "let's wait a little longer. What's the use of giving up now? There, don't you hear them coming?"

The boys listened, and heard Tilly Morse's voice above all the others, singing as they came through the wood.

"There!" said Philip, triumphantly, "I told you so. Now, boys, be quiet. Here, hide down behind the trees. Don't let one be seen, for that would spoil all. Quick! they are coming. Now we will wait until they are fairly out of the woods, and then I will count three, so you all can hear, and then with one jump we will sound an awful war whoop right in their ears."

The boys heard him and obeyed. They crouched down behind the bushes, breathless. Their spirits rose at the prospect of the fun being so near at hand, for Tilly Morse's voice was still distinctly heard, and they strained their eyes through the thickening twilight for the first glimpse of the girls coming from the woods. But they did not see them, and they were stiff with cruching so low behind the bushes, every moment expecting to spring out upon the unprepared girls. The momenst lengthened, and twilight had slipped into night; the stars were out, and the girls' voices ceased.

"Some one is coming," whispered one.

Through the darkness they saw emerging from the woods a silent, shadowy, solitary figure, moving very slowly and noiselessly as it came, and as the boys gazed at it their wonder was turned to fear, and a cold shudder ran through them.

"Who is it! What is it?" whispered one. No answer was given. But as the figure came silently on, the boys saw with terror that it was moving slowly from the usual path and coming toward them.

"Boys," said Philip, "it must be the old Deacon's ghost," and without waiting to count three, he sprang up and darted off as fast as his trembling legs would carry him, followed pell-mell by his companions, who ran swiftly and silently. One ventured to look behind, and cried in terror:

"It's after us! it's coming too!" for the tall white figure had quickened its steps, and was close on the heels of the frightened boys.

Philip had been the first in the flight, but his faint heart made a weak body; his strength nearly gave out. When he found that his friends had far outstripped him, and he was the last, he called in a feeble voice for them to wait, but they did not heed, if they heard. The tall figure seemed as tall as the trees they were passing, and Philip fancied that his hand was every instant upon the point of clutching him. Again he called feebly to his friends, but each was thinking of taking first the best care of himself; and an unlucky stone in Philip's path tripped him up, and he lay sprawling upon the ground.

"Schlechtes Kind! schlechtes Kind!" said the figure, in a warning voice.

"Oh! oh! oh!" sighed Philip, shutting his eyes to keep out the dreadful sight. But a good strong arm held him, and the grasp of the substantial fingers encouraged him to open his eyes. There was something familiar in the voice, and he discovered in a few minutes that the ghost was good-natured John, the German farmer who lived with Deacon Frost.

The boys heard very soon how Thomas and the boys who had gone with him, instead of going home, had met the girls, and they, with John's assistance, manufactured the ghost, having their own fun over him, and then sending him out from the dark strip of woods, while they followed leisurely behind to witness the sensation he made, and, as Thomas said, "to carry off the wounded." It was a long time before they heard the last of the ghost story, and the lesson taught them that night was not easily forgotten.—The Methodist.

THE IMMORTALITY QUESTION.

I.—Still, inadequate, gross, grotesque, and horrible as these conceptions are, you have under them all the one idea of future unending life.

H.—But so distorted as to be a mockery, a humiliation, a sorrow—apart from the fact that we do not know how firm or broad a hold it had upon the common people. But see now, we all admit that man is capable of being made immortal, and that without any organic change. Christ only redeems from sin; he does not make an angel. Man, then, must have been originally adapted to immortality. He sinned. and thereby forfeited it. But is it strange that the tradition of his lost estate still clings to him, the ghost of his forfeited immortality still haunts him—no longer an angel to comfort, but a demon to vex? Is not this phantom of immortality which has always flitted around the grave—at best a cold, shadowy, eluding shape, a horror, and never a hope—is it not just such a phantom as we might suppose man's disordered brain would evoke? It was the devil who first taught man the doctrine of his immortality, and that in God's despite. "Ye shall not surely die." Satan tempting and man tempted put their heads together, and Hades and Valhall, the transmigration of souls, haunted houses and churchyard wraiths, are the pleasant fruits of their copartnership.

I.—But does it not seem something like a waste to have so many souls made and so few come to anything?

H.—Apparently that is the Divine way. A thousand seeds are formed for one that fructifies. Destruction walks hand in hand with production. Besides, is it any more a waste for souls to die out than it is for them to live in ever-increasing and hopeless wretchedness? Here I think the Pagans had the advantage of us. Their belief was more cheerful than ours. Their future existence was indeed only a perhaps; but future misery was involved in the uncertainty of this perhaps, for which we Orthodox have substituted—for the greater part of the world—a fearful certainty.

I.—But we do not impose it upon the world; we open wide to all the gates to heaven.

H.—Knowing that the greater part will never enter. What inroads does the church make upon the world? How much larger a part of the population of the earth is christianized now that was christianized ten, twenty, thirty years ago? And how much more is the christianized part spiritualized? Remember, the point is not now by whose fault men are reduced to eternal misery, but the fact of their being so reduced. And I maintain that the pagan no-faith here left life more comfortable than our faith. The pagans, moreover, fall back on nature. They reasoned that death was natural, and therefore ought not to be dreaded; and that whatever should come after it would be natural, and need give them no concern. They trusted the unknown God. There is something touching, sometimes almost sublime, in this sturdy if rather blind reliance—this tenacious clinging to the best they knew or could devise.

I.—Yet Orthodox society is very cheerful and often merry, and its religious life and aspiration not seldom exultant, while nothing can be more sad than "heathenesse," if we may judge from certain signs—"Atalanta in Calydon," for instance:

"Thy limbs to the leaf,
Thy face to the flower,
Thy blood to the water, thy soul to the gods who divide and devour."

And Marcus Aurelius you confess yourself has an "o'ermastering sadness."

H.—Atalanta is neither here nor there—being but a modern's imagination of the ancient—if it were not far too tragic to be a representation of the ordinary mood of the Greeks. Nor am I saying that the ancient was less cheerful than the modern, but that ancient orthodoxy as a faith was less terrible than modern orthodoxy. Believers in the latter are happy, just as far as we do not believe or comprehend our creed—which gives a large enough margin for the exigencies of ordinary society.

I.—Do you mean to say that we are hypocrites?

H.—Not at all. Undoubtedly we think we believe it. Undoubtedly some do believe it, and the joy of life has died out of them. But the great majority believe only on the utmost thin surface of their minds, with the merest hem of their soul's garments—believe so slightly that it scarcely colors their thoughts, not to say influences their life.

I.—Your positions seem to have some force, but probably it is only phenomenal. It is but an inglorious victory you can get over me; say those things to a minister, or some one who knows a great deal, and I dare say your argument would be torn into shreds.

H.—I dare say.

I.—Tell me, now, honestly as a man, and not cautiously as a controversialist, do you believe this doctrine yourself? When you began I thought you were only arguing as a gymnast—just to show how much might be said on the side of an absurdity, but you seem to be quite serious.

H.—I am quite serious, though I do not say that I believe the doctrine for which I have been arguing. But, on the other hand, neither do I disbelieve it. I will say this for it, that it offers the most satisfactory solution of the great problem that I have ever yet seen. It is the easiest way out of the difficulty. It shows how God may be just to the souls he has made, and yet it does not attempt to wash away the sins of the world with rose-water. It seems to me a doctrine perfectly natural and reasonable. It is at one with God's judgments as we see them executed. It only carries on into another world the same laws which we see operating in this. The tendency of sin is to destroy the sinner. Vice is suicidal. Evil is fate. Crime pulls down the whole man. It is not the intellect, nor the physical strength, but the character, which is the man. It is the spiritual nature which is to stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, and it is this spiritual nature which sin wars against, and perpetually and insidiously destroys. Immortality? Why, how many people one constantly sees, concerning whom the wonder is, not that they should finally perish, but that they should have been suffered to live at all. Have you not met persons who seemed to be mere chemical compounds? There is no individuality in them, no strong flavor of a soul. When their chemistry fails, they disappear. Take away the salts and gases, and there is nothing left. Their souls are but nebulæ—a fine spiritual film, which at death one imagines must simply exhale. There are others more pronounced, but with so pungent an earth-smell that we must conclude they are not yet developed out of the gnome-state into full manhood. What use they subserve, what glory they bring to their Maker beyond the beast of the field, it is difficult to see. They are mere earth-worms. All their thoughts, hopes, plans, are confined to the earth—very often to one little corner in the earth. Shrewdness they may have, and industry and all the earthly virtues. Perhaps they grow rich; perhaps they become known; but of the qualities that do not pertain to earth, of those which raise the soul into a similitude of its Maker, they have no more to all appearance, at life's end than at its beginning. Now, if a man lives seventy years without having made a start in godliness, what reason is there to suppose that he will make a start in seventy thousand years? And if a man is good for nothing in this world but to convert grain into tissue, what is there for him to do in a world where there is neither grain nor tissue? Why should they live again! It would seem to be more economical to make new beings than to make these over. I see much more reason for the resurrection of a sagacious and faithful dog than for that of his foolish and faithless master.

I.—If he could rise no longer foolish and faithless, but wise and loyal to God and man, that would be a justification.

H.—But I see no ground for hoping that, either in reason or revelation. When a man has resisted all the promptings to good which this world offers him, I do not know that there is a prospect of his yielding to any promptings to good. If Christ's sacrifice does not move him, nothing will, to my thinking.

I.—But poor people who know nothing about Christ's sacrifice?

H.—We can very safely leave them in the hands of their Maker.

I.—It seems to me we are getting into deep waters.

H.—That supposition is creditable to your penetration, for we are, and should speedily be—if we are not already—beyond our depth. So we may as well make for dry land again; but you cannot fail to see that this doctrine of eternal death marshals on its side arguments enough, both from nature and the Bible, to give it an honorable claim on every man's respect. One may not feel called upon to investigate, but only ignorance or bigotry can revile it.

I.—Now how strange it is! The caterpillars led us into all this talk of death, and yet the butterfly, Psyche, has been the symbol of immortality for thousands of years.

[To be concluded.]

LETTERS.

From Catharine C. Williams.

BUTLER, Bates Co., Mo., Aug. 4, 1867.

DEAR HERALD OF LIFE READERS, who are scattered abroad:—Being in reality and feeling so remote from you, I sometimes think I am cut off from sympathy with you, though the weekly messenger from the East serves in a measure to keep me in mind that now and then additions are made to the "little flock," and that here and there a shepherd is raised up to care for, and encourage them. It is no uncommon thing to see something so good from a brother or sister, that I feel like sitting down and writing about it to the HERALD, not only to call attention to it, but to let the writer know it is appreciated; but it is work to do it; and then, too, the thought occurs, what use will it be? So it passes. But then if all should do so, where would be our paper? where the pleasant interchange of thought and feeling? and how should we know the cause so dear to us is slowly, though surely, gaining ground, and working its way toward sapping the foundations of those sacred beliefs (really, theological monstrosities) which it is so desirable should be numbered with the things that were? Such a work, without reflection, seems a thankless, hopeless task; and such, no doubt, the multitude regard it. And how can it be expected that poor, weak, blind mortals should regard it otherwise? Then, what an attainment is it to come to love truth well enough to seek for it, and to comprehend the principle on which it is based; and that done, to maintain and defend it in the Spirit of him who stooped so low, to eventually ascend so high. What else but "the joy that is set before those" who win by standing by principle can strengthen and inspire one to cope with such a vast majority in point of numbers? In order to experience the full benefit of this inspiring agency, one must needs be intrenched in impregnable positions. If there is a weak point, certain it is it should be looked to. Perhaps the reader will not know what is intended by the above. It is this: It is nearly twenty years since I first heard of, and became interested in, the doctrine of the non-immortality of the finally impenitent. Like Luther, when he first began to see, it was only one point, without considering it would affect the entire Catholic Creed. This was subsequently discovered, as step by step the principle on which he started was brought in contact with what he had been taught to fondly cherish as truth. This seems to have been, in the past, and still is, the case with all. The bearing of the principle of "No life out of Christ" does not seem to be discovered at first; not till the principle is carried out, and step by step, one cherished position after another is assailed. But I could not rest till its workings were known, and the principle could have an established course, from centre to circumference. It may be an encouragement to some to know the plan adopted to find out solutions to such questions as must and will inevitably arise in the mind of every truth seeker, I believe, viz.: The resurrection, who are the subjects of it? The judgment, whether it is a judicial or only an executive tribunal: the personality of the devil, etc. The first thing was to take the simplest statements on every given point; try and understand them; then explain the difficult by the simple. Next, to reason from things I did know, to things I did not, and could not, know any other way. Thus I was enabled to solve many a difficulty, till at last the scheme of salvation stood out in glad, glorious, unmarred proportions; a scheme worthy the Almighty Ruler of the world, and that needs only to be comprehended to be seen to be perfect; and, as such, "worthy of all acceptation." And is it so, that the HERALD OF LIFE is the only paper advocating life by a resurrection from the dead to the righteous only? It should not be so. Let the principle contended for have its legitimate way and sway, and it will sweep away all such fallacies as being made alive for no other purpose but to die again, sooner or later. The reply of an intelligent Universalist woman, when in the early stage of investigation, before either thought or reasoning had been employed, I advocated the common view, is worthy of consideration, viz., "God never does anything unnecessary." After a time I came to see that we might as well expect life in "a branch severed from the vine," as life from the dead any way, to those who died in their sins, and consequently without any union to him in whom alone is life. David says such are "laid in the grave like sheep.... they shall never see life." And Jesus, long after, reiterated the same idea. It is philosophical as well as in accordance with the principle; so why not cease to cavil about it? So of the judgment to come, Jesus says, "He that believeth not is condemned already." Then what remains but to execute the sentence, unless the criminal is pardoned, and the sentence is consequently revoked. So of the devil. Why not put a few simple things together and learn from them what foe we really have to face and fear? It is said of the "Captain of our salvation," "He was tempted in all points like as we are," etc.; and further, it is said we are servants of whoever we obey, whether of sin unto death, or obedience unto righteousness. If sin is our master, death is the wages; and vice versa. "Lust brings forth sin; and sin brings death." Now apply these simple statements (which accord with the experience of all, I have no doubt) to Jesus' temptation, and believe, as I can and do, that he was tempted as we are, and we as he was, and the account of it will be intelligible and explicable, without resorting to a solution that has no counterpart in our experience. But enough; perhaps too much has been said. I see so much in the HERALD that leads me to think it is too common to try to grapple with the most difficult passages first, on the various controverted points, I feel as though I wanted to suggest reversing the order, viz, begin with the simplest, which, if adopted, I believe the result would be satisfactory. Then, too, I saw "W. M.'s" notice of the soon coming "Union" meeting, and as I cannot be there, in body, I fain would be in word and spirit. I cannot command $50 or $100 at present, as some can, but I can do something. I will take two copies of the HERALD. I hope none who engage in the conflict will fail to put on the right armor, and be very careful first to find out what is truth, and then "speak it in love," and so shall the meeting, I hope, be blessed to the spreading abroad of the gospel of peace on earth and good will to man.

PITTSFIELD, N. H., Aug. 9, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—As I am studying the Book of Hebrews, as rendered in the Emphatic Diaglott, I wish to copy from chap. x. 26–29, and ask some of the readers of the HERALD to answer through our paper the question asked in the 29th verse.

"For if we should voluntarily sin after having received the knowledge of the truth, there is no longer a sacrifice left for sins, but some terrible expectation of judgment, even of a fiery indignation which is about to consume the opponents. Any one having violated the law of Moses dies without mercy, by two or three witnesses; how much worse punishment do you think will he deserve, having trampled on the Son of God, and esteemed as a common thing the blood of the covenant by which he was sanctified, and insulted the spirit of favor?"

Let any one who shall undertake to answer this question, remember that there are readers of the HERALD who will be satisfied with no other answer than the true one. And we are aware that if any one shall fail to give a correct answer to this question, it will be because he will first have failed in his understanding of the nature of the death named in the 28th verse, as a penalty for the violation of "a law of Moses;" for the difference demanded in the question is between this death and the "worse," or "sorer punishment" named in the 29th verse. Mark, the question is not, Is there any difference?—for that there is a difference, is already allowed. But the question is, What is the difference?

Now if this question is to be answered at all, it can be answered only as we understand the nature of both these punishments.

We have noticed these texts and their parallels, in an article sent to the HERALD some six months since, in which we gave some short expositions of the same. But as we have not heard from said writing, do not know whether it has been received; and if it has been, we do not complain, but only wish to see this subject made more plain than we have yet seen it.

The above texts, and those like them, I have often been referred to as containing strong proof against the doctrine that literal death, such as we see taking place daily around us, is the only penalty for any, and all sin; and this has led me to a somewhat critical examination. Can I have help from the editor or readers of the HERALD?

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We think the Syriac gives the true sense of the text, and it reads thus:

"For if he, who transgressed the law of Moses, died without mercies....how much more, think ye, will he receive capital punishment, who hath trodden upon the Son of God," etc.

It is the greater certainty of the death penalty being inflicted, and not that of a worse one, that the apostle is speaking. But supposing it related to a "worse" infliction; then it was applicable only to apostate Hebrews; concerning whom, the apostle affirmed that, a fearful judgment would soon overtake them, as the national crisis was just at hand when he wrote his epistle to the Hebrews; and he reminded those who were still tempted to apostatize, that a fiery indignation was soon to fall on these national rejectors of the Son of God, and apostate Hebrews would not escape it.

NEWPORT CENTRE, VT, July 22, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—As there has been a great deal said about the personality of the devil, pro and con. I would like to suggest a few thoughts for the candid. In the first place, I will call the attention to the two seeds; "thy seed, and her seed;" Gen. iii. 15. Now, who are the "thy seed?" and who are the "her seed?" Turn to 1 Cor. xv. 45, "And so it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul," verse 47, "The first man is of the earth, earthy," verse 48, "As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy." Here is one class, or the "thy seed." Now for the "her seed." 1 Cor. xv. 45, "The last Adam was made a quickening spirit." 46. "Howbeit, that was not first which is spiritual," (or the her seed) "but that which is natural," (or the thy seed) "and afterwards that which is spiritual" (the her seed.)

Here Paul makes two classes. He makes direct reference to Adam the first seed, as he also does to Christ the second seed. We read of two classes, the children of God and the children of the flesh, (or children of the evil.) "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the spirit is spirit." John iii. 6. Now turn to Mat. iii. 7. "O generation of vipers," etc.; also, xii. 34. "O generation of vipers, how can ye," etc.; also Math. xxiii. 33. "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers." See also Luke iii. 7. Here we find, in the above texts, the "thy seed," or the seed of the serpent. Now, who are the "ye serpents, ye generation of vipers?" They were Pharisees and Sadducees; earthly, fleshly, born of the flesh, yet claiming to be the children of God. Christ made but two classes; the one travelling the straight and narrow way; the other the broad way that leads to destruction; or, in other words, the children of God and the children of the devil; which we find to be earthly, fleshly creatures; for Christ said to his disciples "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" None can dispute but what this one was an earthly man; so also that of the beloved disciple, when he said "Get behind me satan;" so also of John viii. 44, "Ye are of your father the devil." Now, were they earthly or spiritual parents, Paul says, the natural is first. In all the above texts I find nothing to require me to believe in a spiritual being or devil, so called. Well, says one, if there is not a spirit-devil, how do you account for all the evil in the world, for the scriptures say, the devil goes about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour?

Go back with me to Gen. iii. 15, and see who says he will put enmity between thee and the woman. I understand the I, in this 15th, verse, to be God, and that he puts enmity between them; and that the enmity is not between the woman and a spiritual being, or demon; but between her and the serpent; for there is no other personage recognized in the record but the serpent, the woman, Adam, and God; anything further would be becoming wise above what is written. O, let us stick to the word; for it is able to make us wise unto salvation. "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God, eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 16–23. Now I claim that man in his natural or unconverted state, goes about seeking to devour his fellow; taking the advantage in trade, lying, deceiving, robbing, fillibustering, and warring. Thus we see the enmity in the unconverted, bruising alike saint and sinner; for with them might and gain is their God. We see the other class showing their enmity, not with carnal weapons, for their weapons are not carnal, but spiritual, and mighty, through God, to the pulling down of the strongholds of sin and satan.

God help us to be of "the seed;" heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away.

Yours, striving for the truth, hoping for eternal life through Christ the LIFE-GIVER.

GENERAL GRANT'S ANCESTORS.

Noah Grant came from Scotland and settled near Coventry, Conn. He died early leaving a son, Noah, who entered the army in 1755, and was killed in battle in September 20, 1756. He left a son, Noah, born July 4, 1744, who served through the revolutionary war, and rose to the rank of captain. He migrated to Western Pennsylvania, and there married in 1794. His son Jesse Root Grant, was born in 1799, and the family moved to Ohio. In June, 1821, Jesse Root Grant married Hannah Simpson, and on the 22, of April, 1822, their son, Ulysses Simpson Grant, was born. Martha, the widow of the first Noah Grant, was married to Joshua Porter, of Salisbury, Conn., and they were the parents of the late Augustus and Peter Buel Porter, of Niagara Falls.

FUTURE RETRIBUTION.

The following extract from the remarks of the late Prof. Stuart, in the Biblical Repository, some years since, shows how a powerful mind may be exercised in endeavoring to reconcile the hopeless torment theory with the perfections of God or the felicity of the saints in glory. He says:

"That the subject is one of fearful interest, none will deny who believe in future retribution. That there are difficulties pressed by it on the mind, when one thinks of his own condition, that of his beloved friends, or of his brethren of the human race, it would be mere pretence to deny. But it is a consolation to believe, that behind any clouds, however dark, that interpose between us and the light of the sun, his beams still shine clearly. If parents, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters, must see those dear as their own life perish at last, while they themselves are saved, heaven in mercy will either extinguish their social susceptibilities, or else give them such a sweet and overpowering sense of the justice and goodness of God as shall not permit the joys of the blessed to be marred, nor the songs of the redeemed to be interrupted, with sighs of sympathetic sorrow."

Thus does the Christian mind labor in view of the God-dishonoring doctrine of future hopeless suffering. It is irreconcilable with any ideas we now have of the perfection of God or the "susceptibilities" of our natures, and so we must be transformed into stoics—made callous to all the agonies endured by "parents, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters," and friends, in order to reconcile us to their unmitigated and hopeless torture! But it is worthy of remark, that Prof. Stuart uses the term "perish." Why this? Because his mind could but revolt at the horrid idea of "endless misery," for such relatives as he had named; and he quietly slides into the scripture language. Thus he shows the power of truth on his own understanding. "The wicked shall perish; and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume: into smoke shall they consume away." Ps. xxxvii. 20. Such is "law and the testimony;" and "if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." Isa. viii. 20.

We may safely say—that no transactions will take place in the "future retributions" that saints will need to have "their social susceptibilities extinguished" to witness them. God has said, "Come now, and let us reason together." Isa. i. 18. Men may affect to despise "reason," but God does not: and he has made no threat of punishment but what he is willing should now be tested by that faculty which he has implanted in man. He calls upon us now to exercise it, and condescends, himself, to become a party in the matter. Does any man think it can ever be made apparent to reason "now"—in this present life—that the future and unmitigated sufferings of "parents, husbands, wives, brothers, and sisters," is reasonable or just? Prof. Stuart has given up that point, and, in giving it up, has stamped the entire fable of immortality in sin and suffering as opposed to God and truth; and equally so, the fable of raising up dead "parents, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters," and children, to torture and kill them again.

The late pious John Foster, minister in the Baptist church, England, makes the following remarks on this fruitless torture doctrine:

"How every hostile feeling becomes mitigated into something like kindness, when its object, perhaps lately proud, assuming, unjust, is now seen oppressed into dejection by calamity. The most cruel wild beast, or more cruel man, if seen languishing in death, and raising toward us a feeble and supplicating look, would certainly move our pity. How is this? Perhaps the character is not even supposed to be really changed amid the suffering that modifies its expression. Do we unconsciously take anything like a tender feeling, even for self, as a proof of some little goodness, or possibility of goodness? Is it for those beings alone that we feel nothing, who discover a hard and stupid indifference to self and everything beside? Perhaps any sentient being, the worst existent or possible, might be in a situation to move and to justify our sympathy. What, then, shall we think of that theology which represents the men whom God has made most like himself, as exulting for ever and ever in the most dreadful sufferings of the larger part of those who have been their fellow-inhabitants of this world?"—Mr. Foster's Journal, No. 494.

Thus the "reason" of the most pious revolts against the popular doctrine of hopeless torment. Torment is not the threatened punishment of the Bible to the finally impenitent. That idea has originated in barbarism, and was fostered and nourished by Papal blindness, superstition, and blasphemy, as a justification of her abominable cruelties. Shall Protestants still consent to wear the Harlot's attire; and charge the blessed God of truth and love with calling us to "come now" to "reason" with him, while he presents a doctrine for reason's approval, which reason cannot but reject? Is that the way to turn men from sin to God? Reason and Revelation both answer—No. The bible penalty for sin is loss—loss of life—of being. It is to come short of eternal life: "Seeing ye judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life." Acts xiii. 46. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi. 23. "If ye live after the flesh ye shall die." Rom. viii. 13. "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life." John v. 40. "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead....neither can they die any more." Luke xx. 35, 36. The wicked will not obtain that world; they come short of it—lose life—die—perish—are "destroyed forever." Such is the testimony of the bible; and with this view reason harmonizes.

The love of God in the heart must lead men to doubt the truth of the doctrine of hopeless misery, or, if still retaining that doctrine in their theology, they are subjected to an anguish of spirit as unlike anything seen among the apostles, as torment is opposed to rejoicing. As one more illustration of this fact, we present the following from the "Practical Sermons" of Rev. Albert Barnes, Philadelphia, whose "Notes" on the Bible have been so highly esteemed. Pages 123–125 he says:

"That the immortal mind should be allowed to jeopard its infinite welfare, and that trifles should be allowed to draw it away from God, and virtue, and heaven; that any should suffer forever, lingering on in hopeless despair, and rolling amidst infinite torments without the possibility of alleviation, and without end; that, since God can save men, and will save a part, he has not purposed to save all; that, in a word, God, who claims to be worthy of the confidence of the universe, and to be a Being of infinite benevolence, should make such a world as this—full of sinners and sufferers—and that when an atonement had been made, he did not save all the race, and put an end to sin and woe forever...., I have read to some extent what wise and good men have written. I have looked at their theories and explanations. I have endeavored to weigh their arguments; for my whole soul pants for light and relief on these questions. But I get neither; and in the distress and anguish of my own spirit, I confess that I see no light whatever. I see not one ray to disclose to me the reason why sin came into the world; why the earth is strewed with the dead and dying; and why man must suffer to all eternity. I have never seen a particle of light thrown on these subjects that has given a moment's ease to my tortured mind, nor have I an explanation to offer, a thought to suggest, which would be a relief to you. I trust others, as they profess to do, understand this better than I do, and that they have not the anguish of spirit which I have. But I confess, when I look upon a world of woe, filled with hosts to suffer forever—when I look upon friends and upon a whole race, all involved in this sin and danger, and when I see the great mass of them wholly unconcerned, and when I feel that God can only save them, and yet he does not do it—I am struck dumb—it is all dark, dark, dark to my soul, and I cannot disguise it."

Here is an honest expression of the natural and legitimate effects of the twin doctrines of natural immortality and future hopeless torment. But few ministers, whose souls are harassed and in the "dark" by these views, have the honesty of Mr. Barnes to confess it.

We have now presented our readers a short chapter on this subject, which goes to show the doctrine of hopeless torture in a future life is fast passing out of the theological world. But, with many, the scriptural doctrine of death is still overlooked, and the leaning is to restorationism, or to some other equally unscriptural mode of disposing of the plain testimony, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Ezk. xviii. 4–20.

To sweep away all those refuges of lies, let us begin with man as he is—"of the earth, earthy"—having no principle of immortality, but a probationer for it. If he persists in violating his Creator's laws, he brings on himself death—cessation of being; and that state is eternal. Such is the scripture testimony. The evidence to this point is abundant and full. "Death is the wages of sin." "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death;" and that death is eternal: hence the punishment is eternal—not torture, but cessation of being—to live no more.

OUR EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

London, Aug. 4. 1867.

Br. Storrs:—To one familiar with the poverty of the Irish emigrant, the story of Ireland's wrongs, and the long continued efforts which have been made to secure her independence of England, a view of the country as it is, becomes a matter of great interest. From Dublin to Sligo, we watched with unabated zeal the panorama of country, village, hamlet and cabin. The bog and piles of turf, potato fields and pigs, bare-footed women and children, ragged men and donkies, impressed us strongly. A day's ride by jaunting car through the districts surrounding Sligo, revealed the hopelessness of Irishmen. Our first conclusion was, that some unseen despotic power was silently crushing the hope and life out of the people. The crumbling walls and decayed thatch of deserted cabins, the sparse population and want of thrift and activity everywhere written on the little fields, aroused our indignation for the while and caused us to wish well to Fenianism. As we moved northward, however, toward Belfast, and repeated the day's jaunt in the neighborhood of Portadown, matters wore a different aspect. It was still Ireland, poor and pitiable, but there were thrift and comfort, and in many instances well clothed men and women and pleasanter cottages. Our first conclusion, we pronounced a hasty one, and began to think that the civil power was not so much to blame as the ecclesiastical, and that the remedy for Ireland lay more in crushing the Papal power than in lifting the Lion's paw from off her green-sod. But after some days of reflecting and more enlarged observation, I freely confess that I would not like to be compelled to decide what is the matter with Ireland. Whether the secret of her degradation lies most in the character of her goverment, the mercilessness of her landlords, the influence of the Romish church, the character of her population, or the narrow limits of her territory, I cannot say. Probably a combination of causes produces the evil, and the remedy is only to be found in the establishment of that kingdom which will bring a glory to all the Gentiles. Of one thing I am now sure, that I can do nothing for Ireland, but to remember her beautiful Loch Gill, her pleasant hills and valleys and fine cities—fine in spite of bad government, bad religion, bad habits, and imposition upon strangers.

Our second Sunday was passed in Portadown. This place is under Protestant influence, and depends mostly for its present growth upon the linen manufacturers. We introduced ourselves to the Weslyan preachers resident here, and attended their religious service in the morning. They have a large and beautiful chapel recently erected at a cost of about $25,000. A Mr. Dunlap preached an ordinary Methodist sermon. In the afternoon we attended church at the establishment. Though the rector was present, the curate delivered the sermon. While listening to his interpretation of scripture, we thought there might be some truth in the remark made to us by a native. "The Irish gentleman," said he, "leaves his estate to his eldest son. The next smartest he puts in the army; but if he have a 'born natural' he educates him for the church."

In the evening the Rev. Mr. Donlap called upon us at the hotel. A long conversation ensued on scriptural topics. He could not receive the doctrine of "No eternal Life hereafter out of Christ," nor admit an idea so gross as the personal coming of Christ to establish a kingdom on earth. He exhorted us with considerable earnestness to return to our old mother, the Wesleyan Church. The conversation was protracted till nearly midnight, and gave rise to a singular episode. A gentleman was occupying a sleeping apartment adjoining our sitting room. Overhearing the conversation he came out and joined very freely in it. Our views, however, soon awakened in him a terrible opposition. He denounced them as blasphemy, and finally rising to his feet he inquired, sternly, "Do you gentleman stay here to-night?" We replied that that was our intention. "Then I shall leave" said he. "I will not pass the night under the same roof with those who blaspheme my Master." And he was as good as his word. Whether he succeeded in finding lodgings where heretics were not sheltered, we did not learn.

From Belfast we sailed direct to Glasgow. Thence to the charming lochs that skirt the Highlands of Scotland. By a little steamer, called the Prince Concert, we ploughed almost the whole length of Loch Lomond. Scarcely a breath of air stirred its cool depths. With difficulty you could detect where the real mountains separated on the shore from their reflected images. A haze like that of our Indian summer mellowed the sunlight and wrapped the peak of Ben Lomond in a golden mantle. A country seat here and there nestled among the foliage along the shore, while high above them, towered the knobbed ridges of numerous hills. We stopped at a solitary hotel on the mountain side, called Inversnaid, where we passed the night. In the long twilight, while the shadows of the peaks were creeping over the loch, we rowed ourselves across the water, here about a mile and a half in breadth, and resting occasionally on our oars, we said, involuntarily, a more beautiful spot God never made. Early the next morning, we crossed the mountains in a stage coach, and passing down a winding slope, we embarked again upon Loch Katrine in another little steamer, called the Rob Roy. The day was cloudy, and though the hills were just as picturesque and the waters just as pure, Katrine did not impress us so favorably as her sister. Another stage ride through the Trosachs to Callender, and steam from thence through Stirling brought us to Edinburgh, about 3 o'clock.

We "did" the capital of Scotland after the manner of tourists generally. We stumbled into Princes' Garden, through an open gate, hoping to find our way through it to the castle which loomed up before us on the other side. We soon found that the garden was beneath the castle and adjoining it, but unless we could scale the perpendicular rocks and tall battlements above us, we were hopelessly excluded from its walls. When we retraced our steps, the gate was locked, and we were politely informed that there was egress only for those privileged ones who carried keys. A pleasant looking Scotch lady who observed our difficulty, presently produced a key from her pocket and let us out. Though sovereigns in our own country, we were not accounted princes here. A walk around the garden and an ascent by the "Esplanade" brought us safe to the moat and draw bridge. We sauntered about sunset along the parapets, and caught through the smoke a very fine view of the old capital, on one side of the ravine, and of the new city on the other. The latter stretched away before us to the wide waters of the firth, and to the right far down to Portobello. The Mons Meg, a monster cannon of hooped bar iron, stands between two piles of stone balls harmlessly threatening the new city, from one of the highest points of the castle. To us, as novices, the inspection of a feudal fortification for the first time, excited feelings which we will fail to realize again, when we see its fellows along the Rhine. The following morning we stopped in our walk to Holyrood to look at old St. Giles, John Knox's home and the Tolbooth. In the ancient Palace of the Scottish kings we passed a dull but reflective hour. For sixpence apiece we were shown down a long gallery of the pictures of old Scottish kings and queens up unto Queen Mary's audience chamber and sleeping room, the private stairs up which the conspirators ascended, led by the Queen's husband, to murder her secretary, Rizzio; were shown the dark spot on the floor, said to have been made by the blood of the slaughtered man who fell pierced by fifty-six wounds; from thence were taken into Lord Darnley's apartments and down again to the ruins of the chapel, where we walked solemnly over the bones of buried kings and princes and abbots and bishops, who fell by feuds and conspiracies in the dark old times, which, little better to-day, we hope will soon give place to the reign of righteousness. What better are princes that their deeds of blood should be remembered, than the poor citizens of Edinburgh, who struggled to live, and died impoverished by the exactions of these same proud characters, whom we wonder at so much? From the capital by the Great Northern Railway we passed into England, and halted first at York, the old capital of this great country. Here we realized our idea of an ancient city. We walked round its old walls, peeped over the parapets, looked up at its fortressed "bars" or gateways, and marked the embrasures looped for musketry, all useless now, but preserved out of pure respect to that moonshiny thing called antiquity. The great cathedral or minster here is truly a wonderful old church, and we lingered long in nave and choir and transept, marking with wonder the great height of the ceiling, the quaint old sculpture of the organ screen, and listened to the peals of the magnificent instrument, while the vaulted ceilings echoed to the tones which blended finely with the chant of the choir and the intoned prayers of the service which was being performed in the chapel at the hour of morning prayers. "Did Jesus institute cathedral service, and command all this impressive mummery?" asked one of our number; but the question was unanswered. A tedious ride from York brought us again to London, late on a Saturday night, where we shall tarry a few days for rest and sight seeing.

Beware of the common illusion of forming your estimate of yourselves from the favorable opinions of those around you, as they cannot know the secret principles from which you act. —Dr. Alexander.

THE IMMORTALITY QUESTION.

[From Gail Hamilton's "Summer Rest:" Dialogue on Immortality. Concluded from last week.]

H. My dear are you tired?

I. Tired of what?

H. Oh! walking, for instance.

I. Not that I know of. Why should I be?

H. Perhaps you would not mind running into the house and bringing me Whately's Bacon. I had it yesterday, and you will find it lying about somewhere.

As I was curious to know what he had in mind, I brought the book, and he read the following extract from Whately's annotations to the essay "On Death."

"Most persons know that every butterfly (the Greek name for which, it is remarkable, is the same that signifies also the Soul—Psyche) comes from a grub or caterpillar; in the language of naturalists, called a larva. The last name (which signifies literally a mask) was introduced by Linnæus, because the caterpillar is a kind of outward covering, or diguise, of the future butterfly within. For it has been ascertained by curious microscopic examination, that a distinct butterfly, only undeveloped and not full grown, is contained within the body of the caterpillar; that this latter has its own organs of digestion, respiration, etc., independent of the future butterfly which it encloses. When the proper period arrives, and the life of the insect, in this its first stage, is to close, it becomes what is called pupa, enclosed in a chrysalis or cocoon (often composed of silk; as is that of the silk-worm which supplies us with that important article), and lies torpid for a time within this natural coffin, from which it issues, at the proper period, as a perfect butterfly.

"But sometimes this process is marred. There is a numerous tribe of insects, well known to naturalists, called ichneumon flies, which in their larva state are parasitical; that is, inhabit and feed on other larvæ. The ichneumon fly, being provided with a long, sharp sting, which is, in fact, an ovipositor (egg-layer), pierces with this the body of the caterpillar in several places, and deposits her eggs, which are there hatched, and feed, as grubs (larvæ), on the inward parts of their victim. A most wonderful circumstance connected with this process is, that a caterpillar which has been thus attacked goes on feeding, and apparently thriving quite as well, during the whole of its larva-life, as those who have escaped. For, by a wonderful provision of instinct, the ichneumon grubs within do not injure any of the organs of the larva, but feed only on the future butterfly enclosed within it. And consequently it is hardly possible to distinguish a caterpillar which has these enemies within it from those that are untouched. But when the period arrives for the close of the larva life the difference appears. You may often observe the common cabbage-caterpillars retiring, to undergo their change, into some sheltered spot—such as the walls of a summer-house; and some of them those that have escaped the parasite—assuming the pupa state, from which they emerge butterflies. Of the unfortunate caterpillar that has been preyed upon, nothing remains but an empty skin. The hidden butterfly has been secretly consumed.

"Now is there not something analogous to this woderful phenomenon in the condition of some of our race? May not a man have a kind of secret enemy within his own bosom, destroying his soul, Psyche, though without interfering with his well-being during the present stage of his existence; and whose presence may never be detected till the time arrives when the last great change should take place?"

I. That is very significant, but I have seen it quoted to enforce the doctrine of eternal woe.

H. It might be quoted to enforce direct taxation, or universal suffrage, or the high price of butter, or anything else with which it has nothing to do.

I. I wonder what the consequences would be, if a belief in annihilation were substituted for that of unending misery?

H. I suppose you know that question is not relevant.

I. I know that it does not concern the truth of the doctrine, but I have a right to ask it as an independent question. I fancy the first impression would be, that a restraint had been removed and that sin would revel unchecked.

H. Probably the impression would be a wrong one. It depends, of course, ultimately upon the facts. If eternal life in suffering is the fate of the unrepentant, then we must suppose the preaching of that doctrine to be the most effectual. But as that is the very question at issue, we must judge from other considerations. There is this first to be taken into account—that the human mind is unable to contain the doctrine of eternal woe. You may see a community where it has been preached from time immemorial, where the contrary has never been preached, where everybody believes it; and that community has no more received it as a part of its real faith than an infant of days. It lives in a state of soggy indifference to it. As the ancient drew calmness from nature, so the modern draws calmness from a certain dogged trust that he shall do as well as his neighbors. His belief in eternal torments produces no appreciable change in his life. He does not think himself a christian, but believes he shall somehow get to heaven when the time comes. A congregation will listen to a sermon of the most solemn warning, one that points out with tenderness, with real power, and perhaps in a truly christian spirit, the sure doom that awaits the sinner. There will not be a word of cavil, nor a thought of opposition. The congregation will be attentive and hushed—and will go home in an hour's time as "chirp" as crickets, and look after their farms and merchandise, next day, as eagerly as if hell was not supposed to yawn before them.

I. Yes, I remember such sermons when I was little, and they generally ended with the terrible assurance that some of us might die that very day. Nobody could tell who, but I always thought it might mean me, and was badly scared. I remember how I used to watch the clock, and think every time it struck, "Well, I'm not dead yet." Every hour I lasted over was so much clear gain, and I was always so glad to wake Monday morning and find I was alive after all. As I found I never did die on these occasions, I rather got used to it after a while, and took it as a matter of course.

H. I suspect that is the general result of preaching righteousness through fear of death. But suppose any member of this congregation knew that his wife or his neighbor was in the next house, burning in a fierce fire, yet never to be consumed, would he be able to eat his dinner and drive his team and be interested in prices? Yet we profess to believe, and fancy we do believe, that a very large number of our kinsman, neighbors, or acquaintances are in this condition. Rev. Justin Doolittle, who ought to know, says that a few hundred individuals, actuated by the love of money, are annually doing very much more to demoralize and destroy the Chinese than all christendom, constrained by the love of Jesus, are doing to benefit and save them. A few gentleman in New York make up a purse of a hundred thousand dollars for General Grant, and we hardly hear of it, but all the Congregational christians of the North, after beating the drum and blowing the trumpet for months, after appealing to all the power that lies in simultaneous action and in the associations of a great historic day, can barely raise a hundred thousand dollars to build up the waste places of Zion in our own country.

I. We do more than any other denomination, though.

H. That is not to the purpose. Notice what we do in connection with what we declare ourselves to believe—how much of faith in eternal torment we show by the efforts we make to snatch the world from it.

I. Oh! we are so constituted that we cannot realize the idea. There would be no living if we could.

H. That is just what I say. And the question is, then, Is that doctrine likely to be true, which is so dreadful as to be intolerable? Is not the fact that the human mind instinctively, though unconsciously, rejects it, dulls its edge, gets over it or round it in some way, an indication, at least, that it is not a true doctrine? How can that have a practical bearing on life which must be dismissed before life can be endured? In human society it is well known that undue severity defeats itself. If a too heavy penalty is affixed to a law, the jury fails to convict, and guilt and innocence go alike free. A moderate punishment, sure to be inflicted, is far more efficacious in repressing crime than an immoderate one from which there is a probability of escape. So here the punishment is so overpowering that the mind is forced to reject it, and rejects along with it all punishment whatever. Add to this a something arbitrary and extrajudicial in the popular notion of future punishment and you have at once an explanation of its futility. But let men be taught, with a stern simplicity, that the laws which they see working around them and in them are eternal laws; that if they live like beasts they shall die like beasts; that where their treasure is their hearts are; and if they set their hearts on things of time and sense only, time, sense, and heart will perish together—and I think they would begin to reflect; for love of life is strong, and loss of life a most bitter loss.

I. Yet if all this is true, how comes the popular doctrine to have been the popular doctrine so long? Would God let the truth lie lost and error so prevail?

H. He let the good and gentle Queen Isabella, a lover of truth and of her country, crush the one and curse the other for centuries, with the yoke of the Inquisition. Why was the good and great Marcus Aurelius suffered to approach only to repress that christianity whose spirit was so in unison with his own, and of which he who so eminently fitted to be the apostle before the world?

I. Matthew Arnold asks the same question.

H. But does not answer it, I venture to say, for it cannot be answered. It concerns some principal of the Divine economy which we have not yet discovered. All our attempts to explain it reveal the limits of our own powers, but cast no light on the unknown foot-steps of God. In his name be our final trust--God the Good.

"Satisfied."

"As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake with thy likeness." Psa. xvii. 15.

SATISFIED. Who of all the masses that move o'er our world can say they are satisfied? All are reaching forward, eager in pursuit of something to satisfy; but when obtained the object of their pursuit (satisfaction), like the rainbow, is still before them; and pursue it as they may, it is never attainable in this life. Yet man who possesses hope will ever seek its gratification; and the reason is, his constitutional organism prompts him to do so.

Satisfaction only is attainable as we put on Christ, or become like Christ. This is commenced here by faith, but the reality is at the resurrection. "As we have borne the image of the earthy we shall also bear the image of the heavenly."

Of the blessedness of that state we purpose a few words. Here let our aspirations be as holy as they may, and let us enjoy the fellowship of saints as perfectly as we can, yet we find sin marring, and causing sighs and tears; we are not satisfied: but when we awake with his likeness, no jar, no discordant note shall ever be touched. The society of the blessed will experience no misgivings, no fear of misplaced affection, but a freeness and fulness of love expressed by the word satisfied. All the demands of our immortal natures (for we surely shall have wants then as well as now; for immortality is not to change us so as to affect our identity physically or morally. Jesus was the same Jesus after his resurrection as before: so shall his children be the same men and women then and there as now and here, but we) shall be satisfied; the fleshly shall have given place to the spiritual, the divine nature. The flesh is never satisfied; but the spirit ever, always, has its fulness of bliss in the perfect obedience of its loving God. Whatever or however we may conjecture, as to the saints' employment, we have the pleasing assurance of a perfect satisfaction; the cup of bliss is ever full. This in fact is what distinguishes that state from this. Here nothing satisfies. There everything. This satisfaction may result from three causes: first, a perfection in the objects of enjoyment. Second, a perfect understanding of the laws of things; and third, a perfect submission to those laws. Ignorance is the cause of much misery here, even among the best designing. There we shall know as we are known; no uncertainty, no doubt, no hesitating; all, all is clear, and we are satisfied.

Dear saint, ever longing for rest, consider not the scenes and associations of earth as all to be obliterated, but perfected. There will doubtless be a similarity, as type and antetype; but the glory of the one will so far outshine the other that these "shall never come into mind;" or, more properly as the margin reads, "come upon the heart," (be desired or thought of with regret.) Isa. xlv. 17.

Yes, these holy desires and affections are to be satisfied. Sin is so mixed in every department of society, that the most holy feel under bondage to the elements of this world in a measure. God's people are "called unto liberty; yet not to use that liberty for an occasion of the flesh, but by love serve one another;" "hoping for the grace which is to be brought unto us at the revelation of Jesus Christ." Then shall we be "satisfied when we awake with his likeness."

The Mission Tent.

OCEANPORT, N. J., Aug. 25, 1867.

"If the Lord will" there will be a meeting in the "Life and Advent Mission Tent" (for so have we named it) in EATONTOWN, commencing Thursday, Aug. 29, and holding over the Sabbath.

Also, at KEYPORT, commencing Thursday, Sept 5, holding over the Sabbath.

At Keyport we expect there will be board near by the Tent at 75 cents, not to exceed $1, per day, for those coming from a distance. Let those bring blankets; then they can sleep in the Tent.

The cheap access of Keyport from New York offers an inducement to as many as can leave for a little season. There will be room for more tents if any wish to bring them. We trust the friends generally will try to be there. This notice will serve, also, for Ocean County and the southern part of Monmouth.

BR. WENDELL, having deferred his visit West, for a few weeks, will take the leading part in these meetings, and perhaps extend his labors to FREEHOLD and TRENTON of this State.

ANNIVERSARY PROCEEDINGS.—There is neither time nor space this week for further particulars of our doings at Wilbraham than have been furnished by the Editor and Br. Grim. An article by Br. Macdonald, and the Secretary's report will appear next week. Meanwhile let all our friends thank God and take courage, and enter with new zeal upon the work of increasing the circulation of the HERALD OF LIFE, and of spreading the doctrine of Life only in Christ. Never before has there been so much encouragement for faithful and earnest effort.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 28, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Progress.

Our fourth anniversary is past, and we are enabled this week to announce to our readers the general result. The feeling manifested with regard to keeping the HERALD OF LIFE in the field, was so strong, and so unanimous, that there was no mistaking it: there was no dissenting voice on this question; nor, in fact, upon any other question which came before the LIFE AND ADVENT UNION: the most perfect harmony prevailed. Our meeting was the best we have ever had, and the pledges to sustain "our paper" exceeded by seven or eight hundred dollars any that have been made at any previous meeting. We all thanked the LORD and took courage. The way is still open for those who were deprived of the privilege of meeting with us, to send in their pledges or donations to help on the good cause we are engaged in promoting. That the cause is making progress, no longer admits of a doubt, and that it will continue to do so, under the Divine blessing and guidance, is equally clear. Those who hold back in aiding it, now, will soon find themselves so far in the back-ground that it will take a mighty effort for them to overtake the train before it reaches its heavenly destination. We invite all to take hold, at once, and help on the car, laden with the precious truth of "Life only in Christ," and that death, unbroken, is the wages of sin to all who refuse or neglect to come to Christ, the LIFE-GIVER, as "The Resurrection and the Life." Delays are always dangerous; but never more so than now. Soon our time and opportunity for work will be over; and who does not wish to share in an abundant harvest, shortly to be gathered in and shouted home? Let us work, then, while it is day, lest we have to beg in harvest and have nothing.

To Subscribers.

Three numbers more complete volume iv. Lest any should misunderstand or forget our course, with all subscribers, we repeat what we have often stated before, that when the time has expired for which the paper is paid, it is our rule to discontinue sending it. This rule applies to all alike, or without discrimination. This course has been adopted for several reasons. First: Our paper cannot be published without funds. Second: We do not think it right to run any one in debt to us, without their consent. Third: We abhor sending a dun to any one, and we shall not do it. If you wish your paper continued, when your past payment is exhausted, you must notify us, either by sending a new remittance, or informing us that you will do so in a short time. Do not neglect this matter. And as we shall begin to regulate our mail books immediately for volume v., it is exceedingly desirable that you inform us now, whether you intend to continue your subscription: especially all of you whose subscriptions terminate with the present volume.

We hope you will all continue; and why not try to get us at least one new subscriber, each, so as to double our list to commence the new volume? If you mean to do this, do not lose a day in beginning the work; otherwise we may not be able to furnish the first number, as we shall, probably, issue that a week prior to its date. Now, if you cannot do anything else for the paper, give us a few days of your time to increase our subscribers.

Our Anniversary.

FROM JACOB GRIM, PRESIDENT OF L. AND A. U.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE, Greeting:—Our annual meeting was to have been held under the old "Chesnut Tree," the place that gave birth to the HERALD OF LIFE, but owing to the storm that was prevailing at the time of our arrival on the ground, and which continued during the whole day, it was impossible to hold it there. We were for the moment somewhat discouraged at the prospect before us, the rain coming down in torrents. But in the midst of the rain our friends proceeded toward the ground. Arriving at the camp ground, through the kindness of the brethren of the "Time" tents, we were offered the use of one of their tents, which was thankfully received. Its capacity was sufficient to hold, in the manner we were packed in, upward of one hundred persons. We met in the morning about 9 1-2 o'clock, and held a preliminary meeting, in which many gave in their experience in relation to the life views. It was one of the best meetings we ever attended. There was but one spirit manifested throughout the whole meeting, which lasted about two hours and a half. There was no wrangling, no discordant feelings; but one spirit and that was, The Paper, and the Truth it promulgates, must be sustained. We met again in the afternoon, but found the tent entirely too small; many stood around the door on the outside of the tent, while many more would have come in if there had been room.

After the election of officers, which occupied but a few moments, the question came up, Shall the HERALD OF LIFE live? and what can be done this afternoon to sustain it? A resolution was offered and carried, without one dissenting voice, that we raise the sum of $2,500, including subscriptions already received, amounting to $700. The secretary announced his readiness to receive the names of those willing to sustain the paper. At this point a spirit of anxiety seemed to prevail in the whole assembly. Casting our eye over the company, we could read many anxious faces, waiting to know what would be the result. This did not continue long. Pledge after pledge was made, until $2,300 was subscribed on the ground. When we reached this point, it was announced that our meeting must come to a close, as the friends wanted their tent to prepare supper in. So we were compelled to come to a close, although we felt satisfied if we could have continued a short time longer we should have received the whole amount of $2,500. Beside this, we received many new subscribers; friends came in, saying, the doctrine was new to them, and they wished to hear and read something on the subject. Many inquired if there was to be any speaking on the subject. Feeling the necessity of a place under our own control, in which we could take our time for deliberation and speaking our views, a committee was appointed to make such arrangements as may be needed to meet the wants at our next meeting.

And now we would say to our friends scattered abroad, who were not able to be present with us, it was determined that the HERALD OF LIFE shall live; for we all felt more than ever that the Lord was with us, and He means the world shall have this truth, and is raising up friends all over the country. And in order not to slight any of you who were not present, we would say, it is the desire of the friends to make up the sum to $3,000, to include a fund for publishing tracts for distribution. Now friends do not be backward and think that while others are willing to do and sustain the paper, there is no need of your doing anything. Do you love the truth? How much has it benefitted you? and are you now not willing to do for others what some one in the past has done for you? that is to send the light to others, as some on has sent it to you. These are questions we wish each subscriber to answer individually for themselves.

The subscription price of the paper is $2: but in reality it costs between $4 and $5 to supply each subscriber, and some one must make up the deficiency on each copy. Some are not able to pay more than $2. Shall they be deprived of their paper? We answer, No; we will help them. Others who have not much interest, are not willing? Shall they be deprived? We answer, No; we are going to keep the paper before them, until they love the truth so well, as has been done in many other cases, that now they would not part with it for $10 per year; and many have sent on that amount. Now, friends, calculate how much the truth is worth, and then according to your abilities send on your subscription or donation.

With these remarks, leaving it for some other one or more, who are capable, to complete the story, we tender our thanks to the members of the Life and Advent Union, for the confidence they reposed in us, by re-electing your unworthy President. Although small in our numbers, and weak in ourselves, we can look back for twenty-three years, when the light was as a man's hand in the firmament, but it has spread until the clouds of darkness and superstition are being dispelled and clearing away. In hope of soon seeing the Truth cover the continent, we bid you an affectionate adieu.

JACOB GRIM.

"Kept not their First Estate."

We have, in previous remarks, dissented from the idea that Adam and Eve are intended by the angels spoken of in Jude; of course, we have nothing to say to any argument urged against that view; but, that they were angels, once holy in heaven, is so absurd and impossible that even our excellent friend, who has labored so long to establish the idea of a spirit-devil, has at last abandoned it; and the theological notion that these "fallen angels" were ever inhabitants of heaven, he has given up, and he now comes to locate them on this earth, though living here prior to its being fitted up for the habitation of Adam and Eve and their posterity. We have thus gained something in the discussion; for, to prove "the angels" spoken of fell "prior to" the supposed "re-creation" of this earth is impossible; and such an idea is a pure assumption, unsupported by even a hint of inspiration. We might therefore let all such conjectures pass unnoticed. That some persons called angels "did fall," we admit; but that they were another order of beings than men, we have yet to see sustained by evidence that has not appeared. We do not propose to follow the fanciful reasoning from "analogy," resorted to on this question; and after indulging in it through a large portion of his article, our excellent friend comes to the conclusion, that if his fancy sketch is only admitted as true, it "makes the subject clear, and does away with the necessity of resorting to fanciful and clouded interpretations of the divine word." That is rich! Did our friend really mean to take a Photograph of his own theory? If he did he has succeeded to life; for a more "fanciful and clouded interpretation of the divine word" we never read. "What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the LORD." If such a resort is "necessary" to keep a spirit-devil in existence, he is not much to be feared. We, therefore, let that speculation pass, and come to some points of more importance.

If, because the phrase "reserved unto judgment" is employed in relation to "the angels that kept not their first estate," it follows those persons are still alive, and their judgment still future, it equally follows that all the ungodly, of every preceding age, are alive, and their judgment still future; for, Peter takes those "angels" and their fate, as evidence that "the Lord knoweth how....to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." 2 Pet. ii. 4-9. But it is said, by our friend, the examples presented, all except the angels, have had their judgment, and are already punished with "eternal death." By what rule of language is a part of the samples excluded from that which, he confesses, is in the past? We see none, and believe there is none: if one class of the examples are in "eternal death," so are each of the others, if the language is to be considered harmonious.

In our friend's reference to what Jude says about Michael's contending with the devil about the body of Moses, he has overlooked the scripture testimony on that subject entirely. As "the body of Christ is his church, or his people (see 1 Corth. xii. 13, 27,) so "the body of Moses" represents the people of Moses, or "the church" of Moses, of whom Stephen speaks thus, "This [Moses] is he that was in the church in the wilderness with the angel which spake to him in the Mount Sinai," etc. See Acts vii. 37, 38. That people, then, by the same figure that Paul uses to designate "the body of Christ," is called "the body of Moses;" and Jude is not talking of the dead carcass of Moses, but of his people, Israel, after the flesh. Jude's reference is clearly to Zech. iii., in which we have a symbolical representation of Israel's low and depressed state, and "Michael ....the great prince, which standeth for the children of Daniel's people," [see Dan. xii. 1,] is represented as interesting himself for depressed Israel and Jerusalem just at the close of the captivity in Babylon; and "satan [an adversary: margin] standing to oppose, or "resist him;" to whom Michael ["one like God,"] said to, or of, this adversary, "The LORD rebuke thee." This adversary was that power, or that person or those persons, who stood in the way of Israel's and Jerusalem's restoration. "The body of Moses"—the church of which he was, originally, the head and leader—was about to have a resurrection from its long political death. Nehemiah and Ezra found many of these satans—adversaries; but "the LORD rebuked" them, and Michael's prayer was answered. We fail, then, to find the spirit-devil in this transaction; and it is clear that Jude had no reference to such a being. We have no occasion to say the devil or satan is "simply evil;" that evil may be embodied in wicked men who are denominated devils and satan because they are adversaries to the work and purposes of God. To attempt to ridicule by taking one meaning of the term, and show an absurdity in that application, is labor lost.

What we have further to do, at this time, is to confirm the idea we have some time since suggested, that "the angels, which kept not their first estate," were "the sons of God" who "took the daughters of men for wives," and thereby fell from their high position as "sons of God," and "angels," or "messengers" to the old world. Our friend says, "Noah might with propriety have been called an angel, for he did deliver an important message." Thus he has given us a clue to the confirmation of our position. Noah was one of "the sons of God" who "kept" his "first estate;" he did not apostatize with those others who took wives from among the wicked.

In the days of Seth, after the birth of Enos, it is said, "Then began men to call upon the name of the LORD;" or, as some translate it, "Then was begun invocation with the name of YAHVEH"—i. e., the DELIVERER—the coming Messiah. This class of men, then, were "angels"—messengers—to the rest of men, and were "the sons of God." In process of time some of these were drawn away by the beauty of "the daughters of men;" for, "they saw that they were fair." Thus enticed, "they took them wives of all which they chose." Thus they "kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation." On this expression, Dr. Bloomfield, in his critical notes, says, "Some doubts exist as to the sense of it. Later commentators explain it, 'Their original dignity,' (as if he should say) did not preserve their prerogatives as sons of God, and the original excellence with which they were created," etc.

These "sons of God" left "their original dignity" as messengers or angels to the antediluvians and married the daughters of mere worldlings, who lived "after the flesh." That these were "the angels [messengers] which kept not their first estate"—"their original dignity"—"but left their own habitation"—or position as "sons of God," is evident from the facts in the case, and from what Jude next says: "Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them, in like manner giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh," etc.

Here we see the sin of Sodom and Gomorrah was a sinning "in like manner" as "the angels which kept not their first estate"—"the sons of God" who went "after strange flesh," because "the daughters of men were fair," i. e., beautiful; they "left their own original dignity," and became slaves to "strange flesh;" that is, they took wives foreign to, and opposed to their high calling as messengers or angels to the antediluvian world, which caused such an apostacy that Noah and his family, only, kept their first estate, or original dignity: that family was the only one that escaped the "judgment of the great day," when God swept away "the world of the ungodly" by the flood. But would not the apostate "sons of God" escape? No: God "reserved" them, as if in "chains under darkness"—the light of God's countenance being withdrawn from them—the invocation in the name of YAHVEH was no longer granted them; their chains (bondage to the flesh) were "everlasting"—not to be removed, but to hold them 'unto the (executive) judgment of the great day," in which they and their ungodly progeny, the fruit of their illicit marriages, were to be destroyed by the flood. Then all these "fallen angels," were executed, and live no more.

This view of the subject is still more plain, if possible, by Peter's account of the matter. Speaking of wicked and ungodly men who would "bring in damnable heresies," etc., he says they "bring upon themselves swift destruction"...."whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not." He adds, "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but ....reserved [them] unto judgment; and spared not the old world, but saved Noah....bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly," etc. 2 Pet. ii. Here the angels that sinned and the ungodly of the old world are all contrasted with Noah; he kept his first estate. These other "sons of God" did not, but "left" it and were involved in the executive judgment to which they had been "reserved" from the time they went "after strange flesh"—ungodly women, who drew them away from "their original dignity" as "sons of God," so that they lost all divine light; and, at length, "utterly perished in their own corruption;" and were thus "an ensample unto those that should after live ungodly."

Thus we have a rational and scriptural account of sinning angels, and are not obliged to take the "fanciful and clouded interpretations" of those who follow the "traditions of men," instead of keeping to "the divine word." We shall as soon find the divine word teaching inherent immortality and eternal torture as to find it teaching the doctrine of theological spirit-devils. Both are, in our judgment, fanciful ideas, unsupported by scripture, abhorrent to reason, and the fruitful source of superstition, a burden on christianity, well calculated to make infidels, and to furnish excuses for sin to all classes of hypocrites, who are ever ready to "worship the devil," who is their convenient scape-goat, and on whom they complacently lay all their abominations.

For ourself, we have seen enough of the dishonor cast upon God by such representations of his government as this spirit-devil business involves. With the overthrow of the inherent immortal soul and endless torture doctrines, the spirit-devil dies and his works end; and men stand out in their own proper wickedness, in which, if they do not abandon, and seek for the mercy of God in Jesus Christ, they never will escape the judgment of death to which they are "reserved," though having yet a little space granted them to "repent, and to do works meet for repentance," that they may have eternal life through Jesus Christ, the only LIFE-GIVER.

1 Peter iii. 18-20, and iv. 5, 6.

One who is disposed to believe "the soul is a distinct entity, and in death puts off the flesh, and at the resurrection the soul and body are re-united," asks us to explain the above texts.

He says, "the soul of Christ, during the death of his body, was in the unseen world;" and that, "It was not dead;" and asks "What was it doing there?" He thinks "this was the question asked by the primitive disciples of Christ:" and tells us that, "the passages in 1 Peter show what the answer was." The texts read as follows:

"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit. By which also, he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which sometime were disobedient, when once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls, were saved by water,....who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and dead. For, for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit."

To be "put to death in the flesh," we think, cannot mean simply "putting off" the flesh, or body. Christ was first "in the flesh:" in other words, "the Word was made flesh." John i. 14. In this state he (viz., the same who was made flesh) was put to death. "Christ died" (1 Cor. xv. 3,) not, Christ escaped out of the flesh; and thus, in fact, escaped death, or did not die at all, only took his leave for a short time of an assumed tabernacle. But "Christ died"—not a part of him only; for in that case he did not die: yet he did die, "according to the scriptures," (1 Cor. xv. 3) According to that testimony, "his soul was made an offering for sin—he poured out his soul unto death." Isa. liii. 10-12. Jesus saith, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death:" Matt. xxvi. 38. Again he saith, "I am he that liveth and was dead." Rev. i. 18. There was a time, then, when he was not alive; but now, he adds, "I am alive forevermore." Surely such language is inconsistent with the idea that the essential Christ did not die, or sink for a time into a state in which he was not alive. "Christ died," not half died: he "was dead," and therefore was unconscious, for "there is no knowledge in sheol." Eccl. ix. 10. Hades in the Greek New Testament, corresponds with sheol in the Old Testament, and one positive testimony that there is no knowledge in that state, viz., in sheol or hades, the state of the dead, must outweigh all inferential conclusions to the contrary. As to becoming "disembodied spirits," the phrase is an unscriptural one, yet we do not urge that point, only we affirm, if dead men have such spirits, they "know not anything." Eccl. ix. 5-10. And that "in death there is no remembrance of God." Psa. vi. 5. Hence there is no talking or preaching while in that state. If such is or has been the case, we need stronger proof than what is afforded by the texts in Peter's first Epistle. The texts, whatever may be their sense, cannot be construed to contradict the positive testimony we have presented of the ignorance of the dead. Christ did not preach the gospel in hades; yet the Spirit of God, which raised up Christ from the dead, did preach the gospel of life "while the ark was preparing, in the days of Noah," to those who were, in Peter's day, "in prison;" or, as Milton saith, according to the Syriac, "in sepulchro," in the sepulchre—i. e., who were now dead. While alive, and God's long suffering of 120 years lasted, the Spirit of God strove with them; but God said, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man." Gen. vi. 3. When the ark was finished, "the gospel" of life was no longer "preached to them," but God withdrew it and gave them up to death, and they are now dead.

As to the notion that the soul and body are to be "re-united by the resurrection," we will now only say, the expression is unscriptural and subversive of the scripture doctrine of the resurrection, which is, that the man is raised from the dead. It is the man that is dead; not one-half of him. Jesus did not say "Soul and body" of Lazarus come together again! No, he said, "Lazarus come forth." If only one-half of Lazarus was in the grave, our Lord called him to come from a place where he was not. But he did not make a mistake, for Lazarus came forth bound hand and foot, in his grave clothes.

As to the "primitive disciples of Christ" believing in the existence of departed living conscious disembodied human spirits, no scripture evidence of that idea appears to our mind; especially after our Lord's death. During his life they, on some occasions, manifested a belief in the embodiment of human departed spirits, or in the Pharisaic notion of the transmigration of souls. Our Lord has warned us all to beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees as well as of the Sadducees: they were the two extremes: the Pharisees believing in the conscious existence of the dead, and the Sadduces denying all future life: both were in error, and both condemned by our Lord for their heresies.

Representations and Misrepresentations.

We published a letter, July 3, from H. K Whitcomb, Corinna, Me., in relation to reported sentiments held and proclaimed by sundry persons in that region on the subject of "election." We have recently received another letter from H. S. Leighton, South Exeter, Me., denying the correctness of the statements. We hope for the honor of truth and of Christ that the denial is the correct version of the matter, and that the first writer was mistaken. Let all strive to exercise patience, and to "live soberly and godly" in these days of peril; and let us be careful not to misrepresent, in any way, the views of others. We judge not in this particular case, but choose not to open our columns to a controversy on the subject.

Friendly Words from Canton, Ill.

Miss Elizabeth H. Brister, an intelligent and Bible-searching sister in Christ, formerly residing in Philadelphia but now hailing from the distant West, under date of August 11th writes:

Dear Br. Wendell:—So you have been in Philadelphia recently. I wish I could have been there at the time. Did you have any meetings? Have not heard from any of the Advent friends there since I left. Wrote to E. W. several weeks ago, but suppose she has not found time to answer as yet.

How I should enjoy being at that Annual Meeting. I will pay five dollars for my paper another year, if continued as a weekly. Would like to do much more; sincerely hope it may be sustained. I, for one, would not like to do without it, particularly now, when I cannot hear a word of preaching on the life theme, or the coming of Christ and his kingdom. I attend the Congregational church. This morning we sang, in one of the hymns,

"Religion bears our spirits up,
While we expect that blessed hope,
The bright appearance of the Lord,
And faith stands leaning on his word."

I could not help wondering if there was one in that house beside myself who had any idea that the Lord is near, even at the door.

I think the paper grows better and better. Am much interested in the discussion as to the personality of the devil. The Lord lead us into all truth. Was also much pleased to read the reports of your good work in New Jersey. Wish the people here could have an opportunity of hearing the truth.... Your sister in Christ.

NOTE.—In answer to Sister B.'s inquiry, I would state that my recent trip of three (week) days to Philadelphia was exclusively for the purpose of affording my companion and our children an opportunity to visit in that city. They had never been there before. My esteemed correspondent utters the feeling of many other patrons of the HERALD OF LIFE when she says, "the paper grows better." And she will allow me to suggest, that she is one of those who have it in their power to do more than they are accustomed to do toward sustaining and increasing the interest and efficiency of the paper. This remark, in its application to sister B., has no reference to pecuniary aid; for in that matter I believe she does what she can, and does it, too, with a willing heart. But money is by no means the only thing that is needed to keep this periodical in vigorous operation and make it—what manifestly it should be—a power in the religious community. Its columns should constantly be enriched by contributions from the pens of those of its friends who have the ability to write to edification. There are many such who seem to have in regard to this subject deficient views respecting their personal responsibility. A brighter day will dawn upon our publishing enterprise when all who are friendly to the leading objects of our paper, will steadfastly exert themselves in its behalf. But the particular purpose of this paragraph is to insist that a greatly increased amount of acceptable writing could be, and therefore ought to be, forthcoming from our own ranks. "A word to the wise," etc.

An Appeal for a Wider Evangelism.

[The following communication was intended for last week's issue, but came too late. We therefore insert it now. We may as well say, that any organized system of itinerancy among us, as a people, we cannot approve. We are not called out to form a sect, but to revive long buried truths among the people generally. If any people wish our help, and any one is disposed to go among them, let an effort be made by the people themselves to accomplish the object and an appeal to others to help such as may be disposed to go to their aid, and it will not be likely to be in vain.—ED.]

CHATEAUGAY, Franklin Co., N. Y., Aug. 5, 1867.

ELD. R. WENDELL,—Dear Sir:—I have long thought of writing to you or Father Storrs about making some arrangement, at the approaching meeting at Wilbraham, for giving our preachers regular circuits, or sections of the country, to travel over, after the manner of the Methodist itinerancy. It is a fact, that many of the believers in Life only in Christ, and the people surrounding them, hear preaching seldom, or never, on that subject; and the only public reference to it is in the sneers of the "orthodox" preachers. Here is a sample of one preaching in our school house. He said—"These folks that believe in the valley of dry bones and the destruction of the wicked do not know as much as my horse, for he knows the Gospel ought to be preached, and carries me to my appointments."

This was part of his sermon. Now don't you think if each preacher would take a circuit, if he could only pass over it once in three months, that they might reach all or nearly all of our folks four times a year, and give a much larger number of strangers to the doctrine and the Bible a chance to hear? Each believer's home would be a stopping place for the preacher. He would also be interested to find a place to preach in and give out appointments. I cannot but think they would receive much more help than now, and cheer up the lonely ones.

One of our folks told me a few days since that he would give ten dollars, and perhaps more. I would do the same, and I have no doubt I could raise fifty dollars a year in our town, and I think more, beside doing all we could to make the preacher comfortable while here.

You at the East can hardly realize the loneliness and hungering of those scattered abroad who only hear preaching once in two, three, four, or five years, or never, on the subject that interests them most. My dear sir, I wish you would give it some thought and lay it before the brethren at Wilbraham.

Instead of preaching in one locality, and building up one church, would it not be better to travel the country, instruct those already believing the doctrine, and in a measure make preachers of them all? I know you can present this subject in a manner to gain attention, if any one can; and, if nothing more, please to mention it to dear Father Storrs and others.

Hoping we may meet in the glorious world to come, if not here, I am, very truly, your friend,

GEO. T. COLLINS.

Reply to Bro. Collins.

Dear Brother:—Your letter reached me last Monday evening, and was so welcome that I sincerely thank you for writing it. It will afford me the greatest pleasure to bring it to the attention of the brethren and sisters who shall attend our approaching Anniversary. But I need not wait until that meeting shall have passed to assure you that, in reference to the one idea which is uppermost in your letter, there can be among thoughtful Life believers but one opinion; and that opinion is in perfect accord with your own. On this subject it is my privilege to be well acquainted with the views of many of our leading brethren; and I cannot too strongly state the conviction they feel, that our appropriate work is to scatter the truth of Life only in Jesus Christ far and wide in new fields. It will strengthen their hands and hearts, dear brother Collins, to hear the clear ring of your own words on this subject; and in their behalf, as well as on my own account, I thank you again for speaking out your own thoughts as you have now done in your letter.

My own feelings on this subject beat in entire unison with those which you express. And it is my purpose for the future to act upon the principle that no "one locality" ought to receive the greater part of the labors of any one of the few men engaged in publicly disseminating light on the great theme of Life from the dead for the righteous alone. My past record in this particular, I feel deeply sensible, is not what it should have been. My prayer is that the Lord may graciously forgive my unfruitfulness and lack of holy zeal in this best of all causes, and that I may be divinely guided in my future labors in the gospel vineyard. I feel that it is a great thing to be willing to have God lead us, and to put forth all our efforts with sole reference to his glory and the interests of our perishing fellow men. Openings for well directed labor on the Life theme are abundant in every direction, but the laborers to occupy these fields are few indeed. It ought to be a subject of earnest and constant prayer to God that he would raise up the men that are needed and send them forth to gather in the ripening harvest.

I will in this connection add that, if the Lord shall open the way, it will afford me pleasure to visit your region by and by and proclaim the word of life to the best of my ability. But engagements already made must be carried out before anything very definite can be promised in this direction. You will be kept constantly advised of my movements and plans through the paper.

The particular method by which you would have your ideas of evangelizing put into effect would, at present, encounter insuperable difficulties. But I will not just now enumerate them. The substance of what your remarks aim at, however, will, as I view the matter, be accomplished whenever all the preachers of the Life truth shall be doing all that in them lies to bring it to the knowledge of the greatest possible number of those who never yet have heard it.

You can hardly astonish me by any measure of wild assertion which you could report as being employed by preachers who oppose our views. It can be safely presumed that Franklin County can justly lay no claim to pre-eminence in this regard. The particular form of the rash declamation which you mention as being delivered in your school-house is sufficiently extravagant, surely; and one can hardly help regretting that so knowing a horse should be compelled to carry so poorly instructed a preacher to his appointments. But whatever may be true of the beast in question, or of his clerical rider, certain it is, that "the Gospel ought to be preached;" and it is no less true that wherever the Gospel is proclaimed in its purity, the doctrine of eternal torment will never be mentioned with approval. That fearful dogma is the foulest slander upon God, and is a standing libel upon every sentiment of right which he has implanted in the hearts of his intelligent creatures. Yours in christian love.

The Living Epistle.

Dr. Guthrie says, in the Sunday Magazine, "He who so orders his life and conversation as to bring no dishonor or reproach on religion, who gives no occasion to its enemies to blaspheme, nor by his falls and inconsistencies furnishes scandals to be told in Gath and published in the streets of Askelon, does well. He may thank God that amid life's slippery paths he has prayed, nor prayed in vain, 'Hold up my goings that my footsteps slip not.' He does better still in whose life religion presents itself less in a negative, and more in a positive form; for while it is well to depart from evil, it is better to do good; nor does he live in vain who exemplifies by his daily life and conversation, the pure and virtuous, and holy and benficent, and sublime and saving doctrines of God and his Saviour. The first is good, the second is better, but the last is the best of all. So to live as to be beautiful, as well as living, epistles of Jesus Christ, seen and read of all men—so to live as to recommend the truth to the admiration of others, so to live as to constrain them to say, What a good and blessed thing is true religion! as in some measure to win the encomium of her who, looking on Jesus, exclaimed, 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps that gave thee suck!' so to live, in fact, as to resemble those books which, in addition to their proper contents, are bound in gold, are illuminated and illustrated with paintings; or those pillars which, while like their plainer neighbors supporting the superstructure, are also ornaments, rising gracefully from the floor in fluted columns, and crowned with wreaths of flowers—this is best of all!"

Letters and Extracts.

From Joseph Laciar.

MAUCH CHUNK, Pa., Aug. 22, 1867.

BR. STORRS:—Enclosed find $10, the amount I pledged last week for the HERALD, Vol. V. I regret that I am unable to send you a larger amount—hope the brethren will do their best to keep up the paper. The tracts you sent me are received. I am sorry to tell you that a number of them were violently torn to pieces by a minister of this place, before he read them. I had sent four copies to him on two occasions. I suppose he read the first two which I sent him, but when he received the last two, I am informed that he deliberately tore them to pieces so soon as he had taken the wrapper off. Among the tracts I sent him was Man's Nature and Destiny, which I thought was about the best I could do in answer to a sermon he delivered two weeks ago, in which he said that the doctrine of annihilation (his own term) was not to be found in the whole Bible. Judging by his conduct in thus destroying the tracts, I presume his conscience convicted him of ignorantly speaking against God's truths. But so be it. Thanks to the Lord that the scales are removed from our eyes; for we walk no longer blindly. Another gentleman who picked up the HERALD inquired who believed such a doctrine. On being informed who it was, he entered at once into a discussion against it. On leaving he said it wasn't down yet, but he would have to post himself on the torment doctrine and have another talk with me.

Chancing to meet him the other day, I told him I desired him to read a little work on Man's Nature and Destiny. He said he didn't wish to have anything to do with it, as he didn't want to be shaken in his faith; he considered it a very dangerous doctrine, and that his bible told him enough that there was a hereafter, etc. What an answer to come from a christian man! Afraid, in fact, that the tract will shake his present faith; i. e., error, out of him! Surely, such faith must have a sandy foundation indeed. Our doctrine is dangerous; for the power of truth is dangerous to error in anything. But such is orthodoxy. God speed the truth. Your brother, waiting for the Lord.

From Daniel Hawks.

ANDES, N. Y., Aug., 1867.

BR. STORRS:—I herein send $5 20 for the HERALD OF LIFE and your book, "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST." I live in a village where bigotry, superstition and sectarianism abound. I have long felt that the christian world were led by blind guides, and had imbibed various errors, and need to be taught by those that know of the doctrine whether it be of God or not. I dislike the man that deceives and intrigues in temporal matters; but the man that handles the word of God deceitfully, I pity above all others. I love the truth because it makes me free. I am far from believing we have found the whole truth yet. I am far from believing the religious world understand in full the object and mission of the Saviour in this world. Their ideas don't satisfy my mind. I would like to hear some one, that knows, give his views on Christ's object and mission. I have imagined it was more to give us a precept and example how to serve God acceptably, and to affect us, than to make satisfaction to God and affect him, as popular theology teaches. It has been 40 years since I first found the Saviour. I have let the fear of man keep me from doing my duty. That has brought me in darkness and trouble, and I have tried to serve him with a divided heart, but find it will not answer; it can't be done. I have lived alone except the first year or two of my experience; that was with the Christian church. I am convinced what I do, I must do quickly. I have felt I had a work to do, however small it may be, with all of God's people; and I am sometimes resolved to proclaim what light I have to the world, without the fear of man, and seek the honor that comes from God, whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear. I have been despised for taking your paper, and advocating some of the ideas in the same.

We have an old chapel in this village, in which there is no regular preaching. For the sake of letting my light shine and defending my principles, I got the use of the house on the Sabbath, Aug. 12. I wrote off the most important part of your first Six Sermons, and delivered it to them in a lecture, and I think it will set them to studying their bibles, and I design to give them more, if the Lord seems to favor me, as I think he did then, and in sending me the verses in the HERALD the Saturday before; which I read to them. I thought they were sent to me by him for that purpose. I desire your advice concerning the matter. I have let the fear of man bring a snare on me, and I have been beaten with many stripes. Now, shall I, regardless of man, go forward and proclaim what I believe to be truth, in lecturing, and see if the Lord will bless me in it? When I first found him, I felt like going and taking my neighbors by the hand and leading them to Christ, and have felt ever since that I had something more important to do than to lay up treasures on earth, and felt, if I was only fit, I could enjoy myself in my Master's business better. If you think best to encourage me to go forward in the work, and if you have any advice to give in regard to my getting short sermons or references to equal me for the work, I would like to have you give it. I know the Lord is the first one to go to for instruction; but I need to study to show myself approved by God and man; and I look to the aged for advice and instruction. Be so kind as to give me what advice and instruction I need, and your friend will be ever grateful. I have THE THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION, your SIX SERMONS, and I have most of the other books and pamphlets except LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST, which I now send for. Your brother in hope of eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Br. Hawks will find our "advice" fully expressed in our article of last week on "PREACHERS AND PREACHING." If he will study that article, closely, he will understand our views, and we need not add anything more on the subject.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These question are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy"—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS.—Price 5 cents.

No. 4. THE SOUL SAVED OR LOST. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS.—Price 5 cents.

No. 5. MORAL DEPRAVITY: by GEO. STORRS Price, 5 cents.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: or, THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN· by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTER TO A CLERGYMAN; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburgh, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for two cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our expense They will be sold at $8 per 100; but, in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent or 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

The following are 12 mo Tracts, of 24 pages each:

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price 5 cents.

All Letters in relation to any of these works must be addressed,

Special Notice.

It will be seen that we have withdrawn from our CATALOGUE our work on "Man's Destiny;" being the Review of the "Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D.," in support of inherent immortality. We have not a copy of the work left; and the high price of paper, together with the limited demand for the work, forbid expending money in publishing another edition, at present, to say nothing of the lack of funds if we wished to do it.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchaser of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues are hereby revoked.

Poetry.

"LOVEST THOU ME?"

BY MRS. M. E. BRADLEY.

Do I love? dost thou ask me,
My Redeemer and my King?
Oh, I hide my face, and answer,
What is love like mine to bring?
Who am I, that I should love thee,
Dare to lift my eyes and say,
Now my Winter springs to Summer,
Now my night awakes to day!
Now no longer dull and weary,
Oh, my heart, we'll mourning go,
For at last the deep completeness
And the satisfying sweetness
Of a Saviour's love we know?

What am I, that I should love thee,
My Redeemer and my King?
Oh, to think, that thou shouldst care for
Such a worthless, worthless thing!
After all my evil conduct,
When I went so far astray,
Sought out idols, built up altars,
Though I knew them only clay;
And resented so their breaking!
Yet to think my love should be
Still a something worth the naming,
Worth the asking and reclaiming,
O my gracious Lord, to thee!

I may well be slow to answer,
My Redeemer and my King!
When I stand abased before thee
And remember everything.
All thy patient, gentle leadings,
'Through so many thankless years;
All the answers granted to me,
'Though I prayed with doubt and fears;
And the poor returns I made thee,
Maimed and blind, and halt and lame,
How afresh I crucified thee,
How my heart and life denied thee,
Oh, my heart, lie low for shame!

Yet thou knowest that I love thee,
My Redeemer and my King!
Not with just the simple gladness
That my heart felt in its spring,
When it neither knew nor dreaded
Where withal to cloud it o'er;
When to love was just like living,
And, since love is all thy will,
To obey was but agreeing
With conditions of my being
Very easy to fulfil!

But with fear and self-abasement,
My Redeemer and my King!
Knowing well how worn and wasted
Is the offering I bring;
Yet withal a certain fervor
And close-clinging, only known
When, our earthly lovers failing,
We are left with thee alone,
So—Thou knowest that I love thee,
Lord, at last I dare to say:
Oh! whatever ills beset me,
Hold me fast, and never let me
From thy love be drawn away.

GRANDPAPA'S PET.

"Here, get my hat and coat, quick—Grandpa is waiting."

With this exclamation, Linda rushed noisily into the nursery; but was met by Ellen with the whispered rebuke:

"Hush, Linda, baby's asleep."

"Well, make haste," screamed Linda, "and put on my things—Grandpa's going to take me out."

"Won't you be quiet?" whispered the nurse, who was stirring the cot, as the baby had moved at the first noise. "Don't you remember," she added, "that your mamma said, yesterday, she'd whip you if you'd ever waken the baby again?"

"I don't care for baby nor you!" angrily shouted the child. "I want to be dressed to go out with Grandpa."

But before she was half through the sentence, baby was awake and crying, and Ellen, as she lifted him, said:

"Now you may get dressed as you can, you naughty little thing."

This put Linda into a perfect passion; and she threw herself on the floor, and kicked, and shouted as loud as she could. In a minute, however, Mrs. Kelly came running into the room; and, seizing the child by the arms, lifted her up and gave her a smart whipping.

"Now," she said, "you've something to cry for. I heard you—down in the parlor—coming prancing and shouting into the nursery; though you know your little brother is sick, and was awake almost all night, crying with his poor, sore gums."

Mrs. Kelly then stepped out on the lobby, and leaning over the banister, called:

"Father."

Linda checked her loud screams to listen.

"I think, sir," said Mrs. Kelly, "that I shan't let Linda go to-day; she's such a naughty girl."

"I'm sorry to hear that," said Grandpapa, who had come to the parlor door when mamma called him. "I'm sorry to hear she's naughty'" he said; "but perhaps, if you forgive her this time, she'll be a good child in future."

"Oh! dear ma'am," interposed the nurse, who was walking about trying to soothe the weeping baby, "do let her go, for there's peace in the house when she's out of it."

Mrs. Kelly turned back into the room, and, laying her hand on Linda's shoulder, said:

"Do you hear that? What a bad, disagreeable child you must be when Ellen wishes you out of the house!"

Saying this she sighed deeply, and Linda knew that her dear mamma was much grieved. This made the little girl very sorry; and she promised heartily, though she could scarcely speak for sobbing, that she would be a good child all the time, and never be naughty or disobedient again.

Mrs. Kelly then went to the wardrobe and got Linda's street clothes, and dressed her, and led her down stairs. Grandpapa was waiting in the hall, looking very downcast: and, when he saw Linda's tear-wet face and red eyes, he said, in a sad voice:

"I'm sorry my little pet is not a lady today."

This made Linda cry afresh, for she loved her kind grandfather very much, and could not bear to give him pain. But mamma told Grandpa of Linda's promise to be good in future, and wiped her eyes and kissed her. Then Grandpa said he was sure she would keep her promise, and took her little hand and patted it fondly. The door was then opened, and Grandpa and Linda went out together.

Five years have passed since the above occurrence, and a few days ago I heard a very different story of the same little girl.

Linda's family though very correct people, were not at all religious. There was no praying, no bible-reading, no conversing of divine things practiced in the house. A fashionable church was sometimes attended, but nothing that was heard there was carried home; and Linda, at the age of nine years, scarcely knew anything of God or of eternity.

About that time, she was walking home from school one day with a new pupil, when the latter asked her if she attended Sunday-school. Linda said "no;" and her little friend immediately urged her to do so, warmly expatiating on the advantages and pleasures of that institution.

Linda was much interested, and, as soon as she reached home, asked mamma if she might go to Sunday-school. Mamma said she did not care, if Grandpa had no objection; and when the old gentleman was consulted, he only laughed, and said of course she might go, adding that he guessed she would soon tire of it.

But Linda did not tire of Sunday-school. On the contrary, she soon loved it, and loved the glorious and beautiful truths she learned there. She know found out, what she had long desired to know, the way to become a good child: how to control her unholy temper, and how to avoid yielding when tempted to do wrong.

Nor did Linda keep her new knowledge to herself. Every Sunday she told at home what she learned at Sunday-school, and took pains to impart to her little brothers as much divine lore as their infant minds could comprehend.

About six months after Linda entered the Sunday-school, a great revival took place in the church to which it was attached; and the hearts of all—even the small children—were seriously impressed. Linda much wished to attend some of the meetings, and entreated her indulgent grandfather to take her to them. The old man laughed at her curiosity, as he termed it; yet, when evening came, he told her to get her hat, and taking her hand, he suffered her to lead him to the church.

The meeting was for exhortation and prayer, and the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit soon pervaded the whole assembly. In Linda's little heart the good seed which had been sown began to show signs of life and growth; and her soul stretched itself toward heaven in yearning desire for the unspeakable blessings of adoption and love. Sinners were happily converted, and she longed for the blessed change; but when she saw two of her young companions rise from their knees rejoicing in sins forgiven, she could refrain no longer.

"Grandpa," she eagerly whispered, "may I go up to the alter?"

"I don't care if you do," was the half-amused answer.

"Oh! but Gaandpa"—and her moist face and pleading eyes were as persuasive as her words—"I can't go unless you say I may."

"Then, darling, you may," said the old man, touched with the sweet obedience of the child: and, resting his hands on the head of his cane, he watched her make her timid way up to where she believed God's special presence dwelt.

It was not long that Linda's burdened spirit was kept knocking at the door of mercy. She believed the gracious promise, and instantly entered into the joy of the redeemed. And now her heart swelled with love to God and all God's creatures, first of whom was the friend who had ever loved her with the fondest affection—her dear grandfather. Rising from her knees, she hastened back to the seat where she had left him; and her eyes streaming with joyful tears, she clasped her arms round his neck, exclaiming:

"O Grandpa! God has blessed me, and if you will come up to the alter, I know he will bless you too!"

The old gentleman pushed the hair from her brow, and kissed her tenderly, saying:

"You know it darling?"

"Yes Grandpa, I know it, for Jesus has said, "Seek and ye shall find," and I believe his word."

"Well, then," was the response, "we shall see."

He immediately arose, and, with the child's hand in his, followed her to the altar.

The old gentleman's appearance among the weeping penitents caused a sensation in the church. He was well known, also his anti-religious principles; and many in the house, who had come as lookers-on, stretched their necks in intense gazing. When he reached the altar, he turned round, and addressing the people, said:

"For over seventy years I have lived in the world, indifferent to religion and an unbeliever in its mysteries. Now, this child tells me that she knows God will bless me, and I have come to seek a blessing."

Then turning to the brethren, he said "Pray for me," and reverently knelt down—Linda kneeling by his side.

The astonishment which this act occasioned was followed by conviction, and many who had only come to the meeting from curiosity were pierced to the heart. One by one they began to creep up to the altar, and soon they came with a rush, until a crowd surrounded the sacred rails such as is rarely seen on a like occasion.

Over forty souls were converted that night; and Linda's garndfather, with trembling joy, testified to a sense of sins forgiven, and a hope of eternal rest in glory.

When Grandpa and his little pet returned home, they carried the good influence with them. A family altar was set up, the bible was opened, and ever since the whole household has been joyfully serving God together.—The Methodist.

HOW TO BE RICH HEREAFTER.

If it is prudent to provide for the time to come, how much more so to provide for eternal life? While to be rich in this world is the passion of thousands, to be rich in the next be mine. An appetite after earthly grandeur betrays a mean spirit and a base soul; but an ambition to be great in the kingdom of heaven is worthy of an heir of God, of an expectant of glory; for it is to the honor of the surpeme Potentate that all his subjects be nobles, be priests, be kings.

In this short life time is the foundation laid of things of eternal moment, and the wisdom that is from above will teach me to send all my treasures thither. It deserves little or no pity to be poor in this world, but poverty in the other is deplorable beyond the reach of comparison. And yet, according to the capacity of glorified saints, shall that same undiminished fulness be possessed in a greater or less degree.

"How rich died he?" is the speech of fools at the decease of an acquaintance or friend. But none ever die rich but the saints; for, how can that man be said to die rich when the very moment of his dissolution robs him of his all?

"Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven," is the admonition of the dear Redeemer. Let me, then, lay down an imperfect plan to myself how to be rich for eternity.

1. Then, pre-supposing that I am in a gracious state, I must have a christian contempt for the world. No man ever filled his coffers with sand; no monarch ever wore the pebble in his crown; so the soul that lays up his treasures in heaven will not concern himself with perishing trifles. If my affections are not weaned from the creature, and set on things above, I shall be but poor in the world to come.

2. I must be watchful in all things. The man that is anxious to be rich will not waste a penny; so must I watch mine actions, my thoughts, my words. Again, I must watch for God against all my secret sins, and also to reprove the transgressor. A bold and sincere reproof of sin is a stroke against the enemies of the King, from which a palm of victory shall spring in the world of glory. I must also speak in commendation of the good land, that others may be encouraged to set out for the land of promise. Again, I must watch against carnal sorrow. Should the heir of a crown lament the loss of a feather? What can death do in his family who is the resurrection and the life? It may separate them a little while, but it is only to meet again forever. Worldly riches give their owners joy, but joy in the Lord increases spiritual riches. So I must guard against carnal delight; none of the gay things of time must be objects of affection. It would be mean for a noble personage to be charmed with a stable, who has a palace prepared for him; mean for an heir of God to sit down and feed on the refuse of the creation. Again, I must beware of carnal company. These are bankrupts that will spend at my expense, and whatever loss I make by them, yet in their company I shall never be able to add a mite to my celestial treasure. How can I be safe among robbers? They may rob me of a good fame, wound my conscience, and at last leave me with a bleeding heart, which may pain me many days.

3. To grow rich for the world to come, I must study to be heavenly-minded, not by fits and starts, but in one constant, steady, holy frame of spirit. Thus every duty will be my delight; prayer and praise, like my daily food, always pleasant; attendance on the public ordinances like walking in the King's palace garden; reading the scriptures like conferring with the dearest friend: and self-examination like the merchant from a far country, counting over his rich jewels and precious gems, inspecting his gold and silver, that it have the king's stamp, and so be sterling money; that his graces, his duties, his attaiments, are approved by scripture and conscience.

4. Holy meditations will mightily augment the spiritual riches. To find God in all things, and at all times, in all places, and in all providences, will enrich me for eternity. To find his power in this, his wisdom in that, and his goodness in all, will greatly improve my inquiring, my admiring mind. Meditating much, meditating often, meditating with delight, on him in whom are hid the treasures of wisdom, is a noble way to enrich me for a future world.

5. To be rich in the better country I must heartily study to approve of all the dispensations of Providence; though not insensible when he frowns or when he smiles. When the heart of the christian, with a filial resignation acquiesces in the conduct of his Almighty Father, however cross to flesh and blood, and in his unchangeable love he takes deep root for eternity; while fear and unbelief toss the unstable like a rolling thing before the whirlwind. It is proper only to children, not to men, to be peevish for toys and trifles; so let the men of this world lament the loss of worldly things, but let the heirs of God, the joint heirs with Christ, rejoice that the treasures of eternity are theirs.

6. To be rich unto God, and for eternity, I must act strong faith on the Rock of Ages; for it is from the spoils of battles won by faith, that I amass riches for the invisible world. Faith relying on a reconciled God in all his attributes and perfections, on Jesus in all his offices and relations, on the Holy Ghost in all his graces and operations, must remove mountains of difficulty, pluck up trees of corruption, pull down strong-holds of sin, wrestle against principalities and powers, and be more than conqueror at last, through her all glorions Author and Finisher.

7. I must also redeem time, and improve time; redeem time from this world, and improve it for the world to come. The man of business will be loth to lose a change hour for any trifling amusement: and the soul that would be busy for eternity should look on every hour as his last hour, and should avoid excess of sloth and slumber. Vain amusements, impertinent employments, are cruel moths of time; and time is to be husbanded, though worlds should be squandered away. As the jeweller deals wiih gold, so must I with time; he is careful about the filings, and loses nothing; so should I about the smallest divisions of time, the hour, the minute, the moment. It never made a dying person's bed thorny, that, by a bad bargain, he lost such and such a sum; but misspent time has made the dying moments of many dismal beyond expression.

8. To be rich in the world to come I must have an intense love toward God and heavenly things. The men that love the world pant after the dust of the world, and spare no pains to be rich in the world. A man will never toil himself to gather what he despises; so, unless I prefer heavenly things to earthly, I shall never seek to fill my treasure with invisible excellencies. "He that loveth silver," says the wise man, "shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase." But he that loveth God shall be satisfied with God, and entranced with the exuberant fulness of the covenant.

9. To be rich indeed at last I must endeavor to maintain communion with God now. To have fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, in all his divine fulness, his glorious perfections, and his gracious ways, is the most enriching course that I can carry on below. Every moment of divine intercourse would be sinking another sum in the bank of heaven, so that I should be wonderous rich at rich at last. He that quits the Indies for Europe sends his treasures before him, then, though he be poor at his departure from the one country, yet he is rich on his arrival at the other; so well were it with me if I could detach my thoughts and meditations, my care and my affections, my joy and delight, my hope and expectaion, from this perishing world, and centre them on that which is to come.—Selected.

THE PERSONALITY OF THE DEVIL: JUDE 6, 9.

An objection has been urged to the view that there are evil spirits who are engaged in the work of human temptation, that no intimation is given in scripture of their fall, and that such an important event ought to have been narrated. It is also contended by some that Jude 6, which speaks of the angels that kept not their first estate, has reference to the fall of Adam and Eve; while others regard it as referring to the sin of the sons of God in allying themselves with the daughters of men, and to their destruction by the flood.

We do not think that the fact of no fuller disclosure of the circumstances connected with the fall of angels having been given, is any proof that such an event did not transpire. The bible gives us but very little information on other matters connected with our earth, save such as have transpired since the six days' work of its re-creation; and as the fall of the angels occurred prior to this, it is one among other things which have not been specially or clearly unfolded. The passage just quoted we regard, however, as affirming that they did fall.

Those who deny their fall make a strong point, as they believe, of the objection that this could not have occurred in so holy a place as heaven. It was not, however, really necessary that the fall should have occurred there—it might have taken place in one of the principalities over which they had been placed as rulers, far away from that spot constituting the immediate residence of God, commonly called heaven.

That Adam and Eve were the angels here referred to, we cannot see. Angels, so far as the term is applied to men, are messengers—but in what sense were they messengers? What message did they deliver? If they delivered one, ought it not to have been set forth in the record just as much as the fall of the angels? Noah might with propriety have been called an angel, for he did deliver an important message, but Adam and Eve delivered none.

That it was not Adam and Eve who kept not their first estate, and are reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day, is very evident. These angels were reserved unto the judgment of the great day. They had not then, when Jude wrote, suffered that judgment, but were reserved, withheld, kept back, for it. Now, as this being reserved unto judgment in chains of darkness is evidently associated with the idea of punishment, and this an everlasting one, it must be the final punishment; and if Adam and Eve are to be saved, it cannot be said that they are reserved for such punishment; and if they are not to be saved they will have no resurrection, but are now under everlasting chains of darkness, or in a state of non-existence, which will be eternal—they are, not, therefore held in reserve unto such judgment, but but are actually suffering it. Consequently it cannot apply to them. For the same reason it cannot refer to a judgment on the sons of God. If they are to be saved they are not reserved unto judgment; if they are to be lost then they are not reserved for punishment, but are actually enduring it—even eternal death.

God has reserved these angels, whoever they are, unto the judgment of the great day; that day is the day of judgment—the day when the Lord Jesus shall come with ten thousand of his saints, a day yet in the future and not in the past. That Enoch does not, in this coming of the Lord or day of judgment, refer to the destruction of the old world, is very clear. Of whom is Jude speaking in this chapter? He is speaking, not of Adam and Eve. Not of the antediluvian sons of God, but of certain men who had crept in unawares, who were ordained to condemnation, the nature of which he illustrates by referring to the judgment on the Israelites after they had left Egypt—that on the angels who kept not their first estate, and upon Sodom and Gomorrah—which judgment consisted in eternal death, or everlasting chains of darkness. He calls these men filthy dreamers, spots in their feasts of charity, wandering stars, etc., to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever.

Now, it is of these men that Enoch prophesied—not of Adam and Eve: they lived before Enoch, and could not be subjects of prophecy. Not of the angels who kept not their first estate—not of the antediluvians—not of Sodom and Gomorrah: these instances of judgment are given simply to illustrate the nature of the judgment to be inflicted on these filthy dreamers, who lived when Jude wrote—a judgment which is to consist in their "eternal death:" or, in other words, their being bound in everlasting chains of darkness.

We do not believe that this passage in Jude 6, has been translated so as to bring out its proper sense. As rendered, it seems to imply that these angels which kept not their first estate are now held in everlasting chains, under darkness, reserved unto the judgment of the great day. Properly rendered, it should, we think, bring out the idea that these angels are reserved for the day of judgment, which judgment is to consist in their being held in everlasting chains of darkness: be eternally held under the power of the dark grave—that land of darkness. So that these angels are not now held in these chains, but will be at the great day; for then they will be like the Israelites, and as Sodom and Gomorrah, who have entered upon their judgment, and will be forever bound in these chains of darkness.

That such is the true rendering seems most probable, if we look at Jude 13, where, in speaking of the men "who were before of old ordained to condemnation—these "filthy dreamers"—these, "spots"—he calls them also "raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame, wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." We regard the expression, "reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day," as synonymous with the expression "reserved the biackness of darkness forever," this blackness of darkness for ever refers to the final doom of the ungodly, and the everlasting chains, under darkness, we regard also as referring not to the present condition of these angels, but to that future state of everlasting darkness for which they are reserved.

These angels, then, in Jude 6, we regard as literal angels—fallen spirits, who fell, not in heaven, but in one of the principalities on which they had been placed as rulers. Where that spot was is not, of course, clearly revealed. We may, however, venture an opinion which we simply give as such, without claiming for it any inspiration. We think that this earth was probably the spot which this fall took place—the fall of man and of angels occurring on the same planet. Our argument is drawn from analogy.

In the beginning, we are told, God created the heaven and the earth. After the earth had been created, for some reason or other, it was thrown into a state of chaos. When God was about to fit it for the residence of man, he re-created or reformed it in a period of time denominated six days. Why was this earth thrown into a condition of chaos after its original creation? Reasoning from analogy we conclude that it was in consequence of sin. If sin was the cause, who sinned? It was not man, for he had not yet been created; it must have been some other being or beings than man, and, as we have no knowledge of any other class of beings lower than himself who are moral agents, we must conclude that it was a race of beings occupying a position still higher than his own who fell.

That it was sin which caused this chaotic condition of the earth is probable. The earth has undergone so great a change since the period of its re-creation, that the world that then was is said to have perished: this has been the result of the deluge. It is still to undergo another change, and such a change that it will be designated by the name of a new earth. The instrument in producing the first change was water; that which will effect the second will be fire. Sin caused the deluge to sweep over the earth; sin will cause the earth to be yet the subject of the action of fire. These changes on the earth's surface and condition have thus been and will be the result of sin; and, reasoning analogically, we may conclude that it was on account of sin that the earth was reduced to a chaotic condition. If so, who were the sinners? The scriptures speak of "the angels who kept not their first estate, but left their habitation." These, it appears to us, must have been the sinners, and it may be for the reason that satan once exercised authority upon this earth that he feels so unwilling to loosen his hold on it. In consequence of this sin they are reserved unto the judgment of the great day, not now being held in everlasting chains, under darkness, but still free to carry out their work of temptation, waiting the judgment of the great day, a judgment which will consist in their being brought under everlasting chains of darkness, the blackness of darkness forever; or, in other words, "eternal death." In our own opinion this view of the angels who sinned, the place where they sinned, the time when they are to suffer, and the nature of their punishment, makes the subject clear, and does away with the necessity for resorting to fanciful and clouded interpretations of the divine word.

In another place in Jude, the personality of the devil is brought to view. "Yet Michael, the archangel, when contending with the devil, (he disputed about the body of Moses,) durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee." The idea here set forth is that these filthy dreamers despised dominion, and spoke evil of dignities, and that Michael, the archangel, who is admitted to be a personal being, a holy angel, though occupying so high a position, did not, like them, despise even a fallen dignity like the devil, and indulge in evil speaking, but said, "The Lord rebuke thee." Now if the devil is not a person, but simply "evil," let us read the passage in the light of such an interpretation. "Yet Michael, the archangel, when contending with evil, (he disputed about the body of Moses) durst not bring against evil a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee"—evil. There does not seem to be much sense in such an interpretation. Disputation is a thing usually carried on between intelligent beings, capable of disputing with one another, and as one of these, Michael was evidently such a being, we must conclude that his opponent was also, and not a mere abstract principle. That this adversary was not a man, but one possessing a higher nature, is evident from the fact that this dispute was about the body of Moses, and man could not have known where that was, for we are told that the Lord buried him, "but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." And as Michael requeeted the Lord to rebuke this devil, the most natural supposition is that an intelligent being, who could understand the nature of a rebuke, was to be the subject of it. If we regard this devil as a personal being, this passage is easy of explanation, otherwise we cannot see that it is susceptible of any clear or satisfactory interpretation.

How few, comparatively, are they, who freely, liberally and in proportions settled on principle, set apart of the substance they possess, for the promulgation of views they hold to be identified with the best interests of society. Louder than others, perhaps, in the praise of certain doctrines and principles, prompt to defend them when impugned, to explain them when misunderstood, and giving every kind of evidence but one of cordial attachment to them, it is yet by no means uncommon for such men to dole out, for their promotion, nothing more than the small change of their incomes, and grudgingly offer to truth trifles which they would blush to present to any one of their own friends.—Miall.

No article of faith can be truly and duly preached without necessarily and simultaneously infusing a deep sense of the indispensableness of a holy life.

THE TREE OF LIFE: TO WHOM ACCESSIBLE.

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

TEXT.—"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the Paradise of God."—Rev. ii. 7.

If a benefit is announced for our acceptance, several inquiries arise, such as, Is the offered good of real value? and if so, how valuable? What is the character of the party making the offer? Is he truthful and reliable? Is he able to do as he proposes? and what is the evidence of his ability? If all these points are settled, the inquiry follows—On what terms can the good be secured?

1. Is the offered good of real value, and how valuable? The benefit is, access to the tree of life. That tree is first presented to our view in the garden of Eden, where man was placed at his creation, with permission to eat of every tree therein, except the tree of knowledge of good and evil. By transgression he was excluded from the tree of life, "lest he" should take thereof "and eat and live forever." Access to that tree would secure life, uninterrupted by death. The innate love of life and abhorrence of death makes such a means of security of inestimable value.

Let it be announced that such a tree has been discovered, which, beyond all doubt, would heal every disease "flesh is heir to," and renew the youth of the aged and infirm, at any and all stages of life, and what would be the effect on earth's population? Would it not produce a greater excitement than has ever yet been witnessed? Suppose this tree is to be found in only one location; what a move would be seen for the favored spot! Every vehicle of conveyance, from a hand-cart to railroad cars and steamships, would immediately be put in use to convey men, women and children to the scene of interest. What a gathering from all lands and of all classes! Many would fancy themselves sick who never felt pain, and make haste to the place where health and life were to be secured against a possibility of interruption for evermore. The cost of reaching the place would be wholly disregarded, if the fact was established beyond doubt, that such a tree had been discovered. The halt, the lame, the blind, the cripples of all classes, as well as the more favored invalids, would all be seen in the vast army seeking health and life.

Thus all parties and classes proclaim, with an earnestness there is no mistaking, that this life tree is of value beyond all human calculation. All men have an inherent love of life of which they cannot divest themselves.

Such a remedy as we have supposed in the foregoing illustration, is offered in our text. It will not only remove all the disorders to which men are liable in this life, but also bring to life the dead, and so perform its work that they "cannot die any more:" life, vigor, health, and eternal enjoyment is the result of access to this tree of life! Is the announcement to you incredible? Do you inquire—

2. What is the character of the party making this offer? Is he truthful and reliable? This inquiry is reasonable. The party is presented to us in the first chapter by the beloved disciple, John, who thus introduces him. Says John—"I was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ. I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet, saying" "what thou seest, write in a book and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia:". . . . "And I turned to see the voice that spake with me. And being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks; and in the midst of the seven candlesticks one like the Son of man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle. His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as snow; and his eyes were as a flame of fire; and his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace; and his voice as the sound of many waters: and he had in his right hand seven stars: and out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword; and his countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength: and when I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead. And he laid his right hand on me, saying unto me, Fear not; I am the first and the last: I am he that liveth and was dead: and behold, I am alive for evermore, amen; and have the keys of hell" [hades] "and of death."

Such is the description of the party in question. Once a sufferer on earth, even unto death itself: a party with whom John was conversant in a previous period, and on whose bosom he had leaned his head without fear; but now he who was once a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief, is so changed, and appears in such glory, the beloved John falls at his feet as dead! He had seen his Master on the mount of transfiguration, and said, with Peter, "It is good to be here;" but there is a glory on Patmos so much exceeding any thing John had seen before, that he is overpowered, and "flesh and blood" give way, and life seems to become extinct; but the hand of that beloved Master touching his servant, with the consoling words, "Fear not," enabled him to look up, while it is announced, "I am he that liveth, and was dead—and behold I am alive for evermore, and have the keys of hell and of death." Jesus had told his disciples, just before his death, "The gates of hell" [hades] "shall not prevail against my church." Now he demonstrates to John the fact, that he has in his hands power over death and hades; for he had the "keys." Jesus went down under death, but it was impossible that he could be holden of it, for he had never sinned, and could only by a voluntary act be under it at all; but that he might obtain the right and power to deliver his church from death, he descended into it and came up again with the "keys" in his possession, and thereby secured the resurrection of all his followers.

Do you still ask, Who is this party that saith, "I will give to eat of the tree of life?" God the Father shall answer. While Jesus stood at Jordan, John the Baptist saith, I "saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him: and lo, a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Again, we go forward to the mount of transfiguration; a bright cloud overshadows the company there, and "a voice out of the cloud, said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased: hear ye him." Truly, "Him hath God the Father sealed." He is, indeed, "The way, the truth, and the life." If any testimony is trustworthy, then can we rely on that of Jesus, who "was dead, but is alive for evermore."

3. Is he able to do as he proposes? and what is the evidence of his ability? While here on earth, he healed all manner of sickness and disease, raised the dead, opened the eyes of the blind, walked on the sea, commanded the stormy winds to cease and they obeyed: yea, "By him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible,". . . . "all things were created by him, and for him;". . . . "and by him all things consist:" and "all power is given unto me in heaven and in earth," saith the party of our text, whose ability we are considering. His revival from the dead is full proof of the validity of his claim to such power. No impostor was ever compassed about with such a cloud of witnesses and testimony of ability to do all that he promised. If the evidence on this point is not ample, no amount of it could convince the doubter: he is farther gone in unbelief than the hypocritical Pharisees who said, "If thou wilt come down from the cross we will believe;" and yet when he had risen from the dead, and it was so demonstrated to them that they could not deny it, they gave the soldiers, who had guarded the sepulchre, large sums of money to tell the most infamous and improbable lie that was ever uttered, viz.: "The disciples came by night and stole him away while we slept!" If asleep, how did they know anything about it? Poor frightened disciples, who all forsook their Master and fled when he was arrested by his murderers! How did they get courage to venture on an armed guard to steal their dead Master! And if they did venture, how happened it, they were so fortunate to arrive there just at the time when all the guard were so sound asleep as not to awake at the rolling away of the "great stone" which secured the sepulchre? Wonders multiply at the folly of unbelievers: and those who can reject the resurrection of Jesus, as an accomplished fact, are hopelessly lost to all value of truth in testimony. The fact of his resurrection being settled, all the other facts of his power are established with it, beyond a doubt. His ability then, to do all he has said, is not a matter of uncertainty.

4. The Tree of Life and the Paradise of God. What are they, and where located? Whether the tree of life is literal, or a symbol, is of small importance to us. That the reference is to the literal tree in Eden, there can be no doubt; and the use of the tree is clearly stated by JEHOVAH himself: if man "eat thereof" he would "live forever." The proffered good, then, in our text, is an unending life, bestowed by Christ, the LIFE-GIVER.

The term Paradise, signifies "a garden of delight," or pleasure. The word occurs but three times in the New Testament, Lk. xxiii. 43, "To-day, shalt thou be with me in paradise:" 2 Corth. xii. 4, "caught up into paradise:" and in our text. Much has been said about it; and most professed Christians seem to suppose it is some intermediate state of bliss, entered on between death and the resurrection; some holding, it is heaven itself; while others suppose it is located in the lower parts of the earth. But the first class, while they insist that the dying thief and Jesus were together in paradise, on the day of the crucifixion, find an unanswerable argument against their idea of its being heaven, because Jesus said to Mary, three days after, "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father;" so that if their heaven is paradise, and the thief went there, on the day of the crucifixion, he did not find Jesus. The other class are just as much in difficulty; for while they contend paradise is not heaven, but an intermediate place somewhere else, they cannot reconcile Paul's desire to depart and be with Christ, which they urge in proof of the conscious state of the dead, with the fact that "Christ has ascended into heaven itself," and that deceased saints do not go there till after the resurrection, if at all; so that Paul's desire to be with Christ could not be realized immediately after death, as he would have to be retained in the paradisiacal state till Christ's "return from heaven," at the "last day."

In Paul's use of the term paradise, 2 Corth. xii. 4, he distinctly makes it synonymous with "the third heaven;" for what he calls paradise in verse 4, he calls the third heaven in verse 2; so that we have only to determine what and where this heaven is, to know where "the paradise of God" is to be located. Turning to 2 Peter iii., we find this apostle speaking of the scoffers of the last days, he says, "For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water: whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished; but the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Here, then, we find the "third heaven:" the first destroyed by water: the second to be "dissolved" by fire: the third to remain. As the apostle John, carried away in vision, Rev. xx. and xxi., saw "earth and heaven" flee "away," and then "saw a new heaven and a new earth," in which there was "no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain," so Paul "knew a man" who was caught away in a vision and saw this "third heaven"—this new state in which "the paradise of God" is found; where "the tree of life" stands, so that there is no more pain, sorrow, or death, to any who have access to it; in paradise restored, the flaming sword removed, "the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them:"—"I will give to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise of God," saith "He that is alive and was dead; and behold" he is "alive forevermore."

5. On what terms can access to the tree of life be secured? "To him that overcometh." A victory is to be achieved. Adam the first was overcome. Adam the second overcame, and is set down with his Father on his throne. Temptation is to be encountered; or, trial is to be endured: none can overcome without it. A triumph in obedience to God insures the promised benefit. The first thing to be subdued is self; or, our animal propensities. These are not to be destroyed during our time of trial, nor to be put under unnecessary and uncommanded restraint. Every one of our natural appetites, with which our Creator endowed us, he intended should be a source of pleasure, to be gratified in a lawful way and in a temperate manner. This is evident from the fact, that God said to Adam, "of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat;" one only was excepted. Here was permission such as we should expect from a wise, kind, and benevolent Creator. He gave man no appetites or desires but what he made provision for their being a source of pleasure; and pleasure, too, in the highest degree, by restricting them in such a manner, only, as to prevent man from being enslaved or surfeited by them. There are some mistaken but well-meaning persons, who torment themselves, and others around them, all their life long, by false notions of self-denial; some carrying their ideas so far as to think it is inconsistent with holiness to desire even pleasant food. A man can no more help desiring pleasant food to eat than he can help desiring pure air to breathe. But if his circumstances, in providence, are such that he cannot have "savory meat such as I love," as said Isaac, he can be thankful for what he has, and not murmur because he has not such as he may desire. There is no virtue in being indifferent as to whether we eat mouldy bread or fresh: and so there is no virtue in crushing out any of the natural desires or appetites: the virtue is in restraining them to God's appointed order in their gratification; both as to a lawful indulgence and a temperate manner. Thus to use them, is to honor the Creator and to excite gratitude to him. Those who act otherwise, may find God does not accept their offering, and may ask, "Who hath required this at your hands?" and add, "Bring no more vain oblations;" such "incense" may be found an "abomination" to him. Use all our members and senses so as ever to impress our minds with a deep sense that God is good; for it is "the goodness of God that leadeth thee to repentance."

The grand victory, then, is, to so subject all our desires to the will of God, so that in their gratification we shall have such regard for our fellow-men as to carry out the rule he has given us, to "love thy neighbor as thyself." This rule will not allow us to encroach on his means of enjoyment by overreaching, deceiving, or taking advantage of his ignorance, necessity, or weakness, to wrest from him any thing that is necessary for his lawful enjoyment of his God-given desires, or capacity for happiness. In a word, we are to overcome all desires for happiness or enjoyment which infringe on the rights of others, whereby they are deprived of the means or power to participate in lawful enjoyment. Such a victory embraces all that the Christian world have called victory over "the world, the flesh, and the devil." Our view, we think, simplifies the subject, and brings it to the comprehension of all minds which are disposed to come under the government of God.

But how can we attain to this moral grandeur? First, by a believing contemplation of the life of Jesus; and second, by the aid of the Holy Spirit, which Jesus is exalted to bestow on all who truly set their hearts to follow him. Without such divine aid, we shall struggle in vain, and always fail; but as saith the apostle, "I can do all things through Christ," by the Holy Spirit, and victory is certain: the promise of our LIFE-GIVER will be realized, and we shall eat of the tree of life in the midst of the paradise of God.

Some suppose, Christ must restore to the whole race all that the first Adam lost. The main thing lost was, access to the tree of life. Our text tells us to whom the second Adam will restore that, viz.: "To him that overcometh." Let us see to it, we do not deceive ourselves by the vain expectation of gaining anything lost by Adam, unless we come off conquerors through the blood of the Lamb. That we may be thus victorious, let there be no delay in beginning the conflict. Soon our eternal destiny will be sealed by access to the tree of life, or an utter and final exclusion from it, involving the loss of "an eternal weight of glory."

"SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES."

IF men were as anxious to grow in divine knowledge as they are to build up their sects and parties, we should see a different state of things in the Christian world to what appears in these days. The fact is, in these last times, professed Christians have had their understandings placed in old creeds, where they are compressed as Chinese compress the feet of their children by placing them in iron shoes: no matter what the torture is, they must wear them, till instead of well developed "understandings" they possess mere clubs to walk on. So it has, unfortunately, been in divine things. Iron creeds have been employed for centuries to cramp and make mere "clubs" of the minds of men professing to be Christians; and they dare not look into the Scriptures of truth without first putting on the iron cramps, called "creeds, confessions of faith, or, articles of religion," wrought out for them by men as fallible as themselves, and with not half the means of knowing the truth now enjoyed. The result is, a dwarfed religion, so far as Biblical knowledge is concerned, and a weakness against infidel objections and spiritualistic notions, which tend to bring religion itself into contempt by thinking, intelligent men. If all Christian men were thoroughly imbued with the importance of taking no doctrine at second hand, or from the creeds of men, however good and honest those men might have been, we would find true Scriptural knowledge greatly increased and increasing. The reverse of this, alas, is true, in general, and Christianity suffers in consequence.

If Puritanism had been a perfect form of Christianity, if it had been thoroughly imbued with the spirit of progressive advancement, if it had been as zealous in searching for the new paths of God's word, as it was in inquiring after the "old paths" of theology, the disastrous reaction which is witnessed in the New England religious character would have been avoided. The noble-hearted Robinson when he bade farewell to the Pilgrims at Leyden, gave them this advice:

"BRETHREN: We are now quickly to part from one another, and whether I may ever live to see your faces on earth any more, the God of heaven only knows; but, whether the Lord has appointed that or no, I charge you, before God and his blessed angels, that you follow me no farther than you have seen me follow the Lord Jesus Christ.

"If the Lord reveal anything to you, by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive any truth by my ministry; for I am verily persuaded, the Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of his holy word. For my part, I cannot sufficiently bewail the condition of the reformed churches, who are come to a period in religion, and will go at present, no farther than the instruments of their reformation. The Lutherans cannot be drawn to go beyond what Luther saw: whatever part of his will our God has revealed to Calvin, they will rather die than embrace it; and the Calvinists, you see, stick fast where they were left by that great man of God, who yet saw not all things.

"This is a misery much to be lamented; for, though they were burning and shining lights in their times, yet they penetrated not into the whole counsel of God, but, were they now living, would be as willing to embrace further light as that which they first received. I beseech you remember it is an article of your church covenant, that you be ready to receive whatever truth shall be made known to you from the written word of God. Remember that, and every other article of your sacred covenant. But I must herewithal exhort you to take heed what you receive as truth; examine it—consider it, and compare it with other scriptures of truth, before you receive it—for it is not possible the Christian world should come so lately out of such thick anti-christian darkness, and that perfection of knowledge should break forth at once."

THE GENERAL JUDGMENT.

"VERILY, I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city."—Math. x., 15.

This scripture, with the one Math. xi., 20–24, is, by many, supposed to present an invulnerable position for those who defend the doctrine of an assize judgment. A little reflection, however, will convince the candid that what is supposed to be sound argument is little better than mere assumption—assumption which ignores the plain testimony of the word of God. It is boldly assumed that there is a trial judgment at the end of the present dispensation: a trial judgment, in which all men shall stand in their proper persons before a judgment seat: a literal trial. This is not taught in the record. Then it must be assumed that there will be a general resurrection to meet the idea. The living of all men, after they are dead, is, again, doctrine unknown to the blessed testimony; but, in the dark ages, the general judgment notion was used as a great motive, and has been by many since. Now, to prove that all men will rise from the dead, it is asserted that all men must be judged in that manner after they are dead. One assumption is here employed to prove another.

The idea of a day of trial after the dispensation ends, is supposed (very unfairly) to be taught; and hence, as in the old superstition, all the great idea of judgment and motive to influence the life to holiness is left to that day. Now, I demur altogether to this leaving out of view the great and tremendous influence of infliction for sin, published beforehand as a warning, as in the case of the Israelites, whose case is especially under consideration in this instance; and the influence of the example of such punishments upon those who should "afterward live ungodly."

The truth is, that every people, whose probation as a people has terminated, have had their day of judgment. They have been judged—punished; and there has been a time or day in which this has been done. In speaking, therefore, of that people, and contrasting their condition, as the Saviour does, with others, the day of judgment must be the day of their punishment (judgment in the execution), because he is speaking of them and their condition. The day of judgment, for any people, must be the time when the judgments written against them are executed. Such days had Egypt, Canaan, Sodom and Gomorrah, Tyre and Sidon, Jerusalem and Palestine. Also, the entire antediluvian world. Now, to suppose that the day of judgment specified by the Saviour here is for Sodom and Gomorrah, or Tyre and Sidon, is to suppose that they have a future time appointed for the execution of judgment (infliction of punishment) upon them, since Christ was, without any question, speaking of the punishment of the Hebrews, (it must be he was, for he speaks of an intolerable condition) the same which he deplores elsewhere. Now, then, people who stand in contrast with the Jews in these predicted judgments, had received their punishment. It was in judgment for sin—it destroyed them. Therefore they had suffered in the judgment in their day of judgment; and as God is righteous, and of just judgment in all his ways with all people, and as they suffered according to law and the penalty which the law published, and which they had incurred and suffered too, all that the law required—all that God who giveth the law required, there cannot be another day of judgment for them.

These are the facts. Here is the principle. It has never been departed from in the divine administration, and never will be, for "shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" He is just; "justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne." Having punished the condemned for sin, the condemned must have been tried. They will neither be tried nor punished for those offences again. Their punishment took away their life; therefore they have no more sins to be tried or punished for. The day of judgment in any case can exist only for those who are to be punished. Here the Lord tells us plainly who they are. The exposition of scripture, to be sound, must be according to the great principles of the divine government, which are patent, and not according to a fancy or a preconceived opinion. We have given an interpretation of this which is in harmony with the precedent of God himself, and the plainest principles of his word. Now it will stand, and we hesitate not to stand by it or to fall with it, if it falls. The terrible condition of the examples before the mind are matter of history. How much more dreadful will be the condition of the greater transgressor! That condition is now a matter of history also. The world might judge which was the most terrible of the two days of judgment.

Nothing is gained to the unscriptural opinion that all the wicked dead will be raised up alive, or that, in the state of life from the dead, there will be a trial of all men—by the statement that there is a day of judgment for the Jewish nation. Nothing by the supposition that the worse condition came upon the apostate Jews, for they were the greater sinners; and all history shows, as well as the Bible prediction, that no people ever suffered so fearfully for their sins.

In another article we shall show from the Bible that these people had a worse punishment than Sodom or any other class.

W. S. CAMPBELL.

THE DEPTH OF RICHES.

SHALL we refuse to believe because we do not understand? The world acts upon the reception of truth as commended to us by the result. This is true in the sciences and the arts. Thousands and millions of people act upon the result, in respect to the steam engine: a very few, comparatively, understand it. It is still a mystery to the masses. Notwithstanding the whole civilized world depends upon the result. They all expect to reach the most distant places by the application of steam as a power; and we know this is by means of the steam engine. Still, we could not explain an engine. So Christ is a force in the gospel. We know that this force works in us, and we see the result. We feel it; we know it; yet we may not be fully able to explain the mode by which it is done. We see that Christ is the Son and heir of David—the King to sit upon the throne in the world to come. We do not feel competent to explain how it is that the Son of God should have become the Son of David. Shall we, therefore, refuse faith? We should act unwisely if we did. We should act contrary to sound sense. Contrary to our action in every-day life; for in every-day life we consent to that which is mystery; and where we cannot begin to understand, we still believe. Now, I would urge that we do depend upon that in nature which we cannot fathom, and yet we see the force and the result.

In Christ it is the same. We see that God the Father has made him the power of our salvation; and we see the result in the conditions of grace and the fully defined state for the future, the resurrection of the dead to immortality. We may therefore consistently believe in the Son of God and the plan of God.

THE MEASURELESS LOVE.

I CAN measure parental love—how broad, how long and strong, and how deep it is; it is a sea—a deep sea that mothers can only fathom. But the love displayed on yonder hill and bloody cross, where God's own Son is perishing for us, no man nor angel has a line to measure. The circumference of the earth, the altitude of the sun, the distance of the planets, these have been determined; but the height, depth, breadth and the length of the love of God passeth knowledge. Such is the Father against whom all of us have sinned a thousand times! Walk the shore where the ocean sleeps in the Summer calm, or, lashed into fury by the Winter's tempest, is thundering on her sands; and when you have numbered the drops of her waves, the sand on her sounding beach, you have numbered God's mercies and your sins. Well, therefore, may we go to him with the contrition of the prodigal in our ears and this confession on our lips: "Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight." The Spirit of God helping us thus to go to God, be assured that the father, who seeing his son afar off, ran to meet him, fell on his neck and kissed him, was but an image of Him who, not sparing his own Son, but giving him up to death that we might live, invites and now awaits your coming.—Dr. Guthrie.

THE STARTLING CRY.

THE Lord cometh! The heart of many a one thrills at this call. He thinks of the approaching and complete establishment of the Lord's kingdom upon earth; and he sighs, "Ah, didst thou but come!" Yes, our heart also joins in this longing of eighteen hundred years; for even so long has it been in the church, not like a flood of water, which is gradually lost in the sand beneath, but like a stream, which, the nearer it draws to its destination, rolls onward with greater power How many a prophetic omen has there been that the grand moment of jubilee is not far distant. We already perceive signs of the publication of the gospel in all the world; that of the shaken foundations of the Mohammedanism; that of the re-emergement of the Beast from the abyss; that of the decline from Christ and his word, extending through the world; and that of the powerful errors of the anti-Christian spirit, acquiring dominion over the cultivation of genius; of the idolization of men, and of many more similar signs.

Never did the church witness such a constellation of signs of the near coming of Christ as now. "The branches of the fig-trees are full of sap; and the Summer is at hand." Assuredly, I am not ignorant that a portion of the church has become gradually weary of the long tarrying, and has fallen into doubt. You also shake your head, and are of the opinion that we have long talked of "the last time." Well, use this language, and increase the number of the existing signs by this new one. Add that of the foolish virgins, who, shortly before the midnight hour, maintained that "the Lord would not come for a long time." So also in the days of Noah. They ate, they drank, they wooed and were wooed, and inscribed over the festivity-decorated gate of their dwelling, "Peace! Peace! There is no danger!" But then, however, the depths suddenly burst open, and the floods rushed forth at the command of the eternal wrath. Only Noah and those with him watched and were preserved; upon every one else destruction came with the swiftness of a whirlwind. The Lord cometh! Oh, were he already here! How do we long for his revelation in these dark times!"—F. W. Krummacher.

"The Mortality of Nations."

This is the title of an address delivered by Parker Pillsbury before the "American Equal Rights Association." The object of the author is to show that nations, like individuals, are subject to Divine laws, and their protracted existence in a state of happiness depends on the observance of those laws. In a very interesting manner, he illustrates his ideas by citing the histories of various governments, and points out the elements in each that brought them to disaster, or that continued their existence for any length of time. The ideas given are very interesting. Published at Room 17, 37 Park Row, New York, by the "Equal Rights Association." W. M.

Studying the Scriptures.

I cannot, says the late Dr. Whately (commenting on some of the difficulties in the writings of the apostle Paul), but attribute a great part of the discrepancy and perplexing uncertainty that has arisen, both on this and on several other points, to the habit cherished by some persons of reading the Scriptures—assiduously indeed—but without any attentive reflection and studious endeavor to ascertain the real sense of what they read; concluding that whatever impression is found to be left on the mind after a bare perusal of the words must be what the sacred writers designed. They use, in short, little or none of that care which is employed on any other subject in which they are much interested—to read through each treatise consecutively as a whole; to compare one passage with others that may throw light on it; and to consider what was the general drift of the author, and what were the occasions and the persons he had in view.

In fact, the real students of Scripture, properly so called, are, I fear, fewer than is commonly supposed. The theological student is often a student of some human system of divinity, fortified by references to Scripture, introduced from time to time as there is occasion. He proceeds—often unconsciously—by setting himself to ascertain, not what is the information or instruction to be derived from a certain narrative or discourse of one of the sacred writers, but what aid can be derived from them toward establishing or refuting this or that point of dogmatic theology. Such a mode of study surely ought, at least, not to be exclusively pursued. At any rate, it cannot properly be called a study of Scripture.

There is, in fact, a danger of its proving a hindrance to the profitable study of Scripture. For so strong an association is apt to be established in the mind between certain expressions and the technical sense to which they have been confined in some theological system, that when the student meets with them in Scripture, he at once understands them in that sense, in passages where perhaps an unbiased examination of the context would plainly show that such was not the author's meaning. And such a student one may ofted find expressing the most unfeigned wonder at the blindness of those who cannot find in Scripture such and such doctrines, which appear to him to be as clearly set forth there as words can express; which, perhaps they are, on the (often gratuitous) supposition, that those words are everywhere to be understood exactly in the sense which he has previously derived from some human system—a system through which, as through a discolored medium, he views Scripture. But this is not to take Scripture for one's guide, but rather to make one's self a guide to Scripture.

"The Earth Shall be Found."

We insert on another page, from the London Freeman, a criticism upon the Greek Testament of Dr. Tregelles, who, in 2 Peter, iii., 10, reads "the earth and the works that are in it shall be found, or discovered, instead of 'burned up.'" The writer thinks this looks too much like "nonsense," and therefore supposes that a Latin word, meaning to burn, is inserted instead of the proper Greek word. This is too violent a supposition to be readily admitted. We ought to follow the true and natural reading, whether we can understand it or not. But there is no difficulty in the passage as it stands in the best and oldest manuscripts. When the heavens and the earth are dissolved, and the earth and the sea give up their dead, then will the earth and its works be "discovered," brought to light as they had never been before. A more consistent sense is thus obtained than by the old reading, "burned up," for in immediate connection with the text we see that the earth is not to be absolutely burned up or annihilated, but only transformed into "a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."—Am. Baptist.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 2, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Herald of Life.

Our paper comes to you, this week, somewhat changed in its appearance. Whether for the better, you will judge. Its contents are what most concerns us all; yet, we have long since learned, the appearance of a periodical or book has something to do about its being read by such as are not interested already in their contents. It is very apt to be supposed, if the matter is of much value, it will be likely to appear with a fair external, and be printed in such a manner as not to make the impression of slovenliness in its authors and conductors. We must say, that our printing has, much of the time, been done in a manner that has caused us severe trial. We are making one more effort to have it done in better style. Whether we shall immediately succeed remains to be seen. Our type is all new: bought expressly for the Herald of Life. If we are not deceived in the article of paper, and our new printer does us justice, we trust that the mechanical part of our periodical will be gratifying to all our patrons; and we hope to make the matter it contains interesting to all. We do not expect that all readers will agree with or be pleased with everything the paper may contain; for, we are certain that such will not be the case with ourself. We intend, however, to do the best we can to make our columns acceptable to all reasonable persons. Let all who write for the paper strive to cultivate a spirit of love toward all men, friends or foes; those who agree with us or differ from us. Love is the fulfilling of the law. "God is love: and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him." While we "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints," let us show, to all, that we "seek not our own, but the things that are Jesus Christ's." Then, tho' we may differ, love shall still live and reign in us, and thereby win men to our Life-giver.

We send this number to all our old subscribers, that they may see what we are trying to do, and in the hope that they will be so well pleased with our present effort, that if they have not yet renewed their subscriptions they will do so immediately, and send us at least one new subscriber each. Those who have not yet renewed, and who do not now attend to it, after receiving this number, we shall be obliged to consider as not wishing a continuance, and cease sending to them. We hope that number may be few. If you do not wish to continue, yourself, please show this sample copy to some of your neighbors. Perhaps they may like to subscribe.

Now we shall wait a few days for your responses. This number is dated Oct. 2, but issued several days in advance of that time, to give all a chance to do what they can or will before our next issue, which will be Oct. 9.

P. S. Our paper appears in its new dress, but unfortunately the paper-maker cut it short of margin, which we did not discover till too late to remedy it this number; we hope to do so before another issue.

A Query.

Will you please explain the passage John iii., 13, "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven?" Have not Enoch and Elijah ascended to heaven? If so, how are we to understand this passage?

R. W. N.

It appears quite evident the Saviour is not speaking literally, but figuratively, in this text. That is, he is not telling Nicodemus of personal ascensions; for himself had not yet ascended as the "Son of man." He was clearly speaking of the truths he was commissioned to promulgate. No man had ever entered into the counsels of Heaven, fully, but himself. He had ascended perfectly into all the fulness of the Divine economy of God in relation to human redemption, and was thoroughly informed in all things Heaven had to communicate; yet those things were so deep and incomprehensible to a mind not in full communication with the Divine mind, that it could be truly said, "No man hath ascended into" such heavenly things but he who "came down from heaven, even the Son of man who is in heaven:" i. e., is fully in the counsels of heaven, and is alone competent to teach them to men as no other man ever was: no other ever having ascended into those counsels as he had. We know of no better exposition to give the text, and we think the context warrants this conclusion.

After some critical remarks on the text, Dr. Bloomfield, says, "The sense then is: 'And no one has ever ascended to heaven, to bring down this information from heaven, nor can any one except the Son of man, (i.e., the Messiah) reveal the counsels of God but I who came down from God.'"

Changing: Dr. Litch: The Periods.

We see by the Advent Herald, the organ of inherent immortality and endless torment believers among Adventists that Dr. Litch has abandoned his long-cherished and long-advocated "year-day theory," in explaining the prophetic numbers of Daniel and Revelation. No man has held that theory stronger than he has, or preached it more positively for the last thirty years, nearly. But now he has changed. We honor him for daring to change with such odds against him, and especially his former self. He says:

"At the age of eighteen, I pledged myself to God if he would assist me, I would some day understand the book of Daniel. From that day to this I have never lost sight of that pledge. Of course in these forty years I have read much of what others have written, and written somewhat myself. And now at the end of that time I am prepared to say that I pledge myself to point out irreconcilable incongruity and contradiction in every attempted exposition of the book, predicated on the year-day theory: so incongruous and irreconcilable that I am constrained to reject the theory and the expositions based upon it.

"This, I am aware, is a bold declaration, but whoever doubts it, let him try the test.

"No one has more to sacrifice as an author, expounding the prophecies and pointing out the fulfilment of the prophetic periods on the year-day theory than your correspondent. But those things which were gain to me, I counted loss for Christ and truth. The argument which I gave in 1838, on Dan. vii. 25, 26, showing the fulfilment of the 'time, times, and the dividing of a time' in 1260 years, beginning in A. D. 538, and ending in A. D. 1798, was universally accepted by Adventists and adopted as public property. But all who were engaged in the time movement of 1854 and 1866, 1867, and 1868, declare it to be unsound, and that the period ended, some of them say in 1792, others in 1793.

"But I reject both my own and their interpretation, for the reason that neither of them fulfilled the terms of the prediction."

Who shall say, after this, that Dr. Litch may not change? Who need despair but what he may yet be brought to "reject both" his "own and" the "interpretation" of his fellow laborers in relation to the "immortal soul" entity and its "eternal torments?" Be that as it may, we are glad that he is not a petrified theologian. We think, however, his theory of souls and the day of judgment, as a great assize at the end of this age, has had much to do in his recent change. But we shall not dwell on that point.

So far as we are personally concerned, our mind has been stationary on the theory of interpreting the prophetic numbers of the Scriptures for many years. All prophetic numbers given with symbolic prophecy, must, it seems to us, necessarily be symbolic—and, therefore, cannot be literal. But the case may be different in historical prophecy. On this account, for more than twenty years, we have accepted the "year-day theory," as it is called, for Dan. vii. 25, viii. 14; Rev. ix. 5, 10; xi. 3, 9, 11; xii. 6, 14; and xiii. 5. In regard to Dan. xii. 7, 11, 12, being a historical prophecy, we have been in doubt whether those numbers are symbolic or literal; and that doubt is not fully removed to this day.

We do not believe, however, that the various numbers embracing 1260 days, or years, are all of one common beginning or termination. Here is one of the grand difficulties in their application by the various expositors. One of those periods, we judge, commenced between 532 and 538, and ended between 1792 and 1798. Another, and the most important one of the 1260, commenced between 604 and 608, and will end between 1864 and 1868. This position we took twenty-two years ago; but we have refrained from saying anything on the subject, for some time past, because it was impossible to do so without its being construed by friends and foes into an indorsement of setting the time for the second advent of Christ; whereas, we do not believe there is a prophetic number in the Bible given for that event; and we wish all to understand that such is our position on this subject. The prophetic numbers are given for something; and prophetic events are to guide us to understand them.

We took the position twenty-two years ago that if the "1,335 days" of Dan. xii. are symbols of years, they commenced between 529 and 533, and end between 1864 and 1868, or at the same time with the last mentioned 1,260 days. On that subject our mind is unchanged. We have no faith that these periods give us the exact time of the advent, but they bring us into the immediate vicinity of it, and mark the point of time for the fall of "the abomination of desolation," which is a two-fold power, viz., Papacy and Mohammedanism; both of which, we are inclined to believe, will come to a complete overthrow of their power within the next eighteen months. We are not positive of this; but we are certainly looking for it, and shall be disappointed if it does not occur; and we farther expect the Napoleon dynasty will fall with them; and that the three will go into the lake of fire (a dreadful and consuming war) together, and be utterly overthrown and sink to rise no more.

We are not disposed to argue these points now, as we might; for the time is so near that it will soon appear whether the view is correct or not. "Men's hearts are failing them for fear," now, and "and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth." Those who have Christ have no cause of alarm; for these things will indicate that their "redemption draweth nigh." They may well "lift up their heads, and look up." Let us watch the opening events before us, and keep ourselves "unspotted from the world." So shall we be safe, "whatever ills the world befall." They shall be a "pledge of endless good" to all such as cleave to our Life-giver, who will shortly exercise his authority as "King of kings and Lord of lords;" and the earth shall be ruled in righteousness; "justice and judgment" shall he "execute," and "the wickedness of the wicked shall come to an end." Blessed day. May it soon come.

What is Understood by the Gospel?

As we are about to commence the new year of our paper, I have thought it might not be out of place to say a few words, or write a few articles, on the subject of the gospel.

To those familiar with all the great truths we have been discussing, for the past years, our articles are not intended; but for our new subscribers, or those that are not familiar with the doctrines of Life only in Christ, I look upon our paper as upon the table spread at a feast, containing many dishes. The strong meat for the well and laboring men; the lighter food for the more delicate; and the milk, and such dishes, for the children of the household, or those of the invited guests. Therefore we should have a word or dish for all in due season. Our name then, the "Herald," or proclamation of "Life, and of the Coming Kingdom." What do you mean by it? says one. In plain words, we mean there is no life outside of the Gospel of Christ. In other words, the Gospel is a gospel of Life through Jesus Christ. This leads us to ask the question, What is man? and what is his nature? If we look at nature and natural things around us, we see that all are passing to the grave. We have only to pass into our cemeteries to find the record of past and the present generations. Therefore, from this source we can learn nothing of man but that he is the subject of death. Nature offers no solution to the great problem "What is man?" Where then shall we look? It is answered, "To revelation." "True:" There and only there, can we find an answer to the great problem of "Man," his nature and his destiny.

What say the Scriptures? "And Jehovah God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living [man] living soul," a living being. Now, from this plain declaration of the sacred word, we have the origin of man to be from, or of the dust of the earth. But we are asked, Is there nothing more of man? does he not possess an immortal soul? did not God breath into the man an immortal soul, a spirit or something? We answer, Yes: God breathed into man, or into his nostrils the breath of life. For if God had not done so, he would not have been a living man. God made him, formed him, fashioned him, complete. Bones, muscles, organs, and all complete; just like Ezekiel's men, xxxvii. chapter. Bone to its bone, sinews, flesh, and skin covered them above; but what were they good for? for there was "no soul in them!" Is that what the prophet says? No. What then? "But there was no breath in them." But when the prophet "spake unto the souls to come back!" But, says the objector, "he did not do that." We ask why noe; if that is what they wanted to give them life? The simple Bible truth is, they wanted something else. And that was breath. And he prophesied to the wind to blow upon them. And that is just what God did in Gen. ii. 7. Nophakh—blowed into his nostrils; and the wind gave him life.

In Genesis vii., 15, we read, And they went in to Noah, into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the breath of life." Here we find this breath of life in all flesh. In Psalm civ., 29, the Psalmist says, "Thou hidest thy face, they are destroyed: thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust."

Here the Psalmist speaks of the dust as being theirs. Isaiah, in ii. chap. 22 verse, calls upon Judah and Israel, "Cease ye from man," (the reason assigned is) "whose breath is in his nostrils: for what estimation is to be made of him." Baptist translation. We answer, He is to be estimated as dust when God takes away his breath, which is in his nostrils. We will now come to the language of the Apostle Paul in 1 Cor. xv., 45. "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made an animal man; the first man was not spiritual but animal; and afterward the spiritual." He is of the earth, earthy. We have quoted sufficient to show the nature of man and his origin and tendencies. That, according to revelation, he is of the earth, and he is tending backward to the earth. In our next we will show the law under which man was placed; the promise to him under the law; the penalty for disobedience of the law; and so continue on until we come to man's present condition and the hope offered him in the Gospel. Yours, in hope. Jacob Grim.

The Tent Mission.

Our readers, no doubt, are interested in the progress and labors of the Tent Mission, so auspiciously begun by Br. E. Wolcott. The way once opened, we hear cries from many quarters to "come over and help us." Christ's mission is "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." We have, undoubtedly, been preaching too much to those who understood the gospel in its fulness when we should have been serving those who would have been made to rejoice in a knowledge of its saving power. Our confidence is increasing that a wider door is opening for spreading the "Life Views." The Herald is now solidly established: our Tract fund is finding favor with all, and because of the influence of both of these, the people desire to hear of the more excellent way. God has certainly blessed the effort already put forth; but as Christ told his disciples to pray that laborers might be raised up, we can do no less, now that we have evidence that there is a harvest ready to be reaped.

The tent meeting at Freehold last week, was a very interesting one, the subjects were new to the people and many heard gladly. On Thursday next the tent will be at Mariner's Harbor, on the north shore of Staten Island, where we have a number of steadfast brethren rejoicing in the truth. Most likely the meetings will be continued in that vicinity for two weeks. Our friends in New York and Brooklyn can avail themselves of this opportunity in helping on those meetings by their presence, as the ferry takes passengers every morning from this city and returns in the evening every day, Sunday and all. Preparations have been made in expectation of such visits. While seeking to feed others they may be richly feasted themselves.

In speaking of the expenses of these tent meetings, we had reference to the responsibility only—Br. Wolcott, in faith assuming that. Among our warm-hearted brethren at Eatontown and Long Branch, the burden was joyfully borne; and so it will, no doubt, where we have such a goodly company of friends in one place. But it is expected that the tent will be pitched in quarters never before visited, and then, as we intimated, there is no one but Br. Wolcott to bear the burden of responsibility. Notwithstanding this, we believe God will raise up friends and provide for his faithful ministers, that his work may be prospered. We wish the hearts of such brethren to be cheered by words of encouragement and sympathy, and we believe Br. Wolcott has found such sympathy from friends as to do his heart good. May others profit by his example, and go out in simple faith in Christ's command, and get the same blessing he gets, and find equal favor among those who hear the gospel of the kingdom. W. M.

Religious Singing.

The singing at church service should always be done as worship, as much so as praying or speaking. Instead of this, it is often gone through with as a necessary formality, without regard to the feelings of the audience or the special nature of the service. Some one, ambitious to be a leader, will give out a hymn whose sentiments are entirely out of place, and then strike up a tune the very opposite of that needed. The consequence is often to make the meetings dull, if not ridiculous. But a timely hymn, appropriately sung, is one of the best things to give interest to a meeting. We believe, therefore, the primitive one, of a brother or sister singing as the spirit gives utterance, is the best even in our day, notwithstanding the prevailing custom. The lively singing of the Methodists is one of the most attractive features of their services. Our Advent singing was once as full of spiritual worship, but now-a-days it is driven from public worship, and is only heard after regular services, or at the homes of the people. W. M.

The Spiritualists have been holding another of their general conventions. A reporter who attended it says that each delegate denounced the pretensions of the others to infallibility but blew his own trumpet vigorously, to show how much he had done and how great he was, and how well fitted to the infallibility he denounced. Egotism, envy, hate, contempt were so manifest that nothing but discord marked the proceedings. And yet some three millions of beings in this country risk their future existence by following this delusion. W. M.

The New Camp Ground.

A committee was appointed at the late camp meeting at Wilbraham to secure grounds for holding any future meetings needed, the lease of those heretofore occupied having run out. We learn that a spot has been selected close by Springfield, and the grounds are to be appropriately laid out next month. The kindly feelings that were shown to the members of the Life and Avent Union, while attending their conference at Wilbraham, did not end there. Two of our friends were placed on the committee to procure the grounds and lay them out, and they were invited to select a site for a tent, and were welcomed to meet with the others and work together for a common cause. Our friends have, therefore, taken in hand to raise the sum of $400, as our appropriate share of the expense in getting the grounds. Brn. Dneny and Day are on that committee, and have already collected about $300 of the sum needed, the officers of the Life and Advent Union having appropriated $100 out of the common fund toward it. We know that all our friends will rejoice at this manifestation of fraternal spirit, and will look forward with greater pleasure and satisfaction than ever for the time of our happy annual gatherings.

Bible Against Tradition.

Some men claim tartarus is the smoky atmosphere. Other learned men claim it is the nethermost part of the earth. Jude says, the angels are chained under darkness. So they must be under the smoky sky, and under the surface of the earth. Jude speaks of wicked men as in the same state of darkness; which is the grave; or state of the dead. What chain is stronger than death? That binds Adam and Eve. Jude says, the angels are even as Sodom and Gomorrah. If these angels are devils in a living state, then Sodom and Gomorrah are in the same condition. If Sodom and Gomorrah are in an unconscious state, then the angels are in the same. Jesus says, in heaven angels always behold his Father's face. How can men say, some of them have fallen? The Bible says nothing of fallen angels. I think the saying of Jesus includes all that ever were in heaven; for the word teaches angels cannot die. In Heb. ii. 9, we read, Jesus was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death. This proves angels can not die; therefore, to teach there are angels in such a state as men claim, is supporting the doctrine of endless misery in the strongest terms; for if they have lived so long, it is reasonable to suppose they will live forever. I claim that no wicked being has lived, or ever will, over a thousand years, according to the Bible. Paul says, the angels are all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation. If men claim there are angels teaching the spiritualist, he will tell you he is an heir of salvation; for all are ministering spirits to heirs of salvation. The saints have the promise of being like the angels; neither can they die any more. The Bible does not teach that angels ever rebelled in the heavens above. That is man's teaching; got up long ago. It is the root and foundation of endless misery. No man has a right to say that there was a fallen angel or a devil in the serpent in the garden. No man has a right to say that sin existed before Adam and Eve; for sin entered the world by the disobedience of man: not by a devil. All things God had made were good. No man has a right to say there were bad angels; if he does, he goes beyond the Bible. The word tartarus belongs exclusively to the heathen mythology, it never found a place in the septuagint translation. All that have attempted to prove the wicked angel theory, and spirits of demons have taken heathen philosophy for proof.

Pleasant Memories.

To all of us there are happily some green spots in our lives to which we can with more than ordinary pleasure turn our thoughts, and anon with joy tell to those around us all about them. How sad must those disciples of the Saviour have felt when, to all earthy appearances, their hopes had been cut off; when he in whom they had trusted was taken by cruel hands and slain: how, when they knew he was laid in the tomb, and there safely guarded, he was hid from their sight. And how sad would we feel to-day if our Saviour, in whom we are enabled to trust, had remained dead! Where, ah! where should we look for consolation and hope? But thanks be to God, the proclamation has sounded forth, "Christ is risen!" and I fancy the joyousness of those who in half hope, half doubt, were relieved from all their anxious fears when he came into their midst and showed himself to be alive from the dead, no more to return to corruption; for, from this time the sure mercies of David were for him guaranteed.

It is, then, a pleasant memory to all the children of men, at least as many of them as have made the resurrected one their chief joy, and boast to think of him as chief among ten thousand and altogether lovely, that he has been raised on high as a Prince and a Saviour; that as Priest he is now an intercessor; that he loves his own, and that he loved them unto death; that he is coming again to bless the world with beauty, and to give the gift of life, even eternal life, to those whose sins and iniquities shall then no more be remembered against them; and I often think how full of joy shall we be who have trusted in him, when with undimmed eye we shall see the King in his beauty, and the memory of his sufferings be absorbed in hisglory. Unsteady Christians.

There is a class of Christians who suffer from their peculiar temperament. Such should be treated considerately and tenderly. They are periodically cheerful, and periodically desponding. Their usual condition is one of depression; but this is relieved by an occasional sunburst of light and joy. Then the barometer rises. The skies brighten. You can see the change in their countenance, if you meet them in the street. The "change of weather" with such a Christian is nowhere more apparent than in the prayer gathering. He sings like a lark. He is fluent in prayer and in speech; he is jubilant, and has the promises at arm's-length, and holds to them lustily. Alas! to-morrow the "east wind" will blow again, and his barometer will fall to the stormy quarter! No sun or star appears in his lowering sky. The worry of his business, the failure of his plans, the derangement of his digestion, the loss of his wonted sleep, or some painful intelligence, have completely upset him, and his prayer sounds like the mournful wail of a captive through prison bars. Now, such a nervous, excitable, fitful Christian needs a prodigious supply of grace. He needs, too, to look well after his bodily health. Good bread, good sleep, and a good perspiration, are worth well nigh as much to him as a passage out of the Bible. Watchfulness, too, is his duty; and he ought to face the very beginnings of despondency and irritability with as bold and prayerful a spirit as he would face a temptation to a fraud or a sensual indulgence. He manufactures the very clouds that fling their shadows over his pathway.—Selected.

THE LIGHTS IN THE TUNNEL.

I WAS travelling upon a road which I had never passed over before. There was a long train of cars crowded with passengers. In the afternoon, while there yet remained an hour of daylight, I noticed the lamps were being lighted. We journeyed on, and I watched their faint glimmering flames; scarcely could they be distinguished in the bright light of day. I wondered why they were lighted so early. Suddenly we passed into darkness. Then the lights shone with a strong, steady ray. All through the tunnel they burned brilliantly. How dependent we were upon them! Could it be possible they were the same flames which a few minutes before burned so dimly? Yes, they were the same, only brought into view by the surrounding gloom.

How like God's promises, I thought. When the sun of prosperity shines upon us, we may greatly undervalue them. But when adversity and affliction enclose us with thick shades of night, our faith bursts into a strong and steady flame, and chases away the darkness and gloom of despair. We feel how weak and feeble we are. We cannot take one step without the light which comes from above to guide our wandering feet. Our souls rest upon God's promises as our only hope. Without them we should be in deepest night. Let us have true and living faith, and we may rest secure that when we need its cheering ray it will not desert us, but become a burning and shining light to guide us on our journey to the promised haven of rest.—American Messenger.

THE BRIGHT SIDE.

GOD doth checker his providences white and black, as the pillar of cloud had its light side and dark. Look on the light side of thy estate; who looks on the dark side of a landscape? Suppose thou art cast in a law-suit, there is the dark side; yet thou hast some land left, there is the light side. Thou hast sickness in thy body, there is the dark side; but grace in thy soul, there is the light side. Thou hast a child taken away, there is the dark side; thy husband lives, there is the light side.

God's providences in this life are various, represented by those speckled horses among the myrtle trees, which were red and white, Zech. i. 8; mercies and afflictions are interwoven; God doth speckle his work. O, saith one, I "want such a comfort;" but weigh all thy mercies in the balance, and that will make thee content. Look on the light side of your condition, and then all your discontent will easily be dispersed; do not pore upon your losses, but ponder upon your mercies. What! wouldst thou have no cross at all? Why should one man think to have all good things, when he himself is good but in part? Wouldst thou have no evil about thee, who hast so much evil in thee? Thou art not fully sanctified in this life, how then thinkest thou to be fully satisfied? Never look for perfection of contentment till there be perfection of grace.—Watson.

CHARITY NEVER KILLETH.

BISHOP THOMPSON, in one of his fireside talks, giving his experience among the Southern Conferences, referred to a sermon of a colored preacher on "Benevolence." In one of the propositions, "that many churches have very little spiritual life and power, because they do not give as much as they ought to give"—elaborating this thought, the preacher said:

"Ise knowed many a church to die cause it dident gib enough, but I neber knowed a church to die cause it gib too much. Dey don't die dat way. Bredren, has any of you knowed a church dat died cause it gib too much? If ye do, jest let me know, and I'll make a pilgrimage to dat church, and I'll climb up by de soft light ob de moon to its moss-covered roof, and I'll stand dar and lift up my hands to hebben and say, 'Blessed are de dead dat die in de Lord.'"

RELIGIOUS DEPRESSION.

IT is the strange truth that some of the highest of God's servants are tried with darkness on the dying bed. Theory would say, when a religious man is laid up for his last struggle, now he is alone for deep communion with God. Fact very often says, "No; now he is alone as his Master was before him, in the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil." Look at John the Baptist in imagination, and you would say, "Now his rough pilgrimage is done. He is quiet, he is out of the world, with the rapt foretaste of heaven in his soul." Look at John in fact. He is agaitated, sending to Christ, not able to rest, grim doubt wrestling with his soul, misgiving for one last black hour whether all his hope has not been delusion.

There is one thing we remark here by the way. Doubt often comes from inactivity. We cannot give the philosophy of it, but this is the fact—Christians who have nothing to do but to sit thinking of themselves, meditating sentimentalizing (or mysticizing) are almost sure to become the prey of dark, black misgivings. John struggling in the desert needs no proof that Jesus is the Christ. John, shut up, became morbid and doubtful immediately. Brethren, all this is very marvelous. We are mysteries; but here is the history of it all—for sadness, for suffering, for misgiving, there is no remedy but stirring and doing.—Selected.

FROM ELD. S. L. WALTER.

OTTO, ILL., Sept. 16, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I am well, thanks to my heavenly Father; and Mrs. Walter has recovered so that I could safely leave her. On the 28th of August I left to come out here and see about the HERALD OF LIFE. I found all the subscribers wanting the paper continued. I reached Fulton on the 4th inst.; heard of Br. Lewis as I journeyed from place to place. When I arrived here he had gone to Lewistown, to which place I journeyed; and from thence to Milton, where I arrived about four o'clock on the 7th. But Br. Loveland not being at home, I had to stop short of Br. Lewis, and as I learned that Br. Osborne was with him, I concluded to stay and preach to the people at Milton. We gave out our meeting for the morning, had a good attendance, and they heard with interest. We made an appointment for the evening, which was opposed by one of the brothers, who said he "would not go there to night meetings, because the young men behaved so bad;" but he repented and came. I told them what he said, and asked them kindly to preserve order at night. The people came out, and the house was well filled. The behavior was good, and they heard about life from the dead. Thank God, we had the light of life. On the 10th I found Br. Lewis after a ride of ten miles. We meet at the Baptist church. Br. Osborne opened the meeting. Text: "He that cometh to God must believe that he is," etc. His remarks were good, and food for the adult Christian. Br. Lewis and myself followed with remarks. On the 11th we had a meeting; the people gave good attention. I spoke from "What is man?" Brn. Lewis and Osborne had gone to Canton, about ten miles east. On the 12th instant I went to Jones' Settlement to preach in the Christian church, but found the house closed. After waiting till the people came, they said they would have a meeting, and as the church was shut, the school-house should be opened. It was done, and we were soon singing praises in the school-house. We had liberty in presenting truth, and had some good responses from some of the brethren. Some came to hear a Universalist, others a soul-sleeper, but it had so much Bible, and they liked it so well, they wanted me to preach on the 13th; but this I could not do, as I had to be at Otto on the 14th, twenty miles' ride, and it looked like rain. I left with a promise to preach if I came that way again. I preached here on the 14th at night, and on the 15th three times. We had the house full, and the word took effect, praise the Lord. The church here was made glad. We meet again to-night. Brn. Lewis and Osborne came in the afternoon unexpectedly. Praise the Lord, we had a good time. I hope your proposition to raise a Tract Fund will not only exceed a thousand, but come up to two. It can be done if the friends say the Lord's money shall be forthcoming, and not give as though the Lord would let them or their children starve, or go without clothes. Oh, that all God's dear children may obey the command of the Saviour, "Have faith in God;" then the work will be done. Yours in hope of Life when the LIFE-GIVER comes.

P. S.—I found three packages of books, etc., at Milton for me. The donor has my thanks for this gift. I hope that I shall ever prove worthy of their favors. The Lord bless them. I have had to financier.

S. L. W.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The works you received were furnished from funds paid to help Br. Hanford to go West. We will send more so soon as we are certain where they will find such moving planets as you and Br. Lewis are.

FROM CHARLES H. SUTTON.

MANAYUNK, PA., Sept. 18, 1867.

BR. STORRS: It gives me much pleasure to learn through the HERALD OF LIFE that our paper is to be continued another year. How could we do without it? It is the only paper that fearlessly advocates the Bible truth of future life to the righteous only, through a once crucified but now a risen Saviour.

I thank God that my mind was ever led to investigate the Bible as it is, and not as so called orthodoxy would construe it. It will be ten years next December since I resigned my possition in the M. E. Church. Had I then been told that such a revolution in my theological opinions would have taken place, I would have been ready to say, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" (For there was a good deal of the old leaven then remaining). Praise the Lord! my mind is now free from all human creeds, and I know no creed but the Bible, and I try to take it for the rule of my faith and conduct; therefore please find enclosed $5 for Vol. v., with my prayer that it may be instrumental in leading many to the truth; and may God bless you my aged father in the gospel. Yours, looking for speedy deliverance through Jesus. (I am no time setter).

FROM WM. FORRESTER.

DUNDEE, N. Y., Sept, 18, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I wish you to send me several copies of your ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; for I think I can use them to the glory of God in sending them to our Advent friends who honestly are looking for the truth, which you have most fully illustrated in that work, in perfect harmony with God's word. I am yet taking the Crisis. I think it one of the best of religious papers. But I think the HERALD OF LIFE is in more strict harmony with the word of life on the resurrection, and no life out of Christ. I am aware that our views of the resurrection are very unpopular, even among Adventists. But, my Br., that don't stop me from telling the truth of God anywhere, whether it is popular or not, wherever it is appropriate, among my fellow men, in public or private. I have kept one copy of the ESSENTIAL BAPTISM, and intend to. I have lent it to some to read, where I could safely.

I should like much to take the HERALD OF LIFE if I felt able; but I am of limited ability in this world; but am willing to do all I can to circulate the truth of God. Send me two or three copies of the paper, and I will send you the money immediately. Perhaps I will conclude to subscribe for it. I wish to say, I am no definite timist; but think the time is very near when our Master will come back to reign with his saints, personally. So we all need to hold ourselves in constant readiness. Your Br., in Christian love.

FROM ELD. J. LEWIS.

OTTO, ILL., Sept. 16, 1867.

DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST: The truth is spreading most gloriously in old Fulton, and in other counties where we have traveled and sowed the good seed of the kingdom. We have just returned from a long and laborious tour farther West, with Br. Osborne, and we found our way to Canton. For the first time hunted up our good Advent friends, Br. and Sister Middleton and Sister E. H. Brister. Was glad to find some of the same faith, who received us with a hearty welcome. May the Lord reward them. We tried to obtain a place in which to hold forth; but all in vain; for the ministers of the different sects had been advertised of the fact that we were going round "breaking up the churches," and that we were a dangerous set of fellows, calling us "soul-sleepers, infidels," etc. So we had to speak in the open air, on the public square, which resulted, we trust, in good. At all events, it awakened up an interest, so that they wanted us to come back as soon as they get the Masonic Hall finished, which will not be long, promising us to preach in it free. Well, as I do not intend to say much, only by the way of reporting ourself, so that our friends could hear from us, I will close by saying, The tent is in the field with good success. Br. Walter is with us, and we intend to pitch the tent in different localities as long as the weather will admit. Pray for us; and may our heavenly Father bless all the dear ones that have done so nobly in pledging to the support of the paper and tract cause. O, the tracts! Why, my beloved brethren and sisters, it is altogether important that we should have a constant supply; although we give away more than we sell, they must be circulated. The SIX SERMONS are the most called for, and we are all out now. Who will donate more? May the Lord direct. Think not that we are making capital out of the operation. No, for we have no other object in view but to spend and be spent in the glorious cause. We send you two new subscribers for Vol. v., with the promise of more soon.

FROM MARIA MATHEWS WEAVER.

STANFORD, VT., Sept. 16, 1867.

DEAR PILGRIMS: It is nearly eight weeks since we left our quiet home in Westfield, Mass., to labor in the Master's vineyard. We have attended four camp-meetings, and other meetings too. Are tired, and feel as though home would be appreciated could we be there. But we don't expect to settle down again till we come to the congregation of the immortal ones.

We most firmly believe we shall see our blessed Redeemer ere this year (1867) passes. We have our reasons for so believing, arguments that we cannot withstand. Blessed be God.

We have not lost our interest in the HERALD OF LIFE, nor our love for its prominent truth, "No life out of Christ." We talk it, enforce it, sometimes, and at other times, gently, yet plainly speak our views on the subject.

We realize that these are solemn moments, and that "perilous times" have truly "come." Alas! alas! how "lukewarm" the professed people of God have become.

I was much pleased by the remarks made by Brn. of the Life and Advent Union; especially Brn. Hanford, Grim, Day, and Wendell. Glad they feel more like persuading and less like driving people into the truth. Their words made me love them more than ever, and I can pray God to bless the labors of those possessed of such a spirit.

You can not think it out of place for me to exhort you, all, to candidly consider the arguments on Time. Search and see if these things be so. If we are in error, show us wherein; and if we have the truth you certainly need to know it.

Definite time and the life views combined make us strong in the Lord and happy in his truth. They are the crowning truths of these last days.

May grace and peace be multiplied unto you. In a little while, a few short weeks, the faithful will meet and be at rest in the home of the redeemed. O let us keep ready for the great event. How blessed the thought of being changed from mortality to immortality in a few days. Blessed hope. It cheers me. It gives me joy amid earth's sorrows, and peace amid her turmoil. Hallelujah! Your Sr. in the Gospel.

S. E. HOFFMAN, Middleville, Minn., writes: I do not know but you may conclude by my silence for so long time that I am giving up the life theme. The Lord pardon such a thought, especially in me. I am trying to do what I can; but it is very hard times in this new country. Many came near starving in consequence of the crops being cut off last Fall, and the rush of emigration. I have been away for more than two months, and have not had the invigorating HERALD to stir up my "mind by way of remembrance." I send $2, and when I get more I will send it. I could get a number of subscribers here but for the scarcity of means to pay; but I keep lending mine, and scattering them all I can.

CHAS. C. WEBBER, Minneapolis, Minn., writes: I have delayed writing, hoping to be able to send some money for my paper; at least the subscription price. I shall send soon, and hope during the year to send more than $2; but the paper I must have, for it is the only preaching I have, though I attend "church" (?) twice every Sunday. I am alone in this city so far as I know, in the belief of the glorious doctrine of "Life only in Christ." I wish that Br. Wendell, when he comes so near as Lake City, might come to this place and stir this people up on the the Life theme. I would like to have my name registered as a member of the LIFE AND ADVENT UNION.

DAVID H. BAKER, Lawrence, Kansas, writes: I have been sick over three months, and have not the money now to renew my subscription, but I cannot do without the paper. I will send the money after awhile. I am trying to get subscribers; but there are many church members here that say they can't take time to read the Book, and they pay a preacher to tell them all about these things, and they have no idea that he does not tell them right. So it goes. As soon as I can spare the money I must have a lot of works on Life only in Christ. Some I can sell, by making an effort. There are, I fear, too many of us content to know the truth, while we make too little effort to lead others into it. This should not be so. Can not each of your subscribers sell at least one copy of LIEF ONLY IN CHRIST? If they would try, something would be done. So of the paper—can they not each get at least one new subscriber in twelve months? I hope to do this, and more. Yours in the gospel hope of life from the dead.

SALLY DILLINGHAM, West Brewster, Mass., writes: I send you $5 for the HERALD OF LIFE. I would like to do more, but cannot at present. I do not know what I should do without the paper. I am striving for the kingdom which is to come, and hope to prove faithful to the end, that I may receive the crown of life when done with the sorrows and cares of this life. I am sixty-eight years old. I live alone; have a comfortable living and something to dispose of to the poor and needy. Thank the Lord for all his goodness to me. I can sympathise with you in the death of your beloved son. I know how to. But what comfort to think you will soon meet him again. I often say "courage" to myself; the bitter cross in every trial will help to bear me to the world to come, but it shall not enter there. How I do wish I could meet with you in your place of public service. I never had that privilege but once; that was in Boston several years since. O, that was a happy meeting. It seemed as if I was in my Father's family. What a blessed meeting when salvation is completed. In that bright day there will be no dark gloom of sorrow; it will never reach that place. Pray for me that I may follow the truth wherever it leads.

MELISSA A. SAWYER, Plymouth, Me., writes: I send you a little money for the HERALD OF LIFE. I was in hopes to send more, but my way seems hedged up. I am glad I can do a little for our good paper. I can say with many others I rejoice that it is to come weekly. My health is poor; but the time will soon come when those who belong to the Lord will reap eternal life. I hope to be found in that number.

MRS. H. B. HARRIMAN, Warner, N. H., writes: Please find enclosed two dollars for the HERALD OF LIFE. It is all we can do at present; but we feel that we cannot get along without it, as we have taken it from the beginning, and think it grows better and better. Yours, in hope of future life in Christ.

FRENCH HONESTY.

M. LEGOUVÉ, of the French Academy, tells this story of his body servant in Paris: "Some years ago, he let it be known to his baker that he wanted a body servant. He received fifty applications a day, none of which suited. One morning, while hard at work in his study (it was about five o'clock, in the winter), somebody knocked at the door. He opened it. 'I am told that you want a confidential servant.' 'Yes, and you think you are the one I want; you have first-rate recommendations, and lived, I dare say, ten years in your last place.' 'No, sir; I am just out of jail!' You may imagine the astonishment of Legouvé. 'Just out of jail!' 'Yes, sir; I loved a woman who required money. She pressed me every day to give her more money. I gave her all I earned honestly—'twas not enough. I thieved to gratify her covetousness. I was arrested, tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary for three years, which expired last Saturday.' 'Do you think that a recommendation to a place of confidential servant?' 'Yes, sir. A man that loses his character in an hour of folly will be on his guard against temptation, and will strive to regain his reputation. Besides, I know that, at heart, I am an honest man.' There was in the fellow's tone such an honest accent, that Legouvé took him at once, and has never since repented it. The released convict has now the keys of the house, pays all the bills, and does all the marketing."—N. Y. Home Journal.

ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL will preach at the Advent Chapel in New Britain, Conn., on Sunday, Sept. 29. Will expect to attend the Tent meeting on Staten Island.

BR. SAMUEL CURRY.

IT is probably well known to the friends of Br. Samuel Curry, that he is lying dangerously ill at his home in this city. Within the past week his case has become critical, and he is fully persuaded in his own mind that he is in a few days to sleep in Jesus. His disease is cancer, which began to show itself about six months ago, at the root of his tongue. For a time he did not understand the nature of the attack, deeming it merely a sore, the result of a cold. When made fully aware of its dangerous character, although anxious to be relieved from it, he did not bewail his fate, but bore up with Christian fortitude, and labored in his Master's cause as his strength and circumstances permitted, seldom alluding to, but never complaining of the ordeal he was called to go through for some wise purpose known only to his heavenly Father.

But it is his present frame of mind that will be most interesting to his friends to whom he has endeared himself, and who may ask, "How does he feel that the dread enemy is so fearfully nigh?" We can say his case is a glorious triumph for the Gospel of Jesus. He rejoices in God as a very present help. His Saviour has not forsaken him in his trying affliction, but has proved himself a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.

We called on him in company with a friend last Monday, the 23d inst., and found him emaciated to the last degree, his strength almost exhausted. He stretched out a feeble but welcome hand, and while tears bedewed, our cheek, his face was radiant with a celestial glory. "All triumph, all triumph, hallelujah, to God! Jesus is with me. It's all well, hallelujah!" and with such kindred expressions, he greeted us, that left no doubt either of his joy or the clearness of his faith in his Saviour. He said God made his angels ministering spirits to him. He had no belief in dead men's spirits; but should sleep to awake in the likeness of Jesus when he should come to gather his sleeping saints.

He spoke freely about the preparation for his funeral, wishing Br. Storrs to preach a discourse, and present every item of his faith—to have nothing omitted; on this point he was anxious to set his seal with his dying breath. He expressed his love for all his brethren, and spoke particularly of those who were looking for their Saviour this year. He said he thought they were mistaken, although he believed Christ was close at hand. He prayed for them that they might be kept if their hopes were not gratified in the return of their Master as they expected. He had nothing but love for all his Advent brethren.

After taking an affectionate farewell, the friend accompanying us said, "It is true that it is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting. But that bedside is not a place of mourning, it is one of rejoicing and full of glory." And truly it was so. We never saw our aged friend, at any time in twenty years, with a face so radiant with joy and he so full of cheerfulness, although weak in body, full of pain, and choking with a most terrible disease. God is good, and is a very present help, as this trying case proves, and the religion of Jesus is a power to cheer a dying bed, and bear his followers through the dark valley in shouts of triumph.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

IT may be, in part, the scheme of politicians, to further their plans, to excite fears and exaggerate dangers; but there is much ground for serious apprehension in relation to the future peace of the country. One senator, at a large public meeting, declared it within his knowledge the President intends to forcibly resist the legislation of Congress. President Johnson, last Tuesday evening, declared to an assemblage in front of his mansion that the country was in great peril at this moment, and intimated that he would expect the people to aid him in stemming the tide of anarchy and lawlessness that was hurrying the country to destruction. Horace Greeley, who is anything but an alarmist, writes in his Tribune of the 26th as follows: "During a political career of no inconsiderable length, during many years by no means wanting in affairs of great public interest, we have never known the general mind to be in a more apprehensive and unsatisfactory condition. The clouds of peace are heavier than were the clouds of war. Whether it be the fault or the misfortune of the President, he has contrived to make the community exceedingly uncomfortable; nor is the tone of those newspapers which profess to speak for him to any extent reassuring; for his organs are full of frightful hints and alarming premonitions. It is publicly intimated by one of his friends that 'he will meet the attempt to oust him from his position in a manner that will astonish everybody.'" Inside, there are other evils manifesting themselves. In order to conciliate the rum and infidel interests, both parties into which the country is divided, politically, are declaring themselves opposed to interfering in moral questions. Principles are to be sacrificed that parties may rule. This will be the shortest cut to destruction. The times are indeed dark and threatening.

The ravages of yellow fever in Texas are frightful. Not only the chief cities, but the small hamlets in the central and southern portions of the State, have been visited. A private letter from Houston mentions several villages that have been almost depopulated, and our exchanges, though evidently making the record as light as possible, give fearfully long lists of deaths. In Galveston, up to the 14th inst., there had been 1,054 deaths in a population of about twenty-two thousand. There must be painful suffering there and elsewhere that demands renewed exertions on the part of citizens in sections free from such afflictions.

FOREIGN.

The news from Europe that promised to be of great importance this week, amounts to but little. Garibaldi, who had arranged matters so that Rome was certain to fall into his hands, was interfered with by the Italian government at the instigation of Napoleon. He was arrested and imprisoned as he was crossing the Roman frontier. His arrest and imprisonment excited his adherents in Florence to such a degree that a serious street riot ensued, but the movement was promptly suppressed by the Government. The volunteers of the Army of "Action" have been dispersed by the Italian troops and have retired to their homes. King Victor Emanuel issued a proclamation explaining his action against Garibaldi, his regard for the faith of treaties imposing on him a "painful duty." The Italian Government offers to send Garibaldi to his home in Caprera, provided he gives his parole not to engage in further "hostilities" against the Roman States. Of course this only interrupts, not ends, the determination of the Italians to possess themselves of Rome. The Harlot will be all the more hated by this opposition of her upholders. Even in France an intense interest is being excited in favor of Garibaldi and against their Emperor. This will now spread all over Europe. In America but few are found not heartily in accord with the aim and spirit of the great revolutionist, Garibaldi.

Greek accounts persist in denying that the Cretans have submitted to the Turks. It is stated that the Goverment of the United States declines to mediate in this war. But aid from Russia is probably drawing near, and already inspires Cretans and Greeks with new courage.

Manchester was last week the scene of a bloody riot, a mob of Fenians undertaking to liberate some prisoners who were to be transported to Dublin. The police were overpowered and the prisoners liberated, but of the mob a number were wounded and killed. Several ringleaders were arrested.

While the French papers are, as usual, discussing the meaning of the last diplomatic note of their Government, and are doubtful whether it means peace, war, or nothing at all, the King of Prussia, the Crown Prince of Prussia, and the Grand Duke of Baden have made public addresses, which have, at least, the merit of being so plain as not to be misunderstood by any one. They all state in the most emphatic manner that the German nation desires to complete its unity peaceably, if no foreigner interferes, but by force of arms if no other course is left open. These addresses were followed by a very significant speech from Count Bismarck. He defied any foreign power to hinder the union, if the German people wished it. An official organ of Count Bismarck at the same time indicates that the South German States may now at any time enter the North German Confederation.

Admiral Farragut proves the maxim of Solomon, that a man diligent in his calling shall stand before kings. Lately, the Kings of Denmark and Greece had the honor of standing before him.

Poetry.

A Meek and Quiet Spirit.

"MY PEACE I GIVE UNTO YOU."

I HAVE a treasure that I prize,
Its like I cannot find;
'Tis far beyond what earth can give:
'Tis this—a quiet mind.

'Tis not that I am stupefied,
Or senseless, dull or blind;
'Tis God's own peace that reigns within,
Which forms my quiet mind.

I found this treasure at the cross;
And thus to every kind
Of weary, heavy-laden souls
Christ gives a quiet mind.

My Saviour's death and risen life
To give it were designed;
His love's the never-failing spring
Of this, my quiet mind.

The love of God within my breast
My heart to him doth bind:
This is the peace of heaven on earth,
This is my quiet mind.

I've many a cross to take up now,
And many left behind;
But present troubles move me not,
Nor shake my quiet mind.

And what may be to-morrow's cross
I never seek to find;
My Saviour says "Leave that to me,
And keep a quiet mind."

And well I know the Lord hath said,
To make my heart resigned,
That mercy still shall follow those
Who have this quiet mind.

I meet with pride and wit and wealth,
And scorn and looks unkind;
It matters not—I envy none,
While I've the quiet mind.

I'm waiting now to see the Lord,
Who's been to me so kind;
I want to thank him face to face
For this, my quiet mind.

The Great Image: or, The King's Dream.

KING Nebuchadnezzar, in the second year of his reign, dreamed a dream which troubled him exceedingly, yet he could not recall it to mind. The impression left upon him was so powerful that he could not sleep, so he called for the Chaldean sorcerers, magicians, and astrologers to come before him and tell him the dream. The Chaldeans said to him, "Tell thy servants the dream and we will tell thee the interpretation." But the King could not remember the dream, and told them, if they did not tell him the dream and the interpretation they should lose their lives; but if they would tell the dream and the interpretation he would reward them with gifts and great honor. They tried to persuade the king that he was unreasonable, but he could not be swerved from his purpose. The Chaldeans told him there was no man on earth who could do what the king required; nor any king or ruler who would ask such a thing of any one, only the gods possessed such power. Then the king became very angry, and commanded that all the wise men of Babylon should be destroyed. So a decree to that effect went forth, and Daniel and his companions were included in the number. Then Daniel asked the captain of the king's guard why the king was so hasty; and he told him all about the king's matter. Daniel went in to the king, and told him if he would give him time he would tell him what he desired. He then went to his house, and with his fellows prayed to the God of heaven concerning this secret, that they might not perish with the rest of the wise men.

It is never a vain thing to call upon the Lord; and in this instance the Lord heard their prayers and revealed the secret unto Daniel in a night-vision. Then Daniel praised the Lord who had heard his cry and given him the wisdom he desired. He went also to the captain and told him not to destroy the wise men, for he could show the king the interpretation. So he brought Daniel in before the king, in haste, and told him that he had found a man among the Judean captives who could tell the dream. The king began to question Daniel as to his ability; but he at once acknowledged to that heathen king that it was the God of heaven alone who was able to reveal secrets, and to make known to the king what should come to pass in the latter days.

This was the dream as related by Daniel. The king saw a great image stand before him, very bright, and the form was terrible. The head of the image was of fine gold; his breast and arms of silver; his belly and sides of brass; his legs of iron; his feet part of iron and part of clay. While he looked at the image he saw a stone, cut without hands, strike the image on the feet, and broke them. Then the great image in all its parts was broken in pieces, and became like chaff, and the wind carried them away; but the stone which smote the image became a great mountain and filled the earth. This was the dream, and he then proceeded to tell the interpretation.

AUNT LOUISA.

Going Home to be Forgiven.

SOME boys were playing at ball in a retired place, one afternoon, when they should have been at school. They absented themselves without leave, intending to go home at the usual hour. Thus they thought their absence would not be known to their parents and friends.

While thus engaged, Mr. Amos came along. "What are you doing here?" said he, "Your parents think you are at school. I shall let them know where you are, and what you are about." He passed on, and the boys stopped playing. What was to be done? He would be sure to tell their parents. It was too late to go to school, and too early to go home. Their consultations came to no comfortable conclusion; the probabilities of punishment were calculated. Some thought they might escape, but the prospects of meeting them were not promising. At length John Roberts rose up and said,

"I am going home."

"What for? To get your flogging, and have it over?" said one.

"No; I am going home to be forgiven;" and away he went.

John had never played truant before. He had very kind parents; they would deny him nothing that was for his good, and he felt that he had treated them very ungratefully by acting contrary to their known wishes. He resolved to go home and make a full confession of his fault, and ask their forgiveness; he felt sure of receiving it, and he went home to be forgiven. It was a good thing to go home for.

This incident suggests what is the duty of the child to God: he should go to his heavenly Father to be forgiven. This should be his first object, for forgiveness is his first need. He should go as John went—with a sense of his guilt, and with confidence that he will be forgiven.

Beautiful Extract.

WE possess a genuine fragment which Cicero has preserved to us from a lost work of Aristotle. It runs thus: "If there were beings who lived in the depths of the earth, in dwellings adorned with statues and paintings, and everything which is possessed in rich abundance by those whom we esteem fortunate, and if these beings could receive tidings of the power and might of the gods, and could then emerge from their hidden dwellings, through the open fissures of the earth to the places which we inhabit: if they could suddenly behold the earth, and the sea, and the vault of heaven, could recognize the expanse of the cloudy firmament and the might of the winds of heaven, and admire the sun in its majesty, beauty, and radiant effulgence; and, lastly, when night vailed the earth in darkness, they could behold the starry heavens, the changing moon, and the stars rising and setting in the unvarying course ordained from eternity; they would surely exclaim, There are gods, and such great things must be the work of their hands."

It has been justly observed that this passage is alone sufficient to corroborate Cicero's opinion of "the golden flow of Aristotle's eloquence," and that his works are pervaded by something of Plato's genius. Such a testimony to the existence of the heavenly powers, drawn from the beauty and stupendous greatness of the works of creation, is rarely to be met with in the works of antiquity.—Humboldt's Cosmos.

Be Cheerful, Christian.

AN old Scottish divine, in commenting on Psalm c. 2, "Serve the Lord with gladness," says: "Your serving him doth not glorify him, unless it be with gladness. A Christian's looks glorify God. We glorify God by walking cheerfully. It is a glory to God when the world sees that a Christian hath that within him that can make him cheerful in the worst times. He can, with the nightingale, sing with the thorn at his breast. The people of God have ground of cheerfulness. They are justified, and instated into adoption; and this creates inward peace; it makes music within, whatever storms are without. If we consider what Christ hath wrought for us by his blood, and wrought in us by his Spirit, it is a ground of great cheerfulness, and this cheerfulness glorifies God. It reflects upon a master, when the servant is always drooping and sad: sure he is kept at hard commons; his master does not give him what is fitting. So when God's people hang their harps on willows, sure they do not serve a good master, and repent of their choice; this reflects dishonor upon God. As the gross sins of the wicked bring scandal upon the gospel, so do the uncheerful lives of the godly. Religion doth not take away our joy, but refines and clarifies it. It doth not break our viol, but it tunes and makes our music sweeter."

The Power of Kindness.

IN a town not thirty miles from Boston, some years ago, a young lady, who aimed at the high standard of governing without force, and had determined to live or die by her faith, went into a school, which was far below the average in point of good order. Such was the gentleness and sweetness of her manners and intercourse with her pupils, that, for a few days, there was nothing but harmony. Soon, however, some of the older pupils began to fall back into their former habits of inattention and mischief. This relapse she met with tender and earnest remonstrances, and by an increased manifestation of interest in them. But it was soon whispered among the transgressors, that she would not punish, and this added at once to their confidence and their numbers. The obedient were seduced into disobedience, and the whole school seemed rapidly resolving into anarchy. Near the close of one forenoon, when this state of things was approaching a crisis, the teacher suspended the regular exercises of the school, and made an appeal individually to her insubordinate pupils. But finding no hope-giving response from their looks and words, she returned to her seat, and bowed her head, and wept bitterly. When her paroxysm of grief had subsided, she dismissed the school for the morning. After the intermission, she returned, resolving on one more effort, but anticipating, should that fail, the alternative of abandoning the school. She found the pupils all at their seats. Taking her own, she paused for a moment, to gain strength for her final appeal. At this juncture of indescribable pain, several of the ring-leaders rose from their seats and approached her. They said to her that they appeared on account of the school, and particularly on their own, to ask pardon for what they had done, to express their sorrow for the pain they had caused her, and to promise, in behalf of all, that her wishes should thereafter be cordially obeyed. Her genuine sorrow had touched a spot in their hearts which no blows could ever reach; and, from that hour, the school went on with a degree of intellectual improvement never know before; and, like the sweet accord of music, when every instrument has been attuned by a master's hand, no jaring note ever afterward arose to mar its perfect harmony.

"Fred Douglass."

WHO is he? A colored man, who years ago was a slave, but "ran away" from the house of bondage, and was made free by anti-slavery men, who paid to his former master a sum for which free-papers were procured. Thenceforward he used his manly powers and eloquence in the cause of human liberty, and he has lived to see the emancipation of his race. He is still unyielding in support of free institutions. He has long been located in Rochester, N. Y. Recently a brother and his family came to him in that city. The following letter (private, yet published) shows his brotherly heart in a touching manner:

"I have been," he writes to the editor of The Independent, "keeping a kind of hotel all Summer! My poor brother Perry—after a bondage of fifty-six years, deeply marked by the hardships and sorrows of that hateful condition; and after a separation from me during forty years, as complete as if he had lived on another planet—came to me two months ago, with his family of six, and took up his abode with me. To him—dear old fellow!—one who has carried me on his shoulders many a time (for he is older than I, though my head seems to contradict it)—one who defended me from the assaults of bigger boys when I needed defence—I have been mainly devoting myself, and gladly so.

"I have now completed for him a snug little cottage on my own grounds, where my dear old slavery-scarred and long-lost brother may spend in peace, with his family, the remainder of his days. Though no longer young, he is no sluggard. Slavery got the best of his life, but he is still strong and hopeful. I wish his old master could see him now—cheerful, hopeful, and 'taking care of himself.' If slavery were not dead, and I did not in some sort wish to forget its terrible hardships, blighting curses, and shocking horrors, I would try to write a narrative of my brother Perry's bondage. But let the old system go! I would not call its guilty ghost from the depths into which its crimes have cast it. I turn gladly from the darkness of the past to the new and better dispensation now dawning."

Letters and Extracts.

From William Wood.

LAWRENCE, MASS., Sept. 15, 1867.

BR. STORRS: Not being able to be present at the annual gathering of Life believers in Wilbraham, I was much rejoiced to learn that those, though not of the same faith did place at your disposal a shelter from the rain whereby you were enabled to convene together. The act was no more than every one should do; but it is more noticeable from the fact that there has been, and still is, a tendency to oppose, and ofttimes to show a bitter, quarrelsome spirit to such as do not see, or will not agree with our opinions. We cannot be a recipient of eternal life unless our character is fashioned and moulded into the image of the great head of the church. It is written, Isa. lii. 7, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace;....that publisheth salvation. Thy watchmen....shall see eye to eye when the Lord shall bring again Zion." Again. "All we like sheep have gone astray," (yes, we must all confess to this) "we have turned every one to his own way....But he was wounded for our transgressions....He was brought as a lamb to the slaughter, yet he opened not his mouth." And can we, who profess to be followers of our Lord and master, feel angry in any sense, though an unbeliever, a man of the world should scoff at us, or one who may profess the religion of Jesus should oppose our sentiments, and bring before us a stubborn and bitter spirit? Ah, no! The religion of Jesus Christ "suffereth long, and is kind; it envieth not: is not puffed up; thinketh no evil; rejoiceth in the truth, and endureth all things" without a murmur. It would be profitable not only to myself but others, who have expressed a desire, if I could occasionally contribute to your columns; but differing on some points, very prominent ones, I have withheld until the way opens. In the meantime, may the Almighty God bless you and your endeavors to do good; and in the morning of that glorious day may you be ushered into that presence where there is fulness of joy and pleasures evermore. Your Brother, who is a firm believer of "No life out of Jesus Christ."

P. S. Enclosed is $3 for the HERALD another year.

From J. L. Swain.

NORTHWOOD NARROWS, N. H., Sept. 16, 1867.

BR. STORRS: You will find enclosed $6 to help support the HERALD OF LIFE. I will try and do something more, if the Lord does not come before Vol. v. is completed. Oh, how we were pleased with our paper No. 46. The spirited letters it contained, showing that such union and harmony existed in the meetings of the life believers, at Wilbraham. Oh, those sweet letters it contained from Br. McAllister and others did cheer our poor hearts. God bless them, and all the rest of our correspondents, is my prayer.

There has been a great deal said about the HERALD OF LIFE dying; and in fact, I thought it showed symptons of death, myself; (but I must been drowsy). If it has been sickly, it has revived, and at present we consider it in good health, and we expect it will live until it has done its work. Why should it not live? It is a healthy child, so to speak. It has the best of fathers, the God of heaven, and consequently he will see that it is cared for. For men to talk about the doctrine of life only in Christ "dying out!" permit me to say, I consider that impossible.

No death about it. Who would think of people dying if there was no such thing as death in the land? Bless the Lord, we've got the truth on this point. I hope that union may exist between us and Christ till he comes; and if it does, we shall be saved in that day. Now, may the blessing of God rest in copious showers on the Editor and all that are concerned in heralding forth the glad tidings of No future life out of Christ, the LIFE-GIVER. Your brother in Christ.

From A. Boynton.

WEST BATAVIA, N. Y., Sept. 15, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I have delayed writing because of our tent meeting, which has just come off. I hoped to do something for you at this meeting, but can only send $3 now, and that from those who have received the paper before. Yet I am encouraged even in this. One brother to whom the paper was sent free, now sends $2 for the next volume, and is so affected by its truthfulness that I am sure he will follow on in the right track. O, I am so glad for a paper open to a free investigation of Bible subjects, even that of a personal devil. So on in the good begun way: we need not fear getting very far into error while we keep the word of the Lord before us as our chart. Having clearly defined the great outlines of truth, the filling up will all work in most beautifully and harmoniously.

A future life only in Christ tears away and removes forever the last vestige of that dark cloud of error, eternal torment; and makes God's loveliness, even in the sinner's doom, shine forth clearly. I was with you in spirit at Wilbraham, and was made so glad when reading of the glorious results of your deliberations there. Yes, it is God's cause; and woe to any who are found resisting it.

I find it somewhat unpleasant to be holding so many doctrines which seem to be a burdening stone to my brethren; but then, the loveliness and sweet assurances of it repay all sacrifice. The little hell of our Advent brethren is becoming quite as repugnant to all my feelings of justice and goodness as the eternal one of popular theology used to be. Bless God, the truth dispels the whole thing entirely. The divine administration, in all its departments, is founded in and carried out on the broad principle of universal love.

From Wm. Montgomery.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1867.

BR. STORRS: Enclosed you will find five dollars, my subscription to the HERALD OF LIFE. I am glad to see that you had such a good time at the annual meeting, and that the glorious cause of "No future life out of Christ" is on the increase, but am sorry to see so much valuable time and space taken up with the discussion of the personality of the devil; as I think there are other topics which would be much more profitable for the readers of the paper.

I have long thought that the subject of experimental religion was not set forth as prominently as it ought to be. I would like to see at least one article every week on the necessity of personal piety. You know, as a general thing, the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE have not the privilege of hearing the word preached in its purity; and although it is to them a great boon to get a paper that does advocate the truth, yet they want something more. "Man cannot live by bread alone." What would it profit me, if I had all knowledge, and understood all mysteries, and had not the love of God in my heart?

Excuse these remarks, as I do not wish to dictate, but thought it my duty to make the above suggestion. Just let it go for what it is worth, and believe me to remain, yours, waiting for eternal life.

From Eld. J. Parry.

SANDY HILL, N. Y., Sept. 17, 1867.

BRO. STORRS: The HERALD OF LIFE failed me last week, and thus reminded me of my deficiency in not sending you my subscription for vol. v, which I will now endeavor to rectify by sending you $5 on my account. I have forgotten how my account stands with you, will you inform me? I am glad the prospect of the HERALD is so good; and hope the good cause may prosper: for though I do not agree with you in all points of doctrine, the spirit of the paper is so good, I wish the example may be followed by some others. The gospel of the kingdom is in my opinion the great central point of attraction to all true believers, and it is sad that all who receive the truth, in the love of it, cannot merge their minor differences in its refulgent light. We shall never see eye to eye till the Lord brings again Zion. If we are in reality on the road thither, why should we fall out by the way? There are but too few travelling the narrow road; and narrow as it is, there is room enough for all who choose to walk therein. When will it be said again by those, who with argus eyes scrutinize the conduct of professors, "Behold how these Christians love one another?" I fear that instead of this Christian union, so visible in the primitive church, the refined Christianity of the present day has contrived to separate most widely those whom God designed, in his word, to be united together in indissoluble bonds of faith and love. The only conclusion I can come to in the present condition of the Advent churches is, that "an enemy hath done this," to scatter, to devour. Yours in hope of life.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR: Your account is all right. We fear others did not receive the last two papers, as we had a misfortune, both weeks, in getting the wrappers written. If any have not received those numbers, who are entitled to them, if they will inform us, we will try to supply them.

From B. Gifford.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Sept. 14, 1867.

BR. STORRS: Enclosed find $2, for which please send me one copy, each, of your Six Sermons, Watch Tower, and Life from the Dead; the balance, if any, you will place to the Tract Fund. My object in having them separate is, that I can loan them, so that three persons can be reading at the same time, and thereby spread those glorious truths more widely. I do think they are the glorious truth indeed; and I rejoice exceedingly that I ever heard them; and I give glory to God that the scales of darkness and of early prejudice have fallen from my eyes, and I am enabled to see light and beauty, as well as perfect harmony throughout the sacred word; and I am anxiously looking for the appearing of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; our great and only LIFE-GIVER. I wish we could have more of the preaching of the word than we have in this city; but I must try to be content until the way is opened. I often go to the M. E. church, (of which I was once a member; but resigned because I could no longer subscribe to their creeds, and hear what they call preaching the gospel; but I can now see that it is a different kind of gospel from that which Christ and his apostles used to preach; for they preached a resurrection from the dead, by the Spirit of him (Christ) dwelling in us, while orthodoxy preaches a "re-union of soul and body," at some time or other; but they seem not to know when. Pray for me, brother; and may God bless and comfort you exceedingly. Yours in hope.

From Levi Boughton.

VICTOR, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I have delayed writing longer than I had intended, as I have no idea of doing without the HERALD OF LIFE; for I consider it the nearest the truth of any paper printed. Though I say so, I do not think all that appears in it is truth; but the doctrine of life only in Christ I believe with all my heart; and I rejoice that evidences are accumulating that the time is near when our Lord will take the kingdom and reign: but I have no faith in the definite time movement. The positions of the governments of the world look ominous of some great event just at hand; and we know the next universal kingdom is to be Christ's everlasting kingdom, under the whole heavens; and when we see the increase of crime, of all kinds, who that loves right can but pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven?" Enclosed are $5.

MRS. E. G. MCCULLOUGH, West Chester, Pa., writes: I think I can pay $20. You may depend on that amount from me. I very much approve of advertising our paper, and will help to raise the means. A lady at Cape May C. H. (to whom I wish the paper sent) is seeking for the truth. She is not serving God from fear, but love. She told me if she could be convinced that future torment was not true, she would be a far happier woman; not on her own account, but for those who will be lost. Her husband is a decided infidel. I think if he was to read our paper his infidelity would disappear. They are very kind hearted. A friend at Green Creek, N. J., told me if our people would come there, they would be well received and good might be done; and I say the same of this place, a town of 5,000 inhabitants. Professors of religion here seem to think it a sin to talk of a future life out of meeting. I heard one say, to talk of religion at a tea-table was irreverent. If I had Br. Grim's address I would write to him. He is the very person to come here. I am thankful that the paper is to be continued.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR: Br. Jacob Grim's address is, No. 1,314 Franklin St., Philadelphia. He is just the man to visit West Chester, Pa., and we hope he will do it soon. The HERALD OF LIFE will be sent to your friend at Cape May C. H., as you request.

RACHAEL GORHAM, North East Pa., says: I have not been capable of writing for quite a number of years. I should like to write if my trembling hand would allow me to. I have had your paper for nearly two years; and there is a great deal in it that is entirely new to me. I like the paper, and want it, if I can get it, as long as I am able to read. I am 81 years of age. You will find enclosed $2.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH.

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

TEXT—"Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." Rom. iii., 28.

It is not uncommon to hear men say, "The Bible is full of contradictions." The contradictions, if real, would indeed make that book unreliable, or unworthy of credit. Some wish to prove it so, while others, sincerely desirous to know the truth, are stumbled by a seeming want of harmony in the Scriptures. We are disposed to believe the supposed contradictions are in the theories of men, and not in the Bible itself. Different expounders of the word form adverse theories from the lack of a comprehensive view of Bible truth as a whole. They fix upon isolated texts, and draw out a system from a few portions of the word, without seriously inquiring whether the general tenor of Scripture is not adverse to their theory. We regard such a course as calculated to mislead, and plunge in error those who pursue it: it is not "rightly dividing the word of truth," so as to see it in all its harmonious proportions. To do this, we should carefully inquire what is the general tenor of the word of truth, viewed in all its parts. That point ascertained, the few texts which may seem to clash with this general scope of the word, will be found to bear an interpretation in harmony with it.

If the Bible is from God, some interpretation must harmonize its teachings. That construction, whatever it is, must be the truth.

Our present object is, to consider the Scripture teaching on the subject of Justification. Different and unharmonious views have been maintained on this topic. Some use the language of Paul, Rom. v. 18, "Therefore, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life," and conclude that all men, without exception, will be eternally saved in life. Such a construction, however, must be made to harmonize with the general tenor of Scripture, or it is not reliable.

Others fix on such texts as Rom. iii., 28, "Therefore we conclude a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law," and argue that a man's works have nothing to do with his acceptance with God here, or hereafter: that, there is only one ground of this, and that is faith; and no matter how evil his conduct may be, if he maintains his faith, he is safe. Such a view may be found unharmonious with the testimony in general; and if so, it cannot be correct.

Another class of men insist that justification is wholly by works; they use the language of James, "Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar;" and the words of Jesus, "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned," in proof that there is no ground of justification except that of right doing. Here, again, a conclusion is arrived at which is not in harmony with many plain declarations that a man is justified by faith.

Can these texts, which give rise to such contradictory theories, be embodied in a harmonious system, so that each shall occupy its important position in the great whole of truth? We judge they can; but wish not to force our opinions on any man. Let those who read or hear be the jury, and we will present the evidence.

We will first make some general remarks on justification; or what to justify implies, or signifies.

1. To justify, sometimes means to approve; as when they say, "a man is justified in doing" a certain act or acts; or we justify him in what he has done.

2. It means, to declare one innocent who is really so, though he may have been accused.

3. It also has the signification of the acquittal of one who was really guilty, for some reason or consideration. In this latter sense it is used in the language, "a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law."

4. To justify, also signifies continued approbation, on account of continued obedience. In this sense it is used by James, when he says, "Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he offered Isaac his son upon the altar?"

From all these remarks it may be seen, there are different stages or degrees of justification; and that every finally glorified man passes through them all, in some period of his trial state.

We will now illustrate the several stages in the progress to the final justification; and will do so by the figure of a race to be run and a prize to be obtained.

1. A man may be justified—that is, approved to run a race for a prize who is not yet justified, or accepted as having actually entered on the race. This idea embraces such texts as Rom. v. 18, "The free gift came upon all men to justification of life." All men, through the one offence of Adam, were subjected to death, or condemned to death: but, by the one righteousness of the second Adam, Christ, the free gift is bestowed of being placed in a state where life may be secured, notwithstanding the previous condemnation. No man hereafter shall fail of life by the fault of Adam, but is placed under the mercy of life offered; or is justified to run in the race for life, if they will: they are approved so far as to give them a personal opportunity to secure life. This is without any regard to previous acts of their own; and places them on ground in which their own course will decide whether they shall live or be held under the dominion of death. They all have the prize of life set before them, and are called to enter the race for it. This is the first stage of justification: from it no man is excluded: it is upon all.

2. A man may be justified, or accepted as actually entered on the race, who has complied with the terms specified as prerequisite to running. This class embraces those spoken of in such texts as Rom. iii. 28, "justified by faith without the deeds of the law." It is not any previous goodness in them that is made the ground of their justification or acceptance to run in the race for life, or for which their past sins are remitted; but for present compliance with offered grace, or favor. The faith is an act of acceptance by the runner. By this act he is justified, without any previous goodness or righteousness. This is the second stage or degree of justification. Of this we shall speak more particularly before closing.

3. A man may be justified or approved while running the race by a careful adherence to the laws and requirements of the race.

This idea embraces such texts as James ii., 21, "Was not Abraham our father justified by works when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar?" It is in the day of trial, after he had been accepted to run the race. Abraham had previously been justified by faith: now, as a believer, running the race for the prize, he is justified by works, or obedience to God's commands. Such justification is by works, which he must perform, or his previous stage of justification avails him nothing, and in fact he forfeits it, and is condemned. For, saith the apostle, if a man strive for mastery, yet is he not crowned except he strive lawfully. 2 Tim. ii. 5. This justification by works, in the day of a believer's trial, is the third stage or degree of his acceptance; and by obedience, in this trial, is his faith made perfect, or gains additional strength.

4. A man may be justified when he has completed the race, or he may be accepted to receive the prize. This implies all the three previous stages of justification; yet it is made on the ground that he has conformed to and obeyed the laws of the race. He must have been accepted to run for life—he must have entered on the race by the specified means, viz., faith—he must have been obedient to the rules of it while running—and he must have run to the goal appointed, or to the end of the course. Here comes the fourth stage of justification; and it is by the evidence of works, or obedience. This embraces such texts as the following: "For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom" . . . "for I was a hungered, and ye gave me meat; thirsty and ye gave me drink; naked and ye clothed me," etc. These things done were the evidence that they had entered right, run right, and they now are called up in their justification, in the final result; and they enter "into LIFE ETERNAL," which is the glorious prize given of God to all such as have passed the four stages of justification of which we have spoken.

Here we see a most beautiful harmony of texts, which some had supposed contradicted each other. It is from want of attention to the Scripture, as a whole, that men so often come to the conclusion, the statements are contradictory. The contradiction, as we said at the outset, is in men's imperfect theories, and not in the Bible itself.

We now return to that stage of justification which is by faith, of which the apostle speaks in our text, Rom. iii., 28. This, as the context shows, is the justification of a man—who has been a sinner—in the day he embraces the offer to run for life. The apostle shows this cannot be by the deeds of the law, for all have sinned: and the law once violated can offer no deliverance; for its demands are penal—wrath, not mercy. "By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh"—no man—"be justified:" . . . "for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God:" they have failed to come up to the standard which alone can fit them for the enjoyment of God in his glory. Hence to be justified before him, it must be by another method than that of law: if justified, it must be "freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; whom God hath set forth, a propitiation through faith in his blood"—his death—"to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past" . . . "that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." This justification excludes all sinners from boasting; for it is not by works, but by faith in Christ they are justified. "Therefore," adds the apostle, "we conclude a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." Hence any sinner may enter on the race for life, whatever may have been his past sins; and he may be accepted to run this race as if he never had sinned, by complying with the demand to believe in Jesus as the propitiation, by his blood shed for our sins that are past. It is a system, originating in God's love and benevolence, to put sinful men in the way to eternal life, without sacrificing his justice, or giving license to sin; and a system adapted to the state and condition of all the race, as sinners, whose case would be otherwise hopeless. Truly, great has been the mercy of God to sinful men.

The justification of which we are speaking, then, is that of an adult, in the day of his personal acceptance of God's proffered grace. This is by faith alone. Man fell into sin by unbelief, and forfeited life. It is right and proper that he should regain a standing before God by faith. Such is the course God has appointed for all who are capable of that exercise. To the inquiry,

What is that faith, essential to such persons? We answer: In Hebrews xi., 6, the apostle tells us, "Without faith it is impossible to please God; for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Belief, then, in the existence of God, and in his placability, is essential to this faith; without this assurance to the mind, the faith of which we speak would never show itself.

If a more definite answer is asked for, as to what the faith is by which a sinner is justified, in the day of his acceptance to enter on the race for life, we would say:

It is certainly preceded by a conviction that he is dying: and that, for his sins, he deserves to die. This is followed by a hope in the mercy of God through Christ, which leads him to see the love of Christ in becoming a propitiation for his sins. Hence his faith receives as a fact—"Christ loved me, and gave himself for me." Gal. ii., 20. In this transaction the believer is individualized; that is, it is an individual recognition that Christ loved him and died for him, as if there had been no other soul of man to be the object of this love and death. It is not a general faith that Christ loved the world and tasted death for every man. Though that be a truth, yet it is not the truth a perishing sinner lays hold of when he starts in the race for life. Nothing short of the truth, "Christ loved me, and gave himself for me," can meet his present state. This faith brings him into direct communion with Christ, the LIFE-GIVER, and makes him a partaker of a new and divine life: or, he becomes a "new creature:" he is in Christ, and has commenced a course for the consummation of the new life in its eternal confirmation; which is the prize after which he is hereafter to run. Hence, there is an entire reliance on Christ for acceptance with God, and as the LIFE-GIVER, by whom alone life eternal can be obtained. He embraces Christ as "the way, the truth, and the life," and fully accepts, and realizes, the fact, that "No man cometh unto the Father but by" Christ.

Being now accepted of God to run for life eternal, he has "peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ," and should run the race "looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God." He has yet before him, his justification as an obedient believer in his day of trial, and his final justification in order to receive the prize of immortality, eternal life; of which he is to be put in possession by a revival into it, according to the purpose of God and the promise of Christ thus expressed:

"This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I WILL RAISE HIM UP AT THE LAST DAY." John vi., 40.

THE SHAKING OF THE NATIONS.

THE entire body of Adventists, in this country and in England, have persistently looked forward to a time of trouble among earthly powers that should presage the coming of the "Desire of all Nations." God destroyed the old world, not because of the holy character of the antediluvians, but because of their wickedness. Just so, in the end of this world, the inhabitants will give themselves up to "eating, drinking, marrying and giving in marriage," and utterly ignore not only the signs the Saviour gave to mark the period of his return to earth, but all true religion, and instead, with itching ears, will heap to themselves teachers having the form of godliness but denying the power thereof. Thus we are taught that in this age of the world a purely worldly or anti-christian spirit will prevail, and the religious element will be most deeply implicated, and will also be visited in the most condign manner; to their cries for recognition as his followers they will be dismayed by the response "I never knew you." And they will go down in a destruction only paralleled in its suddenness and overwhelming character by that of the flood of waters.

We have proclaimed these things as divine predictions, and the convictions of our hearts; and have steadfastly waited for their more perfect manifestation, notwithstanding the mockings to which they have subjected us from religious scoffers who have taunted us, time and again, with the query (put in their mouths by prophecy,) "Where is the promise of his coming?".

In times past we have recognized many of the tokens indicating that the end was drawing nigh. They have been increasing as we have journeyed down the highway on which the "signs" are written, until now the chart by which we have been guided seems to have run out and we are left, in expectation, waiting for the Master himself. Excepting the "sign of the Son of man in heaven," we know of no other waymark to lead us further into the future, and that is most generally accepted as synchronizing with the visible appearance of the descending King. We have no right, therefore, to delude ourselves or others that there is another day allotted to a wicked world and apostate sleeping church to fill up their history.

The last event, and the one we think, that has entered most generally in the calculations of all our brethren, is a state of anarchy among the nations, either of general war or preparations for a universal conflict of arms. Strange as it may seem to the world, though not to those who have the "sure word," while the "nations are angry" and marshalling for conflict, the world is to hear resounding on every hand the cry of "peace, peace." To this state we have at last come, and most fully so. There is, confessedly among all classes of men, the prospect of a more general breaking up of every tie that has bound the people of this earth together, than has ever yet been witnessed. Statesmen are proclaiming this, journals are dilating on it, the merchants of the earth are bewailing it, and all hearts are truly failing them for fear in a sense never before witnessed. But from the kings of the earth, and from its rulers, a counter cry of "peace" is heard. Napoleon says he is for peace; his government was established as one of "peace;" the Emperor of Austria announces from his throne that all is "peace;" we hear the same assurance from Prussia; even the Sultan of Turkey has almost subverted the authority of the Koran that he may have "peace;" England has just taken the first step of sacrificing her aristocracy that she may have peace at home; and, not last, our own country has been devoting itself for three years to accomplish her work of "peace."

But where can this blissful state of peace be found? Not surely in France, where an intense agitation for war has been wrought up by her wily Emperor, who seeks in foreign aggressions to save himself from sliding into the abyss which he ever sees at his feet. Not in Austria, whose Emperor has just ended a secret conference with this Napoleon to plan the destruction of that power which has keenly humiliated each. Prussia understands and is prepared for the crisis which has not been hid from her astute leader. Beyond, Russia is confident, and no longer needs to conceal her plans to consummate the one great purpose marking its destiny, to follow the fingerposts set up by the tiger Empress, Catherine I., that point to Constantinople. Italy, for the moment, holds her eager patriots from wresting Rome from that "wicked," which is complacently saying, in the midst of sorrows, anguish and death that are menacing it, "I sit a Queen and shall see no sorrow." England has just shipped a military expedition ostensibly to Abyssinia, but no doubt to be ultimately used to oppose the course of the Tartar, who is under marching orders for the Bosphorus, and already crowding over the dependencies of Victoria. The smaller powers are all being forced into a similar attitude, but the initiative belongs to the great military powers. In our own land, not even preceding the rebellion, nor in its darkest days, was there such a feeling of heart-failing among all those who love their country and its institutions. Then the enemy's powers were fully mastered and the final triumph certain. Now, all seems dread and dismal from the uncertain character of the storm that has been gathering and darkening the land for the past two years. South and Central America, as ever, are in a state of turbulence and bloodshed, but now increasing in its magnitude.

In the moral world the aspect is even more striking. Europe has long been given up to a state of sensuous existence where heart religion finds no place: it has been "burnt out" and left no sign of life; the English papers are bewailing the state of degrading immodesty manifested in all the highest circles of society. The combination of its laboring classes to control one another through arson and murder and other criminal acts, and the condition of its religious bodies, give sad evidence that it is fast reaching a ruinous end. The chronicles of crime and faithlessness in any grade of society in our country need no comment to point out whither we have attained. And yet these last two countries are about the only spots where a semblance of respect is shown for the christian religion.

The material interests are also perplexed. Gold is heaped up in England and the Continent to an extent unparallelled in history; and at the same moment, business distress becomes more marked. The only solution assigned is the prevalent apprehension of extended war and anarchy.

The physical condition of the earth has already manifested its appointed signs, or mainly so, but still we read of a famine in India last year that swept off 5,000,000 beings. We see pestilence raging in Asia and portions of Europe, and to some large extent in America. These things show that the world is nowhere in a state of a blissful peace.

Altogether, the present condition of the world, as expressed even by those who scout with contempt all confidence in prophetic teachings, is but a fac-simile of the picture drawn by the Divine Spirit, to represent the state of the world when Jesus is to appear and take the kingdom and reign forever on the earth, when he is to destroy all earthly governments, and dash them to pieces like a potter's vessel, and then he will reign in righteousness, his power extending everywhere under the whole heaven.

How can we fail, then, to lift up our heads when we thus see that the time of redemption draweth nigh. It may be that the distraction of the world is to be increased, and time be required to finish up the gathering of all nations; but we cannot doubt for a moment that the car of God has been already in motion which is to bring upon the world its final catastrophe.

W. M.

THE COMING OF CHRIST.

BY RICHARD BAXTER.

THIS man of God lived two hundred years ago. Few men have been more deeply devoted to God, or held closer communion with him.

The following extract is from his work, "The Saints' Rest." Tract Society edition, page 45:

1. "The most glorious coming and appearance of the Son of God may well be reckoned in his people's glory. For their sake he came into the world, suffered, died, rose, ascended; and for their sake it is that he will return. To this end will Christ come again to receive his people unto himself, that where he is, there they may be also. The bridegroom's departure was not upon divorce. He did not leave us with a purpose to return no more. He hath left pledges enough to assure us to the contrary. We have his word, his many promises, his ordinances, which show forth his death till he come; and his Spirit, to direct, sanctify, and comfort, till his return. We have frequent tokens of love from him, to show us he forgets not his promise, nor us. We daily behold the forerunners of his coming, foretold by himself. We see the fig-tree putteth forth leaves, and therefore know that Summer is nigh. Though the riotous would say, My Lord delayeth his coming, yet let the saints lift up their heads, for their redemption draweth nigh. Alas! fellow Christians, what should we do if our Lord should not return? What a case are we left in! What! leave us in the midst of wolves, and among lions, a generation of vipers, and here forget us! Did he buy us so dear, and then leave us sinning, suffering, groaning, dying daily; and will he come no more to us? It cannot be. This is like our unkind dealing with Christ, who, when we feel ourselves warm in the world, care not for coming to him: but this is not like Christ's dealing with us. He that would come to suffer, will surely come to triumph. He that would come to purchase, will surely come to possess. Where else were all our hopes? What were become of our faith, our prayers, our tears, and our waiting? What were all the patience of the saints worth to them? Were we not left of all men the most miserable? Christians, hath Christ made us forsake all the world, and be forsaken of all the world? to hate all, and be hated by all? and all this for him, that we might have him instead of all? And will he, think you, after all this, forget us, and forsake us himself? Far be such a thought from our hearts! But why staid he not with his people while he was here? Why? Was not the work on earth done? Must he not take possession of glory in our behalf? Must he not intercede with the Father, plead his sufferings, be filled with the Spirit to send forth, receive authority, and subdue his enemies? Our abode here is short. If he had staid on earth what would it have been to enjoy him for a few days and then die? . . . He will have us live by faith, and not by sight.

"O, fellow-Christians, what a day will that be, when we, who have been kept prisoners by sin, by sinners, by the grave, shall be brought out by the Lord himself! It will not be such a coming as his first was, in poverty and contempt, to be spit upon, and buffeted, and crucified again. He will not come, O careless world! to be slighted and neglected by you any more. Yet that coming wanted not its glory. If the heavenly host, for the celebration of his nativity, must praise God, with what shouting will angels and saints at that day proclaim glory to God, peace and good-will toward men! If a star must lead men from remote parts of the world, to come to worship a child in a manger; how will the glory of his next appearing constrain all the world to acknowledge his sovereignty! If, riding on an ass, he enter Jerusalem with hosannas; with what peace and glory will he come toward the New Jerusalem! If, when he was in the form of a servant, they cry out, 'What manner of man is this, that even the winds and sea obey him?' what will they say, when they shall see him coming in his glory, and the heavens and the earth obey him? 'Then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn.' To think and speak of that day with horror, doth well beseem the impenitent sinner, but ill the believing saint . . . shall not the saints with inconceivable gladness, cry, 'Yonder is he whose blood redeemed us, whose Spirit cleansed us, whose law did govern us, in whom we trusted, and he hath not deceived our trust; for whom we long waited, and now we see we have not waited in vain! O cursed corruption! that would have had us turn to the world and present things, and say, Why should we wait for the Lord any longer? Now we see, Blessed are all they that wait for him.' And now, Christians, should we not put up that petition heartily, 'Thy kingdom come?' 'The Spirit and the bride say, Come: and let him that heareth,' and readeth, say, Come.' Our Lord himself says, 'Surely I come quickly. Amen: even so, come! Lord Jesus.'"

The above is from an abridgment of Baxter's original work, leaving out some excellent sentiments which are found in an older edition.

"The coming of Christ is frequently mentioned in the Prophets, as the great support of his people's spirits till then. And whenever the Apostles would quicken to duty, or encourage to patient waiting, they usually did it by mentioning Christ's coming. Why then do we not use more this cordial consideration, whenever we want support and comfort? Oh, how should it then be the character of a Christian, to wait for the Son of God from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus who delivered us from the wrath to come? 1 Thess. i., 10. And with all faithful diligence to prepare to meet our Lord with joy. And seeing his coming is of purpose to be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe, what thought should glad our hearts more than the thought of that day.

"A little while, indeed, we have not seen him, but yet a little while and we shall see him, for he hath said, I will not leave you comfortless, but will come unto you. We were comfortless, should he not come. And while we daily gaze and look up to heaven, after him, let us remember what the angels said, This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven. Let every Christian that heareth and readeth, say, Come; and our Lord himself saith, 'Surely I come quickly.' Amen. Even so, come Lord Jesus."

Such were the sentiments of this "learned and pious author," as he is now called, in the Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge.

HOW A RICH MAN MAY BE HAPPY.

JOHN MCDONOUGH, the millionaire of New Orleans, has engraved upon his tomb a series of maxims he had prescribed as a rule for his guidance through life, and to which his success in business is mainly attributed. They contain so much wisdom that we copy them:

RULES FOR GUIDANCE OF MY LIFE, 1804.

Remember always that labor is one of the conditions of our existence. Time is gold; throw not one minute away, but place each one to account. Do unto all men as you would be done by. Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day. Never bid another do what you can do yourself. Never covet what is not your own. Never think any matter so trifling as not to deserve notice. Never give out that which does not first come in. Never spend but to produce. Let the greatest order regulate the transactions of your life. Study in your course of life to do the greatest amount of good. Deprive yourself of nothing necessary to your comfort, but live in an honorable simplicity. Labor, then, to the last moment of your existence. Pursue strictly the above rules, and the Divine blessing and riches of every kind will flow upon you to your heart's content; but first of all remember that the chief and great duty of your life should be to tend, by all means in your power, to the honor and glory of our Divine Creator.

The conclusion to which I have arrived is, that without temperance there is no health; without virtue no order; without religion no happiness; and that the aim of our being is to live wisely, soberly, and righteously.

JOHN MCDONOUGH.

"GREATLY RELIEVED."

No doubt! and in view of those things that are coming on the earth there are tens of thousands who would gladly echo the above remark, recently made by the editor of one of our city papers. Relieved from what? Why, he says, Rev. Dr. Cummings, of England, has discovered an error in his reckoning as to the time of the second advent of Christ—the trifling error only of a million or so of years. At this news (for Cumming and others who have been busy in working up time, have been, as it were, beacon lights, and the old Bible chart has tacitly been ignored through them) at this news, then, "we feel relieved." Miller and a host of others have written. Some have written themselves out. Alas! many have literally written themselves out of all faith in the coming of the Lord at all, and have gone over to the strong delusion of modern "Spiritualism;" or if not quite so bad as this, the Bible has become to them an "old fiddle" on which any tune may be played; and the great and important question of duty is passed by. To all of which, what shall we say? who is responsible for much of the infidelity, doubt, and skepticism that obtains at this present time? Cometh these things of themselves, or can responsibility be put to any person's account? My belief is, it can. I have at this moment the sad memory of individuals who seemed bright, particular stars; who, in consequence of settling down on a given period for the time of the Lord's advent, and this time passing, left them mentally relaxed, and proper subjects for all kinds of delusion.

"India Rubber" chronology has been the order of the day from Wm. Miller down to the latest writer. Novelty, novelty, novelty, has been the thing sought after; a hating to give up a cherished notion, even though experience has exploded it; in a word, too much of the "old man" has been manifested, and too great stress laid on "time," rather than events. But what is the remedy, and where is it to be found? Is it in the writings of Miller, Cumming, Dr. Thomas, Eastern State luminaries, too numerous to mention; or Western State writers, less numerous, but none the less zealous? I seek in vain: they are all dark, dark, dark: and my soul cries out, When will the light dawn!

Really, and truly, one would think that our blessed Lord had said little else than to enlighten his hearers on the time when he should "come again;" and yet on looking over the Book how little is said on this, and how much there is said on the practical duties of every day life. Now, it does seem to me, and I speak for myself only, that a proper balancing of all the things he said would make us very anxious he should soon make his appearance. Earth groans; saints weep; the wicked prosper, and the day lingers. Surely the dawn is not far ahead; believe it is nigh rather than put it off; but be careful lest what we say may not comport with what we do, and thereby cause editors and readers of their writings to stumble and fall. Let the prayer of John in Patmos, and of all who have looked to the glorious appearing of Jesus, the Christ, be, "Come Lord Jesus, come quickly."

THE TENT MEETINGS.

Now that the Tent Meetings are closed, I will add a few lines to what has already been said by other brethren. These meetings have demonstrated one thing, and that is, a hearing can be obtained anywhere, notwithstanding the "hated doctrine." This may serve as an encouragement for others to embark in similar labor. A number of such tents, manned by faithful and efficient laborers, would carry the gospel of "the kingdom" and of "the grace of God" to many who now grope their way in the dark Doubtless there are good-hearted, well-disposed people in all sections of our land who are willing to leave all for an endless life could they but once see how to obtain it, and have the proper motives set before them.

The willing mind with which Br. Wendell has bestowed his very efficient labor calls for gratitude to God; besides, a number of other brethren have been ready with their presence and prayers to add to the strength and interest of the work. It is very pleasant to recall these acts of love and sacrifice, and still more pleasant to know the record is on high. May they all reap a full reward.

Still, other acknowledgements are due. To our brethren at Oceanport for labor and material in equipping the tent; to our friends and brethren at Eatontown for material assistance after a godly sort; to friends at Long Branch, and to friends and brethren at Keyport. Our lot would have been comparatively cheerless but for the help and tender regard and sympathy from all these places. Also, concerning Staten Island; it is due to the brethren and friends to say, nothing was lacking; and so far from lacking, our wants were supplied beyond our expectation. May God's blessing attend their further efforts to enlighten the perishing around them.

Also, the warm interest manifested by the dear brethren in New York for the enterprise was oft a theme of gratitude with Br. Wendell; to which we may add the assistance of a sister in Albany, bestowed through Br. Storrs. Such a catholic spirit is worthy of imitation. We thank her.

So we see that God is able to make all grace to abound, and to comfort them who have need of comfort. To him and his beloved Son may all praise be given.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 9, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

OUR PAPER.—WE regret that we have been obliged again to use paper with a scant margin. It was impossible to remedy it this week, but we hope to do so by our next issue. In other respects, so far as we have heard, our paper gives very general satisfaction. We trust those who have desired to see more on practical and experimental subjects will find their full portion; though it is our opinion that the HERALD OF LIFE is seldom deficient in these respects; but we give such as we receive, and think all may find a portion, if hungry, for "the meat that endureth unto everlasting life;" for our main work is, to make Jesus, the Christ, the great and prominent object of attention as the one and only LIFE-GIVER to the perishing children of Adam. Till we can establish fully in the minds of men the fact of their mortality, as a whole, we have no expectation that they will firmly lay hold on Christ as their only hope of a future and endless life. Let them understand, as they should, that all inherent life ends at death, and that by natural generation there is nothing of them that survives in death, or ever will revive from it. If any doctrine can arouse them to serious inquiry about a future life, this will do it. Then they are prepared to learn and understand how important is Christ, the LIFE-GIVER, to them. If this view fails, we judge their case is hopeless—they "will not come unto Christ that they might have life," because they feel not the need of him for life.

MEETINGS IN BROOKLYN resumed. See standing notice elsewhere. It is hoped there will be a general attendance, next Sunday evening, of all the friends of the Life views, as important matters for the promotion of the cause are in contemplation to spread the truth in that city.

"GOD BOTH A PARENT AND A SOVEREIGN."

THIS idea is one on which Christians insist, and many are the conclusions drawn from this premise. One class land in universal salvation, and rightly if the premise be true; for if God is the "parent" of the human race, then is every man a "partaker of the Divine nature," as a child must be of the same nature of his father; and if so, to be lost would be for a part of Divinity to be lost; which is impossible.

Orthodoxy claims the same premise in this matter as the Universalist, but comes to a contrary conclusion; i. e., it maintains that this "parent" will eternally torment some of his children, or "offspring." Such an idea is truly shocking, and to hide its barefaced inconsistency, they tell us these wicked ones are "children of the devil!" Very, well; then God is not their "parent;" so the idea of his being the "father" of all men is abandoned: thus they "blow both hot and cold" with the same breath, and involve themselves in an inextricable dilemma. With this view, they strive to reconcile God's sovereignty with the provision for man's salvation, and the following illustration has been used a thousand times; one of the last of which was by Bishop Janes, of the M. E. Church. He says:

"History gives this account: One of the ancient nations passed a law that the man who committed a certain crime should have both eyes put out. One of the offenders of that law was the son of the sovereign. It became a question of intense national interest whether the sovereign would act the parent or the king. That was the question that agitated and interested the nation. The day of execution arrived. The father was there. The son was seated. The operation commenced. One eye is taken from his son. At that instant the father came down and commanded the executioner to take out one of his own eyes, and spare the other of his son. It was done, and the nation said: The law has been sustained; all its requirements have been preserved. He acted both the father and the king. He maintained his authority. He did it by vicarious suffering."

Here is a positive false statement. The law demanded "both eyes" of "the man" who committed the offence, and it got but one. Was that sustaining the law? But, "the father gave one of his own, vicariously:" i.e., as a substitute! Did that satisfy the law? Did it meet the demand of the law? No: it did not, in any sense; the law was cheated of its claim, and spurned the offer of an eye from an innocent father. "The nation" might say, "The law has been sustained," but it uttered a falsehood; for the law was clearly evaded—it was not executed. It was just as truly a disregard of the claim of the law as if the father had refused to have his son harmed at all. True, the people applauded the father's seeming justice; but it was not because the claim of justice had been met. Supposing another man's son had violated the law. Would any one have called it sustaining the law to let him go with the loss of one eye, when the law said "both?" Would any man have believed the magistrate administered the law truly, even if he should allow any other father to give one of his eyes instead of his son's? Would not all have said, That cannot be done; it is the guilty party only that must suffer. The law knows no substitute; it makes no such provision, and the use of it is, in part, an abrogation of the law.

After having introduced the foregoing illustration, Bishop Janes says:

"Now, God, in his infinite mercy, maintains his authority, the existence of his government, and yet provides that the sinner may live. He has done this by giving for our sins a sacrifice, an obligation, which meets all the claims of the law, and all the claims of sovereignty; so that now God is just to himself when he forgives the sinner."

If "the claims of the law" are eternal misery, then the "sacrifice" is eternally miserable; for, says the Bishop, it "meets all the claims of the law, and all the claims of sovereignty." Here is no dividing the penalty as in the case of the king and his son: the "vicarious" sufferer takes it "all." Such is the confusion of "orthodoxy." It starts with God as the Father of all men (which is false); then this Father threatens his children with eternal misery; then to maintain his "sovereignty" and fix a way for his children to escape that horrible state, he provides a "sacrifice," who "meets all the claims of the law," etc., and yet he does not go into endless torment, clearly showing that endless torment is a fable, and no part of the law against sinners, or else the law was abrogated in his behalf; and, consequently, is not now in force. So error perpetually destroys itself by its contradictory and absurd positions.

Man is a creature of God. God is his maker; not his "Father." As the creature of God, man is subject to law, the penalty of which is death. That penalty he cannot escape as a transgressor; but God has provided a Redeemer, and has given him authority to redeem man from death by a new law of faith in, and obedience to that Redeemer, whereby man becomes a "partaker of the Divine;" thus becomes prepared for the adoption of a child of God by a resurrection from the dead "at the last day."

THE TEN DIVISIONS AND THE KINGDOM.

THE ten horns and ten toes of the prophecy of Daniel, symbolizing the divisions of the Roman empire, have caused many speculations and much discussion in attempts to fix on which ten, of the many divisions of that empire, are "the ten" the prophecy speaks of; and it seems, by the Advent Herald, that Dr. Litch has at last fallen into the idea that these prophetic ten divisions are yet future. "Why," he inquires, "does almost every expositor have his own list differing from his fellow expositors?"

That the Roman empire has been "divided" into forty or fifty parts, first and last, is true. We have long been of the opinion that the differences among expositors about "the ten" have arisen from not rightly applying the number "ten." We think it was not designed to signify that precise number, but many. In this sense we find it used on various occasions in the Bible: thus, Jacob said to his wives, "Your father hath deceived me, and changed my wages ten times." That is, many times. Gen. xxxi. 7. So he charged Laban himself, verse 41, "Thou hast changed my wages ten times." There is no evidence that it had been done precisely that number of times.

Again, Numb. xiv., 22, God said of the wicked Israelites, they "have tempted me now these ten times," etc. We cannot suppose that precise number is intended, but many times. Nehemiah, speaking of information he received of the in entions of his enemies to prevent him in his work of building the walls of Jerusalem, says, "The Jews, which dwelt by them . . . . said unto us ten times," etc. Neh. iv., 12. Job said to his "three friends," "These ten times have ye reproached me." Job xix., 3. And in Dan. i., 20, when the Jewish captives, Daniel and his companions, were brought in before the King of Babylon, it is said, "in all matters of wisdom and understanding that the king inquired of them he found them ten times better than all the magicians . . . . in all his realm."

The number ten seems to be very common among the Hebrews, and appears to be used especially of many, or perfection. Take this view, as we properly may, of the number when used in symbolical representations, and the difficulty about the ten toes and ten horns vanishes; they only represent the perfect disintegration, or division, of the "fourth" or Roman kingdom, without intending at all to specify the exact number of the parts into which it would be divided; and "among" the first of these divisions should arise another "little horn;" and before this power "three of the first horns," or divisions, were displaced, or became subject to this little horn; after which it became a great power, persecuting the saints of God, and "prevailed against them:" and this for a long period, or, "Until . . . . the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom." Then . . . . "The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him."

Thus the kingdom of God should displace all the various divisions of earth-born governments, and establish itself in and over all the earth, "under the whole heaven:" a kingdom not to be subverted or pass away: a kingdom in which rebellion will not be tolerated: a kingdom in which peace will everywhere prevail, and oppression never be known: a kingdom that shall be stable and last forever. Such is "the kingdom of God" which we are called to "seek first" of all things.

Truly, the signs of the times indicate that the time is nigh, if we have not already entered upon it, when that will take place which is written, "Yet once more I shake not the earth only [civil governments] but also heaven [ecclesiastical governments]. And this word, yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are made [or of men's inventions, whether political or ecclesiastical, because they are proved worthless and a hindrance to truth and righteousness], that those things which cannot be shaken may remain." [And what are "those things?"] "Wherefore, we receiving a kingdom which cannot be removed," etc. This is the product of the "stone" which "smote the image" of all earth-born governments, of human invention, "upon its feet," the last of its vain efforts to govern the world without its King. Now that King comes again to earth, and will "reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth." Jer. xxiii. 5. Then shall be accomplished that spoken by Gabriel to Mary of her Son to be born. "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever: and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i. 32, 33.

WHAT IS UNDERSTOOD BY THE GOSPEL?

IN our last article we discovered, from Moses, the Prophets, and Paul, that in the beginning there was no spiritual man; but a natural, or an animal man. But I am met here with an objection: Did not God mean, or was it not in the purpose of God to make a spiritual man, when he said, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness?" Did not this image and likeness relate to the spiritual man, or the spiritual part of man? Our answer is, We have nothing to do with God's purpose, or with what he intended to do; but only with the facts in the case; and what the Bible says he did. Now, a fact is a thing done. And the Bible says, "So God created man in his image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them."

Says the objector, Does this not relate to the spiritual or immortal part of man? We answer, No; for the Bible makes no record of such a part of man in his creation; and the Apostle says, It is written, the first man was made an animal, or earthy man.

What then, says the objector, does this image consist in, or in what manner was he in the likeness of God? We answer, The same historian, Moses, gives us what he understood by the language he used; for he uses the same language in Gen. v., 1–3. Here he says, "In the day that God created man; in the likeness of God made he him. . . . And Adam lived . . . . and begat a son in his own likeness, after his own image." Undoubtedly Moses understood both in the same sense. Seth, Adam's son, looked like his father; a man. So Adam looked like the pattern from which he was made. So Moses understood it. Recollect we are dealing with facts; and facts are things done. And Moses says, God did make Adam in his own image: and Adam did beget a son in his own image and likeness.

And when God had finished his work, he looked over it, and it was very good. We do not understand by this that the man was either morally good or spiritually good; for he was neither. At this time he had no character formed, either good or bad. What then are we to understand by the language, "very good?" Good for the purpose for which God created him. Good like the tree and the vegetable kingdom, to bring forth their seed in their season: good like the animal kingdom, to be fruitful and bring forth their seed; good for the animal law under which God created him. Be fruitful and multiply and fill full the earth, and have dominion over it. And for this purpose man was very good. But we read, "And the LORD God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it. And the LORD commanded the man saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest of it, dying thou shalt die" (margin). Here we find the man introduced into a law of obedience, with a penalty attached for disobedience. Now, this simple fact is all that is recorded. There is not one word of a devil, hell fire, eternal torments, penalty for the soul or spirit. But simply, if thou eatest thereof, thou shalt die. But, says the objector, "It means all these things shall follow in the event of his disobedience." If so, Adam had no knowledge of it; for the Lord informed him what he meant by death. "And the LORD God said unto Adam, because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife; and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee saying, Thou shalt not eat of it . . . . till thou return to the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. Gen. iii. 17–19. In this case, if Adam had an immortal soul or spirit, it seems that the LORD tried to keep him in total ignorance of it; for, in all the account given by Moses, not one word is said about any punishment except to the animal man. What are the facts to be learned from the account as given by Moses? That God made a man and woman of the dust of the ground, under the same law that he made all other animals; subject of enjoyment for a time and then to return to the ground out of which they were taken. But at a point of time the LORD took this pair and placed them in the Garden, and there placed them under the law of obedience, placing before their eyes two trees; one the tree of life, and from the subsequent history we can learn that while Adam had the power to partake of this tree, it contained the power of preventing death. And after he had disobeyed, and eaten of the forbidden tree, the LORD said, "And now, lest he put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life (as he has done of the tree of evil), and eat, and live forever." Here is divine testimony that he will not live forever. To prevent this, the LORD God sent him forth from the garden, and placed a guard to prevent him from partaking of the tree of life. Here, then, is the final doom of the first pair. God set before their eyes two visible objects, with a simple command of obedience. They lacked faith in God and did not believe he would perform what he said; and for their disobedience, after living to a good old age, they returned to the dust from which they were taken.

And thus ended the first law, which was made for the first pair. And we, being begotten in their likeness, and partaking of their nature, being of the earth earthy, must in like manner perish and return to the dust, unless we can find some law that can give us life; which we will trace n our articles.

JACOB GRIM.

THE TENT MISSION.

THE meetings announced for Staten Island proved, equally with all that preceded them an entire success. Elds. Campbell, Wendell, Matthias, Wolcott, and other brethren attended and took part in the services. On Saturday evening we attended the discussion arranged between Br. Wendell and some Episcopal theological students at Mariner's Harbor, where the tent was erected. Notes of the debate were taken, but the young gentlemen evidently had not made themselves familiar with the subjects, and said nothing worthy of special notice. The debate was therefore all one-sided, notwithstanding which, it was a profitable season to our friends there, who were thus taught the difference between the traditions of the Elders, and the word of God.

On Sabbath forenoon there was a conference meeting, at which some very interesting testimonies were given. In the afternoon Br. Wolcott preached on the establishment of Christ's kingdom. He threw much new light on the subject, and showed he had been prayerfully devoting himself to the study of the prophecies relating to this interesting question. The interest of the discourse was broken by the disputants of the previous evening, who, annoyed at their conscious discomfiture thought to gain advantage by proposing new questions. In this they failed, but they marred the effect of Br. Wolcott's able discourse. Br. Wendell closed the afternoon service with some telling arguments bearing on the questions. He also preached in the evening. The audiences were large—the tent being quite full, and people eagerly listened, and our friends were cheered and comforted by the way God's plan was set forth from the Scriptures. None of those resident there had ever had a discourse before on the subject. On Monday evening Br. Wendell again discoursed to the people. On Tuesday a discussion, planned the Sabbath previous between Br. Wolcott and the discomfitted tyros of the Saturday debate, took place. The tent was early filled, the expectation of the public having been heightened by what they had already seen and heard, and also by the announcement that a big "D. D." would be on hand to demolish those who were teaching contrary to the catechisms and commentaries. Sure enough, at the appointed hour there appeared the Rev. Dr. Huntington, Rector of Clifton, S. I., as one of the opposing debaters. Br. Wendell permitted his opponents to frame the question and take either the affirmative or negative side. Twenty minutes were allowed for each speech, Br. W. following after each, there being three. The Rector was the last on the negative side, but finding from the course of the debate that he could say little to the point, took but fourteen of his twenty minutes. The very point his friends promised that he would meet and explain, viz.: Paul's language in Cor. xv., where he uses the term "perish," he did not even advert to, and when called on by Br. W. to give his opinion, said, like Eld. Henson at Brooklyn, "he did not know what it meant." The triumph of our friends was most signal, and was so acknowledged by many who had no sympathy with our views.

The weather proving threatening, it was decided to discontinue the meetings, and the tent was taken down and removed to the home of Br. Wolcott.

The enterprise has fully come up to our anticipations announced at its opening. Each meeting has seemed better and better, and brethren have been cheered and stirred up to renewed zeal, and many poor souls have been comforted by the truth, and set to searching the Scriptures. Every one of the preaching brethren are agreed that not one, but six tents, are needed and can be profitably employed in localities where calls have been made for them.

We are glad to learn that in the localities where any friends resided, the expenses of the meetings were fully met, so that the burden that fell on Br. Wolcott was very little beside his time and trouble, which, we know, was more than made up to him in the pleasure he enjoyed in seeing the truth so widely spread and owned and blessed of God.

A few persons from abroad sent contributions to sustain the tent mission, which were very opportune.

Br. Wolcott regretted the necessity that compelled him to close the tent meetings. But he ought not to cease preaching; he is altogether too able a preacher to be allowed to rust. He presses home on the hearts of the people the great truths of the Life theme and the coming kingdom. He is also ready to go into the field, East, West, North, or South, as the Lord directs. His address is E. Wolcott, Oceanport, N. J.

Br. Wendell has found his true mission in the field of an evangelist. He has never been happier in the work of spreading the truth than while with Mr. Wolcott. He found the same success at Wilmington, and is now preparing and will be ready in about two weeks to start for the west. He will proceed from this State to Lake City, Minn., and thence to St. Paul and Minneapolis. After that, he will descend the Mississippi, and answer such invitations to preach and lecture as friends may forward through the HERALD office. He ought to lecture in Chicago, Dubuque, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, and other towns and cities on the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, and adjacent regions, during this Winter, ere he returns home. No one need fear the results, only get a hall, announce the subjects to the public, and the truth will be sure of reaching the people in a most satisfactory manner. God has endowed our Br. Wendell with abilities eminently fitting him to deal with large audiences, and the more intellectual they are the better will it be for them and the cause he undertakes to uphold. Our friends out west should not let the opportunity slip. It may not be offered again. We know they will ever regret it if they learn what a benefit they could have conferred on their neighbors and themselves enjoyed. Do, friends at the west, arouse, and for once make an effort to honor the Lord in having his word set before the people; for the time of the end hasteth greatly, and what is done must be done quickly.

We had intended to notice some of the incidents of interest that transpired at the various tent meetings. We may hereafter make some of them public. Space nor time permit this week. We trust to hear from Br. Wolcott, now that his incessant and arduous labors are over, on the subject that has so filled his heart and mind for the past two months. The blessings he received while laboring for his Master would be encouraging to others, if set forth. Beside this there is the promise that those who turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever.

GETTING THE HEART RIGHT.

APPEARANCES are deceitful. The mild countenance of the tiger gives no indication of the ferocious disposition that makes him an object of terror. In man there is frequently an outside show of goodness when the heart is corrupt. We often deceive ourselves, and think we are doing meritorious acts, when selfish motives vitiate the whole, and show to the All-Seeing Eye that our supposed virtues are but vices in disguise. The Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart. There is no deceiving him. It is, then, of the first consequence to get the heart right. This will regulate the actions and govern the words. Not that we ever can be in a state of grace that will relieve us of the necessity of watching and praying, that we enter not into temptation. But our hearts may be so completely under the dominion of grace that we can always do our duty and act up to our convictions. But how shall we get the heart right? This is an important question. It can be correctly answered only from the Holy Scriptures. It is safe to follow the directions which God has given us for the cure of souls.

1. We must heartily repent of all our sins. However little may be said in modern pulpits about it, the Bible lays great stress on repentance. It is the first step to be taken in order to obtain a genuine work of grace in the soul. Jesus says: Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish. Luke xiii., 5. These words were first spoken to those who belonged to the church of God. They apply to-day, with undiminished force, to every one who neglects his duty, whether he makes a profession of religion or not. To repent of his sins one must see them in all their enormity. But the nature of sin is to blind its victim to its true character. Hence men need to be told of their sins—to see them painted in their true colors, and to be warned faithfully of their fatal consequences. The more popular a sin is—the more it is sanctioned by illustrious examples, the greater need there is that it should be dwelt upon, and the people warned against it. The idea that we must not speak against popular sins, but "only aim to get the heart right" is a ruinous delusion, a damnable heresy. Suppose I were to go among a people who make and drink intoxicating liquors, and yet they belong to the church, and some of them profess holiness. They even attempt to defend their course from the Bible. They know that I am acquainted with all the facts. I preach the doctrine of holiness among them, but am very careful not to allude to their besetting sin. All that I say is true, but I avoid uttering the truth that they especially need—the one that would stir up the devil in them. Everything goes on lovingly and harmoniously. They profess holiness, but hold on to their sins. Have they not a right to look on me as endorsing their course? It is true I do not tell them in words that they are right, but I ought to tell them plainly and firmly that they are wrong. He who does not do it, handles the word of God deceitfully. Souls are deceived, the standard of religion lowered, and the real work of God hindered. We often see persons professing holiness who are living in violation of the plain commands of God. Some are unequally yoked together with unbelievers, in secret societies. Others are conformed to the world. They adorn themselves with "gold or pearls or costly array." Remind them of their inconsistency, and they will tell you that the "Lord does not show them that it is wrong;" although the Bible speaks as plainly as it can do; and the founder of the church declares that, "Whosoever says there is no harm in these things may as well say that there is no harm in murder or adultery." This avoiding all mention of popular sins proceeds from a cowardly fear of man, and not from a love of souls. The command of God is, "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show my people their transgressions, and the house of Jacob their sins." Do you obey this command? You neglect it at your peril.

2. To get the heart right we must believe in Jesus as our Redeemer and Saviour. It will not do to rely upon our repentance however deep and genuine. Excuses will be worse than useless. If the heart is made right it will be by an application of the blood of Jesus, by a firm and unwavering reliance upon his atonement. If we walk in the light as he is the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son cleanseth us from all sin. There is no middle course. We are saved by Christ, or we are not saved at all. And it is a firm confidence that he died for our sins, and now liveth to make intercession for us alone that will answer. With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.

If the heart is right the life will be right. Sin of every kind will be avoided, and every duty to God and man will be faithfully performed. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.—Earnest Christian.

THE CAUSE IN WILMINGTON, DEL.

While engaged in his tent labors, Bro. Wendell received a very pressing invitation from friends in Wilmington to make a visit to that city. Not seeing his way clear, owing to his Western engagement, he made no reply, until the last meeting on Staten Island, when he deemed it opportune to make them a flying visit. He arrived at Wilmington on Friday last, and was greeted with a most cordial welcome by several brethren in waiting for him. As soon as they learned he could tarry with them over Sunday, the largest hall in the city was hired for afternoon services, and posters were issued announcing the subject of the discourse. The Lord seems to be opening the way for the proclamation of the truth, in a wonderful manner. Br. Wendell rejoices in the evidences he sees that God blesses his labors as an Evangelist. In a private letter detailing his visit to Wilmington before his lectures there, he speaks of his delight at meeting with such warm-hearted friends and firm believers in the doctrines we teach. By a strange co-incidence, Dr. Landis, so well known as a writer on the soul's immortality, was announced to preach on the very Sabbath he was there, on his favorite subject, of which he considers himself, we believe, a sort of champion. Of him Br. Wendell writes:

"But what I desire especially to mention, in connection with Dr. L.'s name, is that he has commenced a series of sermons on the immortality question, and it so happens (as you will see from the printed slip given below) that his Bible argnment is to begin tomorrow evening. Of course, I expect to go and hear it; but it is too much to hope that the Dr. will favor me with his presence in the afternoon. Be that as it may, I design, with the Lord's help, to lay out work for him to do, and I think there are those here who will not shrink from reminding him that he ought to "face the music." It is thought by our brethren here that the Dr. will experience strange emotions when he sees our programme for to-morrow afternoon; certainly nothing could be more unexpected to him. It would seem that my first visit here, where the doctrine of no immortality for the wicked has never been publicly proclaimed, is at precisely the right time. May the Lord direct the effort that is to be made."

Dr. Landis will deliver his third discourse on the Immortality of the Soul, on next Sabbath evening, in the Institute. The subject of this discourse will be the testimony of the Bible on the subject. The Doctor has already presented to a large and very interested audience the argument from tradition on the testimony of all nations from the earliest antiquity; and, also the argument from the light of nature or reason; which was the subject on last Sabbath evening, and he now purposes, as we understand, to present a thorough view also of the whole testimony of Revelation on the subject, as presented both in the Old Testament and in the New; and also to review and consider all the prominent objections which have been made to the doctrine by skeptics and others. We are truly gratified at the interest which these discourses are awakening throughout our city.

Br. Wendell has just returned from Wilmington, and from him we learn that his discourse was listened to by a large gathering, and considerable interest was awakened on the subject he presented.

He could profitably employ several weeks in that city, had he the time to spare. However, the way is now open, and, like the other places where he has been laboring this Fall, the interest has increased and a greater desire manifested to hear our views. W. M.

Letters and Extracts.

FROM STEWART CARLISLE.

WILMINGTON, DEL., Sept. 26, 1867.

BR. STORRS: Enclosed please find two dollars, to continue my subscription for the HERALD OF LIFE; and may our heavenly Father bless the Editor, and the paper, and make them a blessing to all who are sitting in the region and shadow of death. It has been but a short time since I first saw, as I see now, "No life out of Christ," and shall send with this a few hastily written thoughts, which you are at liberty to dispose of as it may seem best to you. There are but few here who take much interest in these things. We are having at present a series of sermons from Dr. Landis on the immortality of the soul; and quite a number of pulpits are throwing all the light they possibly can on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. There is quite a stir among them. They seem determined to prove that satan told Adam the truth, regardless of where the falsehood is lodged. The learned Dr. L. frankly stated that the Scriptures nowhere expressed the doctrine of the soul's immortality; and after taking the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, undertook to prove from the universal belief of all nations, that it must be so. Next Sabbath evening he is to try and prove it from nature. Now, Br. Storrs, can you spare the time to come and show that this question has another side to it? We think the cause of truth demands that the other side should be presented, and we are also persuaded that there are those here that have ears to hear, and they frequently ask us, why we do not get some one to come and preach. If you can come, we will try and make you as comfortable as we can, and of course will cheerfully assume all pecuniary responsibility. Br. McClary has been corresponding with Br. Wendell, as you are aware; but has not received an answer to his last letter.

We feel somewhat anxious to have our views before the public as there is so much misrepresentation on the part of orthodoxy. I am sorry to say it, but they seem to have no conscientious scruples in regard to what they say as to our belief; and consequently all kinds of rumors are in circulation concerning us; but by the grace of God we shall remain steadfast and immovable; having found the truth, we shall still contend for the "faith once delivered to the saints," "No life out of Christ;" but in him, Life Eternal. Blessed truth. Oh, how I love the truth! how plain are the precious promises when viewed in this light. Thank God that the mask has been torn from that original lie, and exposed it in all its hideous deformity.

If after consideration you find it convenient to pay us a visit, please send us word and we shall be most happy to receive you. Yours, in Christ.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR: Since the foregoing was received, Br. Wendell has gone to Wilmington, and we trust the misrepresentations of such men as the notorious Landis will receive the rebuke they deserve. A good cause needs not lies or misrepresentations to support it. Lies are necessary to sustain a system of falsehood, but they cannot stand the searchings of the light of truth.

FROM JAMES H. JACOBS.

FREETOWN, N. Y., Sept. 25, 1867.

BR. STORRS: It has been requested that each one write a few thoughts for the paper. I will say, I am firm in the faith that the kingdom is yet to come, and the gospel God preached to Abraham is yet to be fulfilled, and the promise made to Abraham and his seed is yet future; for they all died in faith, not having received the promise; and I think they never will without a resurrection. So it looks clear to me that there will be no future life without a resurrection. It is quite plain that if we gain the kingdom and the promise, we must be Christ's; and if we are Christ's then we are Abraham's seed. Now if there be conditions, or prerequisite steps to be taken in order to be Christ's, or to be saved, the conditions must be complied with in order to gain the kingdom and a resurrection from the dead. May the Lord help me, and all, to know the conditions and to comply, and so live righteously now; and when the resurrection comes, we shall be accounted worthy of a resurrection. It seems to me that theologians may preach and spread that men will obtain that world without obedience, and a resurrection without being Christ's, and a kingdom without a resurrection; but such will be vain preaching, for it is not preaching the word, as I think; for all Bible doctrine can and must be proved by Bible words, and this I am trying to do as well as I can. Well, I am glad to see the brethren and sisters earnest and true, and liberal for the support of the gospel. I am doing what I can for the spread of truth in the county and out of it, as the way opens, and good is being done; for which I thank God. I shall try to get men and women to take the HERALD OF LIFE.

It is a little curious to see men figure on the resurrection, and to make all men have a part in it without Christ, or that he is the life of them that are not his; such ought to consider Moses and the serpent, to see what benefit Moses' serpent was to them who did not comply with the conditions that Moses gave: then look at the Son of man, and see the conditions of life in him, and see if he does not leave them who will not comply with the conditions, to be in the same state as they would have been if there had been no Christ born, or the same as all would be, if Christ were dead and not risen again.

FROM WM. R. McCARTER.

GUELPH, C. W., Sept. 24, 1867.

DEAR FRIEND: I saw at Sunter's, a few days since, the paper in which you published my letter. I had not the least idea that you would have considered it worthy of so much notice. I do not by any means shrink from an acknowledgment of my firm convictions, and endorse what I have written. I can meet my orthodox friends with the spirit of charity, but without fear.

They have not, apparently, taken offence at the allusions made to them, and I am pleased at not having lost their friendship, as I have very intimate connections with them. They have spoken frequently of sending you some questions and I have advised them to do so.

I am still employed in Guelph, and will most probably be during the Winter a resident here. I would like to get the paper at least occasionally, and hope by and by to become a regular subscriber, and also introduce it to others. My desire is at some time to get as many as possible interested in the subject, and unite with them in an endeavor to obtain a visit by some one of the elders.

The doctrine is unknown here, and there are few or none of the Advent faith. Spiritualism has never been introduced. I am glad to hear of the strong expression of confidence which the paper received at the annual meeting. The Lord is able to reward the friends who have so liberally contributed of their substance for the advancement of his cause. I pray that he may manifest his power in the world to the overthrow of error and the shedding abroad of the pure and beautiful light of his gospel—that he may hasten his coming and make glad the hearts of his people.

FROM WILLIAM SUNTER.

EVERTON, C. W., Sept., 1867.

DEAR MR. STORRS: Please find enclosed two dollars and twenty cents, being the subscription price for the HERALD OF LIFE, and send as usual to the above address. I value the HERALD very much, although our friend Wm. McCarter in "An interesting letter" to you makes mention of us as having no definite belief. I rather think, however, we have a more settled belief than he there gives us credit for. In the main, the "Life" doctrine receives our ready assent; but that there are difficulties in the detail I must also grant. I find your friend and contributor, who signs himself "G. B. D.," laboring under some of them. Others also in other particulars. Surely the gift of the Holy Spirit is only in measure, as you say, and that a very small one, or else we would be more able to see "face to face" in these matters; especially as it is represented as having been the "guide to all truth."

I, however, have no desire to dictate to any one who may say they are so guided, as I have no authority for saying so, apart from the absence of its manifestations; nor do I desire publicity for anything I might ever say on the subject.

With the desire and hope that we may yet see "face to face," and that we may through Christ inherit eternal life, I remain, your sincere friend.

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE: AND THE REASON OF THE HOPE WITHIN ME.

My first Sabbath school teaching took place in the town of Dunham, under the order of the Episcopal church, in the eighth year of my age. It had very little influence on me, save to get a book to read, and play with the boys to and from school. In my thirteenth year I attended the Methodist Sabbath school in said town; and became very much interested in the welfare of my soul; but not having the right help at the right time, I continued on to my 19th year with but little feeling or interest concerning the future. At that time there was a division arose in the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and they started the Methodist New Connection society, and I was converted and baptized under their preaching and joined the church in 1842. I remained with them till Spring, then I moved to Sheldon, Vt., and joined the M. E. Church in that place.

I continued with them, though in a backslidden state a part of the time, till 1857. In the Winter of 1857 there was a public debate between the Methodists and the Universalists on this question: "Does the Bible teach the doctrine of the endless punishment of the wicked?" I was on the affirmative. But we got handsomely whipped. The committee, two Methodists and one Universalist, were unanimous in the decision that according to the weight of argument the negative had the question.

I then studied into the matter, heard both denominations preach, and came to the conclusion that all would be saved; for, as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive, and in the resurrection they are raised spiritual, incorruptible, immortal, equal to the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. Allow the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the wicked, and what other conclusion can any rational man come to?

I lived a Universalist till the Fall of 1865. I then heard the gospel of Christ preached by S. W. Bishop. Thank God for ever sending him to Newport! He, by preaching the word, demolished the tradition of immortal soulism. and the resurrection of the wicked dead, and the future judgment, as taught by modern theology, but yet I was not satisfied. I must know for myself. Methodism had failed, Universalism had failed, and who knew but what this would fail also! I took the word and was determined to dig deep and lay the foundation on the rock, so that my house should not fall again. I also improved every opportunity of inquiring of those that believed in the immortal soul for the proof thereof, and found it was admitted, not proved, to be a settled fact. So with reference to the judgment to come, and the resurrection of the wicked dead, those who die in Adam: not so with those who are in Christ; for, if any man be in Christ he is a new creature. If we believe in Christ, if we have the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, if we fall asleep in Jesus, if we love one another as he loved us, if we love the brethren we know if we have passed from death unto life; and, finally, I found that if I would believe and follow the teaching of the Bible, I must part company and friendship with professors as well as the world. Then, for the first time, I could understand with a realizing sense, those lines, "The world will not persecute those that are like them, but hold them as one of their own."

And, last of all, I received a copy of the HERALD OF LIFE, for which the donor will accept my thanks, and at the same time a copy of the Crisis. After reading them both, I chose the H. of L. and have never been sorry, for time has confirmed the choice to be a wise one. And now, dear brethren, with a grateful heart I return you my heartfelt sympathy for the cause you have so nobly battled for, and not my sympathy only, but my hearty assistance, for I have put on the armor and taken the sword of the Spirit, and I am determined to fight the good fight of faith and to lay hold on eternal life. S. S. CALL.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

THE subject of impeachment of the President becomes more important as the period draws nigh for Congress to meet. It is a critical point to look forward to, if all the stories claiming to be "authentic" "confidential" and "direct," are to be believed. Among these, the Militia of Maryland, officered by late rebels, are being armed to act in case of need, in dispersing Congress, should any attempt be made to impeach the President; also, that the whites at the South, by refusing to participate in the voting will keep their States from being reconstructed in accordance with the Congressional provision, and in another year they will get back according to their own plan, by the success of the Democratic party.

There is no doubt, now that the excitement of war is passed, that the people are giving more prominence to finance and tariff questions than to moral ones. The country being safe from rebellion, the rights of the negro as a citizen are less cared for than the material interests of the country. The prejudices of the poor are being excited against holders of government bonds, because they escape taxation, and politicians are adroitly turning this to account by devising popular schemes to build up party success on this issue. At the bottom they are all wicked; the intention being to use the power of the people to defraud creditors by repudiating legitimate contracts. We are pained to see so many "truce-breakers" among every class of our people as this question has developed. Another rising danger to the good name of our country, is the influence of infidelity in politics. It verifies the prophecy to see, after being bound about a thousand years, the adversary, satan, in the spirit of paganism, gaining a foothold in this great land of churches. Catholicism, had some desire, wicked as it was, to restrain the spirit of anarchy. But now we are confronted by a power, growing bolder every day, that insists on unrestricted license to every form of sensuality. In Massachusetts, even, as well as most other Northren States, the moral questions have been ignored by both political parties, in order to win infidel voters. Respect, not only for the Sabbath, but everything held sacred is to be trampled down to placate the audacity of opposers of God and religion.

The record of the repeated and continual outrages upon the freed people in Kentucky, is one of utter horror and shame. Nearly five hundred victims to Rebel hate and bloodthirstiness have been reported within one year, the names, dates, and details, on file in the offices of the Freedmen's Bureau, giving proof that these charges are not vague accusations. Men have been beaten, shot, drowned, and disembowled; women have been scourged, outraged, and murdered, and a band of "Regulators," countenanced by local authority, and defying that of the State, threaten the life of every negro or Radical whom they may choose for a victim.

The yellow fever still rages with frightful violence in New-Orleans, and a renewed appeal is made for help. There is urgent need of nurses, of medicines, and of food to keep from starvation the families of those who are stricken down. The startling assertion is made by the committee who put forth this call, that twelve thousand human beings, the majority of whom are utter or comparative strangers, are perishing for want of proper care.

FOREIGN.

Although not unlooked-for, the uprising in Italy for the possession of Rome has been startling in its character—so suddenly, so generally have the people arisen to wrest the Eternal City from the "wicked," that has been prophetically doomed. That there could be no peace for any length of time, we have always contended. The opposing elements can not be put under subjection at the beck of those who are to gain everything by peace. Once begun the little spark will become a conflagration. Napoleon is pledged to uphold the secular interests of the Pope, and the catholics of his own empire, as well as all Europe, will insist on his making his pledges good. This must bring him in conflict with Italy, and Austria, and Prussia, will each take sides in accordance with their relative antipathies. In a little while we may see all the Catholic governments united against those who desire to overthrow the Papacy. For a season this revolution may be quelled, but it is too powerful in its character to be destroyed. Garabaldi has pledged himself to destroy Popery as a wicked and corrupt system. We believe the time has come when the Papacy is to be driven from Rome. The indications are unmistakable this time. Whither it will find shelter if its power is to exist longer, we can discern.

Garibaldi continues greatly to embarrass the Italian Government. He was offered immediate liberty if he would pledge himself to abandon the projected campaign against Rome. When he refused he was sent to Caprera without having given his parole, from there he escaped to the mainland, but was recaptured and brought back to Caprera, where he is now kept under a guard.

The reports from Italy are startling. The small town of Acquapendente, near Orvieto, has been captured by the insurgents, who now have full possession of the roads leading to it. The commander of the forces of the Pope has asked the Italian Government for instant assistance. Italy refuses to furnish any soldiers. There is no longer room for doubt that the revolt is serious. There are alarming apprehensions of an interruption of the heretofore friendly relations between Italy and France.

The outbreak in Viterbo is not—like the disturbances in Florence, Milan, Genoa, Naples, and other large cities—a protest of the Italian people against the arrest of Garibaldi, but it is the beginning of the Garibaldian campaign for the overthrow of the Papal rule. The Province of Viterbo is one of the five which in 1859 remained to the Pope out of the twenty-one constituting his State before. The town of Viterbo is, next to Rome, one of the largest of the States of the Church. To judge by the route which Garibaldi took when he set out for the Papal frontier, Viterbo must have been selected by him as the first rallying place of the Roman insurgents and the volunteers. The Cable dispatch, which states the latest dispatches, though conflicting, are highly important. A message has just been received from Florence announcing the clash of arms. The insurgent troops, holding a strong position near Bagnarea, in Viterbo, were attacked by the Papal forces. A short, sharp fight ensued, which resulted in the defeat of the attacking party, who were obliged hastily to withdraw. The losses in the engagement are not stated. The effect of this victory is very inspiriting to the party of action. A public meeting of the friends of Garibaldi was held at Turin. Revolutionary speeches were made by many distinguished persons. Great crowds of people were present, and the enthusiasm was unbounded. Meetings of a like character are in contemplation in other cities of Italy. Though a prisoner at Caprera, Gen. Garibaldi has issued a stirring address to his followers, which is published today all over Europe He recites at length the grievances of Italy, and asks his countrymen to redress them now. He appeals strongly to their patriotism, and urges all his friends to march forthwith to Rome.

It is reported that Napoleon has informed the Italian government that it may occupy the territory with its troops, but they must not enter the city of Rome.

To judge by the excited language of the semi-official papers of France, the French Government has been stung to the quick by the Circular of Count Bismarck on the Salzburg Conference. Nor is this to be wondered at. Though calmly and cautiously, the Circular very distinctly reaffirms that the great object of Prussia is to consolidate the German nation, and openly dares France to prevent it if she can. Throughout the interesting diplomatic war, which since the battle of Sadowa has been going on between France and Prussia, it has been the uniform habit of Bismarck to point to the ultimate consolidation of Germony as his aim, while Louis Napoleon has constantly changed his language and left his own partisans in the dark as to whether he would renounce his opposition to the union of the South German States with Prussia or enforce the maintenance of the Peace of Prague.

Notwithstanding all her pacific assurances, France is arming with the utmost activity. By many it is now feared that France may precipitate a war before the close of the year.

Apparently, Spain has been for some time at peace with Chili and Peru, but she has just officially denied that she has definitely concluded to make peace.

The Emperor Alexander of Russia has demanded of the Sublime Porte the cession of the island of Candia to Greece.

The Turkish government has made an apology to the American Ambassador at Constantinople for the insult offered to one of the messengers attached to the United States Consulate.

It is again asserted by a Cable dispatch that the Japanese are cruelly persecuting the native Christians. Since the re-establishment of a friendly intercourse between Japan and the Christian countries, the opinion has gained ground that there still are in the country many thousands of Christian descendants of the martyrs who perished for their faith in the sixteenth century. The Governments of the Christian nations will, of course, not fail to intercede in behalf of the sufferers.

The Fenians appear at present to be bent upon annoying the English cities. Last night it was feared that they would make an attack upon one of the armories in the City of London.

SONG FOR THE CHILDREN.

Come stand by my knee, little children
Too weary of laughter or song;
The sports of the daylight are over,
And evening is creeping along:
The snow fields are white in the moonlight,
The winds of the winter are chill,
But under the sheltering roof-tree
The fire shineth ruddy and still.

You sit by the fire, little children,
Your cheeks they are ruddy and warm,
But out in the cold of the Winter
Is many a shivering form.
There are mothers that wander for shelter,
And babes that are pining for bread,
O, thank the dear Lord, little children,
From whose tender hand you are fed.

Come look in my eyes, little children,
And tell me, through all the long day
Have you thought of the Father above us
Who guardeth from evil your way?
He heareth the cry of the sparrow,
And c reth for great and for small,
In life and in death little children,
His love is the truest of all.

Now go to your rest, little children,
And over your innocent sleep,
Unseen by your vision, the angels
Their watch thro' the darkness shall keep.
Then pray that the Shepherd, who guideth
The lambs that he loveth so well,
May lead you in life's rosy morning,
Beside the still waters to dwell.

EGYPTIAN LIGHTHOUSE.

Have you ever read, dear children, about the beautiful lighthouse, built of white marble, that stood many centuries ago at Pharos, in Egypt? It was erected at great expense, and on the summit of the tower, which was several hundred feet above the ground, was a great fire kept burning every night. So, as the sailors that passed over the Mediterranean sea, came near the city of Alexandria, they saw far away in the distance the beacon light, by which to steer their course.

Now the Bible is the same to you as the lighthouse is to the sailor. It is a "lamp unto your feet, and a light unto your path."

How earnestly does the pilot gaze to catch a glimpse, if possible, of the bright beacon light that shall guide him safely over the dark sea.

So should you make the holy Bible your guiding star, giving heed thereto, "as to a light that shineth in a dark place."

JESUS LOVED ME.

Two thoughtful blue eyes were raised inquiringly, and a childish voice replied, "Sometimes, aunt Emily, I think that I do love Jesus, but it is only for a little while, and so it can't be that I love him at all."

"The Saviour's love is not for a little while, Annie; he is an ever-living, ever-loving friend. Why do you not love and trust him all the time?"

"Oh, Auntie! if I could know that his love is for me. If I only felt sure that I might trust in Christ."

"Annie, Jesus said, 'Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.' Whosoever means every one, Annie; whosoever will. Will you not believe and accept God's free gift of love?"

There was no answer. As Aunt Emily held one little hand in hers, she breathed a prayer that God would lead the faltering one to rest in the Everlasting arms.

"He is able and willing to save all that come. Won't you trust him, Annie?"

"I ought not to, Auntie, I know I ought not to; my heart isn't right."

"That is just the reason why you need to go, my little one; Jesus, only Jesus, can make your heart right in the sight of God."

"Auntie, what was that papa read last night about going to God with a 'true heart, and a full assurance of faith?' He said it meant to feel sure—and I don't."

"Our heavenly Father will give you a full assurance of his love, if you look to him with simple faith in Jesus as your Saviour. Can you doubt his words of grace, 'Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out.' Will you not have faith in God, Annie?"

"I have tried to, Auntie. What can I do? I know it's my own wicked heart that don't believe, just as you told me before—but what can I do?"

Aunt Emily thought of the time when her own young heart first felt the need of a Saviour's love; how she waited long away from Jesus, vainly seeking to prepare that heart for his acceptance, and she replied, "Annie, do you remember the beautiful words we used to sing when you were at our house last Summer?"

"Yes, Aunt Emily, I thought last Summer that I loved Jesus, but now I feel so very far from God."

"God is not a God afar off, Annie. He is waiting now for you to give him your doubting, wayward heart; just as it is. Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, and he will be your Saviour if you trust him."

"How can I know? I'm afraid I haven't faith."

"Then go to Jesus and tell him so, my Annie. Tell him all your troubles, your doubts and fears, and leave everything with him. Are you not willing that God should do just as he pleases?"

Annie's tearful face was bowed upon her hands.

"Let us ask him now, Annie, to take away your will, and let his will be done in your heart."

Together they knelt in the gathering twilight, and in a few short, earnest words, presented their petition at the throne of grace; to the gracious hearer, who ever delights to bless and save all who plead the merits of a dying, risen Saviour. Their request was granted; Annie became a humble, happy believer. She wrote afterward to Aunt Emily, "God is very good to me. He has heard my poor little prayers, and has forgiven all my sins. I know now that 'Jesus paid it all' for me—and I didn't love him. God has forgiven me that, too. I love him all the time, and I know that he loves me."

Do not you, my little reader, often long to be a Christian and know that Jesus loves you?

A SOUL IN PRISON: OR, A HELPLESS "IMMORTAL."

The following is from the Brooklyn Daily Times of Sept. 24. It shows the power of facts, and the weakness of the fable of an inherent immortal soul. How long will men wallow in the mire in attempts to uphold a fancy entity, which, according to their own showing, is a poor impotent vagabond, that is unable to control a "material vehicle?" Yet they talk about its mighty power when it is "freed from the body!" O, fancy, whither wilt thou fly in thy madness? Could not this fancy soul break out of its cage, and not stay there three score and ten years, as it sometimes does? The grand mistake of this writer and all others on his side of the subject is, they mistake mind for soul, and so go blundering along in the mire of superstition and pagan traditions, instead of attending to the Bible doctrine of man's unity and mortality, and that a future life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ, and by a resurrection from the dead, "at the last day." To talk about the "old bodily elements" being remodeled, by and by, so as to behave to suit the fancy soul, that was so "free and triumphant" when it got rid of it, is the strangest monomania of all. When will such delusions have an end?

SUPREMACY OF THE BODY.

We pride ourselves on the supremacy of mind over matter; we speak of the soul as the immortal part of man, while the body must decay; we rejoice in our spiritual part as "the man," while the material is only a vehicle to contain and carry it for a while. While we do not dispute the correctness of these positions, it is well to inquire if there is not another side to the question. Is it a fact that in the present life the soul is master of the body? Is it not rather a fact that the soul is not subject to the body—that the body is supreme? We do not refer now to profligate men who yield themselves to fleshly lusts, and brutalize their souls, but we refer to the whole race, of whatever moral condition, and affirm that now the body holds supremacy over the soul. The soul may be king, but the body is a royal prison.

There are many modes by which the body manifests its power over the soul. As the relations between the two are hidden and mysterious, is it not always possible to trace the subtle influences that are at work, enabling the one to control the other. Yet the evidences of the fact are numerous and patent. Witness, for instance, the fact of weariness. The body is so constituted that its power of endurance is limited. The constant use of its various organs produces what we call fatigue. Then the body needs rest, and will have it. The soul may rebel and struggle against it, but such struggling is useless, and rebellion is sure to be met with punishment. The mind becomes dull and clouded when the body is fatigued. By and by drowsiness comes on, and the soul is a prisoner, a royal captive chained in a fleshly dungeon.

The body likewise manifests its supremacy over the soul in disease and infirmities. Ten thousand different agencies in as many different forms conspire to afflict us, producing pain, weakness and insensibility, thus overpowering the soul. Some have deformed bodies naturally, or by accident. In others there is a want of muscular development, a perpetual consciousness of weakness; they drag the poor body around, as a prisoner drags his ball and chain. Then there are the infirmities of advancing years; the strength departs, the limbs totter, the senses decay. During all these days or years of suffering, the soul is cramped in its operations, and its well-arranged plans of activity are confounded or destroyed.

The same results are often produced by the reflex influence of mental emotions. As the body influences the soul, so the soul strangely affects the body. We see this illustrated in the effects which the passions produce. Excessive joy, sorrow, fear, or anger disturbs the functions of the body, producing exhaustion and disease. But even here the body asserts its supremacy. When thus affected by mental emotion, it throws this influence back upon the soul and the soul becomes the loser in the conflict.

The body interferes with all the interests of life. Our temporal interests are affected by it. Weariness, disease, infirmities, prevent men from laboring as they otherwise would. How many well-laid plans of wealth have been destroyed because the body could not keep pace with the ambitious soul! But especially does the body interfere with our religious activities, We are often hindered by it in the discharge of religious duty. How much more we might accomplish for God and for our fellow-men if we were never wearied, or even attacked by disease, or never assailed by any bodily infirmity! So the body often hinders our religious enjoyment. Depression of spirits is not always occasioned by indulgence in sin, or by unfaithfulness in duty, but very often results from bodily disease.

This supremacy of the body is sometimes the result of causes beyond our control—such as hereditary disease or infirmity. But very often its most aggravated manifestations are the consequences of one's own sinfulness. Many cannot serve God as they would, even after repentance, because of bodily infirmities which they have brought upon themselves. But as there are no exceptions to this general law of bodily supremacy, so we find that even those who have inherited strong constitutions, and whose lives are pure, give evidence that the body is the master; for they sleep as others; they, too are liable to accident and disease, and to the infirmities of age. In them there is a struggle between body and soul, and the body triumphs.

Men often ward off disease and keep back death by mere force of will. And this, though but a temporary triumph, is a blessed earnest of a better day. The very means by which the body asserts its supremacy, in the end proves its dowfall. The diseases and infirmities by which it fetters the soul are ultimately the means of freeing the soul; for death comes through these, and with death, liberty. The body then decays, but the soul is free and triumphant. And in due time we shall have these old bodily elements reformed, transfigured, glorified, immortal as the soul. Then there will be no clashing or collision between the two, but both will act together in harmony forever.

JUSTICE; CONDEMNATION; RECONCILIATION; LIFE.

BY CHARLES A. HASTINGS.

In considering the Lord's great plan of redemption, as brought to view in his word, these topics present themselves; and also two portions of Scripture which I will here quote. "Wherefore the law is holy and the commandment is holy and just and good." Rom. vii., 12. "Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God; who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began; but is now made manifest, by the appearing of our Saviour, Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." 2 Tim. i., 8, 10.

God, foreseeing from the beginning the course man would take, instituted a great and grand plan, to meet his necessity; and for this, "The creature was made subject to vanity; not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope." The law which is holy, and just, and good, man has violated, and has come under its power, its condemnation; condemned to death. For "the wages of sin is death."

"Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." The question here may be asked, How have all sinned in one man? This may be answered in two ways, either by Adam's being our representative, and doing just what every other animal or natural man would have done, if placed in like circumstances; or, as Adam had no child before he broke the law, the force of the law rests on him as a whole; hence the children must follow the condition of the parent; therefore, the condemnation rests on the whole of his posterity; and "sin when it is finished bringeth forth death." Now the law, which is just (and has been violated), demands the life of every natural man; for he is the offender; and the taking away this life is the execution of this law; which bringeth death; a natural result, the extinction of being.

Now, is it reasonable to suppose God, who foreknew all, should institute another law which should cheat justice (the former law) out of its claim? which he must, if the sinner's natural life is ever restored. How can God be just and yet a justifier of them that believe in Jesus? This is a question to be considered. In this we find the plan of reconciliation, the atonement, the redemption. To be just and let justice have its claim, and let man live, another principle of life must be brought in, else justice is foiled of its claim if man ever lives beyond the tomb. This has been accomplished; this life principle has been brought to light through the gospel. "According to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord." The first man was not spiritual (see 1 Cor. xv., 46), but natural, or animal; so Adam could not give to his posterity anything but an animal life; for he had none other to give; the law claims this; justice demands it, because of sin; God never designed to save it. But he brought in another man, one whom he had purposed; one whom he had foreordained before the foundation of the world; one who is endowed with a spiritual life; the power of an endless life; and so the creature man, who was made subject to vanity, has hope placed within his reach; and the invitation is, "Whosoever will, let him come and partake of the water of life freely." But this man (the second Adam) took upon himself our nature, and became subject to the law; "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same." For this cause likewise the law lays claim on him; justice demands his life, for this nature is under condemnation wherever found; for it is the offspring of the first Adam. Hence he was "put to death in the flesh;" he spilt his blood on the cross, the like principle of the flesh; "for the life of the flesh is in the blood." (See Gen. ix., 4, 5, and Lev. xvii., 11.) By this, the law (which is holy) is honored; justice has its claim. Yet the Apostle says, it was not possible that he should be holden in death. Why? Because he was possessed of another life principle, on which the law had no claim; "put to death in the flesh, but quickened (or made alive) by the Spirit." The wicked are holden by the cords of their own sins, having never laid hold of any other life principle but the animal. Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." Thus we see how God can be just, and also justify them that believe in Jesus.

Here then is the great plan of reconciliation, redemption, and salvation. Well might the apostle say, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ. According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world; having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ (not by Adam) to himself according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved. In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of his grace .... That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ; in whom ye also trusted after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation; in whom, also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise; which is the earnest of your inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory."

Here then we find that, we who trust in Christ will not be holden in death by the cords of our own sins; although our natural life rests under the condemnation of a just and holy law; for, "according to the riches of his grace we have forgiveness of sins through his blood;" .... "the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel. For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins; wherefore when he cometh into the world, he saith, sacrifice and offerings thou wouldst not, but a body hast thou prepared me; in burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure: then said I, Lo I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God; by which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." Wherefore the Holy Spirit is witness to us, it is the earnest, the testimony, the witness of another life. O, was there ever anything presented to the mind of man so beautiful, so noble, so lovely, as this great plan of redemption? Do not our hearts melt in contrition while contemplating such a plan? Can any fail to love such a God? One who spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all; who was pleased to bruise him for our transgressions. "Herein is love; not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." And we hear him say, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. Verily, verily I say unto thee, ye must be born again."

John says, "As many as received him, to them gave he power (or, right, or privilege: margin) to become the sons of God, even to them that believed on his name; which were born not of blood, nor the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." Peter says, "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever." In these texts the term "born," I judge from the sense of the Scriptures, should be translated "begotten," and is so translated by some. "For if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Hence the analogy, begotten of the Spirit; quickened by the Spirit; born of the Spirit. "Christ is the first born from the dead." "Christ risen from the dead became the first fruits of them that slept." And as the first fruits are a sample of the harvest, so also the harvest of the resurrection must be like unto Christ's most glorious body; and as the apostle says, "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory: then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law; but thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

In him is centered all our hope; in him there is life eternal; through him there is justification and redemption. Does the sinner want life? Look unto the Lord Jesus Christ. Does the sinner want pleasures forevermore? Look unto the Lord Jesus; for, beyond, there is glory and honor. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him: but God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit." We hear him again saying, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." "I am the bread of life. I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die;" or, shall not die eternally, as some render it. O, the truth is so precious; the language of scripture so full of meaning, so much better than any I can use, I can only quote and say, Amen, and Amen.

Springfield, Mass.

CHRIST'S SYMPATHY FOR THE POOR.

The Son of God appears to have felt an especial sympathy for the poor. Some of his most tender words of consolation were expressly intended for them. "Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your Heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?" "Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." The rich were not shut out: Nicodemus the ruler was received; the offerings of the wise men of the East were accepted. But let us not forget that it was emphatically to the poor that the blessed Gospel was preached.

Poverty, suffered in fellowship with the Son of God, and solaced by his sympathy, has a lustre greater than that which sparkles from the diadems of kings. The pious Lazarus is comforted not only when borne to Abraham's bosom, but when lying in rags at the gate, seeking crumbs from the rich man's table. His crust may be sweetened with reflections such as these: "Am I poor? so was my Lord. Am I hungry? So was my Lord. Am I homeless? The Son of man had not where to lay his head. Shall not the disciple be as his Lord, and the servant as his great Master?"

FROM W. F. GARDNER.

Washington, D. C., Sept., 24, 1867.

Br. Storrs: I made Sister Robertson my agent in May for ordering the Herald of Life. By that, I was glad to see and know you are yet on hand and at work.

As your name, brother, brings up past associations, I have a mind to go back to 1843 times and review the old paths.

I had the pleasure of hearing Br. Miller, the Pioneer, on his second visit to Newark, N. J., in the Spring of 1842, I believe. I had the pleasure of hearing Brn. Miller and Hymes when they came there with the tent, the 3rd of November, the same year; and the further pleasure of hearing you about the same time, or soon after. I thought the soul doctrine, as taught by the church, all right, till an Advent brother, Samuel Earl, now, or late of Newark, attempted to show me its fallacy. I was hurt; thought him a Universalist and no Christian, and did by him as others have done by me since, went away and left him. In a few days after, notice was given that Br. Storrs was coming to lecture on the subject. I was hurt again. What should I do? If I kept away from the meeting I should be distressed; if I went, with the then state of feeling, I should be distressed. What should I do? Thankful to say, I took the case to the Lord; and took it so often that before the appointed time, my opposition and uneasiness were all gone. I went to the meeting I think like a child, willing to hear and believe the truth, cost what it would. I have said many times since, that before you got half through, I saw the subject as plain and believed it as strong as you did, and continue in the truth, that "only in Christ is immortality—eternal life."

By the paper, I see that you are called the aged brother: and that is what is said of me: though I will be only 77 the last of next month.

Rev. xiv. gives the incidents and events of 1843. Under the teaching and preaching of the angel, of ver. 6 and 7, that was seen to fly in the midst of heaven, I learned the Advent near. Angel meaning minister; heaven meaning the church: verse 8 says, Babylon is fallen—fallen. Babylon meaning the church, that was fallen because it was teaching fables and false doctrines; so I left it; came out by the open door of Rev. iii., 8. Under the preaching of ver. 9, 10, and the teaching of the blessed Spirit, I learned the danger of being a politician, and gave that up; and have had nothing to do with country, government, party, or vote since.

I said at our meetings, at the time, I had been a republican, a democrat, but henceforth I was a monarchist, that Christ was my King, i. e., my promised King; and, God helping, I would never disgrace him nor myself by voting for any other; am thankful to say, I have kept that promise good. Math. vi., 24, says, "No man can serve two masters:" and I am thankful it is so. I say, no man can understand the Bible aright until he gives up; and therefore it is, those who are believing in a fallen spirit devil, in the resurrection of the wicked, in the 1,000 years of Rev. xx. as yet in the future, in the return of the Jews and cleansing Judea before the rest of the earth,—like the teaching of the big tent, that came here in May from Boston,—give evidence they are politicians, men of the world, holding on to the false teaching of the church.

I am very glad to see the Herald is taking high, Bible ground; glad to see you are urging every man to work. Here let me say, I have advocated these subjects and others of Bible truth by word of mouth whenever occasion offered, and by more than 700 letters to relatives and friends in Newark, New York, Brooklyn, and elsewhere, in the fourteen and a half years I have been here. I say to my friends, "I write to forewarn you; I am clear of your blood, as old Noah was clear, by foretelling the flood." I am pleased with the Herald, and if spared will send $5, this Fall for the new volume. I am pleased to see so many correspondents seeking light. Let me suggest they be invited and required to give their sir or maiden names in full, instead of the initials, as some have done heretofore.

If this finds admittance into the paper, I will, if spared, write again on the subjects named: on the time of the Advent: will try to show, as I have all the way from 1848, that it will not come before 1883. In much love your friend and brother.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind —willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

A PURIFYING HOPE.

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

"BELOVED, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." 1 John, iii., 2, 3.

As we have often dwelt on the nature of hope, we shall say no more on that topic than simply to remark, it is made up of desire and expectation; that neither of these alone forms hope; nor can expectation rationally exist without a good reason, which must arise from a reliable promise, or an exertion that forms a just ground for hope. That which depends upon the act of another must have a reliable promise to make the object one of expectation; or if it depends in whole or part on our personal exertion, that exertion must be put forth or there is no ground for rational expectation; hence there cannot be a well-grounded hope.

With these preliminary remarks we proceed to notice,

I. THE HOPE OF THE TEXT: "This hope." It has several peculiarities—

It is the hope of "sons of God." "Now are we the sons of God." It is not, therefore, a hope common to all men, for all men are not in such relation to God. All sustain the relation of creatures to God as their Creator; but the relation of sons is essentially another matter. It pertains to a moral development, and in that view many men are of their "father the devil;" so hath Jesus testified. That development which establishes the relation of sons to God arises only by, and in virtue of, a union with the Son of God, whereby we become "partakers of the divine nature;" or received of the Holy Spirit of God, which is shed on those who believe on the name of Jesus, and by which they are sealed, and which is the earnest of their inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession. See Eph. i., 13, 14; 2 Peter i., 2–4; 2 Corth i., 21, 22.

2. "This hope" is a hope of seeing Jesus Christ; that is, of seeing him personally, or in his proper personality. This sight is not, as some fancy, a spiritual, or mere mental sight, but an actual vision of Jesus Christ. As to a spiritual manifestation of Christ, no man can be a son of God without it; but having this, he hopes to see Jesus personally, and that hope is based on many promises. Without the spiritual manifestation, love to Christ does not arise; and yet such manifestation and love is only the prelude to the personal sight of our Lord. "Whom having not seen ye love," saith Peter; they had not yet the personal sight of Jesus, but Peter saith, "that your faith might be found unto praise and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ"—literally, at the unvailing of Jesus Christ. 1 Pet. i., 7, 8.

How different is this hope from that of those who think of no other sight of Jesus than a spiritual one? or from the hope of such as talk of seeing him at death? or when they die; for

3. This hope is that we shall see him as he is; not as he was in the days of humiliation; but in his triumphant glory; when he shall sit upon "the throne of his glory." Matt. xix., 28, 29. That throne of his glory is "the throne of his father David," which God hath promised him with an oath. See Lk. i., 32, 33. Acts ii., 30. This hope, therefore, embraces what is called the second advent of our Lord Jesus Christ. Thus Paul speaks to Titus, chapter ii., "Looking for that blessed hope, and the manifestation of the glory of the great God, and our LIFE-GIVER, Jesus, Messiah. (Syriac.)

4. This hope is also the hope of being made like him. To "be glorified together" with him: to "put on immortality—incorruptibility"—to be placed in a state where "neither can they die any more"—"death shall have no more dominion over" them, as it has not over him—partners in his throne—"I will give to sit with me in my throne," saith Jesus: yea, they "shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." See Rom. viii., 17; 1 Corth. xv., 54; Luke xx., 36; Rom. vi., 9; Rev. iii., 21; Matt. xiii., 43.

Truly, "it doth not yet appear what we shall be," but it is none the less true, that when Jesus shall appear we shall be like him. The world knew him not when he was here, as it now knows not his followers. Little does the world think, when it is setting at naught the meek and humble followers of Christ, that it is thus treating those who are hereafter to rule the world as joint heirs with Christ when he shall appear.

II. HOW IS THIS HOPE DISTINGUISHED FROM THAT OF THOSE WHO ARE NOT THE SONS OF GOD? Answer: By its effects. "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself," etc. But by what rule is this done? Ans. The rule is Christ—"Even as he is pure."

Here we will examine the rule in some particulars. Christ was—

1. Pure from seeking honor of men. Thus—"I receive not honor from men. How can ye believe, which receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?" John v., 41, 44. One of the strongest propensities of human nature is this desire to be thought well of by our fellow creatures. This disposition leads thousands to travel the broad road to death, and shuts them up in the rejection of truth that constantly comes home to their understanding. While this disposition is permitted to hold sway, no man can advance in divine things. Jesus was pure from such desire, or free from its control, and it is of the first importance that we should be.

In saying Jesus was free from the control of the disposition spoken of, we say, He was pure from pride. Some persons have advocated pride as a necessary exercise, and that without it men would not maintain self-respect, or "be decent." Such talk shows ignorance, pride, or folly, in the advocate. Pride is sin. Did Jesus sin? Did he not maintain self-respect? Was he not "decent?" and did he not always conduct himself with propriety in his intercourse with all classes with whom he came in contact? To say that pride is necessary for any purpose is to affirm that Jesus was a sinner, or that he was defective in the necessary qualities for good society! The fact is, pride is a destroying sin, and it destroys in a thousand ways, and takes a thousand forms, according to the different circumstances of persons in life. It ascends the pulpit; it takes its place in the pews; it walks in the flowing robes, and hides in the meanest attire; it goes to social prayer, and it refuses to pray; it talks against sin, and persists in sin; it goes with the rich, and it travels with the poor. On what side soever we turn, this monster appears openly or crawls secretly, and it always claims to be very innocent and harmless; yea, absolutely useful. It shows itself in the desire to "be as gods;" and it affirms men are gods, for it clothes them with attributes which belong to God alone. It is hated by all in others, but is caressed and made a household god for themselves. It makes some men misers and others spendthrifts; it adorns the churches, or temples, and strips the widows and fatherless of food and clothing to do it; it hates and is hated; it blinds and is blinded; it destroys the rich and the poor, and is a foul murderer of the peace and repose of all where it dwells; and yet it is the last thing any are willing to part with. There is one example, however, where pride never appeared, viz., Jesus—the "meek and lowly" Jesus. He was pure from pride. Again,

2. He was pure from the "love of mammon." "Though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor;" and he said, "No man can serve two masters." "Ye cannot serve God and mammon:" and again, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." See 2 Corth. viii., 9; Matt. vi., 24; Acts xx., 35.

3. He was pure from a spirit of selfishness: or, his labor was not for himself alone. He "went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil;" Acts x., 38. His was an earnest desire and effort to benefit the children of men; and the most needy and oppressed were sure to share in his benevolence.

4. He was pure from a murmuring spirit. None ever had more occasion to be dissatisfied with his present lot; none were ever in greater straits or trials; yet no murmur ever escaped him. "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth" to complain. "He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth"—no complaining is ever heard. What submission to his lot and to his Father's will!

5. His love to men was pure: it was not a hypocritical pretence. His love not only led him to poverty, reproach, and amazing sufferings for men, but to "taste death for every man;" "while we were sinners Christ died for the ungodly." Here is no mock love, or love rising no higher than profession: it stands out in living characters, and may be read of all men. He gave practical proof of its reality.

6. His love to God, his Father, was pure. "I delight to do thy will," he could say: and again, "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." Such was the love of Christ to God. How unlike some professed worshippers of God, who declare, if it was not for the dread of endless torture they would not serve God at all. If such speak the truth of themselves, they have no love to God, and are mere hypocrites in all their professions of it. They do not at all resemble Christ in his pure love to his Father.

9. Jesus was pure in all his tempers, words, and actions. So far was he above fault in these particulars, that he could appeal to his worst enemies, and say—"Which of you convicteth me of sin?" John viii., 46. (Syriac).

Such was the purity of him whom we are called to imitate—whose example we are called to follow. "He that saith he abideth in him ought himself also to walk even as he walked." 1 John ii., 6.

This hope, then, of seeing Jesus as he is and being like him, leads "every man" that hath it to purify himself after this example of purity. Thus are the "sons of God" to know themselves, and to be known of others; for, "every man that hath this hope" thus purifieth himself—by this rule. But—

III. HOW IS THIS PURIFICATION ACCOMPLISHED?

It is said "He purifieth himself." A man may be said to do that which he is anxious to accomplish, and uses every possible means to effect. Thus Paul said he once "compelled" Christians to blaspheme. He was anxious to have them do so, and did all he could to that end. So, he "purifieth himself" indicates the will set on the object, and all the means in one's power employed to accomplish the end.

1. Faith is the medium through which this purity is accomplished. If there is no faith in its attainment, how can it be had? It will not rain down from heaven upon us. "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." And "He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Matt. v., 6; Heb. xi., 6. And James saith, "Let him ask in faith, nothing wavering." Faith, or a sincere belief, that what God has commanded us to be he will enable us to be, if we seek his help without doubting his faithfulness, is a most important exercise of mind. Let us then dwell upon God's faithfulness to his promises, and believe that what he has enjoined on us to attain, he will certainly enable us to reach, and we shall find the purity spoken of in our text not that impossible object of attainment our unbelief has so often suggested. Thus coming to God for the aid of his Spirit we shall find that "what he has promised he is able to perform;" and he has promised, "I will circumcise thine heart that thou mayest love the Lord thy God with all thine heart;" thus circumcised in heart, we shall be pure even as Christ is pure. Let none, then, sink down in sullen unbelief; the prize is too great to let slip without a mighty struggle—to see Jesus as he is and be like him. Up, then, every one of us, and so run that we may obtain.

2. Obedience, equally with faith, is essential to attain the purity spoken of. "Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit," etc. 1 Pet. i., 22. "For as the body without breath is dead, so faith without works is dead also." James i., 26. It is vain to expect purity unless faith and obedience are united. Faith is the life principle, but it must work or it dies. Let us see, then, the importance of obedience in order to purity. Faith and obedience comprehend the whole that is necessary to be said under this head of the subject. We come now, briefly—

III. TO URGE THE DUTY TO SEEK PURITY.

"Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." Heb. xii., 14. Without purity, then, we shall be eternally excluded from the sight of the Lord, and we must, hence, "not see life"—future or eternal life cannot be ours. By impurity or sin we are unfitted for the society and employments of holy beings. What a loss is this? Who can comprehend its magnitude? No language can describe it. "Be ye holy, for I am holy," is the injunction of God upon us. Harmony with God must exist in us, or to dwell with him we cannot. Death, corruption, eternal night, must be the portion of the impure and unholy.

Let us study the life of Jesus; sincerely and truly repent of all our departures from a likeness to him; seeking the mercy of God to forgive our shortcomings, and help us in time to come that we may become truly Christ-like. Let us not faint because we find ourselves often to fail in the effort, but rather let those failures lead us to greater diligence and more earnest prayer for the divine Spirit to aid; for "in due time we shall reap if we faint not." Never should we allow discouragement to overpower us, as we shall often be tempted to do. Here is our true warfare, and though sometimes wounded and perhaps defeated, let us return to the conflict armed with "the whole armor of God," and ere long we shall be able to say, with the apostle to the Gentiles, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me in that day, and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." Yes, if we have fought the good fight and attained a likeness to Christ here, we shall soon "see him as he is and be like him." Happy day—glorious hour, and fast approaching. A little longer struggle and the victory is won and the crown bestowed.

A FUTURE LIFE.

"I AM the resurrection, and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." John xi., 25, 26.

These words fell from the lips of him who spake as never man spake. The occasion that called forth their utterance, was the death of an intimate friend of the Saviour's, whose two lonely sisters were weeping in sorrow over the loss of their beloved brother. From the time that the first man had returned to the dust, until now, the successive generations of men (with but two exceptions) had each in turn yielded to the stern decree, "Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." Death, with none to question his right hitherto, had steadily pursued his victim, and, with unerring aim, dealt the fatal blow that struck down the teeming millions of our race, and consigned them to the solemn silence of the dead. Job xxi., 26.

And now the important question propounded by the patriarch Job, "If a man shall die, shall he live again?" (not live on while dead, but live again?) is about to have a practical solution, affirmatively. For the resurrection and the life stands at the threshold of the territory of death; and though four days had intervened since Lazarus, the brother of the weeping sisters, had fallen by the shaft of death, yet at the bidding of him who is the "resurrection and the life" the sceptre falls from the trembling hand of death, and "he that was dead came forth."

We have before us then, the work of death, "Lazarus was dead," John xi., 14. Not simply his body, but whatever constituted Lazarus a living man, had died. It does not say any thing of a "re-union of soul and body;" it simply says, "he that was dead came forth." When Jesus had said unto Martha, "Thy brother shall rise again," her mind instantly looked forward, and her faith found expression in the following sentence, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection, at the last day." Nothing said about his being happy in heaven either by the Saviour or Martha. Strange (is it not?) that they should overlook a matter that affords such consolation to the bereaved in our day! But their views and ours differ in this respect, namely, the work of death was to be counteracted by the Prince of life; and that, only by a resurrection from the dead. Hence the reply of Martha, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection, at the last day." And now, ye that believe in a resurrection of "prison houses"—"cumbrous clay"—"old shells," etc, and not of dead men, literally, just listen to the response of the Saviour, in answer to Martha. "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me though he were dead yet shall he live; and he that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." Now, as Jesus loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus, the fair inference is, that they in turn loved and believed in him; and Lazarus, believing in him, though dead, should live again. And in order that we may understand how Christians after death, at the resurrection, shall be raised from the dead, and enter into eternal life, we shall briefly examine the source from whence this life cometh; and in doing so, we shall consult the Author of life himself.

Jesus says, (John v., 26) "For, as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself." John i., 4, "In him was life, and the life was the light of men." John vi., 48, "I am that bread of life." John xiv., 6. "I am the way, the truth, and the life." These passages will suffice for the present to prove the principle of life from the dead, is in Christ, and not an inherent quality in man; and when man falls a victim to the common enemy of our race, he has no conscious existence, until the resurrection and the life comes to quicken him into life again by a resurrection from the dead. Man in his natural condition has not this life; no, nor even the promise of it, except on conditions with which he is bound to comply, or never see life; much less be a partaker of it. God the Father seeing man in this perishing condition, pitied him, and so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life; and the Saviour says, John xx., 10, "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." John vi., 40, "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life." John vi., 57, "As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me even he shall live by me." John vi., 53, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." John iii., 36, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." John ix., 24, "For if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." John v., 40, "And ye will not come to me, that ye might have life."

These are the words of him that spake as never man spake, and are by no means far fetched. They are the utterances of him in whose hands are the "issues of life and death," and who has solemnly averred that he hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but had rather the wicked would turn from his wickedness and live. Did he not authorize his servant Moses to set before the people of his day life and death, and bid them seek life that they and their seed might live? Did he not say by the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel, "The soul that sinneth it shall die?" David, in Psalm xxxvii., uses the following language, "For they shall soon be cut down like the grass and wither like the green herb." "For yet a little while and the wicked shall not be" . . . . "Yea thou shalt diligently consider his place and it shall not be." "But the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume, into smoke shall they consume away." The transgressors shall be destroyed together; the end of the wicked shall be cut off." The prophet Malachi says, "For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the LORD of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch; and the righteous shall tread them down as ashes under the soles of their feet, in the day that I shall do this, saith the Lord of hosts."

Now, are all these terrible threatenings to be applied simply to the loss of their happiness, or to the total extinction of their conscious being? It takes a firm believer in the first great lie to Eve, pursuading our first parents that "they should not surely die," to explain away those positive terms, "Life and death," by substituting in their place "happiness and misery." Truly it is astonishing to see with what persistency and bold tenacity men, who should be teachers of the way of life, cling to and reiterate this first falsehood; and to see that it is a bold and unblushing falsehood we have but to turn to the record and see.

God said unto Adam in the event of his disobedience, "Thou shalt surely die." The serpent said, "Thou shalt not surely die." There was not even an attempt to take advantage of the language used by God to Adam, and explain it in a spiritual sense, but he flatly contradicted the Almighty and thereby introduced death into our world, and all our woes. This, then, being the condition of our race, the bowels of divine compassion were moved toward us. And as there was no law could be given that would have given life, God sent his own Son, in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh. Christ having suffered, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God; being made perfect through suffering, he became the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him. And if the world is in a state of death, as is clearly proved, and if God the Father hath given his Son for the life of the world, and the Son invites the world to come to him that they might have life, and men refuse and reject the proffered boon, is it not the height of folly, nay more, is it not downright presumption to suppose that they can have any life in the future state? Let us stand by the record, 1 John v., 10, "He that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son; and this is the record, that God hath given unto us eternal life: and this life is in his Son." Now when do Christians come into actual possession of their promised inheritance? When Christ who is their life shall appear. But then the question may be asked, Does he not appear at the death of every good man? We answer, Yes, he appears at the right of the Father for us; and he allowed Stephen, the first martyr to his cause, to see him there.

Mathew xxiv., 28, "For as the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Does this take place at the death of every good man? If not, then death is not the coming of the Son of man. When he comes they that are in their graves shall hear his voice. When he appeared to his servant John in the Isle of Patmos, he declares, "I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death." And in closing up the vision, he assured his servant of his second coming with these words, "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give every man according as his work shall be." Is it not manifest, then, that man, having fallen under the power of death, must be holden by it, until he who has the key of death returns to abolish death, and bring life and immortality to light by raising up his faithful ones and giving unto then eternal life? Heaven and earth may pass away, but not one jot or tittle of Christ's words shall pass till all be fulfilled. "I will raise them up at the last day;" and I give unto them eternal life." John vi., "I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also." Upon his coming again, then, depends our being received unto himself, according to his own words; and as the resurrection of the dead is the last and closing act of this present dispensation, and there can be no resurrection until he who is the resurrection and the life shall appear, then the second Advent of the Son of man becomes a matter of deep and abiding interest to all those who love his appearing; and to those who look for him, will he demonstrate the truth of the text under consideration, that having believed in him, though they may have fallen under the power of death, yet shall they live again; and that those who are living and believing when he shall appear shall never die; but they shall be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. Now there is nothing in all this to prove the conscious state of the dead, nor that the wicked can by any possibility have any future life. God has his own terms upon which men may have life, and he will not change them to suit the corrupt desires and passions of the ungodly; and though men may forsake the fountain of life, and hew out to themselves broken cisterns, that can hold no water, or seek to force an entrance into the kingdom of God, or like thieves and robbers seek to climb up some other way, they will find that inflexible justice cannot be imposed upon; and though there was a way that seemed right unto them, yet the end thereof was the way of death. Come, then and learn of him who is the way, the truth, and the life. Come and be reconciled to God by the death of his Son. Come, seek to have your life hid with Christ in God, and your name entered on the roll of the church of the first born, that are written in heaven, and then, with them, you may enter within the pearly gates of the New Jerusalem; with them walk the streets of the City of Gold, see the king in his beauty, eat of the tree of life and drink of the water of the river of life that flows from the throne of God, and with the radiant host of the redeemed you shall join in that triumphant song of praise for deliverance, Unto him that loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father. Then delay not. Soon he who is our life shall appear, and if he find us watching and waiting we shall enter into the marriage supper of the Lamb. STEWART CARLISLE.

ST. ALBANS, VT., October 4, 1867.

BR. STORRS: The first number of Vol. v. of the HERALD OF LIFE has come to hand. Our old friend is most welcome with its pleasant, winning look and cheery talk. This improvement in personal appearance is in perfect keeping with the spirit of our annual meeting, and is the proper exponent of the progressive tendencies of our doctrines and their supporters. God speed thee, our precious paper, and "Herald of Life" to "them that sit in darkness and the shadow of death;" a messenger of joy and gladness, and comfort to the "saints scattered abroad" until we shall meet in the "coming kingdom" of our Lord, to go no more out forever.

A few days ago I was agreeably surprised to meet in St. Albans, Br. L. L. Howard, of Rome, Me., whose acquaintance I made at Wilbraham. Br. Wendell will remember him as an attentive listener to his discourse in the Providence tent. Br. Howard is a Sabbatarian Adventist, and was on his way to Enosburgh, Vt., to hold a meeting with a society of his people in that place and vicinity. Eld. J. N. Andrews, who also heard Br. Wendell on that occasion, came with Eld. Howard, but had left by the stage a short time previous.

I had a very pleasant interview with Br. Howard, and, for our limited time, the conversation took quite a wide range. I cannot now report even the substance of it, but in regard to the different branches of the Advent body, and their divisions, Br. H. said he felt conciliatory, and did not attempt to force his peculiar opinions upon others. He regretted that Adventists are not more united, since they all hold so many grand truths in common, to whose support they can unitedly rally. In regard to our doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked, he said that he had always held to the view of their resurrection at the end of the thousand years, and their destruction in the second death. He was much interested in Br. Wendell's discourse, and as soon as he is able intends to give our views a thorough investigation.

On their return I met Eld. Andrews with Eld. Howard. I had seen him some years before, and heard him preach; but was not at that time particularly interested. Our time was limited, and as we could not consider the Sabbath question or the non-resurrection of the wicked, Br. Andrews gave me some account of their health reform and method of raising money. The latter especially would commend itself to our brethren; and if something of the kind were adopted, the efficiency of our preachers would be much increased. He said he had given the same account to Br. Wendell, and tried to enforce the necessity of health reform in his case. I saw Br. Howard about an hour longer, as he left on a later train in another direction. In this time he gave me some of his reasons for keeping the seventh-day Sabbath. One conclusion was reached, and that is, that their view of the Sabbath and ours of the non-resurrection of the wicked are not incompatible.

I have lately had some correspondence with Br. S. S. Call, of Newport Centre, Vt. He wrote me giving me an invitation to go to Dunham, Canada, to assist in holding meetings. It is not convenient just now for me to get away, but after awhile I hope to do something in connection with Br. Call in such place, in this vicinity, as shall be deemed a suitable opening. I must do something; and I may as well commence in this way as any other. Pray for me that I may be a faithful laborer in the Lord's work. Yours in the hope of life through Christ.

From Polly G. Pitts.

Dayton, Wis., Sept. 29, 1867.

Br. Storrs: It is with a glad heart that I sit down to pen a few lines to you and the Herald of Life, or the readers thereof. I have been reading the Herald for September 4th, and it rejoiced my heart to hear of the great blessing that God bestowed on those that met at the yearly meeting of the Life and Advent Union. Oh! I bless God that he put it into the hearts of a few to have such a meeting, and that he has increased the numbers from year to year, and that his eternal truth has been gaining ground steadily; and I feel that it must be the reviving, and the returning of their first love in the hearts of God's people that has brought them so near the unity of the Spirit and the bonds of peace. It seems, in some measure, like the love that united them in '43 and '47, but seven-fold more consistent; for it is the love of those glorious truths of the living God that is making his people one. Oh, blessed truth, "No life out of Christ." No resurrection but to those in Christ, and all the dead in Christ are made alive, are raised to glory, and honor, and immortality. Oh, when I read and meditate on those glorious truths, and on their influence on God's children, I am full of wonder that these earthen, mortal vessels can hold them. But I cannot tell them now, as I feel them; but I long for immortality, not that I would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life; then I should be a vessel filled with the Spirit of God to overflowing, and the vessel not break. I feel that I am begotten by that incorruptible seed, the word of God, that liveth and abideth forever. All flesh is grass. But being begotten, I long to be born again, yes, born from the dead, and see the kingdom of God; or, if alive at his coming, to be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, (oh, how quick!) and caught up to meet our Lord in the air. I thank Br. "W. M." for his remarks on the closing meeting at Wilbraham. It begat in me the same spirit of love, that seemed to pervade every line. To God and the Lamb be all the glory. I know that the love of God in our hearts is a great treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency might be of God.

I was made glad by reading an outline of the history of life only in Christ, by Br. Wendell. How my mind ran back to the time when light on that glorious truth began to dawn upon my understanding; and I am astonished, with wonder and admiration at what God has wrought. Oh, his word is a lamp to our feet, and a light to our path; and I know that it grows brighter and brighter, and will unto the perfect day. I do believe that God will, by his people, hold up the Herald of Life till Jesus comes; for, is it not a messenger flying through the land, having the everlasting gospel of the kingdom to preach to all that will receive it? Yes, truly to me it is. I do not mean to convey the idea that I believe that all that is written in the Herald is gospel; no, but its great prominent feature is, "The hope of eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord; and that by a resurrection from the dead, by the eternal Spirit of God that raised up Christ. And no life out of Christ." To me the Herald proves better and better, and my prayer shall be: Lord give all who write for the Herald a spirit of love, and brotherly kindness, and forbearance. Now, the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you all perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen. Your sister, hoping for life when our Live-giver comes, whose coming I think is near.

From Stephen Benton.

Middlebury, Vt., Sept. 22, 1867.

Br. Storrs: I am heartily glad the Herald of Life is to be continued, although it may be seen that I have been tardy in responding to the call. You have had my prayers for the continuance of the paper. I never have had the pleasure of seeing you since 1844, at which time I heard you preach in this region. I have been a constant reader of your paper for many years. I would be glad to meet with you and others of like precious faith. Oh, that I could sit under the sound of your voice and hear the truth explained. I have tried to get my friends and neighbors to take the Herald, but my efforts have been in vain. I lend to all that will read them. The doctrine of man's natural immortality is held as essential in this place as the divinity of our blessed Life-giver. I will try again and again to get new subscribers. The blessed truths in the Herald are strengthening to my heart, and I can truly say: "Oh Father, bless our dear father in Israel, and make his last days his best." I beg an interest in your prayers, that I may be faithful unto death, or until our blessed Master shall return. Pray for my children. I have four sons and three daughters.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 16, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

A Friendly Notice.

"The late liberal subscription at Wilbraham on the part of the friends of The Herald of Life has enabled its conductors to give it an entirely new dress, greatly improving its appearance, which cannot fail to make it more acceptable to its friends and patrons. The Herald advocates the non-resurrection of the wicked dead, opposes water baptism, does not believe in a personal devil, teaches that communion is an annual ordinance, etc. It is conducted with ability by Eld. Geo. Storrs, whose intellectual vigor seems in no way impaired by his age."

The foregoing is from the Voice of the West, published by "Joshua V. Himes, Business Agent." Whether we are indebted to him or some one else as acting editor of the paper, we do not know. We thank the Voice for the kind notice as far as it goes, though it is not strictly correct in the statement that the Herald "opposes water baptism." We believe and teach that the "Essential Baptism" is the baptism of the Spirit. John, the Baptist, said, "He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he that baptizeth with the Holy Spirit." John i., 33. "I indeed baptize you with water . . . . but he shall baptize with the Holy Spirit and" [or] "with fire." Math. iii., 11. We do not "oppose" any one's being baptized with water if they believe it their duty: but we do maintain that water baptism is of no avail without the baptism Christ is authorized to communicate; and we do well, we think, to warn all to beware that they do not substitute water for the Spirit, lest they may receive a baptism of "fire."

Had the Voice favored its readers with one other fact in regard to what "The Herald advocates," and which is, in fact, the principal thing, we would have been much obliged. That is, "The Object of this paper is to promulgate the truth of 'Life only in Christ;' or, that a future life by a resurrection from the dead is conditional, and bestowed only at the second advent of Christ, 'at the last day.'" But we make no complaint in the matter; and hope the Voice will continue to prosper and progress till it comes fully up to the sight of "No Life out of Christ."

More About Wilmington.

LETTER FROM BRO. CARLISLE.

Br. Thomas McClary, of Wilmington, Del., has been for many years an active and highly-esteemed member of one of the Presbyterian churches of that city. His attention was called to the immortality and advent views by a believer from New England, who was at the time in the employ of himself and his brother, Samuel McClary, also a member of the Presbyterian church. The perusal of Hastings's "Pauline Theology" convinced Br. T. McC. of the final extinction of the impenitent. Rejoicing in his new-found light, he brought the subject to the attention of Br. Stewart Carlisle, on whose mind the reading of "Pauline Theology" did its work in a very summary manner. Subsequently, the brothers McClary and Br. Carlisle embraced the view of life only in Christ. The work of propagandism was at once begun, and Br. Carlisle's consistent zeal in this direction soon cost him his position as class-leader and exhorter, as well as his membership, in the M. E. Church. No formal action of the church was even had to deprive him of his membership; and the quiet dropping of his name has been admitted by the present pastor of Grace Church to have been entirely illegal. But Br. C. will hardly deem it worth while to call them to account in the matter; his best revenge will be to spare no pains in making them see the blessedness and power of the new truths which he has embraced. May the Lord enable him to heap such "coals of fire" on their heads most abundantly.

The grounds for expecting a considerable audience on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 6th, were small indeed. Saturday had been, throughout the greater part of it, so rainy that the handbills, which were printed in the morning, could not be posted till late in the day, but on them and the notice in the city paper of Saturday evening we had wholly to rely for bringing the contemplated meeting to the notice of all but the comparatively few that could be spoken to by the brethren personally. However, in spite of these seeming disadvantages, we had a very large attendance; I should judge there were not less than three hundred persons present, and a more attentive audience could not be desired.

Our opening exercises consisted of prayer and the singing of "Calvary" and "The Last Lovely Morning." Br. Carlisle then, in appropriate remarks preceding the discourse, took occasion to define his position publicly before the community. We recommended this step as one that would undoubtedly prove a blessing to him in his future efforts to spread the truth. The life views permeate his soul through and through, and he has an effective way of presenting them for the acceptance of others.

The discourse—including the time spent in hearing and answering questions from the audience—occupied one hour and fifty minutes. Of its influence in awakening an interest in the life theme, and of other related matters, Br. Carlisle, under date of Oct. 10th, writes as follows:

"Dear Brother: Since you left us, I have been trying to sound the minds of the people. I find quite a number speak favorably, but am sorry to say, the most bitterness is found, so far, among the brethren of the M. E. Church. There was a Catholic gentleman present, with whom I have since conversed, who was very much pleased. I was speaking with a Mr. D., who heard that you could not answer a single question that was asked. Knowing that he was a sensible man, I simply stated the case as follows: Suppose, Doctor, you were giving a lecture on the formation of the brain, and had previously announced that your lecture was open to criticism, and, during the progress of your lecture, some fellow in the audience should rise and call your attention to some defect in his toe, another in his heel, and so on; what conclusion would you come to? His reply was, 'that he was a fool.'

"I paid a visit to Grace Church on Monday evening, and met a few in class. It was very quiet and very dry, and I felt somewhat at a loss for a while as to how I should shape what I might find to say, but in my patience tried to possess my soul, resigning myself into the hands of my Master whom I am striving to serve with my spirit. And as I was the last called up, the leader requested me to relate a few words of my experience, and give a word of exhortation to the class. I rose up without anything definite in my mind, but purposed that, whatever should come in, should come out. And, the Lord be praised, it did come out; and such liberty I have not been blessed with for some time. It was perfect freedom. Oh, such precious truths! how they elevate and sanctify the soul that fully embraces them! Well, they looked at me as if I were of a different species; there was certainly a deep feeling pervading their minds. The Lord be praised for his goodness; freedom, seems best to express the idea. Oh, if the watchmen on the walls of Zion only had the sword of the Spirit, instead of the scabbard, what Herculean blows might they strike, and make it pierce even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and make it become a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

"But to return to the result of Sabbath. Quite a number expressed a desire to hear you preach, and felt disappointed when informed that you were gone. I think that, with proper notice, when it may suit your convenience to give us another call, we could have an audience twice as large as the other was. Meanwhile, we shall not be silent, but go in at every open door, and, as far as possible, we shall carry these blessed truths to the ears and hearts of all who will hear. Oh, for wisdom to know just the time and place to speak, and to do it with simplicity.

"Br. McClary sends love to you. Should be glad to hear from you. From your brother in Christ and in the blessed gospel hope."

Had Br. Carlisle's "Mr. D." been present at Institute Hall, he would readily have seen that the course actually pursued in the matter of answering questions could not properly have been deviated from. Early in the discourse, permission was given that any persons in the audience might, either while we were speaking, or at the close of the sermon, or both, ask questions or offer objections bearing upon the arguments and interpretations that might be brought before them. This was our programme, which, if it was well to announce, it was also well to follow. Accordingly, when we were asked, by several persons, to explain the rich man and Lazarus, the thief on the cross, Matt. xxv., 45, 46, we respectfully but firmly insisted that, before we would consent to enter upon those matters, we must know whether anything could be urged by those present against our exposition of the passage we had chosen for a text, viz., I Corinthians xv., 17—22, 32. It was evident, that our tenacity on this point enabled us to lodge our argument in the minds of many, in a manner that would have been utterly out of the question if we had consented to be drawn into a rambling controversy on a variety of texts. We stated fully to the audience the grounds and necessity of our procedure, and were well satisfied that it commended itself to the approval of by far the greater portion of our hearers. Of course, there will always be those in such an assembly who will insist, that if you do not try to do what they ask you to do, it is because you dare not. But the man who is easily turned aside, or annoyed, by such imputations from the unthinking, will hardly help forward any cause which he may expose to the risks of promiscuous and public oral controversy. Availing ourself of Br. Carlisle's illustration, we would add, that, in our Wilmington meeting, nothing could be urged against our views of the "brain" by those who greatly desired us to leave our theme and dilate on matters pertaining to the "toe" and "heel." The Presbyterian gentleman, who wanted the rich man and Lazarus explained, squarely admitted the correctness of our view of the term "perished," in I Cor. xv., 18; but when we pressed home upon him the utter impossibility of reconciling his concession with the doctrine of inherent immortality and its progeny of tenets, he as squarely modified his admission, by telling us that the term means "perished from happiness!" This shift was promptly disposed of.

Dr. Lawton (a Methodist M. D.) kindly urged the words of Paul, "the dead in Christ shall rise first," as proof that the wicked would also rise from the dead. As we had quoted that passage in our sermon, we were glad to show the unsoundness of his deduction from it: we think he saw his mistake.

Among our interrogators, was Rev. Mr. Scott, Methodist, son of the Methodist Bishop by that name. With him, at the close of the meeting, we had an interesting interview. He states with great frankness, that he did not pretend to know everything; admitted that there were strong arguments favoring our view; and evinced a willingness to examine the subject. Br. Scott's present field of labor is among the poor colored people of Wilmington, and resembles that of our brother Burbank, in Philadelphia. On the subject of Christian Perfection, Br. Scott is in dissent from the generally received Methodist view, and he publishes a periodical in which his own view of the subject is maintained. What we learned concerning him impressed us with the belief, that, if he should see sufficient grounds for embracing the life views, he would not be the man to hide his light under the bushel. We long for the opportunity to confer with him fully on the subject; for we do desire that all good men, who are free from sectarian bigotry, shall see the broad and solid basis upon which our doctrine rests.

On Sunday morning we heard Dr. Landis preach from the words, "For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved." The nearest approach the speaker made to introducing the subject of the Resurrection of the dead in his discourse, was in the statement, that it was Christ's mission "at death to receive us to our everlasting home." His evening discourse, on the immortality of the soul, which we also heard, was of a piece with the usual logic on that side of the question. His text was John iii., 36. We welcome his efforts in behalf of what we regard as a pernicious dogma, for he is helping to keep up an agitation in Wilmington which we must believe is destined, at no far-off day, to bear precious fruit. May our faithful brethren there be strengthened from above with courage and patience.

Tracts.

It has long been felt that we need small tracts to scatter like leaves everywhere. For lack of time to prepare such, and means to publish them, the matter has been neglected hitherto; but we have now commenced the work of getting them up on a single leaf, i. e., two pages. The first two will be ready for delivery in a few days. The first is, "Twenty Questions on Immortality." The second is, "The Short Hell and the Long One." The matter of both has been published in our paper hitherto. Those who wish to circulate them, can be supplied at cost, so soon as we can determine what that will be. At present, we will send them for 25 cents per hundred. Please do all you can to enlarge the contributions to the "Tract Fund." Let no one forget that matter. We shall add, as fast as we can, to the number of these small tracts, so as to have a variety, if we are sustained with funds. Send your orders for all you want immediately.

Our paper appears again with a scant margin, which none can regret more than ourself. Our paper-maker complains of "scant water" as the reason why we have not a new supply before this. We trust he may have "water enough" before our next issue. We try to exercise patience; but cannot expect always to have every thing just as we would.

We have given a large part of this week's issue up to "Letters and Extracts," which we suppose is well pleasing to many of our readers, and they had accumulated on our hands till we feared our correspondents might feel neglected. Let all continue to write who feel they have any thing of general interest to communicate. But we ask, as a special favor that none use pale ink or light lead pencils in writing. It is sometimes next to impossible to decipher what is thus written.

Eld. J. Lewis writes from Otto, Ill., Oct. 4, saying that he wishes his friends in the West who are indebted to him for money advanced for the Herald of Life, for books, etc., would, without delay, help him to square up his accounts with this office. He wishes to hear from all such at Shelbyville, Ill., immediately; and we really wish him to be able to settle with and for subscribers he has sent, as many of them stand in such relation to this office that we may be compelled to discontinue their papers for a lack of settlement. Do not keep Br. Lewis waiting for his dues in these matters. He much desires you all to continue, but feels that he cannot bear the burden unless you help him as he requests. We sent Br. Lewis a lot of pamphlets and tracts to Shelbyville one week since, which he will dispose of to help the cause and to strengthen himself: they are donations to him. We would have sent a like quantity to Br. Walter, but were uncertain where to direct them.

An Inquiry.

"Please send me your views on Math. xviii., 10, and Acts xii., 15. B. A. B."

Our "views" are easily expressed. The apostle asks concerning the angels, "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" Heb. i., 14. This seems to be a truth so well known and believed in Paul's day, that he barely refers to it as a fact that needed no further proof. In Math. xviii., 10, the Saviour, speaking of the "little ones which believe in me" (v. 6), says, "In heaven their angels (ministering spirits) do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven." Peter was one of these "little ones" after he had been fully instructed at the house of Cornelius, Acts x. He was taken by Herod, Acts xii., and put in prison, bound with chains, soon to be put to death; but God sent his angel (while the church was praying for Peter), which came to him, knocked off his chains, and opened the "iron gate" and let Peter out. Peter made his way immediately to the house "where many were gathered together praying." He commenced knocking. A damsel came to listen, and she knew his voice; but, instead of opening the door, she ran in, and told the company Peter stood before the gate. They thought it exceeding strange, but she affirmed it was even so. To them, it was still incredible; but she was not to be moved, and persisted in her testimony. They concluded it was impossible that Peter himself could be there, and said, "It is his angel:" i. e., his "ministering spirit," which did "always behold the face of" Jesus' "Father which is in heaven." We have never doubted the truth of such work being performed by the angels of God. The Scriptures abundantly sustain this view.

"The First Day Sabbath: clearly proved," etc., "by T. M. Preble." We received, from the publisher, a copy of this work some time since, but have not yet had time to examine it. It is a 12mo volume of near 500 pages, and is "published by the W. A. C. P. Association, Buchanan, Mich." Orders for it, we presume, should be addressed to Eld. Joshua V. Himes at that place. It is probable the work can also be had of the author, Lynn, Mass. The work is well got up, and contains, doubtless, much valuable information on the subject.

From Nicholas Allpool.

Locust Point, Ohio, Sept. 26, 1867.

Br. Storrs: I am happy to learn that the proper medicine has been administered at the meeting, held on the camp ground at Wilbraham, to keep the Herald of Life alive. My prayer to God is, that its columns may be fed with such food as to lead men from darkness to light, and from sin to God.

Let us all pray that prejudice may soon die and be forgotten forever, and that love and union may pervade the hearts of all God's children, and his Holy Spirit may guide us into all truth.

I have some trials on account of the views I hold of no immortality nor future life except in Jesus Christ alone. This is nothing to you who hold the same views. We must bear it patiently, and talk much to Jesus about it. He knows how to sympathize with us, being better acquainted with such trials than ever we will be; and we must willingly bear his cross, if we ever expect him to raise us up at the last day to immortality and eternal life. My time on earth can not be very long, according to nature; and as I never expect to see you in the flesh, Br. Storrs, if we prove faithful to our trust we will be permitted, with all God's children, to enter through the gate into the New Jerusalem, and so be forever with the Lord.

I feel while writing to you, to say with the poet:

Death's vale I soon must tread;
Dear Lord thy smile I crave,
To save me from the dread
Of death and of the grave.
Let me by faith thy glory see,
In death 'twill then be well with me.

When we our Saviour meet,
And on the throne sit down,
We'll bow at his dear feet,
And there we'll cast our crown.
Him eye to eye we then shall see,
And 'twill be well with you and me.

Yours, in hope of eternal life.

Eld. Z. Campbell, Ashtabula, Ohio, is engaged in the cultivation of grape vines, which he sells to the farmers, good men, on credit; but he says: Among them all I have been able to collect but $3, two of which I herewith send to the Herald of Life, thinking it is the best use hard-earned money can be put to. The paper must live. When it first started I thought it impossible to make it live. The great city of "orthodoxy" is so prodigiously walled in that I supposed it impregnable. But, really, your paper is shattering the adamantine stones out of the old wall faster than any battering-ram of old or modern times. I read and lend my paper to orthodox people, who read it with astonishment, and already begin to doubt whether their old creed is sound. I propose going out this Fall and Winter to help onward the cause of truth in some new fields.

From Eld. S. L. Walter.

Otto, Ills., Sept. 30, 1867.

Br. Storrs: The evening after writing my last letter to you, Br. Osborn preached to a good, attentive congregation. The next evening I preached by request on baptism. The people are awake to the subject, and "The Essential Baptism" is doing a good work, when it is read by the thinking, who see that the "Christ Baptism is that of the Holy Spirit, and not water. The next evening I preached again, by request, from "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" I believe good was done. The followers of Mr. A. Campbell asked questions about what our Lord said to Nicodemus, in relation to being "born of water and the Spirit," which we tried to answer according to the record, "but they still cried, Great is water baptism, for in that is their hope. I left on the Friday following to preach at Painter school house, which I did on Saturday and Monday evenings: had a good turn out, and good attention inside the house, but outside there was some disturbance by those who are much opposed to no life out of Christ.

The Methodists outgeneralled the brethren, for they monopolized the whole of the Sabbath, and we could not have a meeting, so I attended the class meeting, and heard an old brother with whom I had a talk on the immortal soul before meeting. He contended that "God breathed a spark of his own immortal nature into man." In his experience in the class, he said, for my especial benefit, that he "saw the immortal soul of his son leave him [his son] nine hours before he died;" and thus overturned the dogma that "death is the separation of soul and body," and demonstrated that man can live without the immortal soul, and that it acted without this mighty lever to put him in motion or to keep him so. I thought they all ought to see that their theory is radically wrong. At night the circuit preacher preached, it was thought at me, for the teacher told him I was there. But I was pleased and profited, for he preached that to remain without a resurrection was the greatest evil that could befal us: "that if in this life only we had hope in Christ, we were of all men most miserable;" and that we get the crown of life after death, and that "the crown of life" was "life from the dead;" and this is attained by those who are "faithful until death." Truth will come from the mouths of our opposers. We have good meetings here, and as good attendance as any of the sects who hold meetings all around us, and keep us out of the prominent places; but, thank the Lord, truth is onward, and is bound to gain adherents of such as love the truth.

I am trying to get subscribers to the Herald of Life, and cash or pledges to the Tract Fund. The work must go forward, for it is of God, and must be sustained by the servants of God in order that they may be faithful stewards, or they cannot hear the Lord say, "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over five, or ten cities." If they are not faithful in the little, they will not be faithful in the much. Let us, brethren and sisters, see to it that we are faithful to our Lord, for he will render to every man according to his work. See to it that our work is done, and well done, and then we shall be sure of life from the dead, and a seat on our Lord's throne. I hope that the brethren and sisters will not forget us, out here, where the lovers of truth are scattered over a large extent of country, and many are in earnest, and stand up for the truth in the spirit of their Master. I close by praying that my heavenly Father may bless you with health and every needed good for this life, and that we may meet in the world to come with all the saints. Adieu. Yours in hope of life when the Life-giver comes.

From Emeline T. Hobbs.

Cambridgeport, Mass., Oct. 2, 1867.

Br. Storrs: Your paper came to hand today in its new and improved look. I hail with delight every sign of progress, whether in outward appearance or otherwise, of everything connected with the great truths with which we stand identified. It is said "coming events cast their shadows before;" and sometimes I think this desire, everywhere, to beautify, is one of the indications of that "beautiful world" being near. I love beauty and beautiful things, and long to see this earth clad in its Eden-like beauty; and above all, long to see the "King in his beauty." And how glad I am we have the promise of seeing him as he is, and also the promise of being made like him. This ought to nerve us to action, and help us to endure. I am glad, to-day, it is and has been twenty-five years my privilege to hear on this great and increasingly interesting subject, "The coming of Jesus." My first remembrance of preaching had in it, "Behold the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him."

I, child like, accepted it as the truth. After years, with study and reflection, cause me to say—This is the truth.

Although I did not have opportunity to take you by the hand at Wilbraham, I saw you during the meeting (in the time tent) of the Life and Advent Union, and felt glad that you were once more permitted to see the triumph of the cause in which you have toiled.

We had a most glorious meeting under the "tree" on the Sabbath, Aug. 25. It was gratifying to hear the testimonies from young and old to the power of these truths on the heart.

A young man, who one year ago was a stranger to these views, who has become interested to search, notwithstanding the ridicule he has heard poured forth from different sources, both in the church and out, said to me, "I believe you are right." He said it was remarkable to see the intelligence shown by the people under the "Chestnut tree."

I cannot bear the idea of being cut off from receiving the HERALD, but I have, at present, no money to remit. I have meant to do something toward its support, and have circulated the paper faithfully.

I have the promise of one subscriber, and will try for more. With my kindest regards, and the promise of my help and smypathy, I am, yours truly.

FROM ELD. A. GUTHRIE.

TRUMANSBURG, N. Y., Oct. 12, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I wish to say to the brethren, through the HERALD OF LIFE, that my health has so far improved that I am able to hold meetings again. I should like to travel in company with some one that will bear a part of the labor, as I do not feel sufficiently strong to go through a course of lectures without help.

The great cause of reform calls for evangelists that will go from place to place, as the way opens, and give lectures, sell books, scatter tracts, get subscribers for the HERALD, and impress upon the people the necessity of holiness.

I should like to correspond with Br. R. Wendell about giving a course of lectures, on his way to or from the West, at Trumansburg. It is about thirty miles from Seneca Falls, via the Cayuga Lake.

P. S.—Any one wishing to write to me will direct their letters—"Trumansburg, Tompkins Co., N. Y."

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We rejoice that Br. GUTHRIE is able, and feels like going into the work. It is such men as he that the cause calls for; and we think he will honor it anywhere. We would be glad if there could be found a man of like mind to go out with him, but fear that may be difficult. We judge it will be impossible for Br. Wendell to comply with his request, as he is already late getting West, and intends returning East, ultimately, by the way of St. Louis, New Albany, Ind., and Cincinnati. May the Lord direct our way and help all who have a "mind to work" to do much good.

FROM ALBIN CHANDLER.

CAMERON, Mo., Sept. 29, 1867.

BR. STORRS; I have just returned home, after an absence of some weeks, and see by the dear HERALD that its friends have bestowed generously for the continued existence of so valuable a friend and exponent of Bible truth; for which, I truly thank my heavenly Father, and the brethren. I intended writing long ago, but the misfortune of not having the ready cash to help the good cause hindered.

I came to this country in May last, among strangers, and in limited circumstances, but with an ardent desire to do good and get in a climate more congenial to my health. I started here by buying a small piece of railroad land, on long time; and while riding over the beautiful prairie on horseback, my horse, in descending a steep hill, stumbled and fell upon me, breaking my left shoulder very badly; so that I have been laid up all Summer, but am just getting about. But in my affliction I never saw the truth so beautiful; and in my quiet could reflect on my past life, and could but rejoice in the goodness of God i my suffering: then the hope of a future life—truly, that anchor of hope did cheer and sustain me. Now, while among men, I love to tell them of the "love of God;" of his "good will toward men;" and there has one young man, a member of the M. E. church, become much interested; and says, he will subscribe for the paper after a while. I hope to be able to send my mite with his, soon. So, please send on my HERALD without delay; for, I cannot do without it: it's all the preaching I have. I read with much interest Brn. Lewis' and Walter's letters, as they are just east of me, as near as I can learn; but the great Mississippi runs between us. I often think we are scattered like seed through the land for the blessing of the people. I trust that every humble believer will let his light shine to the glory of God. I should like much to attend some of the meetings in Illinois, if the expense is not too great. I wish Br. Lewis would write to me the best route, and the expense from Quincy. I live in hopes that, by the blessing of God, I may find enough honest ones here that love the truth so well that we shall be able to get some of the able minds to come to our town and remove the mists of error from the eyes of the people. Your brother, in Christ: a prisoner of hope, praying, "Thy kingdom come."

MRS. E. B. KITTENGER, Philadelphia, after saying she had not seen the HERALD for ten months, having been spending some time on the Eastern Shore of Virginia, buried her eldest daughter, aged 36, etc., writes: I have got No. 1. Vol. v. Be so kind as to continue it; I cannot do without it. I was so glad to see it: and how good it is. We are back to our old place in this city. There was one, in Virginia, who said he would like to take the paper, and I think he will, but I was too sick when I came away, to see him. He is a Universalist. I lent him an old paper I had with me. They truly want light on the Eastern shore of Va. "The Tree of Life." That sermon I have got by heart. Give us another.

FROM ABBY A. PERRY.

SCOTLAND, CONN., Sept. 26, 1867.

BR. STORRS: At the eleventh hour I am seated, with pen in hand, to address a few lines to you, to let you know that I have not lost my interest in the HERALD OF LIFE, or in him who came that we might have "life, and that we might have it more abundantly," in his kingdom.

Circumstances did not permit me to meet with you at Wilbraham as I did last year; though my mind wandered there while I was lying in bed, with my new-born babe beside me; and I thought, what changes take place in one short year! How many dear ones have passed away to the land of silence, and forgetfulness, since we met last year; and how many have come upon the stage, to taste the joys and sorrows of this mortal life, for a few days or years, and then follow their friends to the silent grave to await the coming of the Just One, who said, "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." I think, with many others, that the HERALD grows more and more interesting, and the Life views are growing more popular; though "Truth" will never be popular with the masses until it triumphs over all error when the LIFE-GIVER takes to himself his great power and reigns on the earth. O, how earnestly we should pray, "Thy kingdom come: thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven." I know there are those who earnestly and fervently offer this prayer; "and shall not God avenge his own elect, who cry day and night unto him? I tell you that he will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" I am glad to see not only faith, but works manifested, by some in sustaining the HERALD OF LIFE. God grant, that it, and its Editor may both live till Jesus comes; and may he hear the Master say, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of the Lord."

May the Jehovah of Israel strengthen, and guide, and keep you blameless till that day, is the prayer of your sister.

FROM A. C. NEEDHAM.

BOYLAN'S GROVE, IOWA, Oct. 6, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I have taken the HERALD OF LIFE three years. I signed for seven copies, three quarters of a year, and sent them to friends in five different States, for the purpose of getting the paper circulated and getting new subscribers. I have bought about $4 worth of your tracts and books, and distributed them among the people to spread the truth; but I see no visible fruit as the result, as yet; but it may be like "bread cast upon the waters, that shall return after many days."

Now my subscription has run out, and my money has run out; but I want the paper, at all hazard; for I believe it is the only honest Christian paper I ever read. You shall have your money by the first of January.

I have tried to get new subscribers, and have offered to pay the money myself, if, at the end of the year, they would say that it had not done them $2 worth of good. I live twenty-five miles from any one of like faith; and I have to contend with wind and tide, the churches and evil. I study daily to know the truth, and find the HERALD OF LIFE an experienced teacher. Yours in hope of a resurrection from the dead.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—Take courage, Br. Needham, we all have to pass the incipient stage in a reformation, where we must contend with all manner of prejudices; but "in the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand; for thou knowest not which shall prosper, or whether both shall be alike good." It is certain we shall not labor in vain, if the love of Christ, his truth, and of our dying fellow men prompts us to work. The Winter night may seem to be long, but there will some day be a Spring time, and the fruit of our labor will appear, and we shall rejoice that we did not faint, for, "In due time we shall reap, if we faint not." Again, we say, take courage, and fear not: our reward will be according to our faithful work, and not according to present "visible fruit." Put in the seed when and where the Lord of the harvest gives us opportunity. He will see to the result: and "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."

FROM WALTER PATTERSON.

DELHI, N. Y., Sept. 24, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I wish you to continue my paper, and to continue sending one to George Patterson, Hawick, Scotland; so long as it is appreciated, or can do any good, I want to send it.

I cannot express my thankfulness too much for the benefit I have received from your labors. Your "Six Sermons" shook the immortal soul out of me; but, then, I am glad to see clearly that immortality is offered to me on the most reasonable conditions. Through your lead, I have been enabled to see many glorious truths that once would have been considered the greatest of errors. However, in your last, speaking of the second resurrection, you advance an idea that I am not yet prepared to accept. There may be some things about the second resurrection that we cannot yet see clearly; but it seems to me that, during the millennial reign of Christ and his saints, the subjects of the kingdom are in a mortal state, and subject to death; and is it not reasonable to suppose that those who have proved themselves worthy of eternal life in that age shall have a resurrection to life?

And again: I have sometimes thought that those who obtained a part in the first resurrection were only those who had gained honorable scars in their Christian warfare, and that the others, who, though worthy of everlasting life, not having resisted unto blood, might sleep "until the thousand years were finished."

But God's will be done.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Will our brother allow us to suggest that, under Messiah's personal reign, the tree of life may be accessible to the obedient, and that possibly none will die but wilful sinners; and that such will have no revival, but will die "accursed," even though he shall be a "hundred years old?" But on these points we wish not to be positive. We leave them mostly for the future to reveal what shall be in that dispensation.

IRA FOUCHER, Sandy Hill, N. Y., writes: As my paper is still good, I enclose $2, so as to have it continued to me as long as time lasts in its present form, which I think will be till Sept. 27, 1868, and no longer, for I am a Thurmanite in the fullest sense. I am glad also that you stand to your post so well, and contend so earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints; and I do also wish and pray that you would read and examine Br. Thurman's book, "DANIEL UNSEALED," for I think he has got the truth on the time of our Lord's coming. Yours as ever.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We presume we saw Thurman's book soon as any other person, and examined it so far as we thought it our duty; but our mind was and is unchanged on the definite time of the advent, that it is unrevealed and unknown, at present. But we love Br. Fancher and others of like views none the less because they think differently, so long as they manifest the spirit of Christ: and we yield to none of them as having a more earnest desire for the appearing and kingdom of our Lord and LIFE-GIVER than ourself, and we hope to live to see that glorious day; but we intend to work in our Lord's vineyard, as we are able, till he shall say, "It is enough—Come home."

W. S. OLMSTED, Hartford, Conn., writes: I am thankful that you are continued in life to bring out this precious doctrine of "No life out of Christ." The doctrine never appeared to me so dear nor so precious as it does now. The Bible is full of it when once the old theological spectacles are removed and the "eyes anointed with eye salve." I think the ancients understood it. One of the seven martyr sons of the Maccabee woman said to Antiochus, "It is good being put to death by man, to look for hope from God to be raised up again by him. As for thee (to the king) THOU shalt have no resurrection to life." 2 Mac. vii., 14. The noble mother of these noble martyrs, herself a martyr, said, (ver. 29), "Fear not the tormenter, but, being worthy of thy brethren, take thy death, that I may receive thee again in mercy with thy brethren." No wonder that a Romon Catholic council should decide that the Books of Maccabees are not canonical. Such sentiments as uttered by these martyrs, if admitted as canonical, would upset the Popish dogma of immortal soulism, purgatory, etc.

L. A. BUTLER, New Britain, Conn., writes: I am still interested in the blessed truth of "No life out of Christ." I wish the Christian community understood it better. "But of this they are willingly ignorant," and choose to remain so. As a token of my interest in this God-honoring truth I send $5—$3 for Vol. v., and $2 for the Tract Fund. I hope to be found among the watching and waiting ones at the Master's coming. Yours in the bonds that unite to Christ.

MRS. L. R. R. BISHOP, Warner N. H., writes: The truth is still precious to me, and I rejoice that its clear light has ever beamed upon my pathway. How, then, can I do otherwise than earnestly desire that others should be made to see its radiant beauty, and led to rejoice in its excellence?

I very much desired to meet with you under the ever-to-be-remembered "tree" (which I see by the HERALD, those who were privileged with attending the anniversary, were not yet permitted to do, by reason of the rain), but circumstances prevented. I rejoice in the success attending the meeting, regarding it as indicative of a growing interest in the glorious life theme.

WM. STEELE, Frankfort, Wis., writes: I rejoice that the HERALD OF LIFE is to be continued. The brethren who so freely sustain it, I trust will have their reward.

ELD. J. LEWIS, at Otto, Ills., writes: This is, perhaps, the last time that I write from Fulton Co., as I must leave for Shelby again so as to begin in time to pitch our tent by the 13th of Oct. I wish to say to all who are behind with me, that they will confer a lasting favor on me by sending the money due to me to Shelbyville, Ills. Do not forget it; as I am in want of it to square up at the office of the HERALD OF LIFE.

JAMES STEPHENSON, Davenport, Iowa writes: I am glad to see how nobly the friends of the HERALD OF LIFE have acted in sustaining it. Enclosed is $5 onmy pledge; and I will do something for the Tract Fund before long.

G. B. MARTIN, Gold Field, Iowa, writes: I cannot think of doing without the HERALD OF LIFE. I prize it next to the Bible: it is all the preacher I have here now. I think it gets better and better every year. The glorious leading truths it advocates—Life only in Christ, and his soon coming kingdom and reign on earth with his saints, are two crowning truths around which all lovers of truth are clustering and forming one consolidated Philadelphian church: (Brotherly love). O, may it prosper until it breaks down old sectarianism, bigotry and superstition; and love and harmony reign throughout all the Lord's vast domain. I feel glad to hear of the harmony and good will that prevailed at the recent meeting of the Life and Advent Union, and the large amount subscribed for the support of the paper. I hope the Lord may bless those dear friends of the truth who opened their hearts to contribute so largely to the support of the Lord's precious truth on that occasion.

JOHN MARSH, McKean, Pa., sends $5, and writes: I prize the HERALD OF LIFE, above all other papers I ever read, for its manly defence of Life only in Christ, and for its liberal spirit in letting opposers have a hearing. I am a believer in a personal devil; but if it will not stand investigation on Bible ground, let it go down. If it is not the truth, it can do no good. I am glad to see it investigated. Yours in hope.

E. S. STONE, Boston, Mass, writes: I feel to thank the Lord that we have the HERALD OF LIFE continued. I am satisfied that daylight is opening, and the darkness disappears; though there are some in this city who once had the light, but I am much afraid they now sit in darkness. I hope and pray that the scales may fall from their eyes, soon, so they may see. I would like to be able to do more for the HERALD OF LIFE, but can not now. I send $5. My prayer is that, the Lord will keep you in perfect health, in body and mind, that you may help on the great work in which you are engaged.

E. D. HUTCHINSON, Corinna Centre, Me., writes: I feel that I cannot do without the weekly visits of the HERALD OF LIFE. My prayer is, Lord increase its circulation, and give us all life in the future.

JOHN M. WILLIS, Lake City, Minn., writes: I will shortly send you a portion of the $50 I pledged toward the support of "our paper." I am doing all I can to spread the glorious "news" that a life eternal, immortal, is to be had by faith in him who hath brought it to light in the Gospel, in that "God hath raised him from the dead, now to die no more." Yours in the hope of its enjoyment.

WARREN SMITH, Cambria, Mich., writes: I feel thankful that friends are willing to use the means the Lord has given them to sustain our dear HERALD OF LIFE. May the Lord bless them in their stewardship. I had hoped to be with them at Wilbraham, but was prevented. Therefore, I must be content, at present, in hearing from you through the paper. We have no preaching here on our views. I hope Br. Wendell will call on us, going West, or on his return. We will pay for the meat he shall give us. Shall we see him? I send $5 for my paper, Vol. v.

RICHARD WOLCOTT, Shark River, N. Y., writes: I inclose $3 to continue my paper, and I pledge $7 more, making $10. I wish to do all I can; for I would not be without the HERALD OF LIFE on any account.

J. A. MAYO, North Amherst, Mass., sends $6, and writes: I am trying to take heed to the sure word of prophecy, as to a light in this dark, stormy day. I dare not take things second-handed, as I should if I took dear Sister Weaver's advice. These time movements tend to make perilous times more abundant. May God help us all to watch. Amen. Your sister, trusting God, through Jesus Christ, for eternal life.

WM. G. OCOBOCK, Auburn, N. Y., writes: I send $5 to renew my subscription for the "HERALD OF LIFE and of the Coming Kingdom," which I believe is very near, and I hope will soon appear, for I have looked for it since 1843 and have not been tired of it yet, for it is the salvation of the church of Christ and the release of you and me from our toil and sorrows of this present evil world: but I feel that I need to be tried by afflictions, of which I can say, as did the Psalmist, it is good. I greatly prize the HERALD.

"ADVICE TO READERS."

FORM the habit of getting to the bottom of a subject. Do not be content with looking on the trunk and branch of the tree, but dig your way down to the very roots of it. See from what the thought springs and grows, and how it is developed. Try to know all about it, from the beginning to the end.

Form the ability of seizing general principles. Carefully trace them through their developments; and guard against the very common error of regarding the mere forms and modes of things, as being in themselves great principles.

Cultivate the habit of looking on all sides of a subject. Do not be satisfied with seeing it in one aspect merely. Narrow thinking is very common, and is mischievous in its effects. Examine things steadily and steadfastly, and be content to go round and round them in thorough investigation.

Get also a readiness in coming to a judgment on proper evidence. Do not be in a hurry to make up your mind on any thing. Patiently wait for data. Suspend your judgment till you obtain evidence for an opinion, and when you have formed one, do not change it without sufficient reason. Try, at the same time, to keep clear of prejudice; but be willing to alter any opinion you may hold, if further light break in upon the mind.

Acquire the practice of thinking consecutively and continually. Do not fear hard thinking. Never mind a little headache occasionally. Use your mind as God intended; and remember hard mental work is the price all have to pay for intelligence and intellectual excellence. Of course you will not expect to do enough in a year for the purpose of a lifetime. Study in a regular way, and lay your plans for life. It is noble to see a man working steadily to the last, keeping abreast or ahead of his times. Cultivate the reason and imagination together. These are the two great powers of the mind. It is not for us here to decide which of the two is the superior faculty; but we may be sure it is safe, wise, and advantageous, to cultivate them both at the same time. Think for yourselves, but respect the thinking of others. Go on quietly, looking with your own eyes, and thinking with your own heads; but do not be perpetually disputing with people about their opinions: you will gain very little by that practice.

Read not only history and travels, and similar productions, but study thoroughly some books that will fully tax your powers. They will do you good as long as you live. Don't be afraid of logical and metaphysical works. If you cannot see through a subject one day, be willing to sleep upon it, and very likely you will master it the next.

The reading of poetry instead of novels will benefit the feelings and imagination. Novels give a false estimate of human affairs, and make people dissatisfied with ordinary life. They excite the passions to excess, and when duty calls, the powers necessary to obey are exhausted.

Search for thought, not for mere amusement. Some books have so little thought in them that you may "run and read," certainly; and if you but skim over them you know all they have to teach. Others you must read slowly and carefully; some, perhaps, a second or third time; and a few you will need to peruse many times. If you have the good fortune to meet with suggestive writers, be sure to give close attention to them.

Cultivate the heart as well as the head. You will frequently find that the state of your heart will unconsciously influence your thinking. If you wish a clear mind, seek to possess a morally pure one. Sin blinds the intellect and blunts the moral sensibilities, as well as dims the spiritual perceptions.

Be humble, sincere, teachable. Let your motto be: "The intellect of a man, and the innocence of a child."—Selected by H. YOUNG, Pittsfield, N. H.

OBITUARY.

DIED, in Westville, Conn., October 8th, of typhoid fever, our sister, H. ELIZABETH UPSON, aged twenty-three years and four days, second daughter of Lomon and Lucy Upson, formerly of Southington, Conn. Words of comfort were spoken by Elder M. S. Chambers, of West Haven, Conn., from Job xiv., 14, "If a man die, shall he live again?" Sorrowing, we laid her to rest, with full assurance that she will live again when Christ, who is the believer's life, shall appear. We are comforted with the sure promises of our God, one of which is, "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." SUMMARY OF NEWS.

DOMESTIC.

ELECTIONS were held in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Iowa, and a portion of Indiana, on Tuesday, the 8th instant. The Democratic party have made large gains in all of these States; electing a Legislature in Ohio that will give it a U. S. Senator, although the Republicans carried in their Governor by 3,000 majority. In Pennsylvania the Democrats elected their State ticket by some 1,000, and made gains in Iowa, although the State went largely Republican.

Congress meets on 21st November—time enough these days for many changes of opinion to take place in relation to President Johnson, especially should New York go Democratic, as is most generally expected.

FOREIGN.

There is little of importance from Europe to report this week. The excitement in Italy continues, and many skirmishes have taken place between the Garibaldians and Papal troops, with no decisive result either way. Garibaldi is still held prisoner, but he has appointed his son to fill his place as leader of the revolutionists. There are many reports as to what Napoleon, the Pope, and the King of Italy are to do about the pacification of It[illegible], but nothing is reliable.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

POPE'S "ESSAY ON MAN." Samuel R. Wells, 389 Broadway, New York, publisher. $1. This is a tastily got-up work, and is illustrated by numerous wood cuts, making altogether the most beautiful edition of this standard work we ever saw. Pope taught some wholesome truths about the nature of man, and we are sorry to see his work marred by notes pandering to the superstitious notions of the popular theology. We wonder what Mr. Wells would think to see a Turkish edition of this great poem, with notes by some ambitious Mussalman explaining the essay to suit the followers of the prophet? Mr. Wells does worse in bolstering up the heathen notion of an immortal soul, contrary to Pope's ideas and that of the Bible.

The same publisher issues "THE GOSPEL AMONG THE ANIMALS; OR, CHRIST WITH THE CATTLE," under which quaint title the Rev. Dr. Samuel Osgood discourses with no little unction on the duties of man toward the lower order of creation. Price 25 cents.

UNITED STATES MUSICAL REVIEW, published in New York, the first of each month, by J. L. Peters, 200 Broadway. It is a general musical paper, embracing matters of interest from all quarters. $1 50 per year.

Poetry.

Desiring to be Given up to God.

BY REV. A. M. TOPLADY.

O that my heart were right with thee,
And loved thee with a perfect love!
O that my Lord would dwell with me,
And never from his seat remove!
Jesus, remove th' impending load,
And set my soul on fire for God!

Thou seest I dwell in awful night,
Until thou in my heart appear;
Kindle the flame, O Lord, and light
Thine everlasting candle there;
Thy presence puts the shadows by;
If thou art gone, how dark am I!

Ah! Lord, how should thy servant see,
Unless thou give me seeing eyes?
Well may I fall if out of thee;
If out of thee how should I rise?
I wander, Lord, without thy aid,
And lose my way in midnight shade.

Thy bright, unerring light afford,
A light that gives the sinner hope;
And from the house of bondage, Lord,
O bring the weary captive up;
Thine hand alone can set me free,
And reach my pardon out to me.

O let my prayer acceptance find,
And bring the mighty blessing down;
And eye-salve, Lord, anoint the blind,
And seal me thine adopted son;
A fallen, helpless creature take,
An heir of thy salvation make.

The Great Image; or, The King's Dream.

After Daniel had told the king his dream, he proceeded to tell the interpretation, to this effect: The head of gold represented the kingdom over which Nebuchadnezzar then reigned. After him was to arise another kingdom, inferior to his; and after that a third kingdom, as shown by the brass; and a fourth, which should be strong as iron. As iron breaks in pieces, and subdues all things, so should this kingdom break in pieces and conquer all opposing powers. These were to be universal kingdoms, ruling over all the earth.

The feet and toes of the image were part of iron and part of clay; showing that at the last the kingdom was to be divided, and be partly strong and partly broken. While it was in this divided state, the God of heaven would set up a kingdom which should never be destroyed, but continue forever. This kingdom was to break in pieces and consume all the others, and stand forever. This was represented by a stone which was cut out of the mountain without hands, and which became a great mountain and filled the whole earth.

This dream, Daniel told the king was sent to make known to him what should come to pass hereafter. And "the dream was certain and the interpretation sure."

When the king heard the dream and the interpretation, he fell upon his face and worshipped Daniel, and said, "Of a truth, your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing thou couldst reveal this secret." Then the king gave Daniel many gifts, and bestowed great honor upon him, and made him ruler over the province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon. None was greater in all the realm except the king himself. Daniel, in his prosperity, did not forget his friends, as many people do; but requested of the king that his three companions, Shadrack, Meshach and Abednego, should be governors under himself over the province of Babylon, which he granted; "but Daniel sat in the gate of the king."

We will now return to the king's dream and see if we can learn anything by it, for, as I told you before, many things were revealed to the prophets for the instruction of the church in these last days in which we live.

We learn from history that nearly the whole of this prophecy has been perfectly fulfilled. The Chaldean empire over which Nebuchadnezzar reigned was one of great wealth and power. Babylon, the capital, was a large city of great splendor. It was perfectly square, with the streets running at right angels. It was surrounded by a massive wall of vast breadth, 350 feet high. The river Euphrates ran through the city from north to south. Among the many objects of interest which the city contained was a temple dedicated to Jupiter Belus, the idol worshipped by the Chaldeans. There were also the famous "hanging gardens," as they were called, which were really a succession of terraces raised on arches of increasing height, till they reached the level of the city wall.

The city was built by Nimrod, the great-grandson of Noah. Belus afterward enlarged it, and finally Nebuchadnezzar did very much to beautify and perfect it. He was truly a mighty king, and as Daniel told him, wheresoever the children of men dwelt, the beasts of the field, and the fowls of heaven, all these had the God of heaven given into his hand, and had made him ruler over them all. Surely he was well represented by the head of gold.

Several years after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, the Medes and Persians came against Babylon, and after a long siege took the city and killed the king, Belshazzar. This empire which succeeded the Chaldean, was called the Medo-Persian, and the first king was Darius, a Median. This kingdom was represented by the breast and arms of silver, and was as inferior to the first, as silver is inferior to gold.

The third kingdom of brass was the Grecian kingdom, governed at the first by Alexander the Great; of whom, no doubt, you have read, and who was said to have wept because there were no more worlds for him to conquer. After his death, the kingdom was divided into four parts, his four generals each governing a certain part. They were finally conquered by the Romans about 30 years before Christ, and then the Roman empire was the great reigning power. After some time the kingdom was divided into two parts, the eastern and the western, and the latter was subdivided afterward into ten parts, or minor kingdoms.

This Roman power was represented in the image by the legs of iron. It was always a mighty and persecuting power. At the time of the Saviour's birth the Jews were tributary to the Romans. Perhaps you will remember how some of the Jews tried to tempt the Saviour in his talk, or find an occasion to complain of him, by asking him if it were lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar or not. But he told them to render to Cæsar the things which were Cæsar's, and to God the things which were God's." Augustus Cæsar was the Roman Emperor when the Saviour was born. Pilate was a Roman governor of Judea. Roman soldiers, at the instigation of the Jews, crucified our Saviour. At that time, and for several hundred years after, Rome was a pagan power and persecuted the Christians fearfully, putting several millions to death. It was under the reign of the wicked Nero that Paul and other of the apostles suffered martyrdom. Finally Rome renounced paganism and became professedly Christian; but it was a Catholic power; and under Papal Rome the saints suffered dreadful persecution for many long, long years. Those were called the dark ages, when the Scriptures were kept from the people and were in the hands of the priests only. This persecution was called the "great tribulation," and lasted twelve hundred and sixty years, during which, over 50,000,000 saints were slaughtered. At one time Daniel himself had a vision, and the four great universal powers were presented to him under the symbols of beasts. Please read Dan. vii. The fourth beast, representing the Roman power, was said to "be dreadful and terrible, and exceedingly strong;" and was different from all the rest. It had ten horns, representing the ten divisions of the empire. Then another horn came up afterward, which had eyes and a mouth like a man in it. This made war with the saints and prevailed against them. This symbolized the union of a civil and eclesiastical power, and the same to which we have referred, which so persecuted the saints of God. But it was not always to continue, but was to be finally destroyed, while "the kingdom and dominion, and greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven," should "be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." This will never be taken from them again, and is the heaven or heavenly country for which we look and in which we hope to live forever.

We have reason to be very thankful that we are living so far this side of that time of persecution, and that it will never return again. We know from what we learn from the Bible and history (which is prophecy fulfilled) that we are very near the time when the kingdom of God will be set up. It seems as if every candid person must be convinced of this. We do not know the exact time, but have reason to believe it is very near, and may be within a few months or even weeks. It becomes us all to get ready for that day, if we are not, and keep ready, that when the Lord comes we may be found watching and waiting for him, that he may say to us, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

For one, I am glad I ever learned about the king's dream. Aunt Louisa.

Letters and Extracts.

From O. O. Rogers.

Bethel, Vt., Sept. 23, 1867.

Br. Storrs: I greatly wish my paper continued, as it is the source of much comfort to me; being the medium through which I can hear from the friends and lovers of my Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. I will pay five dollars as soon as I can. I am glad that our paper is to be continued, as a weekly messenger, to shed light in the land of the living. And if the brethren and sisters will let it, the light of God's truth and his love will shine through them in such a manner that those that walk in darkness shall see the light and be led to glorify God, and be a rejoicing to his saints. So let it be. No paper in the world is free from error; but I thank God we have a paper where we may have a chance to be heard, and are willing to have our views criticised, and thereby gain from each other a better understanding of God's word, and his ways. We are commanded to prove all things and hold fast that which is good; and not receive all that is thrown out, as some seem to think.

I have been much surprised to see Br. Fondey take the position he has on the personality of the devil, as he has before shown so much Bible knowledge. To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them. Now, let us see what the testimony upon this one point of Christ's being led, or driven, into the wilderness by a personal devil, and tempted of him forty days, as taught by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, whose language is figurative, as I look at it. Let us see. John gives us an understanding of this matter more clear. He tells us of his baptism, and the next day, he says, that he stood and two of his disciples, and looking upon Jesus as he walked, he saith, Behold the Lamb of God. John, i. 35, 39. The day following Jesus would go forth into Galilee, 43d verse; and the third day there was a marriage in Cana, of Galilee: and both Jesus and his disciples were called. And here, on this occasion, was his first work; and also, his first temptation, followed by a rebuke. The next that we heard from him, he went down to Capernaum, he, and his mother, and his brethren, and his disciples: and they tarried there not many days. Then the Jews' passover was at hand, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. Here we find him where Br. Fondey says his personal devil set him. John ii., 13, 14–22; and in the 24th, and 25th verses, we find an equivalent to his rebuke to the devil of Br. Fondey. In chapter vi., we find that Jesus went up into a mountain, and there he sat with his disciples. Here we find that the people were intent upon making him king; but he fled from them, not yielding to the temption of Br. Fondey's personal devil. We find (verse 15) that he departed from them. And when they next find him, they tempt him to show them a sign, or to show himself the Messiah, or the king of Israel. Read his rebuke to them, and see if it is not, in substance, what Br. Fondey claims against his personal devil. And in Luke xxii., 28, we find Jesus saying to his disciples, "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations." And so he appoints them a kingdom, "as my Father hath appointed unto me."

They go forth and teach us, not of a personal devil, going about to deceive mankind, but we find them teaching us to beware of the lusts that war in our members, and not be overcome with them; for lust bringeth forth sin, and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death. Paul tells us, in Heb. iv., 15, that Jesus, our high priest, was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin. Now, where or when did any one see a personal devil? Will he who has give us his shape and dimensions? I am no devil-worshipper; but love and adore Jesus, the Saviour of men.

From Edward Kelly.

Hinesburg, Vt., Sept. 27, 1867.

Bro. Storrs: There seems to be a most intense interest taken in the things of this life, even by those from whom we should expect better things. I find quite a number who acknowledge our position to be reasonable, but will not do anything to hold it up: and there are others who profess to love the truth, who are quite modest in speaking of it in certain quarters; at least, if it is likely to bring any cross or retard in worldly matters. But to their own Master they stand or fall. I need not tell you, I love the paper, I rejoice in the truth: am sorry I can do so little to help, but am hoping my neighbours, that are amply able, will do something worthy of the cause they profess to love.

There is a thought on my mind, and for the benefit of some that may not clearly see the matter as it is, I wish, if you please, you would notice in the Herald. We are told, 1 Cor. xv., 26, even death the last enemy will be rendered powerless. In Rev. xxi., 4, we read, And death will be no more. Now, which of the two, the first or the second death is thus destroyed?

To the best of my recollection, our Crisis friends have never told us. If indeed it is so, that the sinner has to die twice, and the Bible does not reveal the fact, then those that have detected the error are truly wise in publishing it, even to the earth's remotest bounds.

May the blessing of God rest upon you and yours, and all the brethren and sisters scattered aproad; and may the blessed truth of life only through Christ be published through the columns of the Herald of Life till Jesus comes, is the wish of your striving brother.

Note by the Editor. "Death will be rendered powerless" only to the righteous; and that because Jesus has the "keys" and has pledged himself to "raise him up at the last day" who believeth in him. All others are "holden with the cords of their sins" and "remain in the congregation of the dead." Such is the Bible testimony.

From Emeline Wood.

Albany, N. Y., Sept. 24, 1867.

Br. Storrs: I would love to have the tent brought to this wicked city, sometime, to have Life only in Christ preached long enough for every body to hear. Blessed be the Lord, Br. Nichols will talk it. Like Br. Paul, he clears his skirts from the blood of all that hear him. He uses strong language to them, and in such love; and how the Lord blesses him in it. He loves the doctrine, and I often say to him, I wish some of the preachers of the Life views would come here. He says, you would not hear anything more than, Out of Christ you must perish. Oh, he is so faithful to warn the people. He is a dear brother in Christ. My heart is so full of this doctrine that it runs over with love to God; and I bless God that he has raised up in these last days beloved ones to make known such blessed truths as "No life out of Christ." My heart swells with praise to our God for this most glorious light.

Oh, I do bless our dear Father in heaven for opening the way for me to go to the camp-meeting and getting under the "Chestnut tree." Although I could hear but little, yet it made my heart rejoice to see all the happy faces. Jesus seemed to shine through them, and they looked as though they wanted to talk about this glorious light, and like Caleb and Joshua they have another spirit; they are so mild in all they say or do; and if any body says ever so hard things to them, they show the mild and lovely spirit of Jesus. It is this that makes me love them so; and may this blessed cause prosper more, and break out all over the world; and may the people flock to God as clouds, and doves to the windows; and may our dear Herald of Life spread more and more. May every word that may be said, be for the glory of our God. May he accompany our preachers with his power and spirit, so that souls may be saved from this gross error of immortal soulism, and that it may never be named any more.

Oh, how I have praised God for the Bible Examiner; yet I think the Herald of Life, much the best: it has so many blessed letters in it from all the dear ones scattered up and down; and all think so much of our blessed paper; and we can hear from each other every week, and how they prosper. May the Lord raise up laborers to do all the good they can; to give to the Lord and he will pay back more than they can ask or think. This is my first business to give all I can to the cause.

From Daniel L. Osborn.

Otto, Ill., Sept. 27, 1867.

Br. Storrs: I have been travelling for a few weeks in company with Br. J. Lewis in Fulton Co., Ill., and in Mason, and we rejoice in believing that our preaching has been by the Spirit of the Most High, and that good has been done in the name of the Lord, the Life-giver, and the great truth of a future life only through the Just One, the Life-giver, with others, is gaining, advancing onward, and through investigation becoming plainer, and the people are becoming more interested, therefore we are encouraged to still let our light shine, and be willing to suffer affliction with the people of God rather than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, having respect unto the recompense of the reward. Then we mean to try to stand, having our loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness, and our feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace, and stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, and be not again entagled in the yoke of bondage.

From W. H. Whitmann.

Cameron, Ill., Sept. 19, 1867.

Br. Storrs: As I have not written for a long time, I thought I would say a few things to the dear readers of the Herald. I am living, as I have said before, in a hot nest of "Campbellites" and Universalists. The elder of the Campbellite church here used to favor our views, or let on so, but has of late come out positively in favor of endless misery. He seemed to be inclined to the Advent view, but when the question came up, who will live again? he turned back to the mire. Therefore I am expecting to be dealt with for heresy. I am trying to hold up the doctrine of life from the dead to the faithful in Christ, and of his coming kingdom to our dying race, the best I can. Death to the Christian is a discipline. It was the best thing God could do with Abel to let him sleep until Jesus comes to redeem him. If it had not been best for Abel, and all the worthy ancients, to sleep until the resurrection, then God would have done differently with them. All the faithful will be redeemed from death, and go into life at one and the same time, and live forever on the new earth. But the wicked shall not see life, but will remain "in the congregation of the dead." I have no notion of ever abandoning the glorious truths of the Bible. May God help us all to adorn ourselves with a meek and quiet spirit, and be ever ready to give a reason of the hope within us, with meekness and fear.

I wish to be remembered by all God's people everywhere. I feel as though I will always (in this age) be a pilgrim and a stranger in the earth. I never expect to be surrounded with "Life believers," but to be treated as Noah, Lot, Jeremiah, and all God's people have been since the death of Abel.

I want some advice from old brethren that have gone through church trials for heresy. I hope to receive some letters of counsel on the subject. Yours, trying to learn and do God's will, and be saved in the kingdom. Amen.

Workers in the Highways and Byways.

Sister Anna E. Smith has removed her mission from Thirty-third street to No. 14 Laurens street, a few doors above Canal. The expenses of this mission have been borne mainly hitherto, by a benevolent and wealthy Episcopalian. From motives of expediency he required our good sisters to become members of some orthodox church in order to have around their shoulders the mantle of respectability. To their credit, thank the Lord, they all refused. The "Doctor" discharged them, or they discharged themselves; not from the work of the Lord Almighty, but from the "Doctor's" almighty stamps. We are rather pleased than otherwise with the turn matters have taken. Our sisters' eyes have been double; they have had to please God and the "Doctor." They may have succeeded heretofore, but we doubt it. If they spake any too plain about our glorious hope; if they probed that old sore of the devil, "ye shall not surely die," a little too deep, spies were ready to carry it to the ear of the "Doctor" who, in turn, "is as fearful of heresy as the devil is of holy water." "How can ye believe that seek honor one of another and seek not that honor which cometh from God only?" We thank the good Lord, and we thank our sisters that in the hour of trial they cast their lot on the Lord's side. When they came to the two ways, they "chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of" orthodoxy for a season. They have deliberately refused the means to carry on their mission when it could only be obtained by the sacrifice of principle, by allying themselves to a dead carcass. Instead of lashing themselves to an iron bedstead, they have thrown themselves into the arms of our covenant God. "Men of Israel, help." These sisters are in the highways and hedges doing a great work. Shall it stop? In the name of God it must go on. Stewards of the Lord, to the rescue. Come with these self-sacrificing daughters of the Lord Almighty; enter one of the lowest, dirtiest, and most vile sections of our great city, where it is thought that respectable women will not be seen. Do you ask why our loved ones enter such dens? Brother, sister, there are men and women there for whom Christ died: poor, ragged, ignorant, vile heathen. "Go out quickly into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in that my house may be filled," is the command of our Master. Respectable people, so called, will not go. But here are sisters Smith and Boyd going down into that dirty cellar; let us follow. Whew! Horrible! Here we are, six feet under ground, in a room sixteen by twenty; dark, damp, without ventilation, cheerless to the last degree. Here are eight or ten, of all sorts and sizes, huddled together; there is an old table in the centre of the room, a pallet of straw in the corner, three or four chairs, and the picture is complete, if you imagine the rags.

Sister Smith breaks the ice: "We have come to make you a visit and see how you get along." Old folks look nonplussed; the young folks grin. "I should think you would freeze to death this cold day, got no fire, eh? Did you have your breakfast this morning?" "No." "Did you have your supper last night?" "No." Sister goes to the grocery and procures some provision; the food is brought and laid upon the table, and then the eyes begin to sparkle, and the hearts begin to beat afresh; they are all on tip-toe. "Surely these are friends." And then—then what? Why, these dear sisters begin to break the bread of life to this famishing people: to preach to them Christ and him crucified, not forgetting the restitution.

Leaving this place, our sisters enter an old rookery, and ascend the ricketty stairs. There in the garret, without fire, without food, without friends, upon a little straw, lies a sick woman. Her husband is dead; she supported herself by washing; was taken sick; pawned her furniture, piece after piece. Now it is all gone, she has not tasted food for three of four days. Sister Boyd procures a pitcher of soup, the poor woman's eyes flash fire; she seizes the pitcher and drains it to the last drop. The sisters procure a carriage and convey her up town; lodge her comfortably; call in a physician. But O, it is too late; she has been deprived of nourishment so long, he cannot save her; so she dies in great distress both of body and mind.

Dear friends, it would make your heart ache to hear our sisters relate their experience among the poor of our city; and make it swell with delight when they change the picture and tell of the scores of men and women that have been rescued from those vile dens; in whose mouths "the Lord has put a new song; even praise to the righteous." They have followed the example of our Saviour in feeding the hungry, clothing the naked (enabling them to attend church), and paying the rent of those who were about to be turned into the street. Brethren what say you? Shall this work go on? You that have more money than you need, send some along. I will engage for you a large dividend if you invest in God's Poor Joint Stock Company.

To you that have no money that you can spare, I have a suggestion to make. And, by the way, it will preserve your clothes from the moth. First, finish reading this piece. Second, go to your wardrobe, search out such things as are not needed—an old coat, pants, hat, vest, lady's apparel, boots, or quilt; in short, any thing that will keep a poor mortal soul warm. Third: put them in a barrel, head it up good, mark it Anna E. Smith, Star of Hope Mission, No. 14 Laurens street, N. Y. Fourth: ship it. Fifth: thank God that you have the ability, the opportunity, and disposition to do so small a favor for Christ's suffering children. You that have neither money nor clothes to give; you that are, doubtless, the richest of all God's dear ones, rich in faith, rich in all the Christian graces, you can help in this matter. Go to the throne of grace, pray for this mission; give it a place in your heart of hearts. So shall God bless not only the object of prayer but your own hearts richly. Be not high-minded, but condescend to men of low estate. "Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it to me."

W. H. Hanford.

New York, Oct. 5, 1867.

The Words of Jesus.

How soothingly, cheeringly, all the loving words of Jesus fall on the ear of every care-worn, weary pilgrim, as he plods his lonely way through this waste howling wilderness of sin and death. But to us none, left on record, have greater power to charm and soothe than these, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light."

How encouraging the thought, when all the world looks poor, cold, and dark; when we feel we are despised because we love Jesus and his word more than our best friends, to know that he to whom "is given all power in heaven and in earth," condescends to speak such loving words as these to poor, frail, unworthy mortals. All glory to his holy name! Is he so soon coming to take his bride to himself? I wish I could see it as Sr. Maria does. I hope it is even so. My whole being cries, Come Lord Jesus; come quickly. May I be ready, Amen.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. Moral Depravity; by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. Doom of the Ungodly: or, The Wicked Dead remain eternally under death's dominion. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. The Wages of Sin: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. Letters to a Clergyman; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. Finley, Pittsburg, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for 2 cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our own expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent for 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. The Essential Baptism; by the Editor of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to GUESS them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

WORSHIP: ITS NATURE AND CHARACTER.

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

"AND the devil, taking him up into an high mountain, showed him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time. And the devil said unto him, 'All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them; for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will give it. If therefore thou wilt worship me, all shall be thine.' And Jesus answered and said unto him, 'Get thee behind me, satan; for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.'" Luke iv., 5–8.

This is a part of the account of our Lord's temptation of forty days in the wilderness. We are told that he was full of the Holy Ghost, and was led by the Spirit, and tempted of the devil. The original word translated "Ghost" is the same as that translated "Spirit," and means the same thing; it is pneuma. The Greek word diabolos, translated "devil," is the same as that in Hebrew which is translated "Satan." Both words, however, primarily signify adversary—one who opposes, or stands in the way. In the Old Testament the term "Satan" is applied to the angel of the LORD. Thus, the angel of the LORD who stood in the way of Balaam, is called satan; and the LORD himself is sometimes called satan.

There may be a wide difference of opinion in relation to the nature or personality of "the devil," without detriment to the Christian character of those who entertain such opposite views. The majority, however, agree that there was "something that tempted Christ." Yet some believe that unless the tempter was a personality, Christ must have had evil impulses, and was therefore not "without sin." But Jesus could not have been "tempted in all points like as we are," except he had been in the flesh, or placed in a nature like our own; hence, "He took on him flesh and blood," or the "seed of Abraham," and was "made in the likeness of sinful flesh."

We are aware that many vague and vulgar notions on this subject are widely prevalent. Many seem to think that a personal being offered food to Jesus, and used oral language, such as we have just been reading; yet none of us have ever been tempted in that manner—have ever seen a "personal devil," or heard him speak. The apostle James alludes to this subject in the following manner: "Let no man say, when he is tempted, I am tempted of God, for God cannot be tempted of evil, neither tempteth he any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then when lust is conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." James i., 13–15.

It is necessary, for a trial of this nature, that there be an object of temptation which shall address itself to the subject in an assailable point, which if it is gained, "lust hath conceived," and then it "bringeth forth sin," which terminates in death. Now, because "the children were partakers of flesh and blood, Jesus took part of the same"—of the same desires of the flesh which sway humanity. But this does not imply an evil nature in Christ; for none of the natural desires of the flesh are evil in themselves. At the expiration of the "forty days," Jesus must naturally have experienced a strong desire for food, which he might easily have gratified, inasmuch as it was, doubtless, in the power of his hand to have produced it supernaturally. But this would not have been in harmony with the divine mind. In thus appeasing his hunger, without a direct permission or command from the Father, he would have sinned. In withstanding the temptation he developed his character for obedience.

Our main object in selecting this text is that we may speak of worship—its nature and character. To worship any one is to acknowledge dependence on him. It implies submission to, or compliance with, his commands or requirements, and confiding in him. Whatever, then, is our supreme dependence, is our God. If that object is a created one, we are idolaters.

The tempter demanded homage of Jesus, and offered him "all the kingdoms of this world" as a recompense. No one, we presume, will undertake to say that the devil literally presented Christ with a view of all the kingdoms of the world; in the nature of things, that was literally impossible: nor could a mountain have been found sufficiently high to afford such a prospect. Hence it must have been a presentation to his mind. He must have seen with his "mind's eye" the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them. But "the devil lied," says some one, "he never owned the kingdoms of the world." The devil may be a liar; but does he never speak the truth? Did he not say, "all that a man hath will he give for his life," and is that not true? What manner of being soever it was, therefore, which tempted Christ, it certainly spoke the truth; for if the kingdoms of this world do not appear to be under the direction and the rule of the devil or something equally as bad, we are altogether unable to comprehend the laws of evidence. And such is a necessary consequence of the pride and overweening confidence of the rulers of this world; they have not ruled in the fear of God, nor regarded him as the supreme and controlling power.

The kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ. God at the outset, we believe, intended to bestow the power, the glory, and the dominion of this world upon the second Adam—Jesus, the anointed. We find repeated testimony on this subject in the Old as well as in the New Testament; and God, foreseeing how men would treat his Son when he came into the world, said, for his encouragement, "Sit thou at my right hand till I make thine enemies thy footstool." If he is rejected of men, God would raise him up from the dead, and seat him on the Father's throne till his enemies should be subdued. Again, he said—"I will set my King upon my holy hill of Zion—rule thou in the midst of thine enemies:" and how many prophecies there are which declare that "His dominion shall be from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth;" that "all the ends of the earth shall fear him," and that "his kingdom and dominion are to be everlasting, never to pass away or be destroyed."

Let us return to the subject of temptation. The apostle did not err when he said that Christ was tempted in "all points like as we are." Let us, by way of illustration, for a moment suppose that the object of your temptation, lust, or desire, assumes the shape of a farm. There are two ways of obtaining it: one of which is by patient industry and economy to amass the means; and the other, by parsimony or downright dishonesty—lying, cheating and stealing, to accumulate the money more rapidly. In the former instance you will have obtained the object of your desire by a method which God approves; in the latter, by means which he condemns; or, you gave place to temptation to obtain the object desired.

God had promised the kingdoms of this world to his Son; and it entered into his plan to render Christ extremely poor, in order that he might be exposed to those temptations which surround the poorest man on earth—exposed to the scorn and contumely of the world, and at last be ignominiously put to death by wicked hands. So Christ went down to the grave amid the jeers and the contempt of the multitude, to be raised from the dead to a life eternal; and now "death hath no more dominion over him." He sits at the right hand of his Father, where he will remain until the time appointed by the Father for him to take possession of his kingdom in the lawful way—to inherit and "possess it forever and ever."

But Christ might have obtained the kingdoms of this world by a much shorter way—the devil's way, or the way of the flesh; for he must have been as fully aware of the honor, pomp, and magnificence of empire, and as capable of meeting its requirements as the greatest monarch that ever lived, else he had not been "tempted in all points like as we are." The trial must have been severe, and the struggle a grand one beyond conception, or he would not have cried out in his anguish—"Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." Picture, if you can, his humiliation, when charged with being in league with the devil—when buffeted, spit upon, scourged and vexed; hissed and hooted at; or the terrible struggle between ambition and duty. "If you are the Son of God," said the tempter, "you may soon render yourself popular. You have only to convince the people of your wondrous ability to perform anything you please—to make them a powerful nation—and you will be elevated to the throne, and all the other nations on earth will do homage to you."

Such is the course pursued by ambitious men of the world—those who seek to become kings, emperors, or presidents; they sacrifice truth, principle, justice—anything for the sake of place and power. Suppose that Jesus had yielded to the temptation—no doubt he might have become great, and the world have resounded with his fame; but he would also have sinned, and consequently, died, and the world lost not merely a great King, but a Redeemer. "Yes, come forward; now is your decisive moment;" urged the temptation—"proclaim that you are the Messiah, and have appeared to deliver your people from their trials and tribulations; confound the Scribes and Pharisees with an exhibition of your miraculous power, and the tide of popularity will carry you in what direction soever you may wave your hand." This was the way of the flesh—the devil; but it was not God's way. Then replied Christ, "Get thee behind me, satan"—adversary: adversary of my permanent glory and everlasting inheritance—"for it is written, Thou shalt worship" (or do homage to) "the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

Where, then, is Christ's acknowledgement of dependence upon others? We have said "worship" implies an act of homage proceeding from an inferior toward a superior; an acknowledgment of dependence upon him, or submission to his commands; and this was what the tempter proposed to Christ as his reward for the kingdoms of the world. But, Christ rejected them; and so should we turn to God from similar allurements, and acknowledge and worship him as above all gods, otherwise we are idolaters.

There is an excellent illustration of this subject, Rom. i., 25, where the apostle, speaking of those who gave themselves up to uncleanness through the lusts of their own hearts, adds:

"Who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed forever, amen."

The marginal reading is "rather than the Creator." The moment that men forsake God and renounce his law and authority, just so soon do they bow to the tempter. They may still faintly recognize God in the recitation of some creed or articles of faith—in some form or fashion of the hour—but they entertain no real and abiding faith in him as their supreme benefactor. Saith the apostle—

"Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them, for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead, so that they are without excuse: Because that when they knew God they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful, but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." Rom. i., 19–22.

Thus, when men obey the law of the flesh, and make that supreme, they become fools: for it is the fool who "hath said in his heart 'there is no God.'" The consequence is what the apostle describes in the following verses:

"And changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things; wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness, through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonor their own bodies between themselves: who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed forever. Amen." Rom. i., 23–25.

When men abandon the living God, for gods of their own choice, he leaves them to make the experiment and experience the result—to enjoy their "vile affections," and sink deeper and deeper in their iniquity.

As the worship of any person or any thing consists in our dependence upon that person or thing, so in proportion to the fervor and intensity of our worship do we assimilate to the character of the object worshipped. If a man make his talents—even though they be exercised in the dissemination of truth—an object of worship or dependence, he will have erected a god in himself—he becomes a self-worshipper; and so on in a variety of ways. We may worship money, beauty, power, position, and become as idolatrous as those who cried "Oh, Baal, hear us!" If any one worship a theory, even a theory in religion, and make that theory the object of his dependence and reliance, he acts the idolator as truly as any that ever fell down to wood or stone.

We may worship a ruler—that is, do him homage or reverence—without being guilty of sin. For example, it is said, 1 Chron. xxix., 20—"That all the congregation blessed the LORD God of their fathers, and bowed down their heads, and worshipped the LORD and the king."

That they did not worship the king as supreme, is evident from the context, as well as the very nature of the case. They worshipped the king as king, and rendered him homage and obedience as one who was subject to the supreme Ruler of the universe; in thus doing they did not sin. But if they had only worshipped the king and overlooked JEHOVAH, then they had committed idolatry.

There are other circumstances in life in which God requires us to worship our fellow-creatures. For instance, he requires the child to worship his parents—to reverence them, and acknowledge its dependence upon them; also, the wife to worship her husband, or reverence him, as Sarah did Abraham—not as God, but as one on whom she is dependent for support and comfort.

Therefore, we may say, that in all the various relations of life where God has made us dependent upon others—who may be above us in the order of his providence—homage and reverence to them, as persons upon whom we are dependent, is in perfect harmony with our worship of God as Supreme. But in all these relations there is a point beyond which we cannot go without sinning. If a parent or a ruler enjoins or commands a child or a subject to do that which God has plainly forbidden, he must not be obeyed. It will avail nothing to urge as an excuse that he has been commanded to do wrong. In such a case, we should exclaim, in the language of our text, "Get thee behind me satan; for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

Let us illustrate this subject by reference to the case of Cornelius, in which the circumstances were rather remarkable. When Peter had entered the house of Cornelius, he—Cornelius—fell down and worshipped him; but Peter bade him arise, saying that he was also a man. We do not believe that Cornelius intended to worship Peter as a god; but Peter, who was a worshipper of the living and true God, and a servant of Jesus Christ, was fearful that Cornelius in his admiration of the messenger, might lose sight of the message which he had been sent to deliver; he therefore cautioned him in time. Happy would it be for the Christian world if ministers would do likewise now a days: but alas! many of them are too eager to receive all the homage they can, without reminding the people of their duty to the living God.

The worship, then, which is due to God from us, is an acknowledgment of absolute dependence upon him as the Supreme Being, accompanied with the humiliation which should characterize such inferior and sinful creatures as ourselves. The apostle refers to this subject in Acts xvii., 25.

"God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed anything, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things."

Can you imagine anything that would better express dependence so complete, so perfect as this? Much need have we, in these days of trouble and trial, to adhere to this principle more strictly and closely than we have ever done before. Let us, then, acknowledge God, and come before him with humiliation and confession, and thanks for his mercies; with prayer and supplication at his footstool. "But," says one, "I am placed in such trying circumstances, sometimes, that I don't know how to be thankful." Well, we can appreciate your perplexity perfectly well. Consider the circumstances of one who had filled a lofty station—whose power was second only to that of the king—but yet whose enemies conspired to cause him to be put to death—in the course of whose administration no corruption had ever been known—whose only fault consisted in loving God more than the king—whose resolution to obey him through good or ill was never shaken—DANIEL; he "prayed and gave thanks" after he knew he was to be sent into the lion's den. In that den he prayed to him who is able to save, and he was delivered. We have always abundant cause for giving thanks to God, no matter what may be the circumstances amid which we are placed. Worship him "in spirit and in truth," and, like Daniel, we shall be delivered from the evils that surround us.

THE GOSPEL.

THE OBJECT OF THE GOSPEL IS CHIEFLY FUTURE: LOOKING TO A FUTURE LIFE.

THE object of preaching is to set forth its reasonableness, beauty, loveliness, and perfect adaptation to the end or object sought for.

This is shown or effected in two ways; by doing and undoing; or, presenting truth for reception and exposing error for rejection. Our propositions need not words to defend them; they are obvious to all. We have always been taught that the great object of Christianity was to prepare for a future existence and another world. As our great lines of railroad connect distant points of interest, and are laid for this purpose rather than for the way stations on the route, yet have more or less to do with these several stations; so it is with God's great road from and connecting this world or age with the one to come.

The great incentive to correct action in the future. "Seeing ye look for such things (things connected with the end of this, and commencement of the next age) what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness." The Christian is not only said to stand, and to walk, but to live by faith; it being an element as essential to his life as is his breath; his whole life being one of expectancy and desire of things future, or things connected with a future life. Enough under this head. Next, we notice the object of preaching.

To unfold and show the harmony and consequent reasonableness of the divine plan. For we claim, as God has said, "Come and let us reason together," his ways are equal, and do commend themselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God as such, and must force every man (when they are understood) to acknowledge them all "very good."

The elements of truth always blend in beautiful harmony, and like the sun's rays, each adds force and strength to the other. In this fact is seen the reasonableness of the requirement, "Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of the truth."

One important and all-pervading element of the gospel is love. "God is love." By this we understand every exhibition of himself to us is through this medium, as we might say, the sun is light and heat; these being the prevailing elements in its manifestation. This declaration leads us to the following conclusion: That no requirement is made, no burden put upon, and no penalty threatened to his creatures, in fact, nothing transpires in the divine government at any time, or in any way, but what is, when viewed in its connection, always in harmony with this all-prevailing principle and universal law of love. If our position is right, then it follows that every doctrine of the Bible must harmonize with it; hence, any position conflicting with this universal law must be wrong. Examine well our premises, for this is an important point (a good foundation). For ourself, we are satisfied with it, and have no fears of the results growing out of building thereon; for "a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit."

This is why I love the HERALD OF LIFE; light and love seem to compose the leading features of its pages, and it makes one feel richer, stronger, better, after its perusal.

In presenting truth for the purpose of breaking down the strong forts of error, we, I fear, are not careful enough as to the spirit which actuates us. It is not for victory, merely, that we fight. No, no! we wish to captivate and win their hearts, their affections, to the love and obedience of truth. Theoretical religion is destroying more than open infidelity; it is like the miser's treasure locked in his vaults; it blesses no one; and in each case the good of self sits enthroned in the heart and appropriates all acquisition to its own dear self. And surely it will, unless our teachers melt and dissolve the heart by love's all powerful forces.

Just here I am reminded of the sun and wind's dispute as to which was stronger. A poor traveller was selected to experiment upon. First, the wind tried his force upon him, which only made the man hug his garments the closer about him; but the sun's warm rays soon caused a throwing off, and finally a retreat into the cooling shade. Let us ever remember that love is what wins all that is worth winning, and keeps all that is worth keeping. Were there no other sign than this (the want of the Holy Spirit), I should be satisfied of the near coming of our Redeemer; for where, ah where! do we see the solemn truths which should now occupy men's minds, presented with the holy unction which once attended them? For zeal is manifested it partakes largely of the earthly kind; and its effects are correspondent—transitory. A faith which gives me a future life, also crucifies me to this. Why are we so slow and dull in comprehending these things? One great cause, I fear, is, the apostacy (for such we must call it) of the church in regard to Christian baptism. Becoming carnal, water was substituted for the Spirit, and a once washing of the flesh, for the daily, constant immerging or burying of the old man in death (by faith), and living a spiritual, or new life in Christ. O, how beautiful is this subject when sectarianism is removed from our minds. But as much has been said in the HERALD on this topic, we will only give it this brief allusion.

One thing more and we close. The non-living again of the wicked, or of those lacking the quickening principle, the Spirit; what a blot it removes from the page of revelation; how it adds to the harmony of the whole; like the last touches of the painter's pencil. This doctrine reconciles one, also, to the general course of mankind; having found a correct cause and object for their end, we see an object or purpose in their life; that God has with them a work to accomplish; that they live not in vain; they are his agents, all helping on the great plan. Instruments of his using should not be lightly esteemed. Life is to them a blessing, and they have blessed the world; they take all the comfort their several delusions can give them, and going down to the grave, there sleep a perpetual sleep as their final portion.

This doctrine, this faith, we can talk, and believe too, concerning our dear friends with satisfaction and joy.

God's ways are equal, just, and right; yea, every one.

THE LAST DECADE.

TEN years of human history! When the Lord, by the hand of Moses, was leading the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan, the history of a decade would comprise comparatively few events. The world then moved slowly. Events of historical value were then of rare occurrence. Rut when the Lord, by the hand of his servant Abraham Lincoln led a nation from the Egypt of slavery to the Canaan of freedom, the history of a decade would fill volumes upon volumes with events of thrilling interest and of inestimable historic worth. The world moves fast now, and events of transcendent interest crowd upon each other so closely that history can scarcely trace the record. And the events of the last decade, in our own land, have a grand moral significance of which we can, perhaps, form no just conception at present.

What progress has been made since the year 1857 in the spread of the truth concerning man's nature and destiny? Has this glorious truth kept pace, in any respectable measure, with the moral progress of this period of time? Upon this point I trust some well-posted brother will give us information in the columns of the HERALD OF LIFE. I am tempted to act as reporter for this particular latitude and longitude, and to celebrate the tenth year of my conversion to the life views by an outlook from this moral observatory.

In 1857, while reading a work of Dr. McCullock, of Baltimore, I settled down (as I believe) in the sweet rest of a true faith upon the life view. There had been a great deal of cultivation of the soil before the Dr. got hold of me. I had been ploughed, and cultivated, and harrowed, and the seed had been sown. The Dr. was the great roller; and as the roller of his logic went over the field he pulverized the remaining lumps of unbelief, and pressed the seed firmly into the now mellow soil. Thank God for the seed, and for the upspringing blades and stalks. I trust that the dews of grace and the genial sunshine of love will assure the "full corn in the ear."

To apply the figure a little farther. Among farmers there is one utensil for preparing the soil, known as the "cultivator." It has six little plough-shaped teeth which stir up the soil wonderfully. In my case I think "Storrs' Six Sermons," preached within musket shot of the desk at which I am now writing, was the "cultivator." Of the stirring up my recollection is quite clear.

But I am digressing fearfully. During the ten years which have elapsed I have not been indifferent. I have watched with some care, the signs of the times, and noted the changes. There have been changes, and it is of these I would write. Your readers will carry out the thoughts that may be suggested, and make a more thorough application, in their own minds, than the limits of a newspaper article will permit me to do.

A former friend of the writer's used to remark, as he encountered failure in his efforts, "Well! we must first learn how not to do it." Skeptical he was, in his religious faith, but eminently sound in this bit of philosophy. And it has seemed to me of late that a great many of the ministers of our leading religious denominations were just now learning how not to do it. Some of them, I feel persuaded, have learned this; and let us pray that they may speedily learn how to do it—how more efficiently to set forth Christ as the Saviour of perishing men.

Let me now give your readers such fragments of testimony as may occur to me, all from clergymen of one denomination. It is by this method I would report the progress I have witnessed during the past ten years.

First, we have the statement of Rev. Mr. M. "I could never, in my own mind, make it seem consistent with my conceptions of the character of God that wicked men should suffer eternally for the sins of a brief probation on earth." Well, Br. M., how can you then believe in eternal suffering? "I reconcile it in this way. Men here form characters with which they go into the other world. There, being beyond the reach of mercy, they continue sinning and suffering in consequence of such sin, to all eternity." That will do, Br. M.; thank you for your testimony. But your faith has not the slightest foundation in the word of God.

Perhaps we began too low in the alphabet; let us go back to Br. C., a clergyman of ripe education, commanding talent, and a tender, loving heart. "I would shrink more from preaching the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked than from the preaching of the doctrine of eternal misery, as being the more dreadful of the two." It is well to remember such testimony when we are met, as we often are, by the remark that we take away all the moral force of the penalty by declaring it to be death—the destruction of life and being forever in the world to come.

Down the alphabet again, we find the Rev. Mr. P. He is a man who does a great deal of thinking, as we sometimes say, "on his own hook." "I had rather suffer eternal misery, with what my view of eternal misery is, than to be annihilated." We will harness these two testimonies together, and with them we will agree to get clear off the track of those who profess to see in annihilation the nullification of the penalty of the law.

Here is the Rev. Mr. H., a man of fine cultivation, extended theological research, and withal a genial, lovable, polished Christian man. He discards the literal fire theory, except, possibly, as it may minister to the comfort of the lost. This latter clause is only my inference, and not to be chargeable to him, except by implication. He says, "I am not certain but that there may be some kind of happiness, even for the lost, when they shall have adjusted themselves to their new relations and method of existence. Such floods of benevolence turned perdition-ward, we may almost be tempted to believe would extinguish the literal fires, upon the hypothesis of their existence. We would thank Br. H. for this testimony, only that we feel it is so heterodox, even from our low stand-point, that we could not honestly do so. And yet this testimony carries with it great weight. It exhibits the entire abandonment of all the Bible proofs of eternal misery; for not one of the Scripture proofs usually adduced in support of the doctrine, but that palpably and flatly combats this fancy of our good Br. H. We are glad to get his testimony, but we seriously protest against such views of future retribution. Christ Jesus did not die to save men from "some kind of happiness" in the world to come, but to save them from perishing.

Rev. Mr. E. is one of our choice friends. Indeed he is so full—so brimful—of good feeling that we cannot hold him to even a friendly controversy in private conversation. His testimony is consequently brief, but somewhat suggestive. "It's all a matter of speculation." This may then be taken as about his view. To the great problems, "What am I? Whither am I going? What is the eternal state of the rejected of Christ and the neglecters of salvation?" he who stands upon the walls of Zion as a watchman replies, "It's all speculation."

These testimonies will suffice for our present purpose. This purpose is to show that there has been a grand secession movement in theology. The doctrines of eternal suffering and literal fire, in the old-time acceptation of these terms, are about seceeding from the union. They may be called the "Extreme South" in theology. Will the "border" suffer? Will it join the secession movement? If it does, then the doctrine that "Death is the gate to endless joy" will go out of the union too. And when they have gone (we will not fight to keep them in the union) then there must needs be a "reconstruction." And in our heart of hearts we believe that we can "form a more perfect union"—one in closer harmony with God's revealed will. If this result can be attained we shall ever rejoice that we have been standard bearers—have been in the thickest of the fight, holding high aloft the banner of Christ Jesus our great Captain, emblazoned with invitations, and offers of life to perishing souls.

It must be apparent to any one, who will judiciously and discreetly feel the great throbbing pulse of our Protestant Christianity, that, there is a decided decided change in the symptoms. No doctor has ever yet been able to pronounce this patient entirely sound and healthy. True, it has a splendidly built frame, well-knit muscles, and massive brain. But the blood is slightly disordered. There is a taint of impurity still remaining. But it will work out —is working out. There shall yet be perfect health in our great and glorious Protestant Christianity. It is God's great sentinel, guarding it and watching the sleeping nations. Give but perfect soundness and health, and it will take the nations in its loving arms and lay them at the feet of Jesus. This health must come by inoculation, and not by any process of depletion. Let us then, my brethren, take the "Sword of the Spirit," and pierce through the joints of its harness so that we may be able to insert in the wound a few grains of truth; and the life-current shall be made pure, and in all its fair proportions our Protestantism will stand forth in beautiful symmetry, the admiration of angels and the hope of the world.

And I, for one, think the work is going on grandly. The altered tone of the ministry with reference to "the intermediate state" and eternal torment, is an augury of good. It is no uncommon thing to hear them freely concede, in private conversation, that entirely too much has been made of the state of the saints before the resurrection. They are thinking, and we ask no more of any candid mind than that, in the light of all that has been adduced in the support of our view, it will dispassionately and thoroughly review the ground upon which it bases its assent to the current teachings upon the subject of man's nature and destiny.

The testimonies adduced, are not the product of my imagination. I have given them as nearly verbatim as possible. They were nearly all given by the parties while attempting to defend the doctrine of eternal suffering. No confidence is violated by their publication. They are given merely to indicate that there is a gradual relaxation of the hold upon what we have denominated the "old-time acceptation" of the doctrines in question. We believe there is an almost unconscious letting go of the doctrine of eternal suffering, and that if any belief is to be substituted in its stead (as there certainly must be) it will be the doctrine of the final destruction of the wicked. We are in possession of a mass of evidence confirmatory of this view; but it is in a form so fragmentary and disjointed that it cannot be well-stated in any ordinary newspaper article.

One point more I wish to impress upon the minds of those holding the life views. Not unfrequently a good cause is damaged by the indiscretion of those who espouse and advocate it. I would have Christians everywhere make a determined stand for truth; avow freely and fully their sentiments with reference to these subjects. But it will serve only to depreciate their views in the minds of Christian brethren, if, in order to gain a hearing for them, we bring our "battering rams" to bear against the churches. Too often have the churches been assailed with almost abuse by some mistaken friend of the truth. We should honor the jealousy with which our Christian brethren regard any innovation upon their established faith. And it will be a sad day for Protestant Christianity when its votaries shall spend their time, as did the Athenians in Paul's day, to "either tell or to hear some new thing." All honor to those of the churches who battle for the truth, as they hold it!

And yet, according to our conception of it, we are to spread the truth. How you are to do it, my brother, it is not for me to say, in specific terms. In general terms however, we believe the most efficient advocacy of these views may be realized by a frank, undisguised avowal of them, backed up by blameless, holy lives. If our views of truth induce a feebler spiritual life in us than is found in those who oppose them, they will, very properly, be regarded with distrust. We believe, most heartily, what a good Presbyterian brother told us only last Sabbath. And this is an added testimony. Said he, "I have often thought that your views of penalty made the Bible and God's government, more harmonious than the ordinary views. There seems to be greater harmony in the Bible with your view of this matter." So we believe. We ought then, with clearer light, to live nearer God than those who have not a "like precious faith." The consistent walk and patient faith of our brethren will exert a greater leavening power than volumes of arguments, invaluable as they are. Let our holy living answer the question so often asked, "Suppose what you believe is true—what difference will it make?"

Let us not grow impatient. The truth is God's. There are few more pitiable sights among Christian men than a seeming fretfulness at the progress of truth. A perfect obedience will lead us to make every effort to honor God by the spread of his truth. A perfect faith will lead us to cheerfully leave all the results to Him for whose glory we labor. Let us honor the truth we profess, by the exhibition of that charity which "hopeth all things, endureth all things." There is a vast army of God's elect who are zealously laboring for the salvation of the perishing—making sacrifice—denying self—bringing in the erring and the neglected, and training them for eternal life. In God's own good time, we trust, their eyes will be opened to see the glorious truth in which we rejoice.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 23, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

THE EDITOR IN BOSTON.—Next Lord's day, the 27th inst., Providence permitting, the EDITOR of this paper will preach in BUMSTEAD HALL, Boston, Mass. He cannot, at present, promise to remain in that city more than one Sabbath; and will be glad to see all the lovers of life only in Christ on the occasion, and any others who wish to hear on that subject.

BACK NUMBERS.

WE can supply new subscribers with all the back numbers of the present volume, for the present. Those who wish to secure the volume perfect should apply soon, as it is not likely we shall long be able to furnish the first numbers. The four that are now issued are worth the subscription price for the year. Soon you cannot get them. Do not, then, delay in applying for them.

THE LAST PAGE.—The "Miscellaneous Selections" and "Useful Receipts," on the last page, are not the selections of the Editor, and were placed there without his knowledge. He will, therefore, not be held responsible for their insertion or utility. The same is true of the Poetry.

IT IS ASKED—"Did not Stephen believe in consciousness after death when he called upon the Lord Jesus to receive his spirit?" Acts vii., 59.

We can see no necessary connection between Stephen's request and a belief of consciousness when dead. If we were dying we would utter the same language most fervently, fully believing that all our future life depends upon our Lord Jesus, who has promised to raise up his followers "at the last day." Till then, and in the confidence that Jesus will fulfil his word, to whom should we commit ourselves but unto him whom God hath appointed as the head of the church—the members of Christ's body. But it may be remarked that the original word here translated receive is dexai, and signifies also accept. The phrase "my spirit" is only a strong expression for me, or myself. Thus Mary says, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour." The plain sense of which is, I myself, Mary in person, do these things. So the sense of Stephen's language is clearly this, "Lord Jesus, receive or accept me." As though he had said—"Lord Jesus, I suffer, I die for thy name, for thy truth—here I am, an offering unto death upon the altar for thy cause—accept me—receive this sacrifice of myself." It is then recorded—"When he had said this he fell asleep:" and he will doubtless sleep till the Lord Jesus, who did receive Stephen's offering of himself, shall call him from "the dust of the earth where he now rests."

A QUERY.

DEAR EDITOR: Permit me to ask a few questions. As there is no life out of Christ, what evidence have we that the thief on the cross was in Christ? and does "shalt thou be with me" mean thou shalt be with me? If so how can we harmonize it with Matthew xxvii., 44, and Mark xv. 32? also, with the expression of the Saviour, "Well done, good and faithful servant?" Had he improved on the one talent? Had he been faithful in a little? I cannot harmonize with the above in any other way than in the light of a question asked by the Saviour, "Shalt thou be with me in paradise?" Can it be harmonized any other way?

Give the above an insertion and pass it round for the answer.

Your Brother in Christ,
SAMUEL SMITH CALL.

Newport Centre, Vt.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—"The thief" is truly a great thief; and a very large portion of sinners are "going to heaven" on his back! The service of God is such a burden to them, and the love of this world is so strong, they can't think of a Christian life; with them it is time enough just as they are about to die! Their imaginary God is such an awful hard Master that now his service is intolerable, and they can't think of it with any pleasure! but just as they are about to die their God is converted [though they may not be] and then, all at once, he has become so easy and kind-hearted that all the service he asks, and which he gladly receives, is, one little short prayer, and away they "go to heaven!" Why should they not think so? Did not "the thief" travel this road? and has he not made it a royal highway over which the assumed priesthood conduct nearly every murderer that goes to the gallows? and has not the gallows become almost the sure way to "heaven," seeing that "the thief" and the priesthood have sanctified it as a sure way into "paradise?"

For ourself, though we meet the text as if it were genuine, we have long since given it up as being doubtful. We did this twenty years since; but have not insisted on it, lest it give some persons unnecessary offence, or prove a cause of stumbling to a few who cannot bear to hear the genuineness of a single text questioned, especially in favor of an unpopular doctrine. But we do not know that we are justified in withholding an honest conviction for fear of the reproach which arises from bigotry, or even from the honest scruples of others.

There are several considerations which led us to conclude the text is doubtful, as to its genuineness. Its lack of harmony with the account of two other evangelists, who say "the thieves"—that is, both of them—reviled Christ; and none of them, except Luke, give any intimation of repentance in either; a circumstance not likely to have been overlooked if it occurred. These facts of themselves stamp the text as of doubtful authority. But further, the case of the thief is never referred to in any sermon or epistle of any apostle, which is singular, if the text is genuine. Still further, the principle involved is in contradiction to the general tenor of scripture, and to some positive declarations thereof. They give no countenance to delay in things of religion, but represent all delays as highly dangerous. In some instances they positively declare those who thus procrastinate shall not be heard when they cry for help. "Because I have called and ye have refused," etc., "I will laugh at your calamity . . . . when your fear cometh as a desolation . . . . when distress and anguish cometh upon you: then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me . . . . therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own doings," etc. Prov. i. The thief's case, as usually understood, is a flat contradiction of this threatening.

The general tenor of the scriptures harmonizes with this statement in Proverbs; and this meets the case of the thief. He did "revile" Christ after he was nailed to the cross; such is the testimony of Matthew and Mark, which is strong presumptive proof of a hardened state of mind up to near the last hour of life. These circumstances go to make it probable that Luke was misinformed, or never wrote that one thief became a penitent, and hence throws not only a doubt on the genuineness of the text, but makes it highly probable that it is an interpolation.

Some of the early Christian writers regarded the text as spurious; and in a discussion in which several were engaged, on the intermediate state, nearly every text connected with the death of our Lord was used, but none of them used the text relating to the penitence of the thief; which is certainly a strange omission in such a controversy, if the text was then received as genuine.

But lastly, the use made of this text by saints and sinners is presumptive evidence against its being of inspired authority. All classes of sinners make it a hiding place against an immediate attention to the things of religion: "There is time enough yet; the thief found mercy at the last hour, and so will we," is the direct or indirect statement of tens of thousands, and they rush on in sinful habits and pleasures under the influence of "the thief," who is constantly robbing God by encourging sinners to trust to the last remnant of their life as an offering to God, and a passport to "heaven."

As sinners thus build a destroying theory on the supposed case of "the thief," so do many professed Christians. How many parents neglect to urge upon their children an immediate consecration to God and his service under the deceitful idea that the work may all be accomplished on a sick or dying bed; or, at any rate, after they have had all their youthful joys and pleasures—"the thief was saved when dying." Ah, how many children, of professed Christians, have grown up in sin, lived and died in sin, with the delusive idea, fostered by their parents, that there would be no special danger in delay; for, "the thief found salvation on the cross, in the hour of death"! We cannot believe there is any thing in the word of God to countenance such delusions; and from all the circumstances of the case, we come to the irresistible conclusion that the one text (for there is only one in the Bible) which countenances such a delusion is an interloper, and does not belong to the Divine testimony.

While we thus speak, we do not wish to be misunderstood. We doubt not that many sincere persons, who have never made a profession of religion, have, in their dying hour received that evidence of their acceptance with God, in Christ, which has enabled them to triumph in the last struggle and to die in great peace. But these persons do not belong to the class of the wicked of whom we have spoken. Their minds have been exercised on the subject, probably, for years; yet some circumstances, unavoidable to them, have prevented their ever receiving a clear sense of their acceptance with God till near the hour of their death; but their lives have been as free from open sin as most of those who had made large professions of devotion to God. Their case is entirely different from those who have lived in the absolute neglect of religion, and whose lives, like "the thief," had been marked with crime. Let all men beware of presuming on the few last hours or days of this life to prepare for life eternal; and especially from resting on the case of "the thief," lest they should find, at last, "it's too late," and the thief has stolen away life eternal from them.

"THE REVELATION ITS OWN INTERPRETER."

"BY JOHN COCHRAN."

THIS work was published by Appleton & Co., in this city, several years since, and we presume is out of print now.

We have read this volume with more interest than any we have ever seen on Revelation. We may not agree with the author in all his items, but his general principles of interpretation, it seems to us, are very near the truth. They may be briefly stated thus—

1. In that book there is unity of design:
2. The structure of the prophecy is Quaternal; or there are four principal actors:
3. The prophecy is reduplicated; or is doubled; i. e., the drama is twice presented, like Daniel 2d and 7th; the first presentation being very brief, forming a sort of "Table of Contents" for the more full presentation: thus making one part interpret the other.

The work is invaluable; and if not exactly correct in all its parts, will help to a more correct understanding of the Book of Revelation. It is not a commentary, but presents the reader a key, that he may use himself, and by using cannot fail to get light.

The author takes the ground, the less we find of literalism in the language of the prophecy, the more likely we are to find the truth: because to use symbolical language as if it were literal is sure to lead astray. The idea that the spirit devil is presented in the Book, at all, the author thinks is a "guilty interpretation," making a "meaning diametrically opposed to" the truth, and "opens up an entirely new field for symbols." He seems to have no doubt of a personal spirit-devil, but says those who find him in the symbols of this book, have set him to "walking amongst political symbols" doing "as much evil in" them "as he did in paradise." He adds—"However, upon a close examination we shall find the fears naturally resulting from such a conception to be groundless, and that the devil has only got into the prophetical part of the book where alone he can do any harm symbolically."

Sure enough, "the devil has got into the Book of Revelation;" and before it can be understood he must be "cast out." Those who find the "spirit-devil" in the language of that book will never find the spirit and truth of the book itself: but Mr. Cochran will find many devil-believers harder to convert to his ideas on that subject than any other; for along with their ideas of the literal devil in Revelation is their eternally-tormenting hell; and if the first is not there, really, personally, so neither is their fancy hell. We do not think Mr. Cochran had any idea of making such a clean sweep of all this rubbish, which has so long hidden from the minds of men the glorious truth of life only through Christ.

The plot developed by the pictures of the seven-sealed book, of chap. v., is the war waged by the Kingdom of God against the Roman dominion in three forms, viz.: Imperial, Papal, and Ecclesiastical. This plot is thus developed, in the first version of it, viz.

First Seal, chap. vi., 12, white horse and rider, represents the Kingdom of God.

Second Seal, verses 3 and 4, red horse and rider, represents the Roman Empire.

Third Seal, verses 5 and 6, black horse and rider, represents the Roman Papacy.

Fourth Seal, verses 7 and 8, pale horse and rider, represents the Romish Church.

Fifth Seal, verses 9–11, souls of martyrs under the altar, represents the oppression of the kingdom of God for an appointed season, which in the second version is defined to be 1,260 years, and a promise of final vengeance and victory to its down-trodden and persecuted cause.

Sixth Seal, chap. vi., 12—chap. vii., 17: FIRST PART—A violent tempest, symbolizing judgments on the Roman enemy, as presented in the second, third and fourth seals. SECOND PART—Sealing the tribes of Israel, symbolizing the security of the kingdom of God during the judgments. THIRD PART—Scene of peace, happiness and glory, symbolizing the triumph of the kingdom of God as the everlasting dominion of earth, when the words of Dan. vii., 27 will be fulfilled.

At this point in the vision, or immediately on the opening of the seventh seal, ends the first version of the prophecy, indicated by the silence in heaven about the space of a half hour.

SECOND VERSION.—The first seal is reduplicated, chap. xii.; the woman answering to the kingdom of God. The second seal reduplicated; the dragon answering to the Roman Empire. The third seal reduplicated, chap. xiii.; the ten-horned beast answering to the Roman Papacy. The fourth seal reduplicated; the two-horned beast answering to the Romish Church. The fifth seal reduplicated; the flight of the woman into the wilderness, and the prophesying of the two witnesses in sackcloth answering to the oppression of the kingdom of God, and showing it to be for 1260 years.

The sixth seal reduplicated. FIRST PART.—Seven trumpets, chaps. viii.–xi., and seven vials, chap. xvi., being judgments on the Roman dominion, imperial, papal, and ecclesiastical. The ten-horned beast and harlot in the wilderness, chap. xvii.; casting of beast and false prophet into a lake of fire, chap. xix.; casting of dragon into bottomless pit and lake of fire, chap. xx.; fall of Babylon, chap. xviii., indicating the destruction of the Roman dominion, imperial, papal, and ecclesiastical. SECOND PART.—Visions of chaps. xiv. and xv.; protection of the woman, chap. xii., 6–14, and of the two witnesses, chap. xi., 4, 5, symbolizing the security of the church of God. THIRD PART.—The new heaven, and new earth, and the new Jerusalem, chaps. xxi. and xxii., symbolizing the final triumph and establishment of the kingdom of God on earth.

The work, though somewhat prolix, is worth a careful reading; especially at this time, when the time is evidently at hand for the final overthrow of the Roman power, civil and ecclesiastical. Louis Napoleon is, seemingly, wrapping himself in his death shroud, preparatory to going into the "perdition" which awaits the carrier of the harlot woman, which he, as the "scarlet colored beast," has been doing for the past seventeen years. Now is especially the time for all Christians to watch. The signs of the times clearly mark the point where Papacy, Mohammedanism, and Rome Imperial—or Napoleonism, the last phase of that power—are all to sink together into "the lake of fire, prepared for the" Apocalyptic "devil and his angels"—messengers: all whose hands have been put forth to uphold those anti-christian powers. "Let them go down quick into hell"—i. e., utter destruction.

CONSCIOUSNESS AFTER DEATH.

"THE spirits of men do retain their identity and consciousness after death. Peter says, referring to sinners, 1 Pet. iv., 5, 6, 'Who shall give account to him who is ready to judge the quick and the read. For this cause was the gospel preached to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.' The doctrine of this text is, that those who are dead had the gospel preached to them during their day of probation, and are thus, although now dead, the subjects of judgment or trial. That although dead as men, they live according to, or in the same manner as, God in spirit. In that spiritual form they will be judged in the same manner as men in the flesh. We regard this as an incontrovertible evidence of the existence in consciousness of the spirits of men after death."—Josiah Litch.

Your reliance upon this text to prove the consciousness of the spirits of dead men, shows how difficult it is to prove the theory you advocate, a text confessedly, by nearly all commentators, of difficult explication; but of all the doubtful interpretations, yours is one of the most so. If it be the true interpretation, it follows that men to whom the gospel has not been preached, will not "live in the same manner as God in spirit;" that is, in a separate state from the body: for the apostle says, "For this cause was the gospel preached to them that are dead, that they . . . . might live according to God in the spirit." If that means that they might live in the same manner as God in spirit, i. e., in a separate state of consciousness, then, if the gospel had not been preached to them, they would not so live; and, of course, that spiritual existence is not and was not in themselves, but is an effect from a "cause," viz., "the gospel;" and so all who have not had the gospel preached to them will not so live whatever others do; and this is "incontrovertible evidence" that "the spirits of men after death" are not "in consciousness" from any inherent principle, as your theory maintains. The text from Peter, then, is clearly against you. The Roman Catholics claim this text to prove their purgatory; and the Resurrectionists to prove their theory; and we cannot see but either of them has quite as good a claim to it as you have to prove yours; all three of you are in error, and your claims without foundation. As to the real meaning of the text we may speak at another time; it is sufficient now that it is shown not to warrant the construction you put upon it.

WHAT IS UNDERSTOOD BY THE GOSPEL?

IN our last number, we left man in his animal condition under the natural law of death, in a perishing condition, with here and there a glimmer of light until God sent Noah, a preacher of righteousness, and through him condemned the old world, and it perished. Then we find the Lord making certain promises to Noah and his family, which we will not stop to consider at the present time. But to Abraham we find that God began the Gospel promise, that through his seed (Christ) all the nations of the earth should be blessed. But the world was not in a condition then to receive the blessing. God placed Abraham's seed under a law, or covenant of works, because of the hardness of their hearts, until the fulness of time when the promised seed should come. It is not our purpose to follow the seed of Abraham through their covenant of works; but to take up the Gospel as revealed unto us through Jesus and his Apostles. We find John, at the termination and failure of this law, or covenant of works, announcing the glorious truth, "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved (have life). He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already.

In this text, John makes the contrast between perish, on the one hand, and everlasting life, on the other. In other words, the conditions by which men might escape from the doom or condemnation, which is death, or to perish, is believing on the son of God; as out side of him there is no life for the world. We take also the words of Jesus, in the controversy with the Jews, John vi 18; and onward at the 38th v. "And ye have not his words abiding in you: for whom he hath sent him ye believe not. Search the Scriptures for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me." (And what do they testify of him? He is the only way by which ye may have life.) "And ye will not come to me that ye might have life." Some persons suppose they have inherent immortality, and hence they do not want life, only happiness. The Jews did as Jesus commanded them, went and searched their Scriptures, and they come to him again and renew their contest, vi., 28. Then said they unto him, "What shall we do that, we might work the works of God?" Jesus repeats what he had told them before. "Believe on him whom he hath ent." Just like some of the immortal soulists in our days, "They said unto him, What sign showest thou then?" Are we not Abraham's children? do not our Scriptures teach us that we have life through him? "Our fathers did eat manna in the desert: as is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat." Said Jesus, "Moses gave you not the true bread: but my Father giveth you true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world." Now, if ever in the mission of Jesus to the world, an opportunity presented itself to state plainly what that mission was. Here was the time and the occasion. Does he inform them that it was to give them an escape from eternal torment? No. "But I am the bread of Life." Here he brings up bread, the staff of life, by the eating of which we live. So says Jesus, "I am the bread of life." He now takes up their own argument, "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead." What did it benefit them? it was not the true bread: Moses had not that to give. "They are dead." "This is the bread which cometh down from heaven that a man may eat thereof and not die." That is, in the sense your fathers died. The bread that Moses gave you had no life principle in it, and your fathers perished, died and are dead. But, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever; and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." Which will introduce us to Jesus, the Gospel Tree of Life, or how men may and will be saved through the Gospel.

JACOB GRIM.

WESTWARD BOUND.

BOSTON, Oct. 21, 1867.

DEAR EDITOR: When I saw you last, at your desk two weeks ago to-day, I expected to see you again the next day, but, as I unexpectedly started for home that evening, was denied the privilege. And the purpose I then formed, of taking New York on my contemplated trip to Albany and the far West, being now abandoned for the sake of saving a day and perhaps some expense, this hasty lead pencilling must be in lieu of a personal leave-taking. I solicit an interest in your prayers, and those of my Christian friends, that I may be graciously blessed with life and health to complete the tour entered upon at 2 1-2 o'clock this afternoon, and that my labors for the spread of the doctrine of life only in Jesus Christ may be watered with the divine blessing. I trust that the Lord will continue to sustain you in discharging the arduous and useful responsibilities of your post, and that you may not have just cause to complain of a lack of co-operation on the part of those brethren and sisters among us who have been gifted with the ability to write acceptably for the paper.

We must not—I am sure that you do not—lose sight of the fact, that we should all be at work in our Master's vineyard—each seeking to know in what department of effort he or she can do most to glorify God and bless dying men. For myself, I have a clear conviction that my principal work lies in the direction of doing all in my power, by voice and pen, to tear down and uproot the enormous error of inherent immortality. Multitudes of earnest and faithful Christians believe and teach that doctrine, but its appalling falsity is not thereby lessened in the least. We know that the Bible is against it, and we also know that its ablest advocates display the helplessness of children whenever they attempt to controvert our leading arguments. By agitating the subject, they may help us to much light on the true interpretation of the Holy Word, but they must inevitably remain shorn of power to a most lamentable degree, until they recede from their fundamental assumptions on the main question. Having obtained help of God, we will battle away at their strongholds, and thus emancipate the minds of our fellow-men from a thraldom a thousand-fold more galling than any yoke of servitude which mortal has ever yet put upon the neck of mortal. Our hatred of the eternal torment dogma must not be of a spasmodic character; on the contrary, we should labor to deserve the reputation of being—as some good men, who do not see with us, say we are—"tremendously in earnest."

While I am penning this note, at the desk of Br. Moses H. Piper. in a wide-awake book-store, Bro. P. tells me of a Congregational brother who has become interested in the meetings at Lowell street Chapel, and who recently had the promise of the gift of a three-dollar Bible, from an orthodox deacon of his own church who had heard him state his views before a church meeting, if he would prove from the Scriptures that man is not inherently immortal! He did prove it to the satisfaction of the deacon, and the latter, true to his promise, has given him the Bible.

But I see I am writing a letter, instead of the intended note to apprise you that I have started. It has not been possible for me to get away from home sooner, and I therefore indulge no vain regrets that I have not had the use of this late fine weather to labor in the West. Duty does not require one to be in two places at once.

Please send me an early copy of this week's paper to Detroit, where I expect to spend next Sabbath. Letters up to then will reach me at the same place. After that, they will find me, until I direct otherwise, at Lake City, Minn. I extend my gratitude in advance to all who will write to me while I am away, and take their pay in such of my letters to the office as your judgment shall assign a place in the paper. My hope is that this may get into the compositor's hands to-morrow, and so appear this week; but you will do what is best with it.

I have sundry subscription moneys to send you, but will retain them until I write again.

My most affectionate regards to Br. Macdonald and other loved brethren who are at your elbow nearly every day. And to all those among whom it has been my privilege to labor during the past few months, I send my greeting. My precious brother Wolcott is remembered with an affection which words do not easily express. I know he will daily lift his heart heavenward in my behalf. Beloved brother Storrs, farewell.

THE AGE TO COME.

WE became convinced in the Winter of '42 and '43 that the view held by Mr. Miller and his adherents that this age would close with the conflagration of the globe and the cutting off of all men not then prepared for immortality, and that the next age would open with the new heaven and the new earth, with none inhabiting it but the immortal ones, was an error; an error, too, calculated to make thinking men, who were governed more by reason than excitement, reject the idea of the speedy advent of Christ altogether. They saw that much remained to be fulfilled on this earth, and that if the conflagration of the globe was to take place at the second advent of Christ that event could not be near. We became satisfied in February or March '43 that their objection to Mr. Miller's theory, in that respect, was good and immovable; and we yielded to that conviction. We have since advocated the doctrine that the advent of Christ as King, to reign on the throne of his father David, is an event nigh at hand—that it will be ushered in with a great and terrible destruction of his enemies, especially among those who have heard the gospel and rejected it; but that there will be "left of the nations," in the flesh, who will become subjects of the government of Christ and his immortal saints, who shall then rule the nations on this earth, having the seat of empire in Jerusalem, and on mount Zion, from whence "the law shall go forth" to all "left of the nations." That under this administration "justice and judgment would be executed in the earth," and "the whole earth be filled with the glory of God," according to his own oath and promise, often repeated in the Bible. That this period or age of the personal reign of Christ and his immortal saints on this earth, is the true millennium, which may be a thousand years; or, possibly, a much longer period; but its exact duration we have not pretended to define.

THE ANGEL OF REV. XXII., 8, 9.

BR. STORRS: While reading your "Response to Kronos," in the HERALD, of Sept. 16, we noticed the following suggestion: "The man who showed John the things which were in the future, though his 'fellow servant, and of his brethren the prophets,' might have been Enoch or Elijah."

The expression "The man who showed John these things" is a quotation from "Kronos;" for he says "The man who showed John these things was his fellow servant, and of his brethren the prophets." He calls himself a "man" to agree with his interpretation of the text, while the record calls him an angel. So that your only remark is, "This angel might have been Enoch or Elijah."

Now we propose to give such an exposition of Rev. xxii., 8, 9 as shall show that the one who showed John these things was not a "man," and never was; for we cannot believe that men ever turn into angels, though they may sometimes be called such, meaning messengers, or servants.

We think it is the want of careful study of this 9th verse that has caused us to miss its true meaning. Dr. Peabody, in giving an exposition of this text says, "This was an earth-born angel; trained by arduous toil and stern conflict to fill this exalted position in heaven." And all the expositors we have seen give about the same meaning to the text.

Now, this angel is one of seven which are introduced to us at chap. xv., 1. "And I saw another sign in heaven; great and marvellous, seven angels having the seven last plagues," etc. v. 6. "And the seven angels came out of the temple having the seven plagues." v. 7. "And one of the four beasts gave unto the seven angels seven golden vials full of the wrath of God."

And at chap. xxi., we read, "And there came unto me one of the seven angels, which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues, and talked with me," etc. This is the angel who showed John the things mentioned in the rest of chap. xxi.; and in chap. xxii., and at v. 8, John says, "And I John saw these things, and heard them; and when I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which showed me these things." "Then saith he to me, see thou do it not: for I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book: Worship God."

Now, the question is, Why was John inclined to worship this angel? why did he fall down and attempt to do him homage? We answer, It was because John mistook his character, because he wanted information such as the angel is about to give him. But shall we say that in order to prevent John from worshipping him, he must be told that he was once a man like John? or his brethren the prophets? that he was of, and so like all "who keep the sayings of this book?" We think not. What then was the instruction he needed? What was the instruction given? These questions bring us to the strict examination of the language following the word "for," in the 9th verse. "I am thy fellow servant;" as if he had said, Thou, John art a servant of God, and so am I; and this makes us fellows—fellow servants. And of thy brethren the prophets." As if he had said, Thy brethren the prophets were servants of the same God that I am, and this makes the prophets and myself fellows—"fellow servants, and of them which keep the sayings of this book." This last takes in every servant of God from first to last; and makes us fellows with this angel, because we all serve the same Being he serves.

This language may also be understood to speak of service done by this angel, for God, to the prophets, to John, and to all "who keep the sayings of this book;" for the pouring out of the vials of wrath surely was a service done by God's command, and for the good of his servants, for they were poured upon their foes, and thus their wrongs would be "redressed;" so that this angel might truly say, with some apostles, "we are your servants for Jesus sake:" i. e., this angel might say, "God has commissioned me with my six fellows to do service for him and for you; in this, we are servants of God and of you." All Christians are servants or each other in this sense; but must not worship each other: they must be fellow worshippers of one God.

FROM AN AGED PILGRIM.

EAST DUNHAM, C. E., Oct. 1, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I have had it impressed on my mind for some months to write you a few lines, but want of a steady hand, and other infirmities, have caused me to delay. I have been a member of the Methodist church 24 years, but never felt clear in my mind on certain points of doctrine. About six years ago, infirmities had rendered me unable to labor. I then took my Bible and studied it for four years, faithfully, and noting every text respecting the threatening of the wicked and their doom, and the promises to the righteous; and I had got along with all the texts but three. My son, S. S. Call, came here with your book, "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST," and I purchased it, last September, and I must say, I never met with book that gave me such light and understanding of the Bible; and I would not part with it for three times its worth. It gave me to see the folly of the preaching of the present day. I thank God that I ever heard there was such a paper printed as the HERALD OF LIFE. I want my paper continued.

I am 76 years old this month, and am broken down with the rheumatism, and other infirmities. I have lost the sight of one eye and the hearing of one ear, but as long as I can hear with one ear and see with one eye, I want your paper; it is all the preaching we get. We have fire and torment preaching on all sides, and no other. I would gladly contribute something for the support of the cause but I have not the means—I can't labor to get means.

If you think this notice will encourage any lowly brother or sister, you can publish it. I am many miles away from any brother or sister of like precious faith. I have tried to get some subscribers for your paper, but they are as afraid of them as if they were charged with deadly poison. I have no one to cheer me on the road of life only my wife; but it cheers me to hear from brothers and sisters though far away. Yours truly, in the gospel hope.

NATHAN CALL.

FROM S. S. CALL.

NEWPORT CENTRE, Vt., Oct. 12, 1867.

BR. STORRS, and the dear ones scattered abroad, Greeting. Grace, mercy and peace be unto you. On Saturday last, Oct. 5, I went to East Dunham, C. E., to preach the word; the weather was very rainy, yet the house was filled to hear the word. I endeavored to show to them that man was mortal, a created being, and that by being shut out of Paradise, access to the tree of life was cut off, and man was compelled to yield to the sentence of death, it being the penalty attached to the law for sin. The notion that all men had immortal souls was a fable received by tradition from the elders; the phrase immortal soul was not found in the word of God; but we find man, formed of the dust of the ground, became a living soul; there was no record of a soul being being breathed into man.

The Methodist minister on the charge was terribly stirred up, and exhorted the people to go home and stay there, not pay any attention to what the good brother said. He told them that I said man had not got any soul; and that he was no better than a dog. "Man has got a soul, and we all believe it, and that is enough." He was very free with slander and misrepresentation; but was very careful not to bring Scripture proof. He claimed, all die in Adam, both good and bad; and all shall be made alive in Christ, both good and bad. I showed them the difference was this: Being in Adam or being in Christ: in the one, Adam, the promise is death: in the other, CHRIST, the promise is life. The conditions are presented for our choice. Now, which will we be in, Adam or Christ? The one is death, the other life. The minister had quite an influence over the people; their laughing and cheering brought to my mind the following saying: "The world will not persecute those that are like them; but hold them as one of their own."

Sunday Br. Hope came; and we went over to cheer Br. Lynn. Had a good time; stopped for refreshment and returned to father Call's. Truly darkness covers the land, and gross darkness the people.

God help us to be faithful till Jesus comes. Your brother in Christ.

FROM THOMAS JOHNSON.

NEWARK, N. J., Oct. 16, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I am more and more satisfied with the glorious theme of Life only in Christ our LIFE-GIVER, and in the ripening prospects of his soon coming to give his people rest. I have no set time for his advent, but as the signs bespeak his coming near, I see how paramountly important it is for me to be constantly girt about with truth, and have that indwelling Spirit, without which there is no future life of any kind.

I had the privilege of attending the tent meeting on Staten Island, two weeks ago last Sunday, and was struck with the remarkable attention and willingness of the people to hear of these (so-called) new doctrines. The arguments of the brethren Wendell, Wolcott, Welsh, and others, were weighty, powerful and pointed, and well calculated to arrest and rivet the attention of honest seekers after truth.

I am well pleased with the opening numbers of the new volume; especially the first articles in each. I had often wished to have a copy of the last discourse I had the privilege of listening to from your lips when in Newark, and its production in the first number of the new volume gave me untold gratification. I hope you will continue that feature in the paper, and give us a short sermon every week, for it is very seldom that, in this city of churches, we can find a place where unadulterated truth is preached. Yours, looking for the soon coming of the LIFE-GIVER.

THEODORE LANGREHR, Philadelphia writes: It is not quite two years since I became convinced that there is no hope out of Christ, and to be numbered among those who shall meet him at his coming; for which time I am anxiously waiting; although I cannot believe in the definite time theory. I am heartily pleased that the HERALD OF LIFE is to be continued; verily, we can hardly do without it; the reading of it is a great blessing to me. May the Lord preserve you, that you may be able to give us through the HERALD such blessed words of comfort and good news.

OBITUARY.

FELL ASLEEP IN JESUS, in New York City, Sunday morning, Oct. 13, SAMUEL CURRY, in the sixty-second year of his age.

Br. Curry was forty years a follower of him by whose sufferings, death and resurrection, the grand redemption scheme was perfected. He embraced the view of the soon coming of Christ under the preaching of Eld. Wm. Miller, but continued to labor in the Methodist connection until about ten years since, when with others of the same faith, he withdrew from the church in Sixteenth Street, of which he was then pastor, and established the church in Twenty-fourth Street, to which he principally confined his labors until some year and a half ago, when, thinking he would be more useful as an evangelist, he gave his efforts a more extended range. He was some months since attacked with cancer on the tongue, which soon became so sore and swollen as almost to deprive him of the power of speech, and compelled him to the simplest diet. Throughout the whole period of his illness, during a portion of which time his physical sufferings were great, he was soothed and comforted by that tender care and generous gratification of wishes which a faithful, loving wife, and kind, considerate children are so ready to exercise. Advent friends, everywhere, who were acquainted with him, either personally or by reputation, will feel that by his decease a great loss is sustained; for a true friend and earnest, diligent fellow-servant has fallen. The funeral took place at his late residence, No. 4 Lamartine place, and was largely attended. The discourse upon the occasion was preached by our beloved Editor from the words "God is love;" and notwithstanding many of those present were strangers to the doctrines presented, a deep interest in the remarks was manifested by all hearers. Although a presentation of the outlines of truth is the most that can well be accomplished upon such occasions, so prominent and attractive was the beauty and symplicity of the gospel made to appear, it is not too much to hope that no inconsiderable dissipation of prejudice was effected, and consequently, good done to the glory of God and the honor of Christ.

Our deceased brother's spiritual experience throughout the affliction which resulted in death was one unbroken trust in Jesus, the "LIFE-GIVER," and unclouded confidence in the timely fulfilment of the promises of God. The great enemy of all the living has secured a victory, but as its deadly sting, sin, was withdrawn, that victory will be but temporary, for the Lord of life and of glory remembers them that are his, and will ere long, come to gather them unto himself.

Rest thee in thy grave, brother; thou art safe from all harm. Death has put forth his rude hand and snatched thee away, but soon a stronger than he will compel him to relent. Thou didst have dwelling in thee "the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead," hence wilt thou be brought forth to glory and honor in due season. Sleep thee, then, in quiet. The winds of opposition to those truths thou didst hold so dear, and labored to exalt, may howl and sweep angrily over thee; the boisterous storms of persecution may rage and beat; the biting, piercing cold of the world's scorn may increase until withering and blight shall mark its pathway, but none of these shall harm thee. The great conflict between truth and error will go on; the struggle may wax hot and terrible; enemies of our Lord may oppress and slay the faithful, and tread rudely above thee, but thou shalt hear not until the voice of Almighty power shall bid thee rise from thy narrow bed and robe thyself in those bright garments of beauty and perfection which our Master will give unto all his people. Some who now walk in wisdom's ways may yield to temptation, fall by the way, and fail to obtain salvation, but thy work is finished, thy journey is ended, thy account is closed, a crown of life awaits thee.

PRIDE AND HUMILITY.

WE proud? of what? Of our ancestors? They were driven out of paradise. Of our patrimony? "Sad inheritance!" Of our wisdom? Hath not God made it foolishness? Of our wealth? It is not current beyond the grave. Of one earthly honors? They die in their birth-place. Of our virtues? They cannot atone for our sin. Of our mansions? They point to a cold grave. Of our relatives? "I have said to corruption, Thou art my father: to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister." Of our power? Death laughs at it.

But look at humility. It adorns humanity; it dignifies its possessor; it ennobles his intellect; it blesses his heart, and makes him a blessing to all with whom he associates. Is he intellectually gifted? His fellow men approach him with confidence, and sit around him with composure while his lips feed many. Are his graces conspicuous? They shine upon others, that many may be benefitted. Has he been intrusted with wealth? He feels that he is a steward, and that he must occupy till the Master come; and he relieves the necessitous, clothes the naked, feeds the hungry, and causes the widow's heart to sing for joy. Is he poor among men? There is a treasure laid up for him in heaven, of which he has heard by that gospel which tells him that he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. Has he few companions on earth? He has communion with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. Is he a solitary wanderer to his Father's house? The angels are sent forth to minister unto him. Is he despised by the proud? His body is a temple of the Holy Ghost, and Christ reigns in his heart. Does he serve for a piece of bread? He is Christ's free man, and his name is written in heaven! Happy disciple? Enviable lot! Who would not lie low in the dust, and humble himself before the high God, if that be the appropriate condition and necessary characteristic of the man of whom these things are predicated?—Selected.

METHODISM—OLD AND NEW STYLE.

JOHN WESLEY, the founder of Methodism, taught in his day the doctrines now held as Adventism—that Christ would come again to this earth, purify it, and make it the abode of the righteous forever; and he believed also, that it was not incompatible with the goodness of God that the brute creation should participate therein.

His brother Charles sang his faith in the same doctrines in many of the most beautiful hymns extant, often sung by Methodists at this day—like the Jews read their prophecies of Christ without perceiving their clear and simple import. In Wesley's hymns page 18 we find this verse:

"Quick as the darted lighting flies,
  Flashing at once throughout the skies,
Saviour, thou wilt on earth appear,
  To 'stablish thy dominion here.
Before the final, general doom,
  We know thou wilt to judgment come,
Thy foes destroy, thy friends maintain,
  And glorious with thine ancients reign."

Watts also sang a similar faith in hymns no less popular. John Fletcher, another of their most eminent ministers, and colaborer of Wesley, not only taught the Advent faith, but believed, as did Wesley himself, that the judgment day would most certainly come before the third generation was swept away—a period at which we have now arrived. Thomas Coke, LL. D., also an associate of Wesley, said, one hundred years ago, "Near, even at the door, is the great day of judgment." But he also taught this remarkable fact which Methodists should ponder over, "At the coming of Christ to avenge and deliver his faithful people, the faith of his coming will in a great measure be lost." This we may unhesitatingly say was the almost universal belief of the Methodist church in its day of purity and strong faith.

Now a days who ever hears such Bible doctrines taught in the Methodist church? His followers, while they build monuments to commemorate his name, stone those who agree with him in regard to the Advent faith. The resurrection is made of no account by reason of the new and more popular plan of sending saints to heaven immediately at death, and the wicked to hell; and they now ridicule those who believe with Wesley and those old saints who struggled and suffered to found a church on pure Bible doctrines. It is not unusual to hear one of our modern Methodists, in quoting Scripture passages referring to the coming of Christ, say that he is not a "Millerite," or make some like apology, fearing he might be understood as believing it near, as though that were a heinous sin. That the Methodist church is completely turned around, and holds different views about the Advent of Christ and the saints' inheritance admits of no dispute. Only a few weeks ago, a Methodist minister refused to receive two members of his congregation into his church because they believed as Wesley did about the Advent. Because they were exemplary Christians he went to them and desired them to join his church. They consented, provided he would admit them to fellowship, holding this belief. After a week's consideration he asked them if they insisted on their condition in relation to their belief in the coming of Christ; and on receiving an affirmative reply, he refused them membership. This was in Mount Vernon, Westchester County, N. Y. This was not the first instance, either in which not only members of the congregation but of the church, also, have been proscribed on account of their belief, even while the most unbounded confidence in their christian character was assured them. We very well know that there are exceptions to our charge against the Methodists in respect to the Advent doctrine; but they are only exceptions, and testimonies of like import to the fact cited above, could be given from hundreds of others, showing the same opposition to Wesley's teachings in relation to these important Bible subjects. When this can be said of the Methodist church, how much more does it imply against the rest of the popular churches. Well did the Apostle know our need of admonition when he wrote, "In the last day perilous times shall come."

Children's Department.

THE POCKET-BIBLE.

IN a small village in the north of England, there lived some years ago a widow with six children, all of whom were Sabbath-school scholars. Their father was an officer in the British navy when he died, and left his wife with the care of this little flock. The eldest son proved to be a great trial to his parents on account of his wicked conduct. He heeded not the instruction of parents or teacher, but sought the most wicked and dissolute youths for his companions, and after his father's death gave himself up to excesses of wickedness and riot.

The poor mother wept and prayed over her reckless boy; but he finally became so ungovernable that she resolved to send him to sea, painful though it was to her; but she hoped the severe discipline of the ship might humble his proud spirit and lead him to reform. It was accordingly decided, and preparations were made for his departure. Unknown to the youth, his mother slipped a pocket-Bible into his chest, with a secret hope that it might be the means of leading him back to ways of virtue and holiness. With many prayers for his safety and salvation, that mother bade adieu to her first-born and well-beloved son.

Many years passed, but the wanderer did not return. The ship in which he sailed was lost at sea, and the widow mourned her son as dead.

One stormy night in midwinter, while she and her remaining children sat beside their cheerful fire, they were startled by a rap at the door. Upon opening it, they discovered a worn and weather-beaten sailor standing there, who begged a shelter for the night. He was cordially invited within, and soon told his sad story of shipwreck and suffering. They were out in a violent gale, he said, when the ship went ashore and was dashed to pieces. All the crew were lost but himself and one companion. They were thrown upon a beach; but his friend died soon after, leaving him alone.

"He was a good fellow," he continued. "Once he had been the terror of the ship for his extreme wickedness; but he became a serious, praying man as remarkable for piety as he was for vice before.

"While lying on the beach, just before he died, he drew a Bible from his bosom and pressed it to his lips; for it was that blessed book, he said, that led him to change his way of life. Looking over his chest one day, he chanced to find it, and seeing his mother's writing, he examined it. This brought the teachings and instructions of that mother so vividly to mind that it led him to see himself as a sinner. and he found no more peace till he found it in the Saviour.

"While lying there upon the beach," continued the sailor, "he told me this story, gave me his Bible, and requested me to keep it for his sake. Then, falling back upon the sand, he expired with a prayer upon his lips."

"Have you that Bible with you?" inquired that anxious mother.

"Yes, madam;" and he drew it carefully from his bosom and gave it to her.

Tremblingly she seized it, and turning to the blank page, there was her son's name in her own handwriting!

"'Tis he! 'tis he! My son! my son!" she exclaimed.

Her prayers had been answered. That little Bible had led her wayward boy to the cross and to heaven.—Bible Society Record.

PERSEVERE.

Oh! say not Hope's a foolish dream,
A passing of the breath—
A bubble on the living stream,
Evanishing in death:
For it bears a deeper meaning to the virtuously brave,
Whose earthly leaning-staff is hope—a hope beyond the grave.

Ho! ye who sweat the livelong day,
And half the livelong night,
Move cheerly on your rugged way,
And work with main and might;
Trudge on—trudge on, while yet ye may—
Oh! struggle onward to the fray,
And God will crown the right:
Tho' lowly be your present task—keep heart, and never fear:
The loom of time can wonders weave—keep heart and persevere!
With faith and truth for guiding stars, with kingdoms ye may cope,
Then let your earnest motto be—"While there is life there's hope."

Ho! ye who by affliction's side,
Wear out the sleepless hour,
And watch the mouldering of pride,
The pride of youthful flower—
Watch on—watch on, whate'er betide;
The very dying have not died,
When lost to human power.
Then let not frowning aspects daunt—watch on and never fear;
True-hearted hope will never flag—watch on and persevere;
Unfearing, not a moment stay, to sigh, or weep, or mope,
But let your earnest motto be—"While there is life there's hope."

Ho! ye who 'neath oppression bend,
Bow'd by a chastening rod;
Ho! ye without an earthly friend,
Contemn'd, despis'd, bestrod—
Hope on—hope on, and well depend,
Ye'll be befriended in the end,
If ye but hope in God.
Then onward wend your weary path—hope on and never fear,
A breath is all of worldly wrath—hope on and persevere;
Tho' bow'd and bent your worldly way ye stumbling have to grope,
The triumph will be yours at last, if ye but live in hope!

Then say not hope's a foolish dream,
A passing of the breath—
A bubble on the living stream,
Evanishing in death;
For it bears a deeper meaning to the virtuously brave,
Whose earthly guiding star is hope—a hope beyond the grave!

ATCH.

"What I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." This language of the Saviour embraces all the family of God, from the time it was spoken to the end of the world. Some of the disciples asked him privately concerning the signs that should precede his coming, and after answering their questions, he tells them plainly, that they knew not the time but instructs them to watch.

There is no doubt that the idea was conveyed to their minds that his kingdom should be established in their day; hence the question after his resurrection, "Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Their own writings also show that they looked for tke Lord, although they became aware that there were certain prophecies to be fulfilled before that event; yet they knew not but that they should be fulfilled immediately; and hence the many exhortations upon the ground that the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. And from that day to this there have been watchmen who have kept their eye upon this great truth, in momentary expectancy of its fulfilment. Shall we say, they were any of them unwise in looking for the Lord in their day? No; rather that they were wise in giving heed to the words of their Saviour: As I have said to your fathers, so say I to you, watch. And as the prophecies have one after another had their fulfilment, God's watching, waiting ones have watched more closely, believing that the opening skies must soon reveal the Son of God. Taking heed to those things they watch, not knowing when the time is; but are determined not to be found sleeping, and thus be overtaken as a their overtakes his victim. Many of them have fallen asleep, seeing in vision, the Son of God emerging from the clouds of heaven, surrounded by his angels, robed in glory, and have gone into death almost as into heaven itself. Tell us not that they were foolish in looking for the Lord in their day; rather tell us that they were wise, and wise for themselves. Yes, thank the Lord, they will soon awake, not to visions, but to the blessed realities themselves; not now to believe and watch and wait, but to enjoy the privileges of angels, no more to die. Brethren and Sisters, where are we? Watching and waiting? That implies holiness at heart; which insures us from being overtaken as a thief. The thief comes to steal, to kill, and to destroy. He tells us not the hour of his approach; but will come upon us unawares. If the good man of the house had known what hour the thief would come, he would have watched, and not have suffered his house to be broken up. Now the idea is this, that as we do not know when the Lord will come, we should be constantly on the watch. If the good man had known that the thief would come on Friday night, there would be no need of watching on Monday night; and he that would take that course would take an unnecessary precaution. Therefore, let us receive the instruction dictated by our own good sense, and be benefitted by the figure that is given us. We do not believe the Lord delays or is ever slack concerning his promises, but is longsuffering, not willing that any should perish: watch ye therefore, Peter and James and John and Andrew for ye know not when the time is. What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch.

"Confusion Confounded."

Br. Jacob Grim, of Philadelphia, has sent us a religious notice, published by Wm. Morris, M. D., and some of his associates in that city, which exceeds in sectarianism and confusion any human production we have lately seen. We have not room for it entire, and if we had, such muddy water may as well run into its own channel as to pollute another's. Br. Grim's brief notice of some things in it—given below—will help our readers to see the general run of these "Brethren in the Lord," as they style themselves. The reader will carefully observe Br. Grim's quotations from their manifesto.

"It is firmly believed and constantly taught among us that eternal life is the special gift of God to the objects of his grace, and that the immortality of the saints is consequent on redemption and regeneration; and so, on vital union with the risen Christ."

If it require the vital union with the risen Christ to regenerate the saints, will Prof. Morris please tell us what union brings up, regenerates, or, as the word signifies, reproduces the wicked dead?

"Moreover, it is truly believed and is incidentally taught among us, that the revealed and final penalty of sin is death." Why not stop there? Why add, "the second death," consequent on the last judgment, even eternal destruction under the wrath of God? "But, be it understood, that we as truly believe the immaterial personality of the human soul, and the accountability of the human race," etc.

Now, D. Ds. may understand what the immaterial personality of the human soul is, but I confess that the common people cannot comprehend it. Worcester says, "It does not possess the properties of matter; void of matter; spirtual." Now, be it understood, this anguage of Prof. Morris is when speaking of the wicked. Does the Prof. believe them to be spiritual?

"No." "For it is firmly believed among us that," that "is the special gift of God to his saints." And "moreover it is truly believed among us that the penalty of sin is death." So speak Dr. Morris & Co.

What is all this ado, then, about? "But be it remembered or understood that we truly believe the immaterial personality of the human soul!" Were the Doctor and his associates afraid that some of the readers might understand that when they said, that "eternal life is the special gift of God," they meant it? and "that the immortality of the saints is consequent on redemption;" or, in other words, on resurrection, and that resurrection dependent upon vital union with Christ; so that in plain English their advertisement would, or should read, "that immortality and eternal life are the special gift of God to objects of his grace, or favor, and this is consequent upon a resurrection from the dead; and this resurrection depends upon a vital union with Christ." But what will become of the wicked then? They are left just where their advertisement leaves them, without the vital union with Christ; and consequently without the regenerating principle in them, and under the penalty of sin, which they say they firmly believe is "death." In death they leave them.

In Dr. Morris' pamphlet, published in England, some twenty years ago, he says:

"In the Old Testament Scriptures ... the resurrection of the wicked is passed over in silence, excepting in one instance (Dan. xii., 2);" also, "The resurrection of the righteous was emphatically the promise," and "the hope of the promise made unto the fathers. Acts xxvi., 6."—Page 28. Again he said, "The resurrection of the wicked was left unnoticed by our Lord, when (according to the sixth chapter of John) he inculcated th edoctrine of eternal life, and spoke of the resurrection at the last day. (John vi.. 27–28 particularly 39, 40)."—P. 29.

"The resurrection of the wicked is also passed over in silence, by the apostle Paul, in his argumentative discourse on the resurrection of the dead, 1 Cor. xv."—Page 29.

Perhaps the Doctor's mind ran back to the time when his own mind realized a glimmering of the truth as published in that work of his, and for fear the public might understand from the published card that a vital union with Christ is necessary in order to live again by a resurrection from the dead, therefore, "Be it understood that we as truly believe the immaterial personality of the human soul, and the accountability of the human race .... and that the souls of the ungodly," [that means the immaterial personality of the souls of the wicked] "after death are not extinct." Well, Professor, what do you mean by saying "It is truly believed and taught among us that the revealed and final penalty of sin is death;" and yet the wicked "after death are not extinct?" Truly, Professor, much learning in this card has made confusion. Again the Doctor & Co. say,

"In true accordance with Protestant witnesses to the truth in the sixteenth century, we maintain .... the vicarious atonement of Christ." [That means that Christ died in our room and stead]. "Therefore, as it is truly believed, and is incidentally taught among us, that the revealed and final penalty of sin is death, the second death, consequent on the last judgment: even eternal destruction under the wrath of God."

Therefore, the society publishing the above card believe Jesus Christ died "the second death, and was eternally destroyed under the wrath of God!" It follows, as a legitimate conclusion, if he suffered in the room and stead of the sinner, he must have paid the penalty.

"We disown all sectarian terms of communion," say they. But they can only receive into their fellowship those subscribing to their articles of belief! Liberal, very!

Jacob Grim.

Note by the Editor.—Dr. Morris and his associates say explicitly,

"We cannot receive any one into our fellowship who is known to deny the personal Deity of the Lord Jesus, and thus to deny the Triune God-head—the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost."

We regard this exclusion as the very climax of the blackest sectarianism. By this "shibboleth" this same people, some years since, refused to let the late Eld. Henry Grew, of Philadelphia, come to the "Lord's table" with them. Though we disagreed with Eld. Grew on some points, and especially in his imitation of Trinitarians, i. e., an attempt to define exactly "who the Son" of God is, yet a purer-minded man, and one manifesting a more Christian spirit we seldom ever met. Yet, "Stand by thyself. I am holier than thou," was the practical language of these "Brethren in the Lord" to Eld. Grew. Sectarianism dies hard; but die it must.

From Charles C. Tuck.

Bangor, Me., Oct., 13, 1867.

Br. Storrs: The more I read the Herald of Life, the higher I prize it. Not only do I prize it for the great fundamental truth of life only through Christ, which it promulgates, but also, and principally, I prize it for the Christian charity and liberality which characterize its columns. In that respect the Herald of Life takes the lead of all other Advent papers. There seems to be a spirit manifested by many in their acts, which does not correspond in the least with their professions. They will talk a great deal about charity, and say they have no test of fellowship but Christian character; but if one of their brethren comes along who differs with them in his views, and wishes to preach, he finds the doors shut against him. Do not the actions of such people speak louder than their words?

The same thing is being acted out every day by men professing Christianity, and even by Adventists, who, of all people, should be the last to condemn one another on account of difference of religious views and interpretations of Scripture. The very thing which drove them out from the nominal churches, and made them a separate people, is now splitting them asunder, and sowing discord and disunion among them as a body. Intolerance is the thing. How much they have complained, and justly, too, of the intolerance manifested toward them by their former brethren in the different churches, in consequence of embracing truths taught in the word of God, but which, until then, had been buried in the dust of ages. God forbid that I should turn the cold shoulder to one of God's dear children, merely because he does not see everything in the same light that I do.

But notwithstanding the discord and division which is caused by this lack of charity, certain temperaments will still take upon themselves the responsibility of purging the church from heresies; and thus the breach, instead of being healed, grows wider and wider. But honest seekers after truth will not be hindered by such proceedings, nor will the truth be bound by any popish bulls. What a pity it is that there are people among us with so little Christian charity that they cannot hear their brethren advance anything outside of their ideas of truth, without showing a cold, and unfriendly feeling toward them! Such people ought never to use the word charity, for it does not belong to them.

How often, within a few years, have I seen this unfriendly spirit manifested toward those believing in the non-resurrection of the wicked. Here in Bangor, and in other places in this region, that doctrine has taken deep and lasting root, notwithstanding the great effort that has been made by some to prevent it, by bringing unreasonable and unscriptural arguments to their aid. That great Scripture doctrine of no future life for the wicked dead was first believed and taught in this region by my father, who first embraced it on reading your book entitled "Life from the dead; or, the Righteous only will live again," about the time it was issued, in 1857. Since then the doctrine has made rapid progress in this vicinity, and will continue to spread, till the end of time.

Salvation does not consist so much in the fact of holding the truth, as it does in the manner of holding it; for "though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal."

Necromancers of Old.—The raising of ghosts was a favorite exploit of the necromancers of old; the fame of Torralva, the Spanish magician, has been immortalized in Don Quixote. The demons that the celebrated Italian artiste, Benvenuto Cellini, describes as having seen when he got within the conjuror's circle, and which amazement magnified into several legions, are now believed to have been merely figures produced by a magic lantern; and their appearing in an atmosphere of perfumes is accounted for by the burning of odoriferous woods, in order to dim the vision of the spectators. When the Emperor Charles the Fourth was married to the Bavarian Princess Sophian, in the city of Prague, the father of the tribe brought with him a wagon load of magicians to assist in the festivities. Two of the chief proficients in the part—Zytho, the Bohemian sorcerer, and Guion, the Bavarian—appeared as rivals in an extraordinary trial before an exalted assembly. After superhuman efforts to astonish, Zytho opened his jaws from ear to ear, and swallowed his companion until his teeth touched his shoes, which he spat out because he said they had not been cleaned. The admiration of the audience was succeeded by feelings of horror, but Zytho calmed their apprehensions by restoring the vanquished Guion in his perfect corporeal proportions to life—a triumph of art inexplicable.

Miscellaneous Selections.

A court-house may be defined as the place where a cent's worth of justice is purchased with a dollar's worth of law. There is only one thing less profitable than sueing people, and that is, going their security.

How to Shake off Trouble.—Set about doing good to somebody. Put on your hat, and go and visit the poor; inquire into their wants, and minister to them. I have often tried this method, and have always found it to be the best medicine for a heavy heart.

Envy.—Envy is strongly characteristic of littleness of mind; a truly noble and generous man feels no enmity toward a successful rival. It is related of an Arabian king, that when his architect had finished for him a structure of surpassing magnificence and beauty, he ordered him to be thrown from its highest tower, for fear that he might build a palace of equal or superior beauty for some rival king.

Good Humor.—Good humor is the clear blue sky of the soul, on which every star of talent will shine more clearly, and the sun of genius encounter no vapors in his passage. 'Tis the most exquisite beauty of a fine face; a redeeming grace in a homely one. It is like the green in the landscape, harmonizing with every color, mellowing the glories of the bright, and softening the hue of the dark; or like a flute in full concert of instruments, a sound, not at first discovered by the ear, yet filling up the breaks in the concord with its deep melody.

Affection.—In the intercourse of social life, it is by little acts of watchful kindness, recurring daily and hourly, and opportunities of doing kindnesses, if sought for, that are forever starting up—it is by words, by tones, by gestures, by looks—that affection is won and preserved. He who neglects these trifles, yet boasts that whenever a great sacrifice is called for he shall be ready to make it, will rarely be loved. The likelihood is, that he will not make it; and, if he does, it will be much rather for his own sake than for his neighbor's.

Life and its End.—Remember for what purpose you were born, and through the whole of life, look at its end. Consider when that comes, in what you will put your trust. Not in the bubble of wordly vanity—it will be broken: not in wordly pleasures—they will be gone: not in great connexions—they cannot serve you: not in wealth—you cannot carry it with you: not in rank—in the grave there is no distinction: not in the recollection of life spent in a giddy conformity to the silly fashions of a thoughtless and wicked world; but in that of a life spent soberly, righteously and wisely, in this present world.

Truth.—Adhere always rigidly and undeviatingly to truth; but while you express what is true, express it in a pleasing manner. Truth is the picture—the manner is the frame that displays it to advantage. If a man blends his angry passions with his search after truth, become his superior by suppressing yours, and attend only to the justness and force of his reasoning. Truth, conveyed in austere and acrimonious language, seldom has a salutary effect, since we reject the truth, because we are prejudiced against the mode of communication. The heart must be won before the intellect can be informed. A man may betray the cause of truth by his unreasonable zeal, as he destroys its salutary effects by the acrimony of his manner. Whoever would be a successful instructor must become a mild and affectionate friend.

The Speculator.—His wealth is imaginary, and nowhere. He contracts debts, and calculates on miracles to pay them. He trusts everybody, and everybody trust him, while the ball can be kept up; and when it falls to the ground, they all roll away and perish together. The idea of owing more than he can ever reasonably expect to pay, does not rob him of a wink of sleep, or disturb his repose for a moment. "Eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die," is his maxim; he lives as if the world were at his command; he despises the sordid maxim of cutting his coat according to his cloth, for the cloth belongs to others; he goes the way of all flesh, and when his books are examined by the assignees, it is found that, though he has lived like a prince, and spent his hundreds of thousands, there never was a time when he would have had a farthing left after his debts were paid.

Inexhaustible Ivory.—New Siberia and the Isle of Lakon are, for the most part, only an agglomeration of sand, ice, and elephants' teeth. At every tempest the sea casts ashore fresh heaps of mammoths' tusks, and the inhabitants are able to drive a profitable trade in the fossil ivory thrown up by the waves. During the Summer, innumerable fishermen's barks direct their course to this isle of bones; and in Winter immense caravans take the same route, all the convoys drawn by dogs, returning charged with the tusks of the mammoth, weighing each from 150 to 200 pounds. The fossil ivory thus obtained from the frozen North is imported into China and Europe, where it is employed for the same purposes as ordinary ivory, which is furnished, as we know, by the elephant and hippopotamus of Africa and Asia. The isle of bones has served as a quarry of this valuable material for export to China for five hundred years; and it has been exported to Europe for upward of one hundred years. But the supply from these strange mines remains undiminished. What a number of accumulated generations does not this profusion of bones and tusks imply?

All About Dimples.—Dimples are the perpetual smiles of Nature—the very cunningest device and lurking place of love. When earth is dimpled by hills and valleys, it always seems to laugh; when the ocean is dimpled by the breeze, it sparkles with joy beneath the sunshine of heaven. We cannot look for frowns on a dimpled face; frowns and dimples will not associate together. How soft, how roguish, how beautiful are the dimples in the elbows and shoulders, the pretty hands and the feet of the rosy babe. Mothers dote upon those darling dimples, and delight to kiss them. But perfectly enchanting dimples, at least to the eye of an enthusiastic young man, are those which come peeping out of the cheeks around the mouth of "sweet seventeen," when sweet seventeen essays some arch, provoking sally, peeping out and flying away the moment after, coming and going with the most bewitching coquetry.

The Agricultural Ant.—Every one has heard of the domestic economy of many of the ant tribe. We know that many of them have the ugly habit of fighting for the purpose of making slaves of some of their race. We have heard of their keeping aphides like cows, and milking them of their sweet honey-dew; but few, perhaps, have ever heard of the agricultural ant. This ant is a native of Texas, and constructs a city in a mound of earth raised fifteen or twenty inches from the ground, to avoid the inconvenience of rain, though the structure may be made on dry earth. Round its city it clears the ground for the space of three or four feet. This space is leveled, smoothed, and freed from every living herb. When this suburban field is so prepared, it is sown with a single species of grain-bearing grass. When the crop appears it is carefully weeded. The cultivated grass grows luxuriantly, and produces a heavy crop of small, white, flinty seeds, which, under the microscope, very closely resembles ordinary rice. When ripe, it is carefully harvested and carried by the workers, chaff and all, into the granary cells, where it is divested of the chaff and packed away. The chaff is taken out and thrown beyond the limits of the paved area. During protracted wet weather, it sometimes happens the provision stores become damp, and are liable to sprout and spoil. In this case, on the first fine day, the ants bring out the damp and damaged grain, and expose it to the sun till it is dry, when they carry it back and pack away all the sound seed, leaving those that had sprouted to waste.

The priests of paganism in all ages have encouraged a belief in omens. As the professed interpreters of such "signs" as they choose to invest with an occult or supernatural meaning, they have always maintained a powerful influence over the ignorant rank and file of the barbarian and semi-civilized nations. In heathan lands the priesthood is, and ever has been, a mysterious order, claiming unborn gifts and powers unknown to the laity, and exercising through the instrumentality of deception and humbug an immense influence over the uninitiated masses. The maxim that "knowledge is power" has been strikingly illustrated in the history of pagan priestcraft from the earliest ages to the present day. The diviners, soothsayers, and augurs of ancient Egypt, Greece and Rome were far in advance of the people in intelligence and acquirements. It was their interest to withhold from all other classes an insight into the philosophy of their predictions, and they kept their secrets well, gaining new light themselves from research and experiment as time wore on, and doing their best to thicken the darkness in which their dupes were enveloped. Where the ignorance to be practised upon is profound, a little knowledge goes a great way. With a smattering of some of the arts and sciences, the flamens of old Rome held the citizens in awe; and by means of such meteorological information as they have derived from long and careful observation, the rain-doctors of Central Africa predict the termination of a drought with a degree of certainty which seems supernatural to their stolid worshippers. To lead the multitude by the nose has been a passion with bright scoundrels from time immemorial; and the willingness, not to say eagerness, with which the obtuse and thickheaded submit their noses to the fingers of chicane seems to justify the dictum of the author of "Hudibras," that —"The pleasure is as great

In being cheated as to cheat."

Heathenism bequeathed to Christianity a large legacy of superstitions, many of which still exist in spite of the teachings of revealed religion and the demonstrations of physical science. Christian men and women in this era of intelligence continue to consult fortune-tellers and to give credence to the predictions of clairvoyants. Thousands of otherwise sensible people would hesitate to commence any important enterprise on a Friday, thus subscribing to a heathen dogma as old as the Scandinavian gods. The Emperor Louis Napoleon is said to believe in astrology, and to rely on the influence of his "natal star;" and two-thirds of the civilized world would regard an intangible something which they deify under the name of luck as the power that "shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will." Impostors who pretend to see "things invisible to mortal sight" find disciples even among the highly educated; and "omens" which science readily traces to natural causes are still viewed with terror by the untaught and credulous. As the light of intelligence spreads and strengthens, let us hope that delusions so unchristian and so unphilosophic will fade before it and ultimately disappear; that a rational dependence on Providence will everywhere supersede a superstitious faith in "luck," and that all men will one day recognize, as the only sure prognostics of success, the energy and perseverence necessary to achieve it.

Useful Receipts.

Oak Varnish.—Clear pale resin, three pounds and a half, dissolved in one gallon of turpentine.

Simple Cosmetic.—Melt one pound of soft soap over a slow fire, with half a pint of sweet oil, and add a teacupful of fine sand. Stir the mixture together until cold.

To Take Stains from Silk.—Mix together in a phial two ounces of essence of lemon, and one ounce of oil of turpentine. Grease and other spots in silks are to be rubbed gently with a linen rag dipped in this mixture.

Beef Cakes.—Pound some beef that is underdone with a little fat bacon or ham; season with pepper, salt, and a little shalot or garlic; mix them well, and make into small cakes, three inches long, and half as wide and thick. Fry them a light brown, and serve them in a good thick gravy.

To Clean Silk.—Take a quarter of a pound of soft soap, a teaspoonful of brandy, and a pint of gin; mix all well together, and strain through a cloth. With a sponge or flannel spread the mixture on each side of the silk without creasing it; wash it in two or three waters, and iron it on the wong side; it will look as good as new, and the process will not injure silks of even the most delicate colors.

Lemon Dumplings.—With ten ounces of fine bread crumbs mix one large tablespoonful of flour, half a pound of finely-chopped beef suet, the grated rinds of two small lemons, four ounces of powdered sug r, three large eggs, beaten and strained; and, last of all, the juice of two lemons, also strained. Divide the mixture into four dumplings, tie them in well-floured cloths, and let them boil for an hour.

To Take Grease out of Cloths.—To sixteen ounces of rectified spirits of wine add ten grains of carbonate of potash (pure), half an ounce of essential oil of bergamot, and one ounce of sulphuric ether; mix and keep in a glass-stoppered bottle. Apply with a piece of sponge, soaking the cloth thoroughly when the grease is not recent. The mixture emits a peculiarly fragrant odor, and, being a fluid soap, chemically composed, will be found a perfect solvent of oily matter.

Veal Pottage.—Take off a knuckle of veal all the meat that can be made into cutlets, etc., and set the remainder on to stew four or five hours at least, with an onion, a bunch of herbs, a blade of mace, some whole pepper, and five pints of water; cover it close. Strain it, and set it by till next day; take the fat and sediment from the jelly, and simmer it with either turnips, celery, sea-kale, and Jerusalem artichokes, or some of each, cut into small dice, till tender, seasoning it with salt and pepper, and butter the size of a walnut. Before serving, rub half a spoonful of flour with half a pint of good cream; boil it a few minutes. Let a small roll simmer in the soup, to be served with it. The pottage may be thickened with rice or pearl-barley; or the veal may be minced, and served up in the tureen.

To Clean Kid Gloves.—Put the gloves on your hands and wish them, as if you were washing your hands, in some spirits of turpentine, until quite clean; then hang them up in a warm place, or where there is a current of air, and all smell of the turpentine will be removed. Or else wash them with soap and water, then stretch them on wooden hands, or pull them into shape without wringing them: next rub them with pipe-clay, or yellow ochre, or a mixture of the two in any required shade, made into a paste with beer; let them dry gradually, and, when about half dry, rub them well, so as to smooth them, and put them into shape; then dry them, brush out the superfluous colour, cover them with paper, and smooth them with a warm iron. Other colors may be employed to mix with the pipe-clay beside yellow-ochre. To dry clean gloves, lay them out flat; then rub into them a mixture of finely-powered fuller's-earth and alum; sweep it off with a brush, sprinkle them with dry bran and whiting; lastly, dust them well. This will not do if they are very dirty.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents: in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not Heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. Moral Depravity; by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. Doom of the Ungodly: or, The Wicked Dead remain eternally under death's dominion. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. The Wages of Sin: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. Letters to a Clergyman; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. Finley, Pittsburg, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for 2 cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our own expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent for 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658,
NEW YORK.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to GUESS them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

LIFE AND DEATH.

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

"FOR God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii., 16.

IN nearly every age of the world, Christians have been compelled, like the workmen of Nehemiah, when rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, after the Babylonish captivity, to remove the rubbish of the former structure, in order to lay the foundations of a new building. Such labor is not the most progressive and pleasant in the world; but it is necessary to overthrow error before truth can be established in its stead. There has been so much perversion of the meaning of the scriptural terms life and death, that it becomes necessary for us to attempt to explain their ordinary and uniform signification by their self-evident relation to circumstances.

The word life, it is said, means happiness, bliss, enjoyment; and death, not the cessation of life, but misery, wretchedness, woe. Now, all these ideas or conditions of the mind are much better expressed by their own appropriate terms than by the use of those which imply something altogether different: hence, there is no necessity for employing the word death, when that to which life is essential is meant. True, the words life and death are sometimes used figuratively; but never thus when denoting rewards promised or punishments threatened.

Much labor has been expended to prove that death does not mean the cessation of life when spoken of in reference to the wicked, but "a state of unhappiness—a futurity of woe—a miserable hereafter, etc.;" but a proper understanding in regard to these two terms will enable us to comprehend the condition of the world, apart from the provision contained in the gospel, as well as the final state of those who reject Christ. Let us trace the word perish through the New Testament and see whether it is susceptible of a different construction. In the the first place, we find it occurring in Matt. viii., 25.

"And when he was entered into a ship his disciples followed him. And behold, there arose a great tempest in the sea, insomuch that the ship was covered with the waves; but he was asleep. And his disciples came to him and awoke him, saying, Lord, save us, we perish."

What is the meaning of the word perish in this verse? "Death by drowning," is the natural response. Certainly, no one can infer that the disciples were apprehensive lest they should be hurried into the place called "hell," or be tormented. On the contrary, they thought death by drowning would be their fate unless Christ saved them: such is the obvious interpretation of the text.

In Matt. ix., 17, we read: "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles: else the bottles break and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish." Here, the bottles cease to be; when they are broken, and the wine escapes, they are no longer bottles: they cease; they perish. Also in Matt. xxvi., 52, "Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into his place; for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." What does the term "perish" in this verse mean? Evidently to die, to lose existence by means of the sword. In Luke xiii., Jesus, in reply to some who had told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices, said:

"Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." What "thing" had those Galileans suffered? Why, death; and the mingling of their blood with their sacrifices. "Or those eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem? I tell you nay; but except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish.

In the one instance it is very clear that the Galileans were slain by Pilate; in the other that those upon whom the tower fell were crushed to death; and Christ, evidently availing himself of the circumstances, impressed upon the minds of the Jews, who regarded that form of death with horror, that unless they should repent, a similar fate awaited them. But he did not remind them that those Jews who had perished, had gone to a place of torment: there was not the slightest allusion to any such consequence. The Jews as a nation did not repent, and, accordingly, they suffered as Jesus had foretold. Their temple was thrown down, their towers fell; they were burned and slain—they perished "in like manner:" and the very site of their city was ploughed up.

Those who endeavor to give these texts a forced application to a state of torment in the other world, pervert the language of Jesus, and destroy the harmony and simplicity of the gospel. In the 33d verse of the same chapter we find the following: "Nevertheless, I must walk to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following: for it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem." Here Christ obviously meant that he would lose his life, or be put to death. In Luke xiii., we read; "From the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple: verily, I say unto you, it shall be required of this generation." Also, in the case of the prodigal son—Luke xv., 17. "And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger!"

Did the prodigal son, in this instance, mean that he would "perish" after the manner described by theologians; namely, be tormented forever? Unquestionably, no. He meant precisely what he said; that he was dying of hunger—perishing for the want of food. On one occasion, while endeavoring to convince his disciples of the loving providence of his Father, Jesus told them that not a hair of their head should perish. The word was evidently used in its figurative sense to illustrate the extreme solicitude on the part of God for the welfare of his children, and not to indicate a mode of punishment.

In John xi., 50, it is written—"Nor consider that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not." From the reference which Caiaphas makes to the prophecy concerning Christ's death, no one can mistake his meaning—the cessation of national life.

In Acts v., 37, we have a part of Gamaliel's advice to the Sadducees who were about to lay violent hands upon the apostles. He says:

"After this man rose up Judas of Galilee in the days of taxing, and drew away much people after him: he also perished: and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed." The "Judas" to whom he refers must have been slain, else there had been but little force in the example. He had probably encountered violent opposition, and perished (lost his life) in the tumult.

Again in chapter viii., 20, Peter replies to Simon the sorcerer, "Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money." Did Peter mean that his money should be tormented? In 2 Cor. iv., 16, the following language is employed: "For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day." Does Paul say, "though our outward man be tormented?" We cannot discover it. He means that our physical structure is corruptible, and perishes day by day according to the laws of our material nature. Some might here take occasion to say that Paul believes in an "inward man"—so do we. We believe that the "inward man" is by the implantation of the Divine Spirit of God in the heart of the believer. But Paul does not affirm an "inward man" of the sinner; for it is a gift bestowed upon the child of God.

Turning to Heb. xi., 31, we find: "By faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not, when she had received the spies with peace." The Old Testament informs us that in consequence of her faith Rahab was not slain with her countrymen in the sack of their city, but escaped with her life. Peter, in his second epistle, iii., 6, says: "Whereby the world that then was being overflowed with water, perished." That is to say, simply, the inhabitants of the earth's surface were drowned, or lost their lives in the overwhelming flood. Jude in the 11th verse of his epistle, says: "Woe unto them, for they have gone into the way of Cain, and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, and perished in the gainsaying of Core." Now, what was the manner of Korah's death? The earth opened and swallowed him up with all his company. So, you perceive, that in all the passages I have cited, where the term perish occurs, it implies, merely, the loss of life, under varieties of circumstances and by various means, or the extinction of being.

We will now endeavor to determine the meaning of the term "perish" in its relation to the final state. Turning to Matt. xviii., 14, we read: "Even so it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish." Here, in allusion to their final state, the word is used in the sense of dying. Again, in John x., 27, 28: "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish."

Paul, in Acts xiii., 41, says to the blaspheming Jews: "Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish." If Paul had meant eternal torment instead of perish, he would in all probability have spoken accordingly; but inasmuch as he did not, his language is susceptible of but one construction, namely, that if the Jews persisted in unbelief, despising the works of God and the proffered redemption through Jesus Christ, they should perish, lose their lives eternally. 1 Cor. xv., 17, 18: "And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they, also, which are fallen asleep in Christ, are perished." Their final state is here spoken of. They are dead, he argues; and if there be no resurrection of the dead, they are perished beyond recovery. Again: 2 Cor. iii., 15, 16: "For we are unto God a sweet savor of Christ in them that are saved, and in them that perish."

Thus we have noticed a sufficient number of texts in which the word perish occurs in the New Testament, to demonstrate its uniform meaning to be death or extinction of life, irrespective of the moral character of those of whom it is affirmed; but as respects the final state, it has reference only to the wicked, and will bear no other construction than that of eternal death, or extinction of life.

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish"—mark the contrast —"but have everlasting life."

Here to perish is contrasted with everlasting life, the antithesis of which is everlasting death. The world was fast sinking into oblivion—eternal death—without a ray of light to illumine the darkness of futurity. Men were returning to the dust from whence they had sprung, without God and without hope; but God so loved them—not that they so loved God—that he gave his "only begotten Son" as a propitiation for their sins. The gospel proclamation is Life—Life from the dead, through Jesus Christ, the second Adam, the head of the new creation, who came to reveal the foundation of life, that men might live forever; that they might possess immortality, incorruptibility. The gospel does not come to us with a curse, but with a blessing; and we had almost exclaimed with the apostle, "If any man preach any other gospel than this, let him be accursed!" Can you imagine that the angels of the Lord who appeared to the shepherds on the dawn of that day which ushered Christ into the world, gave utterance to a lie? "The angel said unto them, Fear not; for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." And the heavenly host praised God, saying, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men."

Now, let any one point out the curse contained in the gospel, or anything that resembles a curse. On the contrary, it is full of love and life, and offers an eternal life through faith in the Son of God, who said, "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day."

If men neglect this great salvation there is no hope for them—no escape; Christ will profit them nothing. To our mind, this fact is as clear as the sun in the noonday sky, when there is not a cloud to be seen. God has pledged his word to those who believe in him, that he will give them eternal life by means of the resurrection at the last day—will clothe them with honor, glory, and immortality. When our Adamic life is gone, unless we have believed in Jesus, there is no hope for us; but by believing in him, we obtain a new and divine life, which emanates from him who is the head of the new creation. If we have no connection with Christ there is no power to bring us up from the dead, and we remain there forever. Then, dying friends, will you not accept the proffered gift of a new life by embracing Christ as the LIFE-GIVER? For he has said in loving terms, "He that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out."

Whatever our sins may have been, he is ready to be gracious and to blot them from his memory, and enrol our names in the "Lamb's Book of Life."

If we sleep in the dust of the earth when Jesus appears again, we shall awake to life eternal; or if we be alive on that great day, we shall "be changed—in a moment—in the twinkling of an eye." "For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead" in Christ "shall be raised in incorruptibility." They shall be raised by the Spirit of God, to live no more by flesh and blood; and their life shall be as eternal as the Spirit of God itself.

DESTRUCTION OF MYSTIC BABYLON.

WE extract the following from "Thoughts on the Coming and Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ—by JOHN COX, minister of the Gospel, Woolwich," published some years since. The extract is taken from his thoughts on events to occur previous to the setting up of the kingdom of Christ He says:

Great and beneficial changes are generally introduced by great and dreadful commotions. This chiefly arises from the opposition made by the old state of things about to be superseded. An eminent writer observes, "In every new development of his plan of mercy and salvation to the human race, it has hitherto pleased God that mercy and judgment should as it were go hand in hand. The calling of Abraham and the birth of Isaac were nearly coeval with the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire from heaven. The exodus from Egypt was associated with the desolation of that kingdom by the ten plagues, and the destruction of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea. The establishment of Israel in the land of Canaan was effected by the extirpation of a great part of the aboriginal inhabitants. The settlement of the crown of Israel in the person and family of David, was accompanied with dreadful wars. The return of Judah from the Babylonish captivity was preceded by the fall of the empire of Assyria. That dispensation, whereby the Gentiles were brought into the church in the room of the Jews, was followed by the destruction of Jerusalem, with circumstances of so awful a nature, as made it a fit type and emblem of the judgments of the last days. In concluding, therefore, that the glorious inauguration of our Lord in his millennial kingdom, which is to be ushered by his second advent, with the clouds of heaven, shall likewise be signalized by the most terrific displays of the Divine wrath against an unbelieving world, we not only are guided by the unerring testimony of prophecy, but we might even, à priori, without any express assurances to that effect, have been led to form similar expectations, from an attentive study of the dispensations of Providence in past ages."

We now come to consider some of the great events, which must transpire in the world before the glorious kingdom of Christ is set up in it. This, if rightly understood, is an awful and alarming subject, a subject which the prophecies speak frequently and largely upon. Nations will be reckoned with, long arrears of vengeance will be paid off, thrones and kingdoms will be overturned, all false religions fall, and oppressors feel the weight of God's wrath. These and like things will make way for him whose right it is to reign. This is the judgment of the quick or living, which is to precede the judgment of the dead, both of whom Christ will judge at his appearing and kingdom, 2 Tim. iv., 1. The nature, progress, and design of these judgments, will be best understood by a diligent search of Ps. ii., 8–12; xlvi., 6–10; Isa. xxiv., 18–22; xxxiv., 1–8; Jer. xxv., 27–33; Dan. vii., 9–12; Rev. xi., 15–19; xiv., 18–20; xvi., 13–21; and xix., 11–21, with many other passages too numerons to cite, to some of which we shall have ocasion to refer.

But to particularize; 1. Before the establishment of Christ's reign, Popery must be entirely destroyed. The kingdom of Christ and that of Antichrist, cannot be dominant on this earth at the same time. The Papacy has been termed Satan's masterpiece, and the Pope, Satan's Melchisedec; and some have considered that the whole system of Popery is an infernal mimicry, or rather anticipation of that kingdom Christ is to set up in the world; something of which Satan might learn from the word of God; and some were foolish enough to prophesy in the days of Constantine (Zedekiah-like) that the glorious era described Rev. 21, was about to be introduced, when, alas! the building of mystical Babylon was going rapidly on. It is imposible to declare the whole truth concerning this horrible delusion, which is alike opposed to reason and revelation, to civil and religious liberty, to the interests of man for eternity, and to his happiness in time; it is a "strong delusion," and "a mystery of iniquity;" and it is a most astounding fact, which is a proof of the power of the devil, and the wickedness and folly of man, that satan should be able to palm such a system upon the world under the name of Christianity, yea, and retain some of the essential doctrines of our most holy faith therein. The characteristics of Christianity are knowledge, holiness, and love; it is most simple, most beneficial, most beneficent; but the characteristics of Popery are ignorance, sin, and cruelty; is a religion of pomp, of darkness, and of blood. Well might John "wonder with great admiration," Rev. xvii., 6; as Mr. Fry observes, "Wonderful indeed must it have appeared in the age of John, that the apostate church should one day possess in sovereign state, the capital of the Roman Empire, and should from the seven hills deal out her spiritual corruptions, to intoxicate and subdue the same world that the legions of the imperial city had conquered by the sword. But now we must shut our eyes indeed if we refuse to recognize, in this emblem of "the woman sitting on the scarlet beast," the vaunted apostolic see of Rome. "Mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots," as the churches in the Roman Catholic communion remarkably express themselves when they speak of the Romish church, "Rome, MOTHER AND MISTRESS."

The Papacy did not spring into being and muturity at once; it was slowly matured, until it reached a height of despotic power before unequalled. It is not our province at any length to trace its growth, or rehearse its deeds of blood. The professing church was Judaized, and philosophized, before the time of Constantine, but then it became paganized, and shortly after satanized. This mystery of iniquity worked in the apostles' days, and during the second and third centuries every kind of heresy was promulgated, ceremonies and forms were introduced, and spirituality displaced by superstition. The materials for Popery were thus prepared, and by the union of the church with the Roman state, its foundation was openly laid, and the building rapidly carried on. An orator at Constantinople, in the reign of Jovian, 50 years after the accession of Constantine to the Roman purple, says, "In the recent changes (he is adverting to Julian the apostate) both religions, pagan, and Christian, have been alternately disgraced by the seeming acquisition of worthless proselytes of those votaries of the reigning purple, who could pass without a reason and without a blush, from the church to the temple, and from the altars of Jupiter to the sacred table of the Christians." Surely such religionists as these must be just such tools as satan wished for. Thus did the enemy of man mould the professing church of Christ, until it exhibited his own image, and wrought the desires of his cruel and malicious heart.

A few facts recalled to mind will show that these heavy charges are not without foundation. Look at its image worship, and other hundred senseless, mischievous mummeries, both for the dead and living. Think how it takes away the book of life, the lamp of eternity. Consider how it exalts saints and angels, and degrades the Redeemer. Behold its course traced in blood. Who can unfold the horrors of the Inquisition, or number the thousands of the Waldenses, Lollards, and Protestants it hath butchered? What tablet records how many millions of Indians, Spain, now so degraded by her ill-gotten gold, sent into eternity? But there is no end to this tale of woe; France, Spain, England, Ireland, has each furnished hecatombs of victims. But we are told that Popery is changed, and that these things should not now be mentioned; but because I believe it is unchanged and unchangable, I have hinted at these things. I believe Popery as a system, to be like sin; both may, yea, shall, be annihilated, but neither can be changed: while they live they will retain their nature, and restlessly follow up their grand object, which in both is—DOMINION.

In Rev. xiii., there is mention made of two beasts; the former (ver. 1–10,) describes the Roman Empire, the second (ver. 11–18,) describes the Papacy. The description is similar to that of Daniel's little horn. The same power is alluded to by the term of false prophet, Rev. xix., 20. But we hasten on to Rev. xvii., in which the destruction of this enemy to God and man is foretold. Yes, the word is gone out of Jehovah's mouth in righteousness, that Babylon shall sit low in the dust; yea, be debased to the depths of hell: as a millstone is overwhelmed by the ocean, when cast into it, so shall Babylon be overwhelmed by the long treasured-up vengeance of God.

In Rev. xviii., one of the seven vial angels said to John, "Come hither, I will shew thee the judgment of the great whore, that sitteth [upon many waters." John was then shown this apostate church, under the figure of a woman sitting on a scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. There appears to me good reason to conclude that this beast is the Roman Empire in its last form of infidelity. As pagan, its symbol was a great red dragon, Rev. vii., 3. As, under the influence of Popery, it is called a beast rising out of the sea, Rev. xiii., 1–10. But this beast is said to rise out of the bottomless pit, or abyss, Rev. xi., 7; xvii., 8; and to be full of names of blasphemy. Another reason for considering this beast to be the Roman Empire in its infidel form is, the office assigned to it, "to hate the whore, make her desolate and naked, and eat her flesh, and burn her with fire," ver. 16; (none but an infidel power could do this), and after having done so, make war with the Lamb, which this beast doth, ver. 14. But it may be asked, does not the vision represent the great whore as riding upon this beast of infidelity? Yes: and this seems to say, that between infidelity and popery there will be, for a time, a coalition; that the latter will owe its support to the former; but that after awile, having gained that which it wished by its alliance with popery, and, perhaps, having both joined together to persecute the church of God, the beast, or infidel power, to whom the ten kings shall give their power, shall destroy the whore by the agency of these kings.

We have had some foreshowing of this in the French revolution and its effects.* Popery has already suffered much from infidelity; and notwithstanding their apparent agreement in these liberal days, it must suffer still more from its iron hand. But still it is plain from the word of God that however the ten kings may waste the whore, there is to be some signal and finishing act of vengeance, which will complete the work of destruction. This is set forth by the angel's throwing the millstone into the sea; and Rev. xviii., 8, her plagues are said to come in one day; the false prophet perishes finally with the beast, and the kings of the earth, Rev. xix., 19, 20. The strong hand of Zion's avenger will hurl her down from her eminence, drag her out of all her fastnesses, and give her an eternal portion in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, together with the beast on which she rode, even all who helped foward her deeds of of idolatry, superstition, and blood.

There is one consideration connected with this subject which claims our most serious attention. How wide, how searching will those judgments be by which Babylon shall be destroyed! Where is the church that hath not been contaminated by her posionous breath, that doth not manifest somewhat of her spirit and conduct? Persecution, pharisaism, heresy, formality, outward show, crying up of the creature, are but too manifest among professors—in some, one anti-Christian feature is exhibited; and in some another—but are any wholly free? Instead, then, of one sect quarrelling with another—had we not better be found praying, both for ourselves and them, that God would give us all humility to unlearn what is wrong, and honesty to avow it? Surely all classes of religious professors need much purification. "And behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave neither root nor branch." Isa. xiv., 22, 24; Mal. iv., 1. It is easy to cut down a tree, however great and lofty; this may be done without much disquieting the soil around, but in order to pull up every root and fibre of an ancient tree, the ground all around must be moved and separated. Thus will the whole of Christendom be shaken by the rooting up of Babylon; nothing but pure truth will escape; God will deliver all beside over to infidelity, and the fire of wrath. That beast of hell will, doubtless, seek to devour truth likewise, and to destroy those who love it; but truth is immortal—the teeth of time, the rage of hell, and the violence of infidelity cannot destroy it, nor ultimately injure its honest professors; for he who sitteth above the water-floods hath said, "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." Rev. iii., 10.

* France contained, before the revolution, 1793, upward of 366,000 secular and regular clergy, beside an immense number of nuns. About 24,000 priests were butchered during the revolution.

In the whole of Christendom, there were no less than 225,444 monasteries, about 150 years ago; 3,180 were suppressed by Henry VIII., and his predecessors, in England; there were 50,000 persons in them.—Simpson's Plea.

THOUGHTS FOR TRIED ONES.

THE path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. Human life is as the journey of a day. It has its morning, noon and night. So religious life has its night of weeping, its morning of joy, and its noontide of glory and bliss. Divine care and love have cast up a highway across the desert of a sinful world for faithful pilgrims. It is called the way of holiness. The redeemed only can walk there. And upon this heavenly road, sometimes rough and wearisome, and anon paved with jasper and sapphire from the celestial quarry, the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads. It is this figure of a wayfarer, flying from his doomed birthplace to the celestial city that constitutes the thread of gold upon which the genius and piety of Bunyan have strung his wonderful allegory.

There are frequent instances in the natural world in which dark and misty clouds shut us in all the day long. We have cherished and pressing plans before us, but they cannot be carried out. We watch the encircling vapors in vain for a single gleam of sunlight. At last, when the shades of night seem gathering hopelessly around us, the dense curtain is slowly upraised, and through the crystal prism stretched across the western sky the wealth of a thousand intermingling colors is strown over the whole canopy of heaven. In like manner the religious life of some poor wanderers, down to its very closing hour, is involved in clouds and darkness. Every forward step is taken with fear and trembling. It takes all the help and patience of guides and companions to cheer them on. Their dawn is delayed till sunset. And yet kind Heaven is sure to grant them one vision of bliss before the closing hour. As nature sometimes retains all her morning splendors to gild the close of a gloomy day, so often these weary, fainting pilgrims take their departure from earth amidst the blended glories of a heavenly dawn and sunset. This sad and doubting band of travellers in the way of life are pictured by Bunyan with the same fidelity and genius that have made all his characters authentic and immortal. In his wonderful descriptions of the passage of the pilgrims one by one over the dark river, he speaks of the departure of Mr. Despondency and his daughter Muchafraid. As the pilgrims were receiving, one after another, the summons to cross the river, this message was brought to Mr. Despondency: These are to summon thee to be ready with the King by next Lord's day, to shout for joy for thy deliverance from all thy doubtings. Now his daughter, when she heard what was done, said she would go with her father. When the time was come for them to depart, they went to the brink of the river. The last words of Mr. Despondency were, Farewell, night, welcome day. His daughter went through the river singing, but none could understand what things she said.

Over this highway, thrown up by the toils and sufferings of prophets and martyrs, many worthy and faithful pilgrims are pursuing their heavenly course. There are aged pilgrims, long travelled in the ways of God, that still keep up their feeble march; and when compelled to halt, faint and weary, leaning upon the top of their staves, they wait and watch for their deliverance. There are little pilgrims, on whom rest the smile and blessing of the dear Jesus, whose happy, bounding feet are treading this heavenly pathway. These are the little angels of our lives; but alas! too often their angel wings outstrip our slow and toilsome pace. There are some—too few—who give to this spiritual pilgrimage the hope and bloom of youth, the strength and glory of manhood. Why will any wander, lost and benighted, when it may be theirs to bathe in the white radiance of eternity?—Selected

Consider it Well.

Have you attentively considered the great crowning truth, that Jesus is soon coming? Are you prepared for the great and terrible events which are about to transpire? Are you a half-hearted professor? If so your Christianity will soon fail you. It is the pure in heart that shall see God; the meek that shall inherit the earth; the willing and obedient that shall eat the good of the land and none others. God grant that you may not reap the fearful consequences of this lukewarmness in the service of God, but that you may lay all upon the altar, and become wholly consecrated to his cause.

Are you one that trembles at the thought of God's approaching day of wrath? See! there is Christ, who died for you. Confess your guilt, turn from the error of your ways, throw yourself upon his mercy, and trust to him alone for salvation. He will in no wise cast you out. Fear not, confess him now before the world, and he will confess you before the Father and the angels. O, make haste; delay not a moment, lest thou be destroyed with the ungodly; for their destruction is certain and inevitable. Come and be reconciled to God while it is an acceptable time and a day of salvation.

O, prepare to meet thy God! The great and notable day of the Lord is at hand. This generation must witness the coming of our Saviour: the signs of his coming have taken place, and at any moment he may appear. Is the bride prepared to receive him? Consider it well, O, man! O, woman! Consider it well. —Selected.

Dr. Beecher's Sermon to One Hearer.

Dr. Beecher once engaged to preach for a country minister on exchange, and the Sabbath proved to be one excessively stormy, cold, and uncomfortable. It was in mid-Winter, and the snow was piled all along the roads, so as to make the passage very difficult. Still, the minister urged his horse through the drifts, put the animal into a shed, and went in. As yet, there was no person in the house, and, after looking about, the old gentleman—then young—took his seat in the pulpit. Soon the door opened, and a single individual walked up the aisle, looked about, and took a seat. The hour came for commencing service, but no more hearers. Whether to preach to such an audience, was a question; and it was one that Lyman Beecher was not long deciding. He felt that he had a duty to perform, and he had no right to refuse to do it because only one man could reap the benefit of it; and accordingly he went through all the services, praying, singing, preaching, and the benediction, with only one hearer. And when all was over, he hastened down from the desk to speak to the congregation, but he had departed.

A circumstance so rare was referred to occasionally, but twenty years after, it was brought to the doctor's mind quite strangely. Travelling somewhere in Ohio, the doctor alighted from the stage one day in a pleasant village, when a gentleman stepped up and spoke to him, familiarly calling him by name. "I do not remember you," said the doctor. "I suppose not," said the stranger; "but we once spent two hours together in a house alone in a storm." "I do not recall it, sir," said the old man; "pray, when was it?" "Do you remember preaching, twenty years ago, in such a place, to a single person?" "Yes, yes," said the doctor, grasping his hand, "I do, indeed, and if you are the man, I have been wishing to see you ever since." "I am the man, sir; and that sermon was the means of my salvation, made a minister of me, and yonder is my church! The converts of that sermon, sir, are all over Ohio."—Selected.

Wise Words from John Wesley.—We may die without the knowledge of many truths, and be carried to Abraham's bosom; but if we die without love, what will knowledge avail us? Just as much as it avails the devil and his angels. I will not quarrel with you about any opinion; only see that your hearts be right toward God—that you love the Lord Jesus Christ—that you love your neighbor—walk as your Master walked, and I desire no more. I am sick of opinions; I am weary to hear them—my soul loathes their frothy food. Give me a humble lover of God and man—a man full of mercy and good fruits—a man laying himself out in the work of faith, the patience of hope, the labor of love. Let my soul be with such Christians, wheresoever they are, and whatsoever opinions they may hold. "He that doeth the will of my Father in heaven, the same is my brother, and my sister, and my mother."

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 30, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Editor has not returned from Boston, and may possibly remain there over the next Sabbath. He preached last Sabbath morning and afternoon in the lower Musical Hall, called "Bumstead Hall," to good and attentive audiences, and trusts the seed sown will take root in some minds: indeed, it was evident it was not laboring in vain, for some of the fruit immediately appeared in the earnest attention and personal interview sought by hearers. The things spoken were new to many who heard, but a disposition was manifested not to despise them on that account. We trust the divine blessing will cause much good to come of this visit to Boston.

Dying Twice: Is it a Bible Doctrine?

"All men are equally subject to the first, or Adamic death, regardless of what they have done or can do; hence to receive the wages of personal sins there must be a temporary life from the dead for the wicked, in order that they may suffer the wages of sin by dying a second time."

Such is the strong argument of the advocates of future misery for the wicked. They seem to overlook the clear distinction of death as a penalty, and death as a disciplinary administration. They also combine the idea of suffering with death, as if that, and not death itself, were the penalty; or, at least, they think suffering is an essential part of it. Both of these positions we regard as erroneous.

1. No man dies the death to which Adam was subjected, except for his own personal sins. Adam's death was a penal infliction: that is, it was the penalty of the law under which he was placed; which law made no provision for deliverance from death's power. None of his posterity were ever under the penalty of such a law, unless they became so by their own personal act. They were "made subject to vanity"—or, to a life brief in duration, ending in death—"not willingly"—or, not for personal sins, but as a part of a system of discipline to which God subjected Adam's posterity, making their trial one of more severity than Adam's, and their deliverance from death possible. Hence the "subjection was made in hope." In this subjection to suffering and death all Adam's descendants participate: but only those of them "which have the first fruits of the Spirit" ever will have the hope realized, or receive "the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." That is the hope of the gospel: it is deliverance from death, or from "vanity." Whoever is delivered from this, is "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." All others remain under the bondage of corruption for their own personal sins in not improving their day of discipline: their sins were not remitted, and they reap eternal bondage to corruption, or death.

2. The idea that suffering must be combined with death to make the penalty complete, we regard as a pure assumption, entirely without foundation in the Bible, and as the offspring of the eternal misery theory. No reason can be assigned for the temporary revival to life of the wicked dead, to torment and kill again, which is not just as good for eternal torment. Both are without any manifest object to Adam's race. Each system demands torment—so far as any reason appears—without any design of benefitting the saved or lost. Beside this, suffering is no expressed part of the penalty for sin. "The wages of sin is death."

That the law given Israel, under the Mosaic dispensation, threatened sufferings and tribulations of various kinds and degrees, is admitted: but not a word in that law extended those sufferings beyond this life. There is not a word therein of a life after death to a wicked man, or suffering in a life beyond the present.

Let it be distinctly marked, then, that dying a second time is no expressed penalty of any law God has ever placed man under, either Adam or his posterity. There was one trial for Adam, and but one, so far as revelation is our guide. His posterity have but one trial; but theirs is far more severe than his; yet this is in mercy to them; for though subjected to death as a part of their disciplinary state—thus keeping them constantly in mind of what sin deserves—yet they were bid hope in a Deliverer, who should bring them up from death's dominion, if they would believe in him, or rely on him for such deliverance. Their reception or rejection of this promised Deliverer was that which should determine their final state, whether to be delivered from death or to have it confirmed on them as the penalty of incorrigible unbelief and sin. "This is the will of him that sent me," saith Jesus, "that every one that seeth the Son and believeth on him may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day." "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him!" Such is the utterance of eternal truth; and none will escape death's eternal dominion, who once come under it, if they have refused to accept Christ as their Life-giver: their one death is confirmed as penal, "at the last day," by the reliving of the righteous dead, while the wicked dead remain under the "condemnation" of death eternal, and do "not see life;" or, if alive at the last day, are "punished with everlasting destruction," and live no more. See 2 Thess. i., 9. They do not die twice; but their death is irrevocable, and may therefore be called the second death, because subjected to death's eternal dominion for their personal sins, which were unremitted.

Remarks on Acts xxiv., 15.

This text is one of the main forts of the advocates of the reliving of the wicked dead. It is claimed as positive testimony that all the wicked dead will be made alive. They say, Paul saith, "I have hope toward God, which they themselves allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust."

The text would have great weight on the question, if there were no opposing considerations. The apostle elsewhere has spoken of the resurrection as a peculiar favor, for the attainment of which he labored and suffered, "if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead:" Phil. iii., 11. The resurrection of which Paul speaks, Acts xxiv., is an object of hope. Hope is made up of desire and expectation. If the apostle expected the wicked would be made alive again, he could hardly desire it. Could it be an object of desire to see all the wicked in one vast company, weeping, wailing, crying for mercy, and mercy deaf to all their sorrows, anguish and despair? Could he desire to listen to the curses and blasphemies, and witness the rolling sea of wickedness that would pour forth from the revived sinners and blasphemers of all sorts? This could not be an object of hope; but the apostle's relation to the resurrection of which he speaks is that of hope—"having hope toward God . . . . that there shall be a resurrection of the dead;" as God hath promised to our fathers who believed in him; and why do the Jews, my accusers, find fault with me? for they "allow" my hope by maintaining "there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust;" for this they did maintain.

The idea of the apostle is clearly this—The Jews by holding to a resurrection of both classes, in fact, admitted Paul's hope, which hope embraced only the just; the Jews' doctrine covered Paul's ground, but went beyond it. Insomuch, therefore, as the whole includes the parts, the Jews "allowed" what Paul contended for, and thus proved their complaint against him to be groundless.

Paul's hope was based upon a promise; for he saith, ch. xxvi., "I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers . . . . for which hope's sake . . . . I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" When or where did a "promise of God to the fathers" embrace the resurrection of the unjust? Or where is a threatening to them of a resurrection? Clearly, nowhere. But the promise did embrace the just, and them only, as Jesus shows in appealing to Moses in proof of the fact in his discourse with the Sadducees, Luke xx., and parallel texts.

But if the Jews allowed Paul's hope, why did they accuse him? "Because he preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection." Acts xvii., 18. He proclaimed life from the dead only through Jesus, and to those "in Christ;" making the resurrection peculiar to believers, while the wicked had no part in it.

Thus the oft-repeated assertion that "Paul said, There shall be a resurrection of the dead both of the just and the unjust," is without foundation in truth. If not said by him in this text as his faith, there is not an instance of his ever saying it in all his preaching and epistles.

A Question.

Mr. Editor: In Luke xii., 28, it is written, "There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all the prophets in the kingdom of God and you yourselves thrust out." I have always had the opinion that there were but two classes of the human family, the righteous and the wicked. If the wicked are not raised from death, who are these that are weeping and gnashing their teeth, and are seeing Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and they themselves thrust out? Where, and by whom, and at what time, or event, are these things to to take place?

An answer in the Herald of Life, if thought best would oblige.

Yours, truly, H. B.

Greenwich, N. Y., Oct. 2, 1867.

Response.—We answer this inquiry in the same manner we do the declaration of our Lord, when he said to his disciples, "When ye shall see these things [the signs of his coming, of which he had spoken] come to pass, know that it is nigh even at the doors." It is a class of persons; of whom, those spoken to, are the representatives. No one, who believes the advent is future, and who believes "the dead know not anything," supposes the Saviour intended these words for the identical persons to whom they were spoken; but they were a representative class; the same class of men, who would be alive near or at the time of his second advent, would witness the things spoken of in both cases. Such we regard as the sense of our Lord's words in each case.

What is Understood by the Gospel?

In our last article we introduced Jesus as the bread of life to a perishing world. In the language of the Psalmist, "Thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust." This was the condition of the world when the Gospel came. It found mankind in this helpless, perishing condition. And in the language of the Apostle, God's purpose and favor is made manifest in giving us his Son, through whose appearing, he "Hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." 2 Tim. i., 10.

This then is the mission of the gospel, to make known to man the way of life: the plan by which this may be accomplished and secured.

Paul says the gospel was made known to him by revelation; and he informs us it consists of a few simple facts.

First among them is, "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." Here we might write a long article of what the Scriptures say of the manner of Christ's death, and how he died for our sins, and for whose sins he died, etc.

But our articles are for those who are not so well posted with the great Bible truths, and hence we wish to make the subject as simple as the nature of the case will allow. Second, "He was buried." Upon this second fact there is not so much of importance attached, only as proof of his being dead. Third fact, "And that he rose again the third day according to the Scriptures." "So we preached, and so ye believed. . . . . And if Christ be not raised (from the dead) then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. . . . . And if Christ be not raised (from the dead), your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins. Then they also (as well as Christ) which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. [Now what is it to perish? or what is the meaning of the word as understood by the Apostle? In the first place, it does not mean eternal torment; because it would in that case leave Jesus Christ in eternal torment; which is not the apostle's argument. There is but one thing that it can mean, by any fair interpretation of the context. Jesus died and was buried. And according to the apostle's argument, if he is not risen from this dead state; he still remains dead. And as Christ, the head, is not risen all those who have died in hope of a resurrection, through him, have perished with him. To perish, then, signifies to remain in a state of death. Now then, God loved the world, the workmanship of his own hand, to such an extent, that he was not willing it should perish; or that the whole family of mankind should return to the dust, hence, he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life. The Gospel then is not condemnation, but it is a proclamation of good news; and that good news is life through the only begotten Son of God. We have the definition of Jesus concerning this proclamation, and the meaning of the word perish. "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so (in like manner) must the Son of Man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life."

Those bitten by the serpent in the camp of Israel became poisoned and soon died. God told Moses to raise upon a pole a brazen serpent, and by the simple act of looking upon the serpent they should live.

Now, in order to be benefitted by the brazen serpent two things were necessary; first, a simple act of faith, or belief that the serpent contained the power to heal; or in other words, it was God's only method for the cure of the disease. And the second was, complying with the simple conditions that God laid upon them, viz., looking upon the serpent. Some might stop to say, there was no virtue in the serpent: it was only a piece of brass, or something brazed over, to represent a serpent; and in and of itself could have no virtue in it; and could not heal. We answer, there was virtue in the serpent, brass or brazen though it was; for it was God's method of healing; and it was the only way made known to the children of Israel to save them from perishing, and, therefore, there was virtue in the act. So also in the gospel. It is God's present method of giving life through his Son. And this life is made known through the Gospel. "He that hath the Son of God, hath life; he that hath not the Son hath not life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." How then may we have the Son of God in order that we may have life? The gospel proclamation is, "He that believeth on the Son of God hath life; and he that believeth not the Son of God hath no life." Again the question is asked, What is it to believe on the son of God? First, it is necessary to know our condition. The children of Israel knew they were bitten by the serpent, and knew they must perish unless a remedy was at hand; hence, they felt the need of the remedy, and when it came felt willing to accept of it. So with the sinner. He must feel or know his condition; that he has been poisoned by the virus, sin; and is going back to the dust from whence he was taken; and that his doom or condemnation is to perish, unless some remedy is provided. Second, it is necessary to have faith or believe that the present or only method of justification to life, is through Jesus Christ, by a resurrection from the dead. And as this is the only way that God has made known in the Gospel, we must believe it, and accept of life through Jesus Christ, as the only way of life. Hence as the Apostle says in 1 Cor xv., "Unless we believe that Jesus died and arose again," we believe in vain. We will next meet some of the objections. Jacob Grim.

The Power of Truth.

A few years ago there dwelt in a large town a young man over whose head had passed something more than twenty Summers. Sixteen years had he been carefully trained by pious parents when with their consent he left the paternal abode, and, glowing with youth's ambition, went out into the world to court the smiles of fortune. Like most children he had had the idea of inherent immortality instilled into his mind from such early childhood that he might have thought, had he thought anything about it, that the soul itself assured him of its existence, and its certainty of being eternally tormented should he die in his sins.

Belief in the possibility of being brought into such a terrible condition produced in his mind that dread which in maturer years not unfrequently fosters distrust, and finally ripens into open infidelity. When, in advanced boyhood, he yielded obedience to those promptings of the Spirit which to inexperienced youth are so novel and mysterious, construing them into a warning to flee from woe, rather than an invitation to love, and serve, and be blessed, he determined to be a follower of Jesus. Unacquainted as he of course was with the ways of life, almost a stranger to himself, he was confident of his ability to resist any temptation that might offer; so easy did it then seem to be good. But guarding, as so many do, against attack from an enemy without, he was ignorant of the real adversary, self; and ere fully aware of his position, he had fallen, ensnared, as is always the case, by the desires of the animal; "led away of" his "own lusts, and enticed." Let us notice, somewhat, his moral condition at that period referred to in the beginning of these remarks.

He is intensely devoted to business, for that is the medium through which he expects to secure the object of his ambition, worldly enjoyment. Do you see that brilliantly lighted hall, and that gay and thoughtless company of fashionably attired persons whirling through the giddy mazes of the dance to the time of joy-inspiring, care-dispel'ing music? He is there, and of that heedless throng is one of the most heedless. He is often there, and delights to thus rob nature of her requisite and heaven-appointed rest. Look into yonder secluded apartment. By the subdued light, you see in the centre a table around which are gathered a few individuals, the nature of whose amusement is revealed by the cards they hold, and at which they intently gaze. Near by, within easy reach, is placed the intoxicating draught, and frequently are its ministrations sought. As the game progresses, and the chances for success point first to this side, then to that, profane ejaculations of disappointment are heard above rude expressions of exultation. That young man is there. No lips press the cup oftener than his, and his voice is heard amid the confusion. But we need not follow him throughout his continual round. You may find him at the theatre, in halls of pleasure, at the shrine of Bacchus, in short, having much to bestow upon self, and nothing to devote to others, or to God, you may trace him into many of those dark corners of society where none but the ungodly are seen. And thus is it always with him: self first, self last, self continually.

But see again. A publication which a friend has kindly laid in his way attracts his attention. He takes it up and reads, "Bible Examiner. . . . No immortality nor endless life except through Jesus Christ alone. Geo. Storrs, Editor." And now we will quote his own words: "Well, thought I, it is sometimes said, 'There is nothing new under the sun,' but this is something new, surely. I have, like everbody else, and as everybody knows, an immortal soul, and, consequently, already possess immortality and eternal life, all of which this presumptuous editor undertakes to disprove by Scripture testimony. Some theological fanatic, no doubt, who wants to create a stir with his new-fangled notions." I laid the pamphlet down, as I did several times subsequently, not, however, without having taken it up in the meantimes, but somehow the thing would not stay laid, for I kept constantly feeling more and more curious to know about that singular doctrine, I finally determined to enter into such an examination of the subject as I was capable, and proceeded to do so, frequently conversing with the friend who first introduced the book to my notice, and sometimes with the supposed theological fanatic himself, to whom I was about this time introduced. The more immediate result was, that within a year after commencing the examination, I became fully convinced that the popular doctrine of immortality, together with its attendants, are wretched delusions, deriving no just support from the word of God; while the mortality of man, his unconsciousness in death, the second coming of Christ to give life to his saints, etc., are truths. Although, as yet, I cared little for truth, and had no conception of its glory and power, yet thoughts upon the subject would throng on me. I saw that it is not true that mankind are exposed to eternal torment. That it was not to save man from such an incomprehensibly horrible condition that God introduced the redemption scheme. Then understood I the meaning of those precious words, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." I began then to comprehend the fact that such a gift merely to save men from going back forever into that nothingness of dust from whence they were taken, could only be prompted by unbounded goodness and mercy. Every vestige of that element with which the torment theory invests the character of God was utterly swept away, and in its stead stood infinite, matchless love. I could now see in the ministrations, the labors, the sufferings of Jesus, and in his great sacrifice on Calvary, exhibitions of love, pure and measureless. A contemplation of such an eternal sovereign of the universe soon brought me to the throne of grace. I could indulge the lusts of the flesh, live at enmity against God, revel in sin, while a theological hell with all its terrors yawned before me, and heed it not. I could behold, unmoved, my ungodly fellow beings stricken down by disease, and dropping, as I believed, one by one, into that awful abyss, but I could not continue to rebel against such a Being as, by the light of truth, I saw God to be. I asked for forgiveness; it was not denied me. I prayed for strength, it was graciously given. Having transferred his affections from things temporal to things spiritual, that young man has now something to devote to others and to God. He loves the society of them who love righteousness and truth, and his daily prayer is that he may be continued in the service of the Lord in some capacity, humble though it be.

Is this the only case of its kind? There are many such now, and there would be myriads were God better known. It is because he is not better known that he is not better loved. He is so completely misrepresented by popular theology that it is as if theologians had set up a false god and called upon men to bow down and worship him. By attributing to the Creator qualities proved by all the revelations of his word to be so many libels, they defame him and debase him before men. As no stream can rise higher than its fountain, so the love of mankind for the God they worship cannot exceed their appreciation of his character. What an awakening and turning of sinners unto Christ would take place were the truth proclaimed instead of those gross errors that are constantly being taught, the dark shadows of whose uncomely forms sicken and repel many noble minds that need only a proper conception of the divine character and dealings with the race to win them in penitence and faithfulness to the cross. This, however, will not be. Christ will come to a sleeping church. The great body of professing Christians neither look for nor desire the Saviour's appearing; and so fondly do they love the delusions they have accepted instead, that few of them may be induced to withdraw their affections. But let us raise high the true gospel banner, and multitudes who are now in ignorance and sin, more than else by reason of the inconsistencies of theology, will be enabled to behold the beauty and the glory of truth, and thus be led, like the young man of whom we have written, to love and serve its Almighty, good, eternal Author. But that our efforts in this direction may be blessed with liberal success, we must ever evince a recognition of the great necessity of a constant exercise of Christ-like humility, kindness and love; so that while we proclaim the truth we may not also repel by our manner of presenting it. If these graces are permitted to adorn our daily lives and shine out in the richness of their beauty in our presentations of truth, its loveliness will surely attract many of the impenitent, and, finding lodgment in their hearts, will lead them to the fountain of life and finally into the kingdom "of our Lord and of his Christ." L. C. T.

The Second Death.

The phrase second death conveys to the mind of most persons, especially those who have been so educated, the idea of dying twice. Now if we can find that the penalty for sin, is to die twice, let us bow to the authority of Scripture, as every honest seeker after truth will: but if no such penalty is announced, shall we add to the Scriptures a penalty which is not threatened?

It has been truthfully said that punishment cannot exceed the threatening without injustice to the guilty party. If the law of the country condemns a guilty man to the punishment of the prison for ten years or a fine of one hundred dollars, it certainly would be unjust to double the penalty of either fine or imprisonment. The man is sentenced to imprisonment for ten years—he serves out the time. Can it be consistent with the penalty of the law to imprison him again another ten years for the same offence? Manifestly it would be unjust. Why? Because the punishment exceeds the penalty of the law. Again—would it harmonize with justice to inflict any portion of the penalty before trial, conviction and sentence? Certainly not. How then can it be seen to be consistent with justice (to say nothing of mercy) to send men to a place of torment for perhaps hundreds of years, and then bring them up from their hell of torment for a trial? And would it be any more reasonable to suppose that God will bring the wicked dead to life again for trial? They are now under the penalty, which is death: to bring them to life again for trial, would seem to imply that possibly there had been a mistake. To our mind it seems more in harmony with reason as well as with revelation that men are having their trial in this life—every day we are making up our account—we are on trial, and at the close of life the account is fully made up—the man has had his trial all along through life and his final condition is determined at death. If in Christ, he sleeps—if out of Christ, he is "CONDEMNED ALREADY;" and consequently has perished—he is dead, and there is no threatening that he shall come to life again to die a second time. Why is it said of the righteous dead, that they sleep? It is because they had a hope of awaking or coming to life again; just as a man who lays down at night to sleep; he hopes or expects to awake in the morning. In the former case it is certain to the Christian, because he has the sure word or promise. Whereas in the latter, he has no promise that he shall awake from his natural sleep.

In the case of wicked—there being no threatening of a second death, nor any of another temporary life and not being in Christ—not having the Spirit which raised Christ from the dead—it is difficult to see how he can be raised to life again to die a second time without a repetition of the penalty.

How then are we to understand the Scriptural phrase "the second death"? Rev, xx., 14 reads, "and death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death." The Syriac reads thus, "This (namely) this lake of fire is the second death." Here then is the idea of the second death—not dying twice, but the lake of fire is the second death. The old world was visited with a universal judgment, viz: the flood, which drowned all its inhabitants then living, except Noah and his family, eight persons in all, who were saved in the ark. This was the first general judgment upon the world and was by water. This was the first death. The second general executive judgment upon the world of the ungodly will be by fire—"This (namely) the lake of fire is the second death." All who are in Christ at that time, and all who sleep in Jesus in the dust of the earth will be saved by being in Christ, the antitype of the ark which saved Noah and his family. This same idea of the first and the second death is conveyed in 2 Pet. iii., 5–7, "By the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water whereby the the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished: But the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and PERDITION of ungodly men."

The word perished must of course apply to the inhabitants of the world that then was—for the world itself did not perish—and seems to convey the same meaning as the word perdition, as applied to the ungodly of this world. See Webster [except his theological definition]. Perished, decayed; wasted away; destroyed: Perdition, Entire loss or ruin; utter destruction, O.

LOVE AND FEAR.

RELIGIONISTS, as a class if we may judge from the style of very many of their efforts when the conversion of sinners is the object sought to be accomplished, well nigh fail to comprehend the respective characters of these two emotions of mind, love and fear. They seem to regard fear as the key that most effectually unlocks the door of love. That they have only to excite that passion to a certain intensity of action and it will immediately awaken love and cause it to unfold in splendor. But this they do only when they seek to make God the supreme object of this affection, love. Suppose a man has a very dear friend who had done him many kindnesses, and lavished upon him munificent gifts. He has a brother whom he desires should become acquainted with this generous friend and to love him as he loves him. Do you think that man would, as the most sure way of attaining the desired end, go to his brother and represent the good friend as vindictive, and thus excite fear of the man? No sane man, barbarous, or civilized, could be induced to pursue so absurd a course. And yet, ministers of the gospel, professing an ardent desire to bring sinners into an acquaintance with God, will go before the people, week after week, and year after year, throughout their period of ministration, ever representing that God will do certain very dreadful things (not found in Scripture testimony) to all who do not come to him; thus arousing a sort of dread of him. Now a mere abject, slavish submission may be compelled, on the part of some individuals, by appealing to the passion of fear, but willing, hearty obedience can only be secured through the influence of love. Cowardly people are sometimes frightened into cold conformity to divine requirements; but if, when the excitement of mind is allayed, they do not return like the sow, "to her wallowing in the mire" to that course from which their love was never really withdrawn, it is because some favoring circumstances enable them to look through the dark, repulsive cloud in which fear enveloped them, and see beyond it some beauty in the Lord that they should desire him.

The utter futility of all attempts at scaring people into effectual obedience has sometimes been painfully apparent even to those who practice them. It is said of a celebrated preacher that once, in a sermon to a crowded audience, he described the terrors of the last judgment and of hell, with such eloquence, pathos, and force of action, that some of his listeners burst into tears and sent forth piercing cries, as if the judge himself had been present, and was about to pass upon them their final sentence. In the height of this commotion, the preacher proposed to them to dry their tears and cease their cries as he was about to add something still more awful and astonishing than anything he had yet delivered to them. Silence being attained he with solemn voice and apparently agitated countenance said: "In one quarter of an hour from this time, the emotions which you have just now exhibited will be stifled; the remembrance of the fearful truths which excited them will vanish; you will return to your carnal occupations, or sinful pleasures, with your usual avidity, and you will treat all that you have heard, as a tale that is told." Few, perhaps, of all the things that preacher said upon the occasion alluded to, were as true as his language just quoted. And well for the glory of God upon the earth that it is so. When men are not content to preach the truths of revelation, counting them too mild and kind to serve their purposes, but fall back upon human invention, ransacking heathen philosophy, for assistance, and calling to their aid the vilest errors of tradition, it is neither strange nor lamentable that sinners should forget what they hear and "treat it as a tale that is told." It were well could they forget all the theological nonsense that is constantly being presented to them under the guise of truth. Had the reverend gentleman pointed out to his hearers the two conditions, life and death; showed them that one is inevitable unless they accepted the gift of the other, upon the terms proposed, and extolled the infinite goodness displayed in redemption; his utterances might have been enshrined in their memories, as "thoughts that breathe and words that burn."

Dr. Adam Clark writes: "He who is ever preaching the terrors of the law and representing God as a vindictive judge, will never bring sinners to him. They are afraid of this terrible God." We agree with the learned Doctor as to the folly of representing God as a vindictive judge, but deny that preaching what terrors there are in the law repels sinners, for, as the law was given in love, a proper understanding of it will enable us to realize the extent of our necessities and thus serve to lead us to Christ. Of course, the Doctor believed that eternal torment is an ingredient in the "terrors of the law" but the fact that that doctrine does excite in the minds of the impenitent a dread of him whom they are taught to regard as its author is one of the strongest proofs of its falsity to be found outside of revelation. But what shall we say of the judgment and faithfulness of that man who, believing men to be exposed to endless misery, allows considerations of policy to restrain him from proclaiming it? If any seriously believe the doctrine, they ought to go into the crowded thoroughfares and cry it aloud to all passers-by, as were the fearful judgments threatened upon Nineveh.

Love and fear are directly opposite in their effects. The former always attracts, the latter always repels. So, as God is love, no doctrine in which his goodness is not incorporated, can have any connection with the gospel message, for that is all glad tidings, good news. Love is an affection of the mind, excited by worth of any kind, or by those qualities of an object which communicate pleasure. Thus, love of God is awakened by just views of his attributes, or recognition of the excellencies of his character. He, by revelation, brings these within the scope of our comprehension, and teaches us to know ourselves, that, finding our need of redemption, we may no longer trust in ourselves, but hasten to lay hold on the hope which he has set before us in the gospel. One of the most potent reasons, perhaps, why so many people evince carelessness and unconcern respecting their future is found in the fact that modern theology has inspired them with false hopes. Hence, effectual and successful preaching consists in showing men, from the inspired word, what they are, what their nature, whither inevitably tending, and the means of escape. Informed in these particulars, their false reliances dissipated, they will bow to the will of God, gladly accept the offer extended in illimitable love, fly to him who has become the "author of eternal salvation," and at his hand drink of the sweet waters of life from the boundless ocean of infinite mercy. If the truths of the gospel are preached, they will carry with them convictions of the excellencies of divine attributes, and excite in the minds of hearers a love toward God strong enough to draw them to the throne of grace.

WILL NAPOLEON FIGHT?

BISMARCK is uniting South Germany with the great Confederation, and with quiet determination seizing what would be in the case of war a great military position in the South.

One of those mysterious pamphlets "by a great personage," which have several times made their appearance before the occurrence of important events, has added to the political confusion in France within the month. In this pamphlet, called "The Final War," the writer asserts that France must acquire Belgium and the Rhine boundary; war, he thinks, is inevitable:

"Thus the alliance or the return of Belgium to France and the restoration of the Rhine provinces are the conditions of universal peace; otherwise war—and war soon—but it will be the last—is inevitable. To those who doubt it, it will suffice to put this question—Can the Emperor Napoleon, with his name, his antecedents, his writings, his words deliberately uttered, tranquilly witness Prussia absorbing all the old states of Germany, and keeping in her hands the keys of France? Could any other government, save his, undergo that humiliation, and would the country, were the question put to it, give its assent? On the other hand, can it be believed that Prussia is disposed to kindly give us back our national limits—Prussia, which contemplates taking from us Lorraine and Alsace? But, if things are to be so, is it not evident that war is one of the necessities of the situation? What will be the pretext, or who shall strike the first blow? Pretexts are never wanting to two people facing each other and determined to fight. Were there no Luxemburg question there are those of Schleswig and the southern states. A simple movement of troops or a change of garrison on the frontier suffices. Then the cannons go off themselves, and often on both sides at once. What is clear is that the present situation is not tenable, either as regards commercial affairs or policy, and that on both banks of the Rhine will soon be heard the fatal cry, 'It must be put an end to!'"

Bismarck, evidently, does not mean to fight unless he is attacked—he can accomplish all he desires without war; and therein he has a great advantage. But in Germany, as in France, it seems men expect war. An intelligent correspondent of the Spectator, writing from Frankfort on "South German public opinion," remarks: "I have spoken with many persons in South Germany, but have not met with one who ventured to hope that war would be long delayed." It is pretty certain, however, that, if it begins, it will find the Prussians prepared, and far stronger than they were a year ago.

Does Napoleon any longer control events in Europe? Is he not rather like a boy trying to steer a boat floating down the rapids? He jerks the bow one way and another, and turns her head now up stream, now across the current; but he does not alter the drift—he can neither stop her headway nor change her course. It would seem that Napoleon is at last as helpless as this in Europe. What can he do, except create a panic among the stock-jobbers? If he makes himself the guardian of the Pope, he commits an absurdity which even he must know will only place him in a false and ridiculous position; if he fights Prussia, he begins a war which he cannot stop as he did the Italian war after Solferino; if he stands still and lets other nations take care of themselves, the French will become discontented.—Selected.

HOW TO GIVE.

AT a missionary meeting held among the negroes in the West Indies, these three resolutions were agreed upon:

1. We will all give something.
2. We will all give as God has enabled us.
3. We will all give cheerfully.

As soon as the meeting was over, a leading negro took his seat at a table, with pen and ink, to put down what each came to give. Many came forward and gave, some more, and some less. Among those that came was a rich old negro, almost as rich as all the others put together, and threw down upon the table a small silver coin. "Take dat back again," said the negro that received the money, "dat may be according to de first resolution, but is not according to de second." The rich old man, accordingly took it up, and hobbled back to his seat again in a great rage. One after another came forward, and as almost all gave more than himself, he was fairly ashamed of himself, and again threw down a piece of money upon the table, saying, "Dare; take dat!" It was a valuable piece of gold; but it was given so ill-temperedly, that the negro answered again, "No! dat won't do yet! It may be according to de first and second resolution, but it is not according to de last:" and he was obliged to take up his coin again. Still angry at himself and all the rest, he sat a long time, till nearly all were gone, and then came up to the table, and with a smile on his face, and very willingly, gave a large sum to the treasurer. "Very well," said the negro, "dat will do; dat according to all de resolutions."—Selected.

WORK OF THE SPIRIT.

THE mightiest forces in the universe are silent forces. Who ever heard the budding of an oak? Who was ever deafened by the falling of the dew? Who was ever stunned by a solar eclipse? So it is with the august phenomenon of a change of heart. So far as we know, it is the most radical change a human being can experience in this life. It is a revolutionary change. Still a change of heart is not an unnatural change. It is not necessarily even destruction of self-possession. God employs in it an instrument exquisitely adjusted to the mind of man as an intelligent and free being. Truth may act in it with an equipoise of forces as tranquil as that of gravitation in the orbits of the stars.

No, it is not of necessity a tumultuous experience to which God calls us, when he invites us to be saved. By what emblem has the Bible expressed the presence of the Holy Spirit. Is it an eagle? "And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending like a dove." "Come," is the select language of inspiration; "come, and I will give you"—what? a shock, the rack, a swoon? No; "I will give you—rest." "Come, and ye shall find"—what? struggle, terror, torture? No; "ye shall find—peace." "Come ye"—come who? "Let him that is athirst come: And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

Letters and Extracts.

FROM CLAMOR FRANKE.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Oct. 21, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I send herewith $6; for which send me Tracts, as herein named.

I feel aroused more than ever, in view of the ignorance that prevails among Christians with regard to our views, to distribute among them our publications. The glorious doctrine of "Life only in Christ," must not be hidden under a bushel in this city. It deserves to be made prominent, and to this end I intend, with the help of God, to devote some of my time and means in the future. I shall commence with the Ministers, of the different Christian denominations, first. Many of them have already been the recipients of my tracts and papers, but as far as I know they have studiously avoided all reference to the views therein set forth. I shall call their attention again to this subject, and then go to work among their church members to distribute our tracts. I want to prepare the way for our dear Brother Wendell, and lay out some work for him to do here when he visits us this coming Winter. He must not pass us by in his travels out West. Cincinnati is not without bigots and sinners, and they too have need to be enlightened, and to be instructedin the way of life.

I shall only be too happy to extend a cordial welcome to this dear brother, and so able a defender of the Life Gospel.

He may rest assured that we will do all we can to make him comfortable while he stays among us; and if something more is needed, we shall not be behind in that either.

FROM MRS. M. A. COUILLARD.

SWANVILLE, ME., October 13, 1867.

BRETHREN AND SISTERS: I am still trying to do my Master's will, and longing for that rest that remains for the people of God. The Lord has truly been good to me, and I will praise his blessed name. I have passed through some severe trials, but thank God, I have found his grace sufficient thus far, and I always expect to, as long as I am walking in the straight and narrow way, and I can say with the poet:

When friends that once I love! so well,
Leave me alone to sigh,
This hope bids me rejoice and sing,
For my redemption's nigh.

Blessed thought! Our trials and afflictions are almost over, and we shall soon exchange the cross for the crown. Let us gird on the armor anew and fight the good fight of faith, that we may lay hold on eternal life. The Master is soon coming, and what we do we must do quickly. God grant that we who profess to be looking for the Lord may be separate from the world and its fashions; for we must be unspotted from the world. I care not what the world may say or think of me, if I can only know that my ways please God; for, if we live godly we shall suffer persecution, and I am willing to; and if we suffer with him we shall also reign with him; but if we deny him he will also deny us. Let us also stand up boldly for Jesus, and show to the world that we are not ashamed of him who has done so much for us, who has suffered and died that we might live eternally in the kingdom soon to be given to all the faithful ones.

My longing heart cries out, O come!
Creation groans for thee;
The weary pilgrim sighs, O come!
Bring immortality!

This is the language of my heart. There is no true happiness in this life but in the service of God. Truly, if in this life only we have hope, we are of all men most miserable. But we have hope beyond this vale of tears; for Jesus is soon coming to make up his jewels and gather all his children home, and we shall be made like Jesus, and our bodies fashioned like his glorious body; then we shall reign on the new earth forever, then we shall behold all those dear loved ones who have so long been sleeping in the cold ground. Lord help me to live in constant readiness, so that when he who is our life shall appear, I may appear with him in glory. Your sister in Christ.

FROM WILLIAM MUNGER.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS, Oct. 19, 1867.

BR. STORRS: Allow me, with others, to give expression to the thankfulness which I feel for the weekly visits of the HERALD OF LIFE. To say nothing of the doctrines so ably presented and clearly set forth, how my poor heart is cheered and comforted while I read the letters written by the dear ones who are scattered all over the land. It seems to me, while reading these letters, as though the brethren and sisters were even here present with me, although so many miles intervene between the writers and readers of those precious letters. What a blessing that such a paper is published, especially to those who love the doctrine of Life only in Christ, and have no other preacher. I think when I read their letters, all of which express so much love for the blessed doctrine, which to me is the finishing touch to all Christian experience. How I wish those dear brethren could sit under that kind of preaching, as it is my privilege to do from week to week; and that too in the Methodist church, strange as it may appear to many of the readers of the HERALD. Thank the Lord, there is one man who is not so trammelled as to fear to preach it.

D. J. ELLSWORTH, Windsor, Conn., writes: I am getting to like your paper very much. I tell my friends if non-resurrection of the wicked is truth, it is the dearest truth that has been proclaimed since Christ was on the earth.

CATHERINE C. WILLIAMS, Butler, Mo., writes: I am glad to see the respectable array of names and pledges for sustaining the HERALD OF LIFE. O that all from the least to the greatest might so rise as to comprehend the import of these simple words, "Herald of Life," and then, better still, live the meaning of them. I am sure there is a good degree of realization of it, or such figures would not appear attached to so many names, among whom I noticed my aged mother, C. Colver, of Alford, Mass. It is not to a view of worldly gain that the investment is made, I am sure; though I have no doubt it will pay better than most others, in the end; and no doubt it was done with an eye to the riches in store gained by him who became so poor, to secure them to those who should be wise enough to accept them. May their number increase.

W. S. OLMSTED, Hartford, Conn., writes: The Tract Fund grows so slowly, I feel impelled to send another $5 for that object.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We would be glad if our friends all felt the importance of "that object" We must, of necessity, be cramped in our labor in that cause unless the matter is taken more thoroughly in hand. We know, of course, that the friends have put forth a strong exertion to sustain the paper; but are there not others who can bring up the Tract Fund, so as to have the amount filled, as was that for the HERALD? We trust it soon will be.

BARNET MATTHIAS, Armonk, N. Y., asks: Would it not be a good measure to send the HERALD OF LIFE to as many as a thousand preachers of the sects, gratuitously, for six months? I will aid in the matter. That suggestion to advertise is a capital one. I will gladly do what I can to help in this matter.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We would be glad to have the paper sent to any minister who would pay the postage and read it; but if many should accept the offer we should need more funds than are yet pledged; yet we would willingly make a beginning with any ministers who would do as we have suggested. Let it not be sent to any who do not wish it; for that is only to annoy them and subject us to trouble. As to advertising, we conclude the idea is not acceptable to our friends, as only two have responded to it, and neither of them with funds.

CHARLES H. SUTTON, Manayunk, Pa., writes: The paper improves both in matter and appearance. If it continues as it has begun (which I think it will), we will find no fault with a "narrow margin."

NOTE BY EDITOR.—We are still obliged to use the "narrow margin," though with continued regret.

THE COMING CRISIS.

WHAT, still another crisis? many will say. Yes dear reader, nothing can be more sure than still another crisis, and such an one as will throw all that has gone before in our world's history quite in the shade. Verily this is the very thing of which "God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." . . .

There is, at the present time, a host of the wise and good, scattered over the whole world, who are earnest students of prophecy, learned, humble, and honest persons, who claim that we are now living in the "time of the end," when, according to the word of God, by the mouth of the prophet Daniel, there shall be such light on what was before "closed up and sealed," that the wise should understand when these things should come to pass, even the completion, when the blessed shall come to the thousand three hundred five and thirty days, when Daniel will stand in his lot with them. Yes, a host of watching, praying ones, believe that we are very nearly there, and that the next great event in our world's history will be the coming and kingdom of our Lord, when the righteous dead shall be quickened, and the living changed in a moment and "caught up to meet the Lord in the air." Surely none who are prepared can object, and those who are not prepared, as in the days of Noah and Lot, have grave objections, for they are not ready. But what if he does not come? Still watch and wait, as when some dear and most valuable earthly friend did not come just when expected; let the desire become more intense, as with the bride expecting her lord; surely in his return is our only hope. Long and weary ages have proved this true.

What a world ours still is—how abortive are human efforts when put forth to regulate and cure its evils. We need no revelation to teach us that the curse rests upon it. The power of evil is everywhere in the ascendant. The pestilence walks abroad at noon and night. Earth's history is still written in blood and tears—its constant dirge, wails, sighs and groans. Mildew blights, and the insect makes the avails of the tiller's toil precarious. Perishing in want, and neglected, many lie down and die. The dominion of man has long since departed, and the beast rises up in rebellion against his former ruler. Everywhere we see where lie the dead, and death sways his sceptre over the universal empire. Indeed it would seem that all with one accord should ever pray, "Even so come, Lord Jesus."—Northern Independent.

POVERTY OF SPIRIT.—A man must be emptied of himself, in order that he may be filled with the blessing of the gospel. He must become poor in spirit, in order that he may become rich in faith, and a partaker of the kingdom of Heaven. Blessed, therefore, is the man who thinks meanly of himself, and highly of his Maker and Redeemer. Blessed is the man who walks humbly with his God and is also humble toward his fellow creatures. Blessed is the man who both feels and manifests this poverty of spirit. This temper may not exalt him in the eye of the world, but it is the temper befitting his condition—it is a temper honorable to God, and truly beneficial to his fellow-creatures. It is the temper which Christ has pronounced to be characteristic of the Christian.—Thornton.

THE late Prof. Moses Stuart, a learned Biblical scholar and critic, gave this testimony to the general correctness of our version of the Scripture: "Out of some eight hundred thousand various readings of the Bible that have been collated, about seven hundred and ninety-five thousand are of just about as much importance to the sense of the Greek and Hebrew Scriptures, as the question in English orthography is, whether the English word honour shall be spelled with a u or without it. Of the remainder some change the sense of particular passages or expressions, or omit particular words or phrases, but no one doctrine of religion is changed, not one precept is taken away, not one important fact is altered by the whole of the various readings collectively taken."

WOULD to God that all the party names and unscriptural phrases and forms which have divided the Christian world were forgotten; and that we might all agree to sit down together as humble, loving disciples at the feet of our common Master, to hear his word, imbibe his spirit, and to transcribe his life in our own.—John Wesley.

AVERSION TO SIN.—I want you to have a holy aversion to sin. Do you know what I mean by aversion? Suppose any one of you were to put your hand in your pocket and feel a toad there, you would draw it out instantly, from your aversion to the animal. Now my desire is, that when conscious of sin, you should have just such an aversion as this to it—a hatred of it, and disgust at its horrid nature.—Rowland Hill.

TRIALS IN THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.—The more difficulties one has to encounter, within and without, the more significant and the higher in inspiration his life will be. The very troubles that others look on with pity, as if he had taken up a kind of piety more perilous and burdensome than was necessary, will be his fields of victory, and his course of life will be just as much happier as it is more consciously heroic. He has something great to live for, nay, something worthy even to die for, if he must—that which makes it glorious to live, and not less glorious to die.—Dr. Bushnell.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Mr. Andrew Johnson recommends that the American people set apart and observe Thursday, Nov. 28, as a day of National Thanksgiving.

The Italian Government, it seems, has shrunk from the responsibility of again arresting Garibaldi. At least, while his movements toward Rome were so well known that they were, day by day, announced by the telegraph all through Europe, the Government this time seems to have preferred to ignore them. Thus, the old hero has marched at the head of new bands of volunteers into the Papal States, where his presence seems to have at once produced a great change. In two lines—it seems, from the north and from the center—the volunteers have advanced upon Rome, pushing back before them the Papal troops. They have recaptured Bagnorea, where, some days ago, the hottest battle of this revolution was fought. Garibaldi himself has reached Monte Rotondo, which is only a few miles from Rome. Alarmed at the new turn of things, Louis Napoleon has ordered the French fleet to embark for the Papal States. The next few days must now bring the solution.

The Government of China seems again to be endangered by the progress of rebellion. The formidable insurrection of the Taepings, which had been devastating China for more than ten years, was almost ended by the capture of Nanking and the death of its chief, in 1865; but other rebellions, and especially that of the Nein-pei, or Northern rebels, have, with varying success, ever since been going on. A Cable dispatch informs us that these rebels have just gained a great victory over the Imperialist troops, and that Pekin is considered in danger. The capture of Pekin might lead to great changes in the administration, or even to a division of the vast empire, but would hardly affect the commercial relations which have of late been established between China and foreign nations.

BUSINESS MATTERS.

One Dollar each from—Caroline M. Jaques, Alvah Libby, Geo. H. Fisher, Francis Babcock, Madison Weaver, Geo. W. Gompf.

Two Dollars each from—Persis O. Ingalls, D. J. Ellsworth, Cicero Roberts, Hannah Webster, Joseph Howland.

Poetry.

Trust in God, and do the Right.

Courage, brother, do not stumble,
 Though thy path be dark as night;
There's a star to guide the humble:
 "Trust in God and do the right."

Let the road be rough and dreary,
 And its end far out of sight,
Foot it bravely, strong or weary,
 "Trust in God and do the right."

Perish, policy and cunning!
 Perish, all that fears the light!
Whether losing, whether winning,
 "Trust in God and do the right."

Trust no party, sect, or faction;
 Trust no leaders in t e fight;
But in every word and action,
 "Trust in God, and do the right."

Trust no lovely forms of passion:
 Fiends may look like angels bright;
Trust no custom, school, or fashion,
 "Trust in God, and do the right,"

Simple rule, and safest guiding,
 Inward peace and inward might,
Star upon our path abiding,
 "Trust in God, and do the right."

Some will hate thee, some will love thee,
 Some will flatter, some will slight;
Cease from man, and look above thee,
 "Trust in God, and do the right."

Children's Department.

A Nice hiding-Place.

A TRUE STORY.

One morning I went to my pleasant school-room, and found many vacant seats. Two little scholars who had been with us a few days before now lay cold in death, and others were very sick. The diphtheria had entered our village and our school. The children were weeping bitterly as I went in, and some of them ran quickly to me, saying: "O teacher! Minnie and Georgie are dead. What shall we do? Do you think we shall be sick and die?"

I touched the bell gently as a signal for the opening of the school, and when they had all taken their seats, I said:

"Children, you are all alarmed at the approach of this terrible disease. You sorrow for the death of your mates, and fear that you too may be taken. Many of you have asked me: 'What shall we do?" I know of but one way to escape this trouble, and that is to hide from it. If you will listen, I will read you of a hiding-place."

All listened eagerly, while I read the ninety-first Psalm. I made no comments, but in a few words asked that the Comforter would carry his message to their hearts. They all seemed hushed by the sweet words of the Psalmist, and the morning lessons went on as usual.

At noon, a sweet little girl named Lizzie, came to me, and said: "Teacher, are you not afraid of the diphtheria?" "No," I answered. "Well, wouldn't you, if you thought you would be sick and die?" "No, dear, I trust not." Lizzie stopped her questioning, and looked me full in the face for some minutes, with thoughtful, wondering eyes, then her face brightened a little. "Oh! I know now," she said. "I know why you are not afraid. You are hiding under God's wings. Oh! what a nice place to hide! I thought of that as you read the chapter. I wish I could hide there too: then I should not be afraid of the diphtheria or anything else. Is there room for me too!"

"Yes, Lizzie," I said, "room for you and for every one who wishes to come. Oh! he longs so much more than you can think to hide you in his arms, to clasp you to his heart, to wash out your sins in his own blood. Used as he is to the music of heaven, with its choirs of ten thousand of thousands, yet it will be far sweeter in his ears to hear your childish voice whispering: 'Jesus, thou art my hiding-place.' Will you not say with your whole heart those precious words?" A soft "I will" was her only answer; but I trust at that glad hour Lizzie sought and found the shelter of her Saviour's wing.—Central Presbyterian.

Knocking Away Props.

"See, father," said a lad who was walking with his father, "they are knocking away the props from under the bridge; what are they doing that for? Won't the bridge fall?"

"They are knocking them away," said the father, "that the timbers may rest more firmly upon the stone piers, which are now finished."

God often takes away our earthly props that we may rest more firmly upon him. God sometimes takes away a man's health, that he may rest upon him for his daily bread. Before his health failed, though he perhaps repeated daily the words "Give us this day our daily bread," he looked to his own industry for that which he asked of God. That prop being taken away, he rests wholly upon God's bounty. When he receives his bread he receives it as the gift of God.

God takes away our friends that we may look to him for sympathy. When our affections were exercised upon objects around us, when we rejoiced in their abundant sympathy, we did not feel the need of divine sympathy. But when they were taken away, we felt our need of God's sympathy and support. We were brought to realize that he alone could give support, and form an adequate portion for the soul. Thus are our earthly props removed, that we may rest firmly and wholly upon God.

Judge Halsted and his Devil.

In the Herald of Life for June 12, we are given, by Judge Halsted, a most unique derivation of the word "devil." A. G. M. has entered his caveat, and now the Judge deigns to grant a three-column reply.

Let us notice the invention which the Judge seeks to patent. "Devil is a mongrel word compounded from the Latin and Italian de, of, and the English word evil. The Italian mode of expressing of evil would be de'evil, of the evil; but two vowels here come together; let one be struck out; also strike out the apostrophe, and you have devil, devil." This we believe is a plain, concise and just statement of his claim.

But others have laid claims to inventions of the derivation or etymology of this word devil. A. G. M. gives its derivation as from the Latin diabolus; whereupon the Judge says, "Nay, there is no such Latin word as diabolus."

At this point let us take up the Judge's denial and subsequently his affirmation. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." John viii., 32.

I. The Denial. "There is no such Latin word as diabolus, and accordingly, diabolus is not given in Ainsworth's Latin and English dictionary." [First page, 21 lines from the bottom of the first column.]

We accept the statement with respect to his dictionary, but on page 254 of our Freund's Leverett's Lexicon we find "Diabolos (diabolus), i. m. the devil." And, with respect to its being a Latin word, were we not astonished at his denial when, on taking up our Latin Bible, we opened to Matt. xiii., 39, and read "Inimicus autem, qui seminavit ea, est diabolus?" (E. V.) "The enemy that sowed them is the devil." Again Luke viii., 12, "Deinde venit diabolus, et tollit verbum de corde eorum, ne credentes salvi fiant." (E. V.) "Then cometh the devil, and taketh away the word out of their hearts, lest they should believe and be saved." Again 1 Peter v., 8, "Adversarius vester diabolus tamquam leo rugiens circuit, quaerens quem devoret." (E. V.) "Your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour." Also diabolus occurs, with this form, in John vi., 70, xiii., 2, 1 John iii., 8, Rev. ii., 10, xii., 9–12, xx., 2. Specially notice that it is diabolus, in Rev. xii., 9, which deceiveth the whole world: "diabolus, qui seducit universum orbem."

With these quotations before him, if Judge Halsted can say, "There is no such Latin word as diabolus," he can say with equal propriety, "there is no such thing as a Latin word." My quotations are taken from "Biblia Sacra, vulgatæ editionis, Sixti v. et Clementis viii.," and not from the many other Latin versions. To the Judge, I have no doubt, the Vulgate will be "good authority."

But I anticipate an objection of the Judge, in saying that diabolus is an adopted word for the Greek diabolos. But, your honor, is not "theater" an English word though it is adopted from the French "theatre?" And is "glacier" less an English word because we took it from the French "glaciere?" I trow not.

A. Gill has given devil a derivation from diabolus, and diabolus from the Greek diabolos. But, says our learned Judge, "Will A. Gill tell us from what original root devil is derived;" not from any medial root, for this will not satisfy him. We must go down to the very beginnings of things; and therefore says, very complacently, "I presume we are to go to the Hebrew, the original—for the original root." Right here our learned friend strikes his great error. He makes a presumption which he has no right to make. Why should he claim that we must go back to the Hebrew? and why should he claim for devil any more than for pig that we must seek a Hebrew origin? No! we go back to the Greek and that is far enough. Here then we rest. Diaballein, diabolos, diabolus, (Goth.) diabulus, (Sw.) diefwul, (Old High Ger.) diufal, tiufal, (New High Ger.) teufel, (Dan.) diavel, (A. S.) deofl, deofol, deoful, divell, devil. There are other cognate words, or words springing from the same source: (Icel.) diofull, difill, (Fr.) diable, (Sp.) diablo, (It.) diavolo, (Pg.) diabo, (Provencal) diabol, etc., etc.

We find Chaucer giving the word devil with the same meaning now applied to it by the orthodox.

> Yet women woll her bodies sell,
> Soch soules goeth to the devill of helle.
> Romaunt of the Rose.

And Wiclif says, "Ye ben of the fadir the deuel."

II. We come secondly to the Judge's affirmation concerning the word devil. Let us notice his "constituent elements" of this "mongrel word" devil. De and evil. We have carefully examined all the Italian books in our possession, including dictionary, Bible, readers, grammars, and fail to find the very first "element" of his "mongrel word," viz., de. According to his use of the word de it must be a preposition, but there is no preposition de in Italian.

There is a preposition di, but no de. There is a masculine singular definite article il, of which the genitive is del or dello, and dell' before a vowel. If then Judge H. wishes to compound an Italian and an English word, he must use the following method: di-evil, or dell'-evil. Let him choose the one most fitting, and it will not give him his devil by any legitimate method of contraction.

A professor of modern languages in a New England college, for over 25 years, gives me the following written statement: "In reference to your interrogatory about an Italian preposition 'de,' I reply, This preposition is Latin, and not Italian, for in the latter language it is 'di.' True, in the genitive singular of the definite article il we have del, and in the plural dei, or de' abbreviated, meaning "of the," from which one might infer that these contractions were for de il—del, and for de i—dei, de,' or della, delle for de la, de le (of the, gen. sing. and pleu. fem.) but this is not the case, inasmuch as de is never used alone, not being really an Italian word, but a Latin preposition, for which the Italian uses the equivalent di, except apparently only in contractions like the above mentioned."

Our learned friend goes a step farther than one of mere derivation or composition, and tells us that "devil" and "devils" in the forty-eight places of the New Testament "mean diseases, it may be that the word is used for very bad diseases." "The word." What word? Does it mean daimon? Certainly not, for this is used only in five instances. Does he mean daimonion? Certainly not, for this is used in sixty instances. Does he mean diabolos? But diabolos is used only thirty-eight times, not forty-eight. We are therefore in the dark as to the word intended. But possibly it is not a Greek word referred to, but the English word devil or devils. I turn to my concordance, and under the word "devil" find forty-eight texts cited. Surely I am on the right track at last. But the same Concordance gives thirty texts for the word "devils." Now, since Judge H. claims that forty-eight times in the New Testament the words devil, devils, (both) mean "very bad diseases," he must claim that both diabolos and daimonion, in the original, mean "very bad diseases;" and at this point I utterly deny the statement, on the ground of the absurdity of a translation which should render diabolos and daimonion into the English "very bad diseases." For instance: Matt. iv., 1 (the first instance in which diabolos occurs), "Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted (hupo tou diabolou), of very bad diseases." Again: Luke iv., 5, "And the very bad disease, (ho diabolos,) —showed unto him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time." This disease must have been the nightmare! Again John vi., 70, "Jesus answered them, Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a (diabolos) very bad disease?" John viii., 44, "Ye are of your father the (tou diabolou) very bad disease." James iv., 7, "Resist the very bad disease (to diabolo) and he will flee from you." Or, as Judge H. would have it, perhaps, "Get a right smart doctor and you won't be sick long." We ask solemnly, Is it right for us to translate Scripture in such a manner as to give trivial or vulgar ideas, when the context demands the purest exaltation of thought? Nay! Nay!

But the Judge may say that I have given no text in which the original Greek is daimon or daimonion. Let me give one of each, samples of many. 1. Rev. xvi., 14, "They are the spirits of very bad diseases (daimonion) working miracles," etc. 2. 1 Tim. iv., 1, "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of (daimonion) very bad diseases." Is Judge H. departing from the faith?

Verily we are in the latter times and are listening to the "doctrines of very bad diseases."

The doctrine of the "Personality of the Devil" is receiving very faithful treatment from an M. D.; why may not the doctrine of the "derivation of the word devil" be questioned by an A. M.?

We hope the learned Judge will expound the law of derivation again, and perhaps he will be led to modify the statements of page 464 "Theology of the Bible."

"Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." 1 Thess. v., 21 D.

Note by the Editor.—The writer of the foregoing is a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, in Massachusetts. We have delayed publishing it for two reasons; one of which was, it seemed to us his attempt at display, on the phrase "bad diseases," was an attempt at ridicule, which was unwarranted. We have concluded to let him speak as he likes, and Judge Halsted can reply if he chooses.

Ye Must be Born Again.

Br. Storrs: I am glad to see so many spirited articles on the doctrine of the devil. I hope that the subject will be thoroughly tested, and the true doctrine of the devil brought out.

Like unto many other doctrines, they want trying by the spirit of truth, the word of God. Take for instance the doctrine of the new birth; it is reduced by the church to mere Christian experience: and, accordingly, consists in a moral change of character, which takes place at the event they call conversion; and according to their theology mean one and the same thing.

I consider the doctrine of the new birth to be exclusively applicable to the introduction into the world to come. As proof of this we will consider the nature of that new birth through which the Lord Jesus Christ passed, and which will be found to be so intimately connected with the new birth of the saints, that to ascertain the nature of the one we must necessarily understand that of the other.

Again we remark, that as Adam was the first man whom God created in the present world, so Jesus Christ, the second Adam, is declared to be the first man whom he created of the inhabitants of the world to come. This truth is conveyed in the following language in relation to Jesus Christ, thus, "Who is the beginning of the creation of God" (Rev. iii., 14); which we shall find to be the new creation. The apostle speaking of the order of the resurrection of the dead, gives Christ the precedence, he being the first of that resurrection, upon whom God conferred immortality.

That this act was done at his resurrection, the following testimony proves: "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you." (Rom. viii., 2.) Again, speaking of Christ being in the grave, the apostle says, "His soul," or himself, "was not left it hell, neither" did his flesh "see corruption." (Acts ii., 27.) Here, then, it is positively stated, that Jesus Christ himself was mortal, and that he was dead and buried. All, therefore, that is included in the term Jesus Christ, actually lay in the grave, dead; and also, he was raised from the dead; not by his own power, but by the power of the Spirit of God; and that as he, being mortal, and having been quickened, or brought to life by the Spirit of God, it must have rendered him what he was not before, immortal. These are plain, and indeed unavoidable facts, and cannot be evaded by saying that it was nothing but his body which lay in the tomb.

We said that, in the order of the resurrection Christ had the precedence. This may be seen by such passages as the following: "But every man in his own order; Christ the first fruits, afterwards, those that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end," etc. He is also declared to be "the first-born among many brethren." And again it is said, that Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead." Again, "Now the God of peace, who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, that great shepherd of the sheep," etc. Thus it is clear that he had the precedence of the first resurrection, and also, that it was not accomplished by his own native energy, which indeed would have been an impossibility; for how could a dead man put forth any act whatever; much less that power and skill requisite to raise the dead? And, more especially, to raise himself from the dead. We are aware that he declared, while living, that he had power to lay down his life and to take it again; but we have no account of his ever having exerted that power; but on the contrary, the apostle charges his murder on the Jews, and which we have also seen he did not exercise in the event of his resurrection. But his second life, or birth, was as much the work of God as he was begotten by the power of the highest at his first birth. This introduced him into mortal life, and the second birth into immortal and incorruptible life; this being the resurrective life, and is effected by the Spirit of God; it is therefore called a spiritual birth.

We can now appreciate the doctrine of the new birth, brought to view in the conversation between Christ and Nicodemus. In answer to some inquiries he had proposed to Jesus, we have this answer given, "Verily, verily I say unto you, ye must be born again; and except a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God." But Nicodemus did not understand how a man could be born when he was old, and Jesus repeats the assertion, but with additional instruction, thus, "Except a man be born of water [natural birth] and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." And then, admitting the intimation of Nicodemus of a second natural birth being possible, yet it would still be a corrupt composition of flesh and blood; and which, therefore cannot inherit the incorruptible kingdom of God, says he, "For that which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." Thus we have the natural birth, the production of which is corruptible flesh and blood, and the new birth qualifying its possessor as an inhabitant of the kingdom of God, which, as it is said, corruption can not inherit.

Jerusalem.

BY EDNA DEAN PROCTOR.

One approaching Jerusalem at twilight, from the Damascus side, might well exclaim with the Psalmist, "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King." The gray, battlemented walls look massive and venerable in the distance; convent, and tower, and minaret, the cross and crescent shining high, lift themselves above the flat roofs of the streets; and so wondrously clear is the air that distance is lost, and the great dome of the Mosque of Omar appears to rest upon the purple ridge of the Mountains of Moab; nay, if you are high enough to catch a glimpse of the Dead Sea at their base, it will seem as though you might almost cast a stone from your hand into its moveless waters.

In the heart of a bare and comparatively barren country, without any of the bustle and importance of a seaport town, or the activity and verdant beauty of one in the midst of a fertile and flourishing region, Jerusalem is yet the most attractive city on earth. . . . . Blessed is he whose eyes rest upon Jerusalem, yet ruled as it is by the Moslem and tenanted by the Arab, with its rough, uncleanly streets, and its lack of thrift and healthy life. Do not enter the gate if you would preserve your dream unbroken; but turn away while yet the soft light lingers, and in the south the stars begin to glimmer over the fields of Bethlehem.

Perhaps no episode in history has oftener engaged the skill of the artist than Abraham's banishment of Hagar, the woman whom he had taken as his wife, and of Ishmael, her child, his eldest son. One must see the wilderness of Palestine—its naked rocks, its frightful gorges, its sandy wastes, unrelieved by murmur of water or shadow of tree—must feel its burning heat at noon, and its chill by night—in order to appreciate what it was to be thrust forth from the comfort and security of the tent that had been for so many years their home. Terrible indeed they found it, and nigh unto death there were when the angel of God came to their relief. Isaac had parental care and affection, the estates and honors of his father, and a wife carefully chosen from the house of his kinsmen. Hagar and her son, utterly abandoned, were forced to seek desert for shelter and Egypt for love. With these wrongs rankling in his heart, what wonder that Ishmael grew up "a wild man, his hand against every man and every man's hand against him?" Since then how great has been the change. The descendants of the favored son, long ago blotted out as a nation, countryless, nameless, wander as fugitives through the earth; while the children of the outcast, as the sea-waves for multitude, have swept over Palestine like a flood, seizing in the name of their prophet upon the most sacred places, and holding them, century after century, in defiance of both Jew and Christian. To-day, from Dan to Beersheba, it is the full, and rich Arab tongue that greets your ear; to-day it is this dark-browed race that worship on Mount Moriah, and watch over the burial places of Daniel and Solomon at Jerusalum, and the tomb of Joseph, and the well of Jacob, at Shechem; nay, that guard with jealous care—lest some unbeliever profane them—the sepulchers of Isaac and of their father Abraham, in the cave of the field of Machpelah, at Hebron. Exiled, despised, forgotten Hagar! thou art avenged! I would gladly see the Hebrews gathered again in their own land, a people of power; but I would offer, also, for their desert kindred the early prayer of Abraham, "O that Ishmael might live before thee!"

The Arab does not thrive in towns. Ceiled houses and enclosed streets do not suit his free blood. If you would see him at his best estate, go into the remote country where he lives still the simple life of his fathers, the wool of his flock sufficing for his clothing, and their flesh and the milk of his camels for his food. Doubtless he lacks a thousand things that we deem necessary; yet I do not suppose Paris and New York, with their complicated refinements and their bustling eagerness, are dearer to God than are the wide, still pastures dotted with the black tents of the Bedouin. A strong, passionate race they are, with vast capabilities still undeveloped. The creed of the Koran, which was, in many ways, incomparably above their previous faith and morals, has had its reign. On every side they are beginning to feel the influence of that other prophet of their father's house, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and whose dominion endureth unto all generations. Day by day Mecca wanes before Jerusalem; and the hour is surely coming, although it be yet far down the ages, when Isaac and Ishmael will be one in the Son of David.

Meanwhile, nothing is so painful in the Holy City as the dissensions among the various Christian sects, so fierce sometimes in the great Church of the Sepulchre that only the presence of the Moslem officials preserves order. Looking abroad, too, at nations nominally Christian, and that have grown powerful and splendid as a direct effect of Christianity, how low appears their standard of excellence and how poor the service they offer. A few days since I met, en route, a young Belgian of rank and culture, who had traveled extensively and spent much time in the principal cities of Europe. "I wished to see this land," said he; "for, if Christ was God—and I think he was—it is more interesting than any other. Yet I confess that I don't know how to regard what is called Christianity as I have seen it. There is a failure somewhere. In England, one must belong to the church in order to be respectable and gain position. The English live in a sort of slavery to the rules of their church establishment. In France, religion, as a general thing, means pomp, and pageant, and sentiment. In Protestant Germany, the cleverest people trouble themselves very little about it in any way. And in my own country, unlike England, it is not respectable to go much to church; a young man doing so would be set down at once as a fool or a bigot." We had talked for some time, and meanwhile had passed unobserved by him a place he particularly wished to see. "Ah," said he, in his foreign English, and with a shrug of the shoulders, "that is because we spoke too much religion."

In thought I love to turn from the mournful surroundings and solemn impressiveness of Jerusalem to that sunny city set in verdure, Damascus—so old that Adam and Eve may have founded it when hand in hand they wandered out of Paradise in search of a goodly site, and yet so fair and fresh to view, compared to other Oriental towns, that it seems never to have known age or decay. Miles of vineyards, and fruit orchards, and waving grain encircle it on every side, and water as clear as that of the Flume at the White Mountains trickles through its streets and bubbles in its court-yards and squares. Orange and lemon trees droop their clusters in its gardens; pomegranates unfold their flame-colored flowers to the song of the nightingale; Mount Hermon towers above, with its crown of snow. No wonder that to the luxurious Moslem it is a very bower of delight. Damascus and Jerusalem—names by which to divine! The Asiatic shores of the Mediterranean are more fascinating than the European, and these two old cities potent and inspiring above London or Rome.—Independent.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. Moral Depravity; by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. Doom of the Ungodly: or, The Wicked Dead remain eternally under death's dominion. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. The Wages of Sin: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. Letters to a Clergyman; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. Finley, Pittsburg, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for 2 cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our own expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent for 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

THE OBJECT of this paper is to promulgate the truth of "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST:" or, a future life and a resurrection from the dead, are both conditional; and only bestowed at the second advent of Christ, "at the last day."—See our motto.

TERMS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE.

Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar for six months; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York City, 48 cents additional.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658,
NEW YORK.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to GUESS them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE TRUE SOURCE OF LIFE.

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

"FOR as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself." "He that hath the Son, hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life." "And so it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. Howbeit, that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption."—John v., 26; 1 John v., 12; and 1 Corth. xv., 45–50.

The following points present themselves from these portions of Scripture, viz: Unoriginated, independent and endless life resides in God the Father alone. By the gift of the Father, endless life resides in Christ. Adam had not in himself, nor have any of his posperity by generation, or birth, endless life. Endless life, for man, is in Christ alone. This life can only be perfected by a resurrection or translation.

1. Unoriginated, independent, endless life resides in God the Father alone.

Such life must be located somewhere. In the nature of the case we can go no higher to find its source. God appeals to this attribute on solemn occasions, or to confirm his word.—"Truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the LORD." Numb. xiv., 21. "Say unto them as I live, saith the LORD God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked." etc. Here then, we have the highest source of life appealed to; and of necessity, it must be unoriginated and independent.

II. By the gift of the Father, endless life resides in Christ.

This, the first text affirm "As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself." "It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell." Col. i., 19. This fulness of life was not complete till his resurrection; then "death hath no more dominion over him." Rom. vi., 9. "Whom God hath raised up [from the dead], having loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible that he should be holden of it." Acts ii., 24, The anointed Jesus was begotten, or generated, of Mary, by the Holy Spirit of God; and by the same Spirit was he "the first born from the dead." Col. i., 18, and 1 Peter iii., 18; and now "ever liveth," and hath "the power of an endless life." Heb. vii., 16.

III. Adam had not in himself, nor have any of his posterity, by generation, endless life.

The threatening of death is proof of this point. To threaten a being with death who had endless life—or, which is the same thing, had immortality— would show a lack of wisdom which we dare not attribute to the LORD our God.

Exclusion from the tree of life, "lest man should take and eat thereof and live forever," is proof positive he had not endless life in himself. On this point we have the plain, positive testimony of Paul that our proposition is true. We will now examine that testimony as presented in 1 Cor. xv., 45–50. In the 44th verse he says, "There is a natural"—psuchikon—an animal "body," or person; so the term "body" often signifies; and in that sense this apostle uses it in other places. Chap. v., 3, he says, "I, verily, as absent in body," etc., that is personally absent. Again, Heb. x., 10, he says, "We are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." Surely our Saviour "gave himself for our sins." Gal i., 4.

To return. The apostle affirms there is an animal person, and there is a spiritual body, or person. And that he is speaking of the entire person, and not of the body merely, is evident from the following part of his argument; for he adds, "And so it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul." Here is the proof that there is a natural body, or animal person. He appeals "to the law and the testimony," and that records that the first man was made an animal man—a living person: not an immortal soul—he says no such thing,—that would have destroyed his argument, which is proof the first man, or Adam, was liable to corruption. The phrase "living soul," which Paul quotes direct from Genesis ii., 7, never can prove that man had an immortal soul, any more than the same language can prove that all the fowls, fishes, cattle, and creeping things, have such souls; for the same is said of them, Gen. i., 20 and 30, as is said of man, chap. ii., 7. The original, in each of the three cases, is nephesh hayah—living soul: which expression puts the fishes, fowls, cattle, and creeping things, and man, all on a level, as to any natural immortality: one was just as much so as the other, and no more, in himself. The apostle's appeal, therefore, to this account of man's creation, shows that he regarded man, of himself, by creation, as a mere animal man; and this he positively asserts in what follows: for he proceeds to say, "That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural," or animal. Here the apostle does clearly affirm, the first man Adam was not spiritual, but that he was animal. Here is no indication of an immortal soul, or a spiritual nature, as some maintain, but the reverse.

We are perfectly aware that the advocates of an inherent immortal soul will be filled with horror, and cry out—"What! man a mere animal!" Yes, ye who would be "gods," hear it; men are by virtue of their descent from Adam but mere animal beings, though the "father of lies" has tried ever since he tempted mother Eve to make them think they are gods—or, are immortal. "Ye shall not surely die," has ever been his motto: but Paul declares they are natural persons—animal men; and he affirms that to be the testimony of God by Moses.

But let us hear him further. "The first man is of the earth, earthy." Surely this is a fatal blow to those proud hearts who talk of their "spiritual, and immortal nature." Hold! says Paul, "the first man is of the earth, earthy," and "as is the earthy," [natural, or animal] "such are they also that are earthy;" or, such as have their descent from Adam. As a stream naturally can rise no higher than the fountain, so all born of Adam, the first man, are of earthly origin, or are only animal, tending back to earth again like all other animals. A mortifying reflection truly; and proud man—fancying himself a god, and claiming that he has a soul that is "a simple essence, uncompounded, immaterial, indestructible and immortal"—will of course make war on the apostle, just as soon as he sees clearly the drift of his argument. It is truly humiliating, after one has taken the seat of God, and claimed affinity to him in immortality, to be made to know that all this self-exaltation is from the father of lies; and that man is by creation, or generation, only an animal, and destitute of a spiritual nature—that at best, he is only the highest order of animals, with a capacity for the developement of moral qualities and the reception of a spiritual nature through another medium, which we shall soon consider.

The animal man, though his intellect may be developed so as to soar among the stars and tell their magnitude and revolutions, and to search out the secret things hidden in the depths of the earth, yet is, after all but an animal, and will "perish forever like his own dung" [see Job xx., 7,] unless he comes to another source than himself for immortality; for, adds the apostle, "flesh and blood" [i. e. man by natural descent] "cannot inherit the kingdom of God:" and for this plain reason —that kingdom is everlasting, and man by creation or generation has no principle of perpetual existence in him; hence must gain it from some other source, or cease to be in the universe of God like any other mere animal.

To this let us add the fact, that man's dominion was over the animals; which imports, at his creation, he was himself an animal, but of the highest order; otherwise there seems an inappropriateness in the language of Scripture, and in the design expressed in creation. "God said, Let us make man . . . . and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth:" Gen i., 26. Compare this with Psa. viii., 4–8, "What is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him? For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet. All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, the fowl of the air and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea." This goes to show man was in his proper sphere, as ruler over other animals; and that was his standing, till such times as further developments could be made of him, or some other qualities should be added by trial, or otherwise, which should fit him for a higher sphere than that of a mere animal.

Further—That man was a mere animal, though of the highest order, and capable of developments which the subjected animals were not, is evident from his trial. That was the trial of an animal: it related to food—to eating. He was placed in Eden, and bid regale himself, or gratify his nature by eating freely of all the fruits of the garden save one. Of that one he was not to eat; that prohibition related to him as an animal, and was evidently designed to bring out [illegible]ce, a quality which he had not by cre[illegible] because such a quality cannot be created. It is not an entity, nor anything that can be created; it is an attribute, and must be produced by some cause whereby there is trial. Man, at his creation, was capable of no higher trial than that of an animal; so the test was, to eat, or not to eat; that was the test, and was suited to man, as one put in dominion over other animals. By this test, if obedient, he might advance in the scale of being, and approach to the attainment of a spiritual nature, which previously he had not. In the trial he failed, and fell under complete subjection to the animal nature with which he was created; but God provided another medium to bring in a spiritual nature, or to produce a spiritual development; that is, He provided a "second Adam," whose origin was not of the dust of the ground, but heavenly, though united to and become one with "flesh and blood;" for the "Word"—Logos—"was made flesh and dwelt among us;" or because those to be delivered "are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same;" thus taking hold on our animal nature, that we by taking hold on his spiritual nature, by faith might have produced in us a spiritual nature, and thus attain unto holiness, immortality, endless life. This leads us to say—

IV. Endless life for man is in Christ alone.

Thus John speaks in our text, 1 John v., 12, "He that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life." In the previous verse, he affirms, this is the record, [that we are called to "believe," viz:] "that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son:" and he declares the rejection of this record is to make "God a liar." Yet, alas! how many professed Christians—ignorantly, we trust—do deny, in fact, the truth of this record, and claim they have endless life, or, which is the same, immortality, without regard to Christ.

Let us now examine the apostle's argument as to the means by which the spiritual man is produced. He informs us it is by the second Adam. "The last Adam," says he, "was made a quickening spirit"—or life-giving spirit. "That was not the first which is spiritual, but that which is natural," or animal; "and afterward that which is spiritual:" . . . . "the second man is the Lord from heaven," or of heavenly origin. As the first was from the earth, earthy—a mere animal, and not spiritual—so the second is from heaven, begotten by the Spirit of God; so that in him dwelt divine or spiritual life the principle and source of immortality and endless life.

Now we begin to see the need we have of Christ, and the value of him to a perishing world. Whatever intellectual or moral qualities may be manifested by any descendant of Adam the first, there is no approach to a spiritual nature, nor to immortality and endless life, till a union is formed with the second Adam, who is of heavenly origin. Out of Christ there is nothing but corruption and death—extinction of all sense and consciousness, or to perish like the beasts. But in Christ is life and immortality. Refuse and reject him, you perish; utterly, totally, and forever. Come to him—be united to him as the branch to the vine—live upon him by faith, and you are a "new creature"—a "spiritual nature" is developed—the man is begotten of the Spirit, and now has spiritual senses, which he had not before; he now sees spiritual objects; knows and loves God, which he did not before, however much his intellect might have been convinced there was a God. "The natural"—psuchikos—the animal "man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned;" and that discernment he has not, and cannot have, till he has a spiritual nature imparted, which can only be done by a union with Christ, the second Adam, and head of the spiritual creation. Hence, the first thing required by the gospel is, faith in Christ, in order to the new birth and the development of spiritual senses. The highest attainments in what are denominated moral qualities cannot produce this development, nor bring a soul of man out of his mere animal condition, or save him from perishing, unless he is united to the fountain of endless life that God has opened in his Son. A union with Christ or endless death must be the portion of all that proceed from Adam, who was of the earth, earthy. United to Christ, and abiding in him, as the branch abides in the vine, we shall not only have a spiritual nature—or be "partakers of the divine nature"—but our "vile body" will ultimately be changed; for, "as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly," saith Paul. "We"—Who? All men? No. Who then does Paul mean by "we"? He tells us, verse 50, "brethren," and verse 58, "my beloved brethren." This leads us to say—

V. This endless life can only be perfected by a resurrection or translation.

The apostle had clearly stated this fact in the previous part of this chapter, when he said, "If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised;" and of course there is no fountain of endless life; "then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished."

All future life turns on the reality of the resurrection. Without that, all are lost—all are perished who have died and "we, who have hope in Christ, are of all men most miserable;" because now we suffer and deny ourselves such pleasures as mere animal men delight in; and, doing all this in hope of a future and endless life, we are losers, if there is no resurrection of the dead. Yes, saith the apostle, "if the dead rise not, let us eat and drink"—enjoy ourselves as animals—"for to-morrow we die," and that ends all our hope. But, he affirms, the dead will rise, and the living in Christ be changed. "Behold, I show you a mystery,"—a secret—"we shall not all sleep" —or die—"but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." "We." Who? All men? No. The apostle has clearly distinguished between those of whom he speaks and other men, verse 19, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." Thus we see, the apostle means, by "we," a specific class of men, viz: those "in Christ"—or those who by faith are united to Christ. Such, if dead, will be raised incorruptible; or, if living, will be changed to incorruption: "for," he adds, "this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." This is the only way immortality is to be received or that endless life can be perfected; and "so," the apostle continues, "when this corruption shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up of victory." Then is the work perfected, and eternal life is entered on; for they cannot "die any more," but are glorified in their head, "Christ, who is our life."

INFERENCES.

1. Out of Christ, men will utterly perish like the beasts. Having no higher nature than that derived from the first Adam, they are of the earth, earthy—not heavenly—not spiritual—not immortal—no endless life.

2. Those who do have victory over death—who are delivered from its sting, and from its victory—attain this triumph through "our Lord Jesus Christ," and give "thanks to God which giveth us the victory."

3. We who have believed in Christ, and have hope toward God for such deliverance and salvation, have abundant cause to be steadfast and immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as we know our labor is not in vain in the Lord: "the end is life eternal" to all such as "have their fruit unto holiness." Let us endure as seeing Him who is invisible, for "we shall reap in due time, if we faint not."

ONE PENALTY.

WHEN the inhabitants of the old world perished by water, it was the penalty for their sin, especially the sin of unbelief. Disbelieving Noah's preaching, which presented to them the only ground of escape from condemnation, they suffered the consequences of their sin and unbelief. But they were placed under a law to which a penalty was attached; for no law can be binding without a penalty. The law with the penalty was published. Noah preached righteousness—doing right according to the law—they preferred to violate the law, and risk the execution of the penalty. The penalty was executed according to the divine statement. Who escaped? Only Noah and his family. Death followed upon all others. Now, if all the others escaped death, even after having been under it, will they not escape the penalty? It is said natural death is not the penaltp, because the good and the evil die, and the consequence is that all must come out of the grave when the wicked will receive punishment (suffer the penalty) while the righteous shall be rewarded. The fact is, death is the penalty; the going back to the dust was the penalty upon man for sin. But for the sake of argument, admitting the natural death is not the penalty, what follows? These did not suffer natural death. They died under the direct judgment of the Almighty, and thus suffered the penalty of the law which they had violated. Were they ever under another law? Can they be placed under another? Did they ever hear of another penalty? Will they ever hear of another? Not until they come forth in the "resurrection of damnation," or "judgment," when, of course, no time of trial will exist for them.

We are told that the justice of God requires that every man who has died in consequence of sin (for which he is not responsible) must have a resurrection. If so, then every wicked man must be removed from existence again, and under sentence, and sentence signifies law and penalty. What law is he under? What penalty must he suffer?

If the law did not take his life, in the execution of the sentence, then he is not under it; and there is no other that he can be placed under. If it did, then he is under it, and cannot live to be punished again for what he did or failed to do; and there is no other law that he can be placed under, hence, no condemnation by another; for it is manifest that where there is no obligation there can come no condemnation. Sin is the transgression of the law. Justice, therefore, cannot require the resurrection of the sinner; for the act of taking him out of existence the second time would be one of injustice, since he had suffered under the law that he violated, and never been placed under another.

The plan of saving men has other important principles published, since Noah's time, and the most who believe in the dying again of the wicked, believe that fire is the agent of destruction. Water was in Noah's time.

The antediluvians present an example. It will be readily admitted by some that they are an exception to the rule of resurrection for all; but the admission is fatal to the theory of a mortal resurrection, or general resurrection. And if the penalty is only one punishment for the violation of law, under which men lived, acted and died, then after a punishment has been inflicted, which is the stated consequence of transgression, there is no more demand. Hence, the sinner, at any time dying, as a penalty, only suffers what that penalty implies.

It is a foolish idea that God inflicts penalty twice for the same offense, whether each infliction shall be the same in kind, or otherwise. If it be denied that the death of man is a penalty, it is foolish to oppose the statement of Scripture with man's assertion, and even absurd and false to declare that the inhabitants of the old world, and others, did not suffer, especially, the penalty of the divine law enacted for their government. They are under it, and ever will be.

A BUDGET OF THOUGHTS.

IT is said, "Truth is mighty and will prevail." I have for years doubted the last part of this saying, and find it still hard to believe, because of the extreme density of unbelief, and other bad compounds, such as bigotry, pride, and prejudice; and I might add another bad element, stupidity. It is very hard work for truth to succeed, against such disagreeable and bad forces.

The wicked doing wickedly: none of whom can understand. But truth has a peculiar power, and can achieve a victory any time in a fair field. Its power is not like the mechanic arts; the wedge, the screw and lever. These can move heavy, inert bodies, that have nothing of will or ignorance to oppose, but simple weight, and similar obstacles. Archimedes said, "Give me a place for my fulcrum, and with my lever, I can move the world." Truth would do this on the lever-principle. Give it faith for a fulcrum. This, it is not likely to have, I greatly fear.

Truth has power as the light. There is no place so dark the sun of truth cannot light up, if only acceptable. It will pierce a crevice, with its genial beams, to show those within its good will. Says the Psalmist, "The entrance of thy word giveth light; by it, is thy servant warmed; and in keeping of it there is great reward." Ps. cxix. Its power is in its activity and vividness; always ready to make the most of opportunity. It could—if allowed—enlighten all minds in due time; only let the windows be opened, and all will be light.

A certain man gave his wife a sum of money to build a house to her mind. When completed—as he thought—she desired an additional sum to pay for blinds. "What," said he, "put windows in the house to let in the light, and then put on blinds to keep it out!"

That is the way with many, everywhere: when the light shines they fold the blinds of conceit and prejudice as snug as the scales of Leviathan. Here investigation ends for the present.

CAMP MEETING AT SING SING.

I went to this meeting; heard two sermons! Considered myself happy, in that they were both on the resurrection. The preachers were earnest men, and they did their work well as far as they went. The immortality of the soul was intruded to mar the sublimity of truth. The "blinds must be closed" to graduate the light, I suppose, to the purblind congregation. I thought I saw that our paper, or other writings of the kind, had formed a part of the reading of these gentlemen.

The first preacher was Dr. True, an original; quite free in thought and novel ideas; I judge, given to investigation, and is a good preacher. His text: "The sea gave up the dead which were in it." He had previously read that interesting and instructive chapter, 1 Cor. xv. He said the resurrection was appropriate only to the Christian religion. Other religions, excepting the Mohammedan, were opposed to it, as well as philosophy and science; chemistry in particular, and physiology, which supposes a change in one's personality every seven years. He did not believe in this philosophy. He insisted squarely upon the resurrection of one's own person. But after all this, he supposed the dead saints to be conscious, in some way or other. I inferred, however, from his drift, that the wicked were exceptions with him. He supposed it incompatible with the habits and choice of the apostle Paul to be inactive in the interval.

I think he would change his mind, should he ask the apostle himself; and then accept of his written opinion in the matter. In this, he has declared his faith, even in his writings. In the chapter read on this occasion, he is express—"Those who have fallen asleep have perished," etc., v., 15, 17, 18. If we get no more from Christ than we can get in this world, or in that interim dreamed of, "we are of all men most miserable." "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Crosses, sufferings, persecutions, for Christ, will never pay. They are needless endurances—worse than needless. To suffer for a supposed principle, and nobody responsible for the damage and outlay! Stoning, crucifixions, burnings, and slaughter endured; wanderings in sheep-skins and goat-skins—destitute, afflicted, tormented." This has been the way with the Lord's friends from Abel down to this time, more or less: all of whom have and will perish, if the Lord does not think upon them, and bring them up into life. This is Paul's testimony.

Second. His account of his active life. "In labors more abundant; in stripes above measure; in prisons more frequent; in deaths oft. Of the Jews, five times received I forty stripes save one; thrice was I beaten with rods; once was I stoned;" and some nineteen other distresses; some of them oft repeated; beside these, "the care of all the churches."

Dr. True would not suppose that persecutions would form a part of Paul's experience in the "spirit land;" but we safely judge, the "care of all the churches" could not be excluded from his heart. Such a man as he, would "weep with those who weep; and mourn with those who mourn," in any world, where the conditions existed; even until the last sigh of the "groaning creations." But all this activity and sympathy is incompatible with taking rest in sleep; and I am sure the learned and eloquent Dr. True ought to know better than to suppose that people asleep can be trusted for congruity of thought, or profitable or appropriate works.

The Dr. referred to those who believed in the unconsciousness of the dead, and gave them the benefit of an argument of fact: the case of the naval officer felled to the deck in the heat of action, whose consciousness was suspended for months; who, on coming to himself began where he left off in the battle. I myself witnessed an instance similar in the effects. I pulled a little boy from the bottom of a river; water twelve feet deep. He had lost his knowledge of things. On coming to, he cried out, "Pull me out; pull me out." I think any body ought to know how to make deductions from such facts.

The sermon, notwithstanding, was good, excellent, and wholesome. The poison had its antidote.

The other preacher was Mr. Inskip; a very zealous man. His text: "Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord." He, also, magnified the resurrection greatly; so much so, that there was no salvation without it. The atonement was nothing worth without it; labor without advantage; suffering without virtue, or reward. So says Martin Luther, "Take away a resurrected Jesus, and a crucified one is of no avail."

I thought what a pity that men with such a prestige, and such large opportunities, should be after all, ignorant of the end of the gospel. But what a mortifying word, to apply "ignorance" to such great men. What else is it? Let them know better; know their own profession; not be quacks in such a high calling as the "cure of souls."

I thought if this preacher could but have the clean truth, what a strong point he could make just now—a large audience, and the right place to say the right thing. "The atonement of no avail without the resurrection." This statement was suggestive to my mind of two important thoughts—the atonement and the second advent.

The preacher spoke as if the atonement was effected on the cross. This, I believe is a common error that will disappear by noticing two or three things. Jesus was a testator, and administrator. He makes the will, ratifies, and ministers upon it as a priest. On the cross he was a victim. In heaven, the most holy place, he ratifies the will; in his return to earth, he administers upon it, and puts the heirs in possession of the estate. This, without doubt, is the programme. If any doubt, let them look again at the word. See Heb. chaps. viii., and ix.; especially these verses, chap. viii., 1, 2, 4–7; chap. ix., 7, 8, 9, 11, 22, 24, 26. The type atonement signifies every thing to be learned about it. The high priest went alone once in a year, on the Jewish annual day of judgment. Thus it was appointed unto men once to die (in a figure) "but after this the judgment;" which is the time for Jesus to officiate. "So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him, shall he appear the second time," etc., after the manner of the High priest under [Lev. xvi.] the law. Peter refers to this case in this language, "That your sins may be blotted ou whten the time of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you," etc. Acts. iii., 19.

BARNEY MATHIAS.

Armonk, N. Y.

FOR WHAT AM I ANSWERABLE?

I AM answerable for nothing but what is in my power. I am answerable for my own conduct, because I have power to control and govern it; but, I am not answerable for the conduct of others, because I have not power to control and regulate them. They may do evil when I have done for them all in my power. I have power to instruct people, but I have not power to make them learn. I have power to entreat and urge them to be good, but I cannot compel them to be good. I have power to set them a good example, but I cannot compel them to follow it. Goodness must be the result of their own free choice, and no one can make men good against their choice or without their choice. If men will not choose to be good, no one can make them so.

The best that we can do toward making others good, is to be as good as possible ourselves. In seeking after perfection of knowledge and virtue, we both secure our own felicity, and do the best in our power toward promoting the conversion and salvation of others.

Some seem to think we are in danger, if we follow truth without reserve, of getting so far forward, that others will be unable to follow us: and they accordingly advise us and entreat us to move slowly in our pursuit of truth, and to be more moderate in our discoveries. But are none to deal out strong meat? Are all to occupy themselves in serving out milk, and must they serve out milk forever? No such thing. Let every one deal out to the large family of faith, all that the great Father may deal out to him. Then let the babes take their milk, and let the men take their stronger food, and let each one have his portion of meat in due season. It is foolish to think of putting off the declaration of the whole truth till people are fit for it. There is nothing can fit people for the reception of truth, but truth itself. Men will always object to some truths, however long we may delay their declaration. Men will never be prepared to hear us declare the whole truth, however long we may wait. If we tarry till men are better, we shall never declare to them the truth at all. We must take them as they are, and if we cannot cure them by the truth, we must kill them by it; if their intolerance and pride will not let the truth prove to them the savor of life unto life, we must allow it, however painful the thought may be, to prove to them the savor of death unto death.

I am getting more and more out of love with the system of worldly expediency than ever. I think the best wisdom of the Christian is to tell all he knows, and to let God attend to the results. I feel inclined for my own part, to give to my brethren what God may give to me; men and sects may roar and rage as they please. We have worshipped men's intolerance too long; it is time to chop up the idol now, and throw it into the fire; it is time to grapple with the monster demon fairly, and either kill or be killed. I would not act rashly; I would use no harsh expressions; I would use no violence: but I would do homage to the truth; I would speak plain out; I would let truth out of her dungeon, and allow her to go forth unshackled and free; I would empty my heart, and not spare till I had filled the whole world with light.

HOMO.

COME!

THERE is no sweeter word than this in the New Testament, because there is none more full of the love of Jesus.

It implies his nearness to us. It is not a message sent to us from a distance, but is a word of conversation uttered within easy hearing; but it includes a world of self-sacrifice, which should bring Jesus from the glory of heaven down to this companionship of social intercourse with us. Before he could say, "Come unto me," he had to come to us.

It is a friendly and a winning word. It is not the same as "Go." "Go and wash in Jordan seven times" was a most useful direction. It contained all that was necessary for the cure of Naaman. But Jesus does not send us away for our healing. Salvation would be a different thing for us if Jesus always said "Go," no matter whither, and never said "Come." This word pledges us his help, his company, his friendship.

It implies, too, what we need is found in Christ. Well might Peter say, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." There is no salvation except with Christ and in him. In him there is rest. Hear his words: "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me: for I am meek and lowly of heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."

In him the thirst of the soul, its ardent desire for happiness, is satisfied. "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink."

"Let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

Dear reader, come! We will not say, "Go to Christ;" but, standing, as we hope we do, on the Lord's side, we say, "Come to him." Of course you are not to do this in any bodily sense. Jesus was not satisfied with this when he was on earth. He is not now. Come in your heart, your thoughts, your service, your prayer, your deepest trust; come, and he will in no wise cast you out.—Selected.

WHAT IT IS TO DIE?

"THERE are those who teach that God cannot suffer, and that suffering is incompatible with pefectness. . . . . 'What! do you teach that God died?' . . . . It was declared to be blasphemous to ascribe suffering, and much more blasphemous to ascribe death to God. . . . . Let me say a word in respect of dying. Do you suppose death means annihilation of the spirit? You might as well claim that it is absurd to say that God threw off the robe of empire, as to claim that it is absurd to say that he died. What is it to throw off a robe? God dies as man dies. And how does man die? We lose the body that we may have the soul. He that dies is like a man in prison, the roof and sides of which are swept away by some earthquake, so that he is left standing a free man. . . . . Dying means unclothing, or taking the material substance from, a spirit. And if it pleased God, in the person of Christ, to descend and take upon himself the human form, is there any more absurdity in speaking of his dying, than of speaking of a man's dying? I do not hesitate to say God died. My God is Jesus Christ. He, as an eternal spirit, became clothed in the flesh, and limited himself by being subject to the laws of nature as we are; and when he had fulfilled his earthly mission, he laid the flesh aside—and that was dying. And that is all that dying means to anbody. I do not know why an inclosed God cannot die as well as the inclosed spirit of man. God can suffer and die: and it is taught that he suffered and died for the sins of the world."—Henry Ward Beecher.

REMARKS ON THE FOREGOING.

We think it is a law of nature and of God, that when absolute "perfectness" is attained suffering is excluded. Mr. Beecher's God, "though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he had suffered; and being made perfect," etc. Heb. v., 8–9. Who was it that said to Mr. B.'s God, "Thou art my Son, to-day have I begotten thee?" And to whom did Mr. B.'s God "offer up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears to him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared?" Heb. v., 5–7. And why did Mr. B.'s God desire to be saved "from death," when death would only "sweep away the roof and sides" of his "prison, so that he" would be "left standing a free" God? Why did Mr. B.'s God cry out in agony when his prison house was being cleared away, by the cross—the "earthquake"—and say, "my God, my God, why hast thou fosraken me?" No wonder Mr. B. labored so hard to "throw off" the absurdity of his theory, with which he saw it would be charged. Can he tell us when the eternal "God threw off the robe of empire?" No doubt, such an assumption is quite as "absurd" as "to say that he died!"

According to Mr. B.'s theology, when JEHOVAH threatened Adam if he sinned he should surely die, the threat amounted to just this—"Adam, thou shalt not eat of that tree, if you do, I will blow your prison walls away and sweep the roof clear from you, and you shall be left standing a free man!" What a sublime *pun*ishment! No wonder Adam and Eve were in a hurry to get such glorious freedom! How could they be reconciled to wait nearly a thousand years for the boon they had been so prompt to secure! They must be models of patience and submission. Doubtless all their posterity copy after these virtues in their illustrious progenitors; for they all seem to be of one mind in their desire not to let the "sides and roof" of their old "prison" be "swept away," lest they should be "left standing free" too soon! All men must be exceeding pious, or Mr. B.'s definition of death is somehow defective, for all are quite willing to remain in "prison" and to defer "standing free" till a more "convenient season."

We have not, however, considered all the beauties of the theory. Mr. B.'s God resumed his prison of "flesh and bones," the third day after his death: for he "died, and was buried, and rose again according to the Scriptures:" see 1 Corth. xv., 3–4. How strange that he could not endure to be left "standing a free" God more than "three days!" There must be something repulsive in the mind of Mr. B.'s God in remaining unclothed, or without "the material substance" for company. He hastens to put it on again, and so "rose from the dead the third day." Mr. B. found it easy for his God to die, according to his definition of death; but he will have to give a new definition to resurrection, as well as to death, to make his theory have any show of emanation from a thinking mind. Did his God rise from the dead? The Scriptures affirm that Jesus Christ did; and "that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." See 1 Corth. xv., 4, and Rom. vi., 9. "God dies as man dies," says B. "We lose the body that we may have the soul." When his God died, then he lost "the body," and that was being made free: he laid the flesh aside, he put away "the material substance." Why does Mr. B. refrain from noticing the fact that his God "rose from the dead the third day"—that he afterward said to his astonished diciples, "Behold my hands and my feet that it is I myself: handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have." Here is the "material substance"—he is "clothed" with it again, notwithstanding it seems so hateful in Mr. B.'s theory; the "prison" reared anew; and as "he dieth no more," Mr. B.'s God is to remain eternally in prison!

But Mr. B. says, "I do not see why an inclosed God cannot die as well as the inclosed spirit of man." Here is "confusion worse confounded." In the first place, "the heaven of heavens cannot contain God," (1 Kg. viii., 27). "Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the LORD:" Jer. xxiii., 24. "In him we live and move and have our being:" Acts xvii. 28. How then is God to be "inclosed!" Can he be shut up in "prison"—in "material substance?" We do not ask how God could manifest himself "in the flesh"—shining through it upon earth's darkness—but how could he be "inclosed" in it, as in a prison?

In Mr. B.'s remark, the two legs are not equal. to have made them so, man, and not "the spirit of man," should be spoken of as "inclosed." He says, God was inclosed. Was man inclosed? No: "the LORD God formed man out of the dust of the ground." When Mr. B. can prove that man had a "spirit inclosed" in him, his illustration may be of some value; till then, it has place among his many groundless declarations.

Why is Mr. B. so profoundly wise in defining what death is? Because he has assumed that man has a distinct entity inclosed in his body, called soul; and that it is immortal. He says, in another part of his sermon, "it is enough for" him "to know that man has a soul, and that that soul is immortal." That would be enough if he only knew it, but does he know it? If so, will he give us Bible authority for it? Can he do that? We "know" he cannot; but he can declaim about it, as a schoolboy would about the "inhabitants of the moon." Let him give us a "Thus saith the LORD" in proof that man has a soul entity which is "immortal." We forewarn him, that he will be in as critical a position as king Saul was before he consulted the spirit rapper at Endor: he went not to her till God had forsaken him, and "answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim nor by prophets." There is not an utterance of JEHOVAH, nor of his prophets, from Genesis to Revelation, which speaks of the soul as immortal; no not one. But Mr. B. and others assume it, and so call darkness light, and light darkness, "corrupting the word of God to establish their own traditions." "If the blind lead the blind" shall they not "both fall into the ditch?"

THE INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE.

THE idea that Scripture language is to be understood different from the same forms of speech in other writings, is a fruitful source of error. Mysticism, or saying one thing and meaning another, is not to be tolerated in a professed revelation. To make plain words of inspiration mean something else than their obvious sense, or pretending the true sense is a hidden one, was introduced into the church, says Enfield, in his Philosophy, "almost as soon as the apostles had left the world." Heathen philosophers dealt in the mystical sense, because they designed to keep the common people in ignorance. The primitive converts to Christianity, from heathenism, had great temptations to use the mystical in interpreting Scripture, hoping thereby to multiply conversions to the new religion by the abundance of hidden wonders they thus pretended to find in the Bible. To some extent they were successful; but the church paid dear for this perversion of the word of God. It prepared the way for the Papal apostacy; and since the Reformation has been the scourge of Christendom, producing fanaticism, wild fancies, and has led to every evil work.

There is but one remedy to this evil, viz., A rational adherence to a literal construction of Bible language, such as would be sound in reading any other book of sober instruction.

There are figurative and symbolical representations and illustrations of truth, but they are such as might be understood by the common people: it was such language as was in common use in that age: hence, if we place ourselves where they were, we need be in no doubt as to the sense intended. The sun, moon, stars, mountains, rivers, various beasts, etc., were used figuratively or symbolically, in the Bible, to denote kings, rulers, governments, kingdoms, states, etc., but they were not so used to hide the meaning, except in rare instances; for it was the common method of conveying instruction in a time when almost every idea had some symbol to represent it, and make it more plain, inetead of obscure, as some suppose.

We are not to give those symbols or figures a fanciful interpretation, but let the Scriptures be their own interpreter, carefully examining such teaching in the light of explanations or fulfilments previously presented, which will show us how the language was then understood; thus shall we be made acquainted with the true import of the words employed. Then we may and ought to explain the Bible as we would any other common-sense book written to communicate information to the minds of men in general: i. e., according to its most obvious sense, unless necessity compels a departure from it.

Finally, in our interpretations of Scripture, our conclusions must be according to the analogy of faith; that is, they must be consistent with plain passages that speak on the same subjects or events. Also, the general tenor of the Scriptures must rule in the conclusion arrived at. The language that is obscure is to be explained by that which is plain. In other words, figurative language is not to rule against plain and positive, but is to submit to it. Any position which converts the plain and positive statement of penalty of law into a figurative representation, must be a false position. Such are all attempts to convert the penalty of death into life in misery, when spoken of the final state of sinners.

PERVERTING THE WORDS OF GOD.

TURN which way we will, we find men turning the words of Scripture into foolishness by their traditions. We give one or two samples of this pernicious course. The account of the death of a pious lady closes thus:

"When struggling in death she exclaimed, 'This is no dark valley! this river is very narrow! I can step across it!' With assurances of love to all her friends, she concluded with 'Good-by, good-by;' 'and she was not, for God took her.'"

Is the concluding remark justified by the text to which it refers? It relates to the case of Enoch. It is said of him, Gen. v., 24, "Enoch walked with God: and he was not, for God took him." The word "was," in this text, is supplied, not being in the original. We get the true sense from the apostle, Heb. xi., 5—"By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him." Now let Gen. v., 24 correspond with this apostolic explanation and we have this fact—"Enoch died not, for God took him," or "translated" him: he did not die. But the pious lady, to whom the inspired language was applied, did die—she "struggled in death;" yea, she died; and yet words are applied to her which belong only to one who "died not"—one who was "translated that he should not see death." By the theology of the account of this lady's death, she went just as Enoch did. By the language of the apostle, if Enoch had died it could not have been said—"God took him." It was because he did not die that such language was applied to him.

Another case was that of a minister who was praying God to comfort persons who had a friend die, and he asked that God would "say to these mourners when they came to the grave, 'he is not here,' for he is not, Lord—he has gone to heaven."

In this case, it will be seen, God was asked to use language to these mourners when they should lay their dead friend in the grave, that was spoken of Jesus by the angel to the woman, after he had risen from the dead and come out of the grave. In the case of Jesus it was a glorious truth: in the other case it would have been a monstrous falsehood which the minister asked God to utter. In other words, the theology of the minister led him to suppose mourners could be comforted by an untruth. It is certain, however, that God never did sanction such a method of comforting mourners. No: his method is to point believers to the resurrection "at the last day," when "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout; with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God;" then "the dead in Christ shall rise first, and we who are alive and remain" [unto that event] "shall be caught up together with them to meet the Lord, and so shall be forever with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." See 1 Thess. iv., 13–18. How unlike the corrupted theology of such a misdirected, though it might be well-intended, prayer!

The evil of all such unscriptural statements and prayers as we have noticed, is, they draw away the mind from the true source of comfort, and the Scripture hope of the resurrection of "the dead in Christ," and argue a lack of faith in the glorious revival from the "dominion of death, to die no more," by which the saints become "the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Lk. xx., 35, 36. Besides, they beget a habit of a loose—not to say criminal—use of the language of Scripture, which prevents the intelligent use and the sanctifying effects of the truth.

ADVICE TO OUR READERS.

WE adopt and commend the following advice:

"Be sure you live in love, and labor to be exemplary in all Christian excellencies. And do not espouse my cause, or make yourself answerable for my peculiarities. Espouse Christ's cause only, and make yourselves answerable for nothing but the simple unadulterated Gospel. If I can help you, I shall be glad to do so: but I cannot be the head of a party or sect. Let Christ be your only head, and pure Christianity your only system. Embrace none of my principles, but what you may clearly discover to be the principles of Jesus Christ; and even then, do not embrace them because they are mine, but because they are Christ's. If you do this, then, though your adversaries should prove that some of my sentiments are erroneous, and some of my proceedings objectionable, they would prove nothing against you. Have as little connection with me, and as little dependence on me, as possible; but have as close a connection with Christ as you can, and let your dependence be on God for all you want. I do not say, Disown me, or slight me; I only say, Have no one for your master but Christ, and be answerable for nothing but Christianity."

WHAT IS UNDERSTOOD BY THE GOSPEL?

A DIALOGUE.

O.—"BR. Grim, I object to your view of the Gospel from the fact that you make life, or future existence, depend upon a belief in it; or, in other words, your gospel contains nothing but existence in the future; whereas the gospel is nothing more than glad tidings of happiness to the human family."

G.—You mistake my meaning of the gospel, entirely; we do not say, the Scriptures teach that nothing is conveyed to man in the future but existence. If you had fully comprehended man's condition you would not have been led into the error you have fallen into. Had you comprehended that man has no life or life principle in him, by nature, except the present animal life, and when that ceases he ceases to be, you would have understood my meaning of the gospel. The world was in this condition when Jesus Christ was sent upon the mission of the gospel, which was to bring life into the world.

O.—"But I have been taught all my life to believe man possesses an immortal soul; and when we read of life, in the gospel, it means happiness, or being delivered from punishment."

G.—Then you would read "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him might not be miserable but have everlasting happiness." "I am the bread of happiness; he that cometh to me shall never hunger." "I am the living happiness which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this happiness he shall be happy forever."

O.—"I would not change the reading, as you have done; but that is the meaning as I understand it."

G.—It is very strange the word happiness is used so often by ministers and objectors to the Life theme, and yet the word happiness does not once occur in the whole Bible. We find the words happy and haply; but, unfortunately for the objectors, the word happiness does not occur in the whole book.

O.—"I understand you to say, if man feels he is a sinner and will perish, and return to the dust, unless he receives help; and if he believes that Jesus Christ was raised from the dead as God's appointed way of life, he shall have life. Now, is that all there is of the gospel? Is there nothing else to believe? Why, I have been taught that I must believe in the confession of faith; in the nature and character of Jesus Christ; the kingdom of God; the future age; and a host of other things."

G.—I would answer in the language of the apostle to the question of the jailor, "What must I do that I may have life?" The answer was, "Believe on the name of our Lord Jesus, Messiah, and thou wilt have life." How plain and yet how simple; "Believe on the Lord Jesus and thou shalt have life."

O.—"It seems to me you make the gospel too simple. I have been taught that the gospel was some great mystery; and that it required considerable learning to comprehend it."

G.—There are many truths in the Bible that concern and relate to things in the future that require deep study and research. But the question before us, at present, is, the gospel. What is the gospel? We say, it is the simple way or proclamation of life to perishing man.

In our articles we have stated what the Bible says man is. An animal of the highest order, endowed by his Creator with the highest order of intelect; but, like all other animals, the subject of death; and returning to dust. Now, is there any way of escaping this doom? In nature there is none. Now Jesus Christ makes the proclamation, through the gospel, "He that believeth on me shall have eternal life." This is the proclamation: life may be obtained in believing on him whom God hath appointed.

O.—"But you make it appear as if the wicked will never be raised to life. Our minister speaks of the wicked in the day of judgment; when they are raised from the dead, standing before God to receive the sentence of condemnation. How do you get over such things, and reconcile them with your views?"

G.—First, permit me to ask you a few questions. I have stated, in a plain and simple manner, what the gospel consists of, and how a man by believing in Jesus Christ, God's appointed way, may have life, by a resurrection from the dead.

Now, as Jesus declares himself to be the resurrection and the life, will you or your minister be so kind as to inform us how the wicked get a resurrection to life, or a resurrection of any kind, without Jesus Christ? For, as the apostle says, "Be it known unto you, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus, Messiah, the Nazarean, whom ye crucified, and whom God raised from the dead," lo, "by him doth this man stand before you recovered. This is the stone which ye builders rejected: and it hath become the head of the corner; neither is there deliverence [from death] in any other; for there is not another name, under heaven, which is given to men whereby to live." [Murdock.] Acts iv., 10, 12. Will you please inform us in our next by what name you give the wicked life?

JACOB GRIM.

THE NEW JERUSALEM.

BR. STORRS: I should like to make an inquiry regarding the New Jerusalem. Is it not a symbolic city—a type or symbol of earth's renewed and eternal state? Is not the idea of a literal city lost sight of in the following passage—"There will be no more curse, but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him; and they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads: and there shall be no more night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light: and they shall reign forever and ever"? Rev. xxii., 3–5.

WM. H. SPENCER.

Brockport, N. Y.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—To our mind, the New Jerusalem of Rev. xxi. and xxii. is a symbolic representation; and it is explicitly said to be "the bride, the Lamb's wife," chap. xxi., 9, 10. The great city, Babylon, was taken to symbolize the harlot church, in all her abominations. The New Jerusalem is the symbol of the pure church of Christ glorified, and taking its place on the earth after the corrupt or harlot church—the great city, Babylon—is swept from the earth, and sinks to rise no more. Then shall the saints shine forth in the kingdom of their Father, as the true bride of Christ, symbolized by the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. Such has been our view of the subject for many years, and we see no cause to change in that matter

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

MUCH has been written on this parable. The best thing, on the whole, that we have seen on the subject, is an 18 mo. tract of 16 pages, by Eld. J. S. WHITE. If we do not agree with every expression in it, we can cheerfully commend it to the attention of all who wish to understand the parable and its design. A tract, simple in its character, showing the true meaning of the parable, has been needed. Br. White's meets the want, and cannot fail to produce conviction upon any mind which is not Pharisaical. This tract can be had of the author, East Boston, Mass., or at this office. Price $2 per 100 copies.

A CHRISTIAN HERO.

A POOR but pious miner in Cornwall (a member of the Wesleyan society) was down deep in the earth with another miner sinking a shaft. They were blasting rocks, and the custom was, after the rock was charged, for one first to ascend in the bucket and the other to wait till the bucket came down again, then ignite the fuse, get into the bucket, give the signal to the man above, and be drawn to the top before the explosion. In the present case, the train unexpectedly took fire. The fuse was hissing, both men rushed to the bucket, got in and gave the signal to hoist; but the man above could not draw them both. They at once saw their danger; both could not escape, and delay was death. One of the miners was pious. Looking for a moment at his companion, and stepping from the bucket, he said, "Escape for thy life; in a few moments I shall be in heaven." The bucket was drawn up and the man was safe. Eager to know the fate of his magnanimous companion, he bent over the mouth of the shaft. Just then the explosion rumbled below, and a splinter struck him on the brow, leaving a mark he will carry to the grave. They soon commenced laboring among the fallen rocks to extricate the corpse. At last they heard a voice. Their friend was yet alive. They reached him, and found him without injury or scratch. All he could tell of the fearful scene was, that the moment his friend was gone he sat down and took up a stone and held it before his face. When asked what induced him to let his companion escape, he replied, "I believed my soul was safe; I was not sure of his."

Now look at him who, to build a city called by his own name, sacrificed a hundred thousand men, and at this poor miner, who, to save the soul of his unconverted comrade, sat down there to be blasted to pieces, and say which is the true hero.

MOURN not that you are weak and miserable. The gentle breeze is better than the hurricane, the cheerful fire of the hearthstone than the conflagration.

THE BIBLE.

WHEN the celebrated Dr. Samuel Johnson was asked why so many literary men were infidels, his reply was, "Because they are ignorant of the Bible." If the question be asked why the lovers of general reading so often fail to acquaint themselves with the sacred volume, one reason which may be assigned, doubtless, is they are not aware of its interesting variety. This feature of the Bible is well illustrated by Mrs. Ellis, in the following eloquent extract from her recent work entitled the "Poetry of Life."

"With our established ideas of beauty, grace, pathos and sublimity, either concentrated in the minutest point or extended to the widest range, we can derive from the Scripture a fund of gratification not to be found in any other memorial of past or present time. From the worm that grovels in the dust beneath our feet, to the track of the leviathan in the foaming deep—from the moth that corrupts the secret treasure, to the eagle that soars above his eyre in the clouds—from the wild ass in the desert, to the lamb within the shepherd's fold—from the consuming locust to the cattle upon a thousand hills—from the rose of Sharon to the cedar of Lebanon—from the crystal stream, gushing forth out of the flinty rock, to the wide waters of the deluge—from the lonely path of the wanderer, to the gathering of a mighty multitude—from the tear that falls in secret, to the din of battle and the shout of a triumphant host—from the solitary in the wilderness, to the satrap on the throne—from the mourner clothed in sackcloth, to the prince in purple robes—from the still, small voice, to the thunders of omnipotence—there is no degree of beauty or deformity, no tendency to good or evil, no shade of darkness or gleam of light, which does not come within the cognizance of the Holy Scriptures; and therefore there is no expression or conception of the mind that may not find a corresponding picture; no thirst for excellence that may not meet with its full supply; and no condition of humanity necessarily excluded fram the unlimited scope of adaptation and of sympathy comprehended in the language or the spirit of of the Bible."

"THAT BLESSED HOPE."

BUT now let me speak to you of the Second Advent, which is the Christian's great hope (as the First Advent, is the foundation of his faith:) for then Christ will assume his office of King; and not till then will the great enemy of souls, the "accuser of the brethren," be bound, error be banished, sin be subdued, and creation cease to groan; because at his coming he will establish the kingdom of truth, righteousness, and peace. What Christian is there who, believing this, when he hears the Saviour's voice saying, "Surely I come quickly," will not reply, "Amen, even so, come, Lord Jesus?"

The First Advent is the source of all our hopes of eternal life; but when we have been admitted freely into the kingdom of glory through the Saviour's obedience unto death, we shall find, at the Second Advent, there is nothing that we have either done or suffered for him will be graciously remembered, and even rewarded by him.

You ask me to answer the question, "How you reconcile the series of signs our Lord's coming with its supposed suddenness? How can people be taken by suprise when his approach is announced?" 1. It will be sudden when it arrives, notwithstanding the preceding signs. "Of that day and hour knoweth no man;" and the majority will not regard the signs of the times as bearing upon that event. 2. The signs of the times were clear at the First Advent; yet who were ready to welcome it but Zacharias, and Elizabeth, and Mary, and Joseph, and Simeon, and Anna, and a few more? To the five wise virgins, the coming of the bridegroom is sudden—to the foolish unexpected.

I never knew an anti-millenarian give a satisfactory answer to 2 Thess. ii., 8. If the Man of Sin must be destroyed before the millennial period, the Lord must come before that period; for it is of his personal, not spiritual coming that the apostle is speaking. Spiritual, indeed, that will be also, for there will be little spirituality till then. Judah will vex Ephraim, and Ephraim envy Judah.

The signs of the times call for—1. A close adherence to the word of God. 2. The exercise of faith, hope and love. 3. Watchfulness and prayer. 4. A diligent use of all available means of grace for ourselves, and a zealous endeavor to propagate revealed truth among others, both at home and abroad. The complete victory of truth I do not expect until the second advent of our blessed Lord. —The late Dr. Marsh.

TRUTH AND ERROR.

ERROR is mortal; but truth lives on for ever. While error lives, it lives on sufferance only; but truth lives of itself: it is incapable of death. Error is at every one's mercy; but all the powers in the universe cannot destroy truth. Error lives by concealment chiefly: if it be tracked and discovered, it dies. Truth can live everywhere: it can bear the fullest exposure; and the brighter and fuller the light that falls upon it, the more sprightly and vigorous it becomes. Many errors live in consequence of having taken the names of truth, and clothed themselves with some of truth's garments; but when truth resumes her names, and claims again her garments, error will perish. And truth will be doing so by and by. She is beginning to look round her, and to make known her claims. She has lived much in retirement in days past, and has been too modest in her pretensions; but she is coming forth to the light—she is presenting herself more openly, and waxing bolder in her claims. She is blessed with a more numerous offspring also than heretofore, and many of her children seem resolved that their venerable parent shall have her rights. They are resolved that error shall be stripped of her stolen garments, and deprived of her stolen names, and presented to the world in her own unsightly nakedness; and that if she cannot live on her own means, she shall not live at all. They are resolved that she shall be tracked to her last hiding place, forced from last disguises, and that truth alone, whose right it is, shall live, and reign, and flourish, through all the dwellings of mankind.

THE MOST EVIDENT AND ENCOURAGING OF ALL FACTS.

BY REV. JOHN COX, IPSWICH, ENG.

"God is greater than man."—Job xxxiii., 12.

THIS is a very obvious fact, capable of ample proof and abundant illustration. God is revealed by his works, so also is man, and man often considers that his works prove him to be great. But what were Solomon's pools to the Pacific Ocean, or, what is the dome of St. Peter's at Rome to the glorious firmament? As we gaze on these and other contrasts the words insect, and infinite are naturally uttered.

Study the fact in Scripture, and there we learn that God is greater than man in his excellencies, and by the way of contrast in all his defects. Take man in his antipodes and this truth is obvious. God is infinitely greater in holiness then the best of men; and equally more infinite in mercy than the worst of men.

What feelings should such facts produce. Reverence at God's great majesty. We should come before him with holy awe. Oh, how little do we realize his greatness; yet we have felt awed when in the presence of those in station or mind above us. Repose. He is great in his words and equally great in his power and faithfulness to make them good. Rest on his great words; and great blessings are sure to flow from them. Resignation. He is great in wisdom and sovereinty. He never errs, and has a right to do as he pleaseth. Rejoicing becomes those who have so great a friend and patron. Great is his glory and equally great his grace; therefore, rejoice in hope of the glory of God, and praise him for the exceeding riches of his grace.

Our Father sits on yonder throne,
Amidst the hosts above:
He reigns throughout the world alone,
He reigns the God of love.

Then let us, while we dwell below,
Obey our Father's voice;
To all his dispensations bow,
And in his name rejoice.

FAITH.

IT was recently stated by H. H. Jessup, that on Mount Lebanon, seven thousand feet above the sea, are several large cedars that tower up from their massive trunks to a great height, and shoot out their wide-spreading branches on every side. The inhabitants of the vicinity call them, by way of distinction, the "Twelve Patriarchs." Just by one of these there has grown up a tall slender cedar, which, above fifty feet from the ground, enters one of its huge branches, and becomes incorporated with it, while its trunk has been almost severed by decay from its own root. It hangs there in the embrace of that majestic cedar, and draws its life and strength from that gigantic trunk.

Thus it is with the soul that lives by faith. He has grown up into Christ. He lives in him, and is sustained by him, and grows and thrives by virtue of an endearing union. Formerly he was attached to earth from which his strength, such as it was, was derived. Now he hangs solely on Christ, and in a manner so contrary to what may be called the order of nature, and so detached from the world, that others cannot but admire the manner and means of his wonderful support.—Am. Messenger.

CONFIDENCE IN CHRIST.

THE dew of thy grace is shed upon my wasting spirit with refreshing consolation. My soul languishes; but soon it will exult in thee; my flesh withereth, but after a few days it will revive. I am compelled to undergo corruptions, but thou wilt free me from this decay when thou bringest me out of all evils. Thou hast newly created me in the image of God, and how can the work of thy hands perish? Thou hast redeemed me from all my foes, and how shall death alone triumph over me? Thou hast devoted thy body, thy blood, and thy entire self for my salvation; how, then, shall death hinder those benefits which were bought with so precious a price? Thou art my righteousness, and my sins shall not prevail over thee; thou art my life and resurrection, and my death shall not overcome thee; thou art my God, and satan shall not have power over thee. Thou hast given me the earnest of the Spirit, and in his will I glory, in his will I triumph; and I firmly believe, nothing doubting, that thou wilt permit me to enter into the marriage supper of the Lamb.—Gerhard's Meditations.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy. It was written by Professor Wilson, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we endorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage, six cents.

FROM ELD. JOHN CRAIG.

WESTFORD, MASS., Oct. 27, 1867.

BR. STORRS: First of all let me say, that the HERALD is very dear to me. I love its contents; I love its spirit; it is delightful to know that we have the assurance of life in Christ our LIFE-GIVER. I am doing all I can to get the truth before the people around where I live. They seem to be pleased with our views. I hope to see them take a decided stand on the side of truth. Like all others, they have been taught to believe in the latter day fables of inherent immortality; going to heaven or hell at death; and raising the wicked dead to kill them again. All these things have been brought to the light of the Bible, and shown to be only the traditions of men; and, thank the Lord, the truth is gaining ground here. If I could obtain some tracts or works on Christ our LIFE-GIVER, I should receive material help in spreading the light. Now, is there any of my good brethren who feel to send in to Br. Storrs and purchase a bundle of tracts and send them to the poor seekers of truth out here in Westford? I shall gladly distribute them among those who are desirous of knowing the truth of the Bible. Up, my brethren and sisters, time is short, out into the harvest field; help—help to gather in the last crops; for soon, very soon will the day be ended, and we, if faithful workers, will receive every one his penny.

FROM ELD. J. LEWIS.

MOULTON, ILL., Oct. 23, 1867.

BR STORRS: The last HERALD came to us yesterday; and truly it is a feast, to a weary pilgrim like ourself, to peruse its columns, and read the cheering epistles of the dear saints, scattered here and there throughout the length and breadth of the land. It appears to grow better and better. The article headed a "Purifying Hope" has so much plain Bible truth, that, to us, it is meat in due season; and, to say the least, they are all good. O how it revives our spirit (mind) to see the interest taken to sustain the HERALD.

Our heart was made to rejoice on reading the notice concerning the tracts. They are just the thing we want; and we respond by sending our mite to help in keeping the ball rolling. Br. Z. Campbell says, your paper is shattering the old sectarian walls faster than any battering ram; and so it seems to us. The work is but just, as it were, begun. Glory to God, the cause is onward, and is bound to triumph; for our army is on the increase. We are getting new recruits wherever we go, notwithstanding some are crying "Infidelity," because they can't have a personal devil to lay their sins upon, but it is very rare that we find any deserters after fairly committing themselves to the truth. But as long as they cling to the old mother's daughters we can never know where to find them. For when they are with the Adventists, they are Adventists; and when they are with the Methodists, etc., they are Methodists. May the Lord help such to remember that if they seek to please men they displease God. We must close by saying that Br. Osborn and ourself are having very interesting times. Thank God that there are some that are not afraid to come out and hear for themselves.

FROM ALBIN CHANDLER.

CAMERON, MO., Oct. 20, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I wrote you a few weeks ago, saying I would soon send you some money and a new subscriber. I now write to redeem my promise. I am alone here in the truth of "No life except in Christ;" but I cannot keep a theme I love so well to myself. The new subscriber that I now introduce to you has become much interested in the life and resurrection doctrine, although nominally a member of the M. E. church. Enclosed find $5.

I rejoice much that the HERALD is yet to live, for it is all the preaching I have that strengthens me. I love to read the letters from the dear brethren, also, for they are my social meetings. They encourage me to be diligent and not weary in well doing. Am very glad to see the tract fund increasing; will try, as the Lord prospers me, to help sustain it, but am now somewhat crippled in financial matters because of moving, sickness, and the accident of breaking my shoulder, which I wrote you about in my last. I am just earning something again, for which my family is needy. I see one brother suggests more articles upon practical, holy lives, which I could heartily second, as I often feel much need of direction by my dear brethren's counsel; for we are living in "perilous times," truly. How often I forget and begin to murmur, as I see and hear others that have no hope beyond this life. Just now the grasshopper plague here creates great discontent and uneasiness. Although this is the finest country I ever was in, still, like all others, it has the curse upon it in some form. About ten days ago, at 1 o'clock P. M., by looking toward the sun, could see the army grasshopper, like a large snow storm; for their white, lacy wings, in sunlight, resembled snow flakes. They established camp with us in this vicinity for the first, and now the Fall wheat is all gone (with a few exceptions of early sown, hence more tough). Even in the meadows the tame grass is fast disappearing, and many discouraged ones are crying "famine." But I feel like saying with one of old, "As for me, I and my house will serve God." Hence in righteousness can appropriate the consolation from King David's experience: "Once I was young, but now am old, but never saw the righteous forsaken, or his seed begging bread." Oh, what comfort to be thus provided for by a rich and kind Father. Yes, dear brother, my constant aim is to live so that when Jesus comes to gather his sheep I may be of his fold, and in his kingdom to rejoice with you and all precious ones of his gathering in that day. Ever let us pray that we may be kept from the evils of the world and be one even as Jesus prayed the Father. Your brother, in hope of eternal life when Jesus comes.

ALEXANDRIA, VA., Oct., 30, 1867.

BR. STORRS: Enclosed find $3 for the paper.

It is over a year since I was in your city and had the privilege of attending the Advent meetings; consequently I feel almost starved for the want of such blessed privileges. But I strive to do the will of the Lord, while I watch and wait here

Our schools have commenced again among the colored people under very favorable auspices, far as the schools are concerned. We have in this city two large new schoolhouses, each containing eight commodious rooms for teaching.

But while education is progressing, the wants of the people continue great as ever. Then the well and hearty men and women have scattered away during the Summer, to work and get supplies for their families, a goodly number taking their families with them. But as this is a refugee station, there are multitudes left. Among the left, are aged and infirm men and women, beside sickly ones, and school children, as well as those who can't go to school. No rations as yet. Provisions very high. Work scarcer than ever. People at the North have no idea of the suffering here among poor whites and colored. O, if they could once see what we see daily, they would make haste to send relief; something to feed and clothe them. I will mention one of many cases. A respectable old woman, whom I have known for a year, came to me on Monday, of this week. "Can't you give me a dime or quarter," said she, "to get me a little corn meal. I did not have a morsel to eat yesterday. I went to meeting and saw you there, and could hardly keep myself awake, I was so hungry and faint; and," said she, "I have had nothing to-day, only a neighbor gave me a piece of bread and a cup of coffee." This is only one among many cases I could mention; and the Winter not yet set in. I hope the brethren and sisters, who truly love our precious, covenant-keeping Saviour, will 'take joyfully the spoiling o their goods," to give to the Lord's poor.

Waiting for the better life, I remain truly yours.

FROM LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Oct., 1867.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE: I feel to rejoice with you in the prospects of our paper, and also the cause itself, the coming year, the contributions have so far exceeded my expectations, and the way seems opening rapidly for the spread of light and truth. How plainly do these finger marks reveal the presence of him who dwelt in the bush; also the unanimity manifested in your deliberations at the annual meeting is presumptive evidence that the cause is sustained and carried forward by an irresistible power. We may well take courage; although in numbers few, far more are they that be for us than against us. The rich pivilege is ours of access to God the Father through Jesus Christ. Do we sufficiently appreciate this boon? That great and glorious being, who is righteous in all his ways, without the shadow of turning. Of his power we can have some faint conception as we survey the starry heavens, those orbs of light with all their shining train, which have been moving in their orbits for ages without collision or derangement; and to this stupendous power we have access. How many, with trembling steps and anxious fears, have sought access to the presence of earthly potentates, like queen Esther, with many fearful forebodings until she saw extended the golden sceptre—how many during the last dreadful conflict of our country felt that all depended on gaining access to President Lincoln, in the hope of pardon for themselves or others. "O," they would exclaim in earnestness, "that I could have a hearing!" How small their interests compared with those we may have by access to God the Father, glory, honor, immortality, and eternal life. Then how important a knowledge of the way of access, and how careful we should be that we make no mistake in this. The beloved Son of the Father is the only way; yes, said Jesus, "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." Then there is no Father except through Jesus for us perishing rebels. We would expect to see the Bible searched and researched that there might be no mistake; yet how contrary to this is our every-day experience. Some human invention or tradition is more reliable than God's word! O, should we not, who have found the way of access, improve it in a prayerful study for the truth, and earnest supplication that the darkness may soon pass and the true light shine everywhere? O, the goodness of God who has provided this new and living way—new, for who but the Infinite would have planned such a way? A "living way" for life to the entire being, and life from the dead its crowning glory. Let us be active, and wisely improve the present year, or so much of it as may be ours to use. We can and should, I think, maintain an uninterrupted spirit of prayer. How much we have to pray for; and while access, such a costly access, is provided, can we neglect to use it? Certainly not, if we feel its power and understand its value. Will the Lord pour upon us a spirit of grace and supplication, as he has to his chosen Israel, that when the despised Nazarene appears, they look on him whom they have pierced and mourn. The muttering thunder of coming judgments are heard on every hand. It becomes us to watch and pray that when the announcement, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh" is made, we may be ready, having improved the way of access to God the Father as we shall then wish we had done.

FROM JOHN SALMON.

MONTREAL, C. E., Oct. 28, 1867.

BR. STORRS: Though not personally acquainted with you, yet through the HERALD OF LIFE, and also through your "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST," I have learned to esteem you very highly for your work's sake. During my stay in Washington, D. C., last May, in company with Br. Miles Grant, at a tent meeting, I visited Alexandria, Virginia, to see Sr. Helen Robertson while she was employed in teaching the poor colored children of that District. She very kindly said she would have the HERALD OF LIFE sent to me for one year, if I so desired. She also presented me with some of your writings in which your views of doctrine are clearly set forth. I found much in them to admire. Though not able to indorse all your sentiments, still I cannot but appreciate the stand you have taken, conscientiously, on behalf of the truth as it is in Jesus. Such a stand requires no small amount of self-denial, because it is not at all pleasant to human nature to speak out with boldness some unpopular truth. especially when by so doing you will lose the company of some of your most cherished friends. But one has to take up his cross and follow the Lord, cost what it may, otherwise we are not worthy of him.

I myself have had a severe trial in that respect. I was eight years and a half a Methodist minister, but was obliged to resign my status as such about a year ago on account of entertaining views of divine truth contrary to those held by John Wesley and his followers. It was one of the most severe and painful trials I ever encountered, but I am amply repaid. The Lord is more precious than ever, and the throne of grace seems nearer and more acceptable, for when a person is forsaken of man, and of human friendship, he will feel more and more the importance of cleaving to him who changeth not. I love to hold forth the grand truth of Revelation that Jesus Christ our Lord is coming back to this earth to raise his sleeping saints so that they may be forever with him.

I think it a matter deeply to be regretted that some men of honest intentions bring this great theme into such disrepute by fixing on a definite day, or even year when the Lord shall come. Surely such have had many lessons in the past from which they might learn otherwise. May the Lord guide us into all truth. Amen.

By the way, my object in writing you is to have you change the address of my paper. I am stationed in Montreal as pastor of the Advent church.

Praying that the divine blessing may attend your labors, I remain, your brother in Christ.

FROM M. P. MARTIN.

COLUMBIA, CALIFORNIA, Oct. 6, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I am glad to see by my last paper that the HERALD is so nobly sustained by the friends of truth. There are a few here, in the lovely foot hills of the Sierra Nevada, that prize it very highly; and as there is less superstition here than in most places, I think its benignant influence will be felt to the overthrow of error and the establishment of the truth where it is read.

We shall do all we can to send you subscribers. The Lord willing, I expect to make this my permanent residence until the Lord comes. All communications should be addressed to me at Columbia, Tuolumne Co., California. I have just received my four last numbers of the HERALD, they having been detained in the San Francisco office.

My health is very much improved, for which I praise the Lord, and for directing me to this healthy region. There seems to be a good field of labor here in the vineyard of the Lord, and I mean to do all in my power in the service of the Master.

Enclosed I send you a post office order for $6 60 for three numbers of the HERALD, commencing with the first number of this volume.

Yours in love of the truth.

FROM MRS. C. A. WADE.

PELHAM, MASS., Oct. 27, 1867.

BR. STORRS: Please send the paper to Mr. Benjamin Swasey, San Francisco, California. I think it will be something new to them, but will only have it sent to them for six months, not knowing how they will receive it. I like the paper very much, and think it comes the nearest the gospel truth (in my opinion) of anything I have ever seen. My husband and myself are the only believers in this town, that I know of, in Life only in Christ. Our Methodist preacher calls us "No Soulists," and thinks one might as well be a Spiritualist; but I do not think so. I should be afraid I might be one if I believed as he does. I think the leaders in this doctrine have great reason to feel encouraged. I do believe it will increase as it is brought before the people; it looks so reasonable, and agrees so well with the Bible. I did not intend to write so much when I began, but could not close without giving my testimony in favor of the cause of truth as advocated in the HERALD OF LIFE.

FROM A LIFE LOVER.

BELOVED IN CHRIST: You who are looking for life through Christ: my heart goes out in sympathy with and for you. I feel that he is my LIFE-GIVER, too: and though not personally conversant with you, I feel a blessed union with you as I read from week to week your earnest words in the HERALD OF LIFE, whose very name is so. I really love the leading doctrine of this paper; still am not altogether convinced of its truth; some passages stand in my way as barriers to its full reception; but I want to know the true light: may God give it to us all. If I should ever see it as clearly as some, I shall rejoice in it with my whole heart. Am glad of the spirit of love manifested among you toward those who differ in some points; this is as it should be. Still so desirable is it that all the church of God should see the blessed truth alike that we should ardently wish, pray, and labor for this end. That God would help us so to do is the prayer of LIFE LOVER.

Haverhill, Mass., Oct. 31, 1867.

WM. H. SPENCER, Brockport, N. Y., writes: The HERAD OF LIFE comes to hand regularly, and I like it very much. I hardly know how to do without it. The trials I have just passed through have prevented me from paying my little bill at your office, which I regret very much. Perhaps you were aware that I was connected with the Earnest Christian office; but they have thrown me out of business, besides censuring me for spreading "the fatal heresy" (Advent doctrine) among their people. I loved these truths, and I felt that I could not compromise them, so between covering up my light or throwing up my business I was obliged to do the latter; for I would rather endanger my earthly support than hazard eternal life. I am trying to spread the light, and I desire your prayers that the seed I have sown and may sow may bring forth much fruit.

R. V. LYON, Suspension Bridge, N. Y., writes: Truth is finding a place in some hearts. It is now some weeks since I arrived in the West. Scores have embraced the glorious doctrine of no future life out of Christ; and that this life is made to depend upon their forming a union with Jesus the LILE-GIVER. In order to maintain this union, they must lead a holy life. The doctrine of life must and will be proclaimed; and in the end will triumph though men and demons may oppose.

Poetry.

The Christian's Walk.

Christian, walk carefully—danger is near;
Work out thy journey with meekness and fear;
Snares from without, and temptations within,
Seek to entice thee again into sin.

Christian, walk humbly—exult not in pride;
All that thou hast is by Jesus supplied;
He holdeth thee up, he directeth thy ways,
To him be the glory—to him be the praise.

Christian, walk cheerfully, though the dark storm
Fill the bright sky with the clouds of alarm:
Soon will the clouds and the tempest be past,
And thou shalt dwell with thy Saviour at last.

Christian, walk steadfastly, while it is light:
Swift are approaching the shades of the night;
All that thy Master hath bidden thee do
Haste to perform, for the moments are few.

Christian, walk prayerfully—oft wilt thou fall,
If thou forget on thy Saviour to call:
Safe shalt thou walk through each trial and care,
If thou art clad in the armor of prayer.

Christian, walk joyfully—trouble and pain
Cease when the haven of rest thou dost gain;
This thy bright glory, and this thy reward,
"Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!"

A Singing Mouse.

A singing mouse! who ever heard of such a thing? I hear some of my readers say with surprise. But do not be startled, my friends; a singing mouse is not merely a dream of the imagination nor a fairy fable, but may be numbered among the realities of life; and although not of very common occurrence, yet there are those, perhaps, among your friends, who will vouch for the verity of the fact that such an animal as a singing mouse does really exist. Listen for a moment while I tell you the short history of one that came under my own observation.

One evening, as we were just preparing for a refreshing night's sleep, and were in a dreamy state of half unconsciousness as to what was going on around in the material world, we were awakened from our reveries by a succession of trilling notes, which came apparently from the centre of the room. The singing resembled very much the notes of the canary; but we owned no canary, and, besides, no ordinary bird swells forth with such a strain of music at the dead of night. On our jumping up, the song gradually subsided into a suppressed twittering, and then ceased altogether. After lighting a light and searching around, nothing could we find that in any way tended to explain the source from which the notes came that we had just heard. What could it mean? Surely it had not been a hallucination, for there were two of us that had heard it. What else could it have been but—spirits? No wonder that, as we stood there by the midnight taper, we conjured up in our minds all the stories that we had ever heard in regard to the visitations from the spirit-land; but among them all we had never heard of a singing one. On retiring again, and after all had become still as before, the song was repeated with still more clearness, and with more variation.

Every night these same noises were repeated, so that the last sound which greeted our ears as we left the outward world for a roam in the brilliantly lighted chamber of dreams, was the bird-like notes of our midnight vistor. At last we made the discovery that the sounds were always accompanied by scratching and gnawings usually made by a mouse; so we resolved at last to try to catch the little fellow, and see if he had any connection with the disturbance. Accordingly, setting a trap that would catch him alive, we waited impatiently for the morning to reveal the fruits of our efforts. The morning came at last, and with it a little mouse with a sleek fur in the trap. He differed none from ordinary mice, and we laughed at ourselves for ever supposing that the innocent little creature before us could be the author of the nightly song. But hark! Was it not he that made that chirp? Yes; and sure enough the little fellow is chirping and singing away to himself at a great rate—the very sound that had troubled us during the past nights. Our difficulty was solved.

We had an open wire cage for our little songster—whom we named Fido—with a bed of soft cotton in one corner, where he would roll himself up and sleep for hours at a time. He was a great curiosity and pet with the neighbors, who often came in to hear him sing.

Soon he became so tame that we allowed him to run around where he wished, and was so attached to his cage than he always returned to it again.

One day little Fido jumped out of the third-story window—which happened to be open—and ended sadly his career, as we thought, upon the pavement. We did not find his body until two or three days after, when a dead mouse was found near to the spot where he had fallen. Supposing it to be our Fido, we buried him with all the honor of a fallen hero. A slab of marble marked the place in the corner of the garden where his mortal remains lay, on which was inscribed an appropriate epitaph.

Several weeks after, however, we were startled from our sleep by the same notes of our bird-mouse which had greeted us on our first acquaintance; and, sure enough, the next morning we found our pet running around and chirping vociferously, as if he was highly delighted at finding himself once more at home.

Where he had been during the interval, and how he had escaped death from the fall from the third-story window, still remains a mystery. You may be sure we were glad to welcome back our "lost sheep." For a long time after this he continued to amuse us with his songs, until one day he was seized with convulsions and died. Thus was ended the career of this singular and amusing little animal. The marble slab was all ready in the corner of the garden to welcome the true Fido to his final resting-place.—Merry's Museum.

No Future Life out of Christ.

BY WM. WOOD.

As there is so great diversity of opinion (some of which is honest) on this most important subject, it would be well to consider a few points of interest. The main objections to this doctrine appear to be based upon the supposition that the teachings of our blessed Saviour are predicated on a resurrection from the dead of both the righteous and the wicked, as in John v., 29. "All that are in the graves shall come forth." Math. xxv., 46, "These shall go away into everlasting punishment" (after being raised from the dead, tried and convicted by the final judgment, as is generally supposed): "but the righteous into life eternal." Acts xxiv., 15, "There shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust;" and similar passages both in the Old and New Testaments. We must confess that these texts of Scripture, if we examine no further, are very strong supports to a future life for the wicked dead. If they are raised the sacred page will teach no other doctrine. First, we ask, what is a future life? The revelation from God alone can reveal it. It must be a better one than we now possess. If not, to the child of God it would be worthless. As we can form no idea of a future or a higher life save by inspiration of holy men, we must quote the sayings of the prophets and apostles. Isa. xxxv., 4, "Be strong . . . . fear not: behold, your God will come . . . . he will come and save you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap like an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing: and a highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called, The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass through it . . . . neither can fools err therein; no lion nor ravenous beast shall be found there, but the redeemed shall walk there. And the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion, and they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." These texts of Scripture, also, if we examine no further, are very strong supports of our question, What is a future life? If so, the word of our God will teach no other doctrine. The query arises in my mind, How came there to be, or how can there be, such deformity as the pious deaf, dumb, lame and blind in a future state? How can there be fools on the way of holiness and not err therein? Can there be fools in a future state who are righteous? A future life must be a spiritual life, not an animal one; hence, giving sight to the blind, making the lame to walk and the dumb to rejoice, if used in a literal sense, it appears to me, can only imply the full restoration of the animal or natural creation. But what saith the Scripture? Luke vii., 20, 22: "When the men were come unto him, they said, "John Baptist hath sent us unto thee, saying, Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" "Then Jesus answering said unto them, Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard; how that the blind see, the lame walk, the deaf hear." Acts iii., 6: "Then Peter said, In the name of Jesus Christ, rise up and walk. And he walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, and leaping, and praising God." Isaiah speaks of "The way of holiness:" Jesus says, John, xiv., 6: "I am the way; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." The wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein. 1 Cor. iv., 10, Paul says "We are fools for Christ's sake." 1 Cor. i., 21. It "pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." The beautiful imagery of Isaiah xxxv. doth shadow forth a future life, state, or condition; not future to us, but to himself and his people. He saw the way of holiness in that sublime code of laws that was uttered by him who spake as man never spake: he saw that the wayworn and weary traveller who was endeavoring to walk in this way of holiness would be esteemed as a fool by the wisdom of an ungodly age; he saw the lame man leap like an hart by the quickening influence of his inspiration as he says, Rise up and walk. And we also see, by an eye of faith, the blessed Saviour stand before the grave of Lazarus; the inmate is dead: the soft, whispering breezes fall unheeded over his remains: the whirlwind and the storm, the forked lightenings as they rive the mighty oak, the thunders of heaven may send forth peal after peal, until the earth rocks to and fro; no sound falls upon his ear; he is dead: no law of the elements, nought in the natural or animal creation of God can awake him. But Jesus speaks: let the whirlwind and the storm cease; let the lightnings be ashamed and hide themselves; let the thunders cease their roar, for Jesus speaks, yes, the Son of God speaks, and with a loud voice, says, "Lazarus, come forth:" and he that was dead lived again. It seems very clear that chapter xxxv., and other chapters of Isaiah, do not speak of, or even intimate, a life yet in the future, therefore what he saw cannot be the life, state, or condition belonging to a resurrection age, neither do the texts at the head of this article, especially as relate to the wicked dead, take place in a yet future age.

We will now turn our attention to some things that are connected with a yet future life. 1 Cor. xv., 44: "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body;" or, a better translation would read, There is an animal nature, or system, and there is a spiritual nature, or system. The first is not a spiritual system, but that which was animal; "and afterward that which was spiritual. The first man was of the earth, earthy" (whose nature or disposition was carnal, sensual, animal) "the second man was the Lord from heaven" (whose nature was holy, heavenly, spiriritual). We must be careful here, for strong minds have fallen into error, hence causing diversity of opinions on this chapter xv. Some one may say, Why use the term nature or system in the place of body? I answer, Paul says in verses 36 and 37, "Foolish man; that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die; and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain. But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him; and to every seed his own body." We will paraphrase this 37th verse. And that which thou sowest will not be this body, or the body that shall be, but the bare grain; therefore, if we say it is sown a natural or animal body, the body takes the place of the grains, and the body or grain being animal, can never produce a body that is spiritual. It is the bare grain that is sown, not the body, whether it be natural or spiritual; under the natural law of generation the body is not sown to produce a body, but the seed is sown, and through this instrumentality a body is brought forth, just such a one as God has seen fit to bestow. Paul speaks of a spiritual life by the similitude of the natural grains. He says, "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die;" and as we have already shown that it cannot be the body that will die, but the bare grain; it may chance of wheat or of some other grains, but never a body: even so, to make the analogy perfect, must be the nature of a spiritual existence. First, the seed is sown. But where? It cannot be in heated ovens, upon the mountain side, or in any other place of deposit belonging to the animal or earthly creation. But where or when can it be sown? It is sown while men are enjoying life, health, strength, and are in possession of good understanding; and at the appointed time, whether the body be dead or living this seed will produce a body as God hath seen fit to give, which will be a spiritual body. Yes, there is an animal nature, or system, and there is a spiritual nature, or system. Thus conveying very forcibly to our minds that God is the governor and the ruler over two distinct creations. How many more is beyond our conception. He hath revealed himself to man from the beginning through the works of his creation. In six days God made heaven and earth, the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and last, though not least, he made man, whom he adapted for the position he was to occupy. In these things we have a view of God's first (generally called) natural creation. Under this law, or creation, all living creatures, wherein is the breath of lives, are mortal, or perishable. The first man, though a man of earth, was the son of God under this natural law; consequently he is mortal, and he is not exempt from death, though he be a son. Through this law man can never obtain a knowledge of a future or a higher life. It cannot be discerned through this channel, nor can our first parents give us any knowledge of another existence. God hath not revealed a future, spiritual life through the natural or earthly law, but hath revealed one through the gospel; for God spake in times past by the prophets, but hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son. The first Adam (man of earth) was wholly dependent on a second man for an imperishable existence. The first Adam was a son, and our first parent, under the natural law. The second Adam was a Son, and our first parent under a spiritual law. The first came into existence full grown, without a spiritual nature. The second came into existence full grown by a resurrection from the dead, without an animal nature. Thus we see that God hath made known to man two phases of life; the one a natural or animal; the other a spiritual; that one of which the first Adam is father is perishable; the other, the one of which Jesus Christ is father, is eternal.

Lawrence, Mass., Oct. 20, 1867.

Christian Retirement.

Social devotion is no substitute for closet duties, for only by secret communion with God are the best elements of Christian character developed and matured. There is reason to fear that the multiplication of social meetings has drawn many away from secret prayer. Rev. J. C. Ryle gives some important hints on this point: "We are told that when the apostles returned from their first ministerial work, our Lord 'took them and went aside privately into a desert place.' We cannot doubt that this was done with a deep meaning. It was meant to teach the great lesson that those who do public work for others must be careful to make time for being alone with God. The lesson is one which many Christians will do well to remember. Occasional retirement, self-inquiry, meditation, and secret communion with God, are absolutely essential to spiritual health. The man who neglects them is in great danger of a fall. To be always preaching, teaching, speaking, writing, and working public works, is unquestionably a sign of zeal; but it is not always a sign of zeal according to knowledge. It often leads to untoward consequences. We must take time occasionally for sitting down and calmly looking within, and examining how matters stand between our own selves and Christ. The omission of the practice is the true account of many a backsliding which shocks the church and gives occasion to the world to blaspheme. Many could say with sorrow, in the words of Canticles, "They make me keeper of the vineyards, but my own vineyard have I not kept." Cant. i., 6.

Assumptions.

It is assumed that the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, is the Roman church, or papacy.

It is assumed that this was set up in 532 or 533.

It is assumed that the length of this abomination was to be 1,290 days, and that those days stand for years.

It is assumed that the Lord so far changed his mind, as to shorten those days to 1,260.

It is assumed that the expression, "In those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened," refers to the 1,260 days, and that it means that before those days would end, the tribulation would end, and that it did end twelve years before these days ended, and so the Lord not only shortened the days of tribulation from 1,290 to 1,260, but made another change and concluded not to have the tribulation so long as that by twelve years.

It is assumed that the seventy weeks were cut off from the 2,300 days.

It is assumed that the angel, in explaining the vision, did not make it sufficiently plain, when he said days; so we must correct him, by saying, he meant years.

It is assumed that the 1,260, 1,290, and 1,335 days, meaning years, commenced at the same time.

It is assumed that the 1,260 days ended in 1792 or 1793.

It is assumed that in seventy-five days or years from the above date the Lord will come.

It is assumed that coming to the 1,335 days, is coming to the end of them.

It is assumed that believing all these assumptions, is to believe the present truth.

It is assumed that these are what the wise are to understand.

It is assumed that any school-boy can understand this subject.

It is assumed that those who do not understand and believe these assumptions are foolish virgins.

Would it not be far better to try to make men believe what the word of the Lord does say, rather than to believe what it does not say? [Eld.] J. S. White.

Rare Jewels.

A lady of the Indian race lay on the couch of her sick room reading a novel. She had been well known in her own country for her riches, and envied there as the possessor of the finest collection of jewels. She married an Englishman, and went to live in Britain. Her husband had been proud to take her to the gay parties of which they were both so fond; for all admired her, and the jewels she wore attracted wondering eyes. But after a few years in Britain, her cheek had faded. The doctors now said it was consumption. She was prohibited from the gay parties, confined to her room, and her strength was fast giving way.

The lady was a Mohammedan: the faith she held gave her no comfort; her sole amusement was in reading the tales of that world outside where she could shine no more. The sick-nurse, who sat in her room, often raised her eyes from her work to watch her patient, so like a prisoner shut up in our cold country, far from her own sunny land. Nurse kept her Bible always near her, and every now and then would read a word to cheer herself, longing to put it into the lady's hand in place of the foolish tale she read. But "He that winneth souls is wise," not only wise in having chosen the highest kind of work, but wise in waiting till God shall open his way to do it.

"Nurse," the lady said at length, "I think you must find it very dull to be shut up in this room with me all day long, and to have nothing to amuse you." "Oh! no ma'am." "I don't find it dull at all; I am always cheerful, and I am not sorry for myself to be shut up in this room." The lady thought this very strange, and said, "Go and fetch that box that holds my jewels; it will help to amuse us to look at it this dull day." So the nurse fetched the box of jewels, and the lady unlocked it, and spread a quantity of them on the table. "Now, nurse, would you not like to have some of these jewels?" "No, ma'am, not at all . . . . for I have jewels much finer than yours." "How can that be, nurse? Mine are the finest jewels in the land. Where are yours? You never wear them!" So the nurse held up the Bible, saying, "My jewels are all in this book." The lady thought there were one or two jewels hidden about the book, and said, "Take them out and show them to me," "Why, ma'am my jewels are so precious I can only show you one at a time." Then she opened her Bible, and read the text, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content." She told her mistress that, though a poor woman, she had no wish to be a rich one, for God knew what was best for her. She said also, that her treasure was in heaven, and that she did not so much mind the trials of this life, because she was looking for happiness in the kingdom of God and Jesus Christ. It pleased God to open that lady's heart that she should attend to the things that the nurse spoke. Acts xvi, 14. "Why, nurse, I never heard any thing like that. How happy you must be to feel as you do. I wish I could do the same!" And then the nurse told her that she had not learned to feel thus of herself; that it was God who had put it into her heart, and that he would do the same for her also, if she would ask him. "Well, nurse," said the lady, "I should like to see another of your jewels—that which you have shown me now is so beautiful." But the nurse saw that the poor lady was tired, and thought it was enough for one day; but promised she should see one jewel more to-morrow. So the next day the lady said, "Show me another jewel." Nurse opened her Bible again, and read, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." The Holy Spirit was at work in the lady's heart. She called upon the Lord Jesus to save her soul. She gave up reading the idle books. She did not care for her jewels now. She had found one that was priceless. Her body wasted day by day. But her soul was joyful in her Saviour. She was a wonder to many—a bright monument of God's power to save.—Selected.

One of Nature's Noblemen.

My thoughts were far from noblemen of any kind, as I stood mid a throng of others in one of the elegant dry goods establishments situated on the fashionable promenade of our thriving metropolis.

I was one of the many who lined the polished counters, looking with admiring eyes at the beautiful fabrics so temptingly displayed. The half hour's absence of the obliging clerk who would find the style of goods I required only in a distant part of the house, allowed me time to be entertained with watching the streams of fair ones coming and departing.

Beautiful faces alight with happy life, and the excitement of "shopping;" older countenances with—"I'm determined to drive a bargain!" looking forth from wrinkles, and just perceptible "crows' feet," evidences of how human nature unconsciously displays itself. And the diversion it was to hear those different voices—one sounding so sweet and clear, that it produced more smiles on the face of the polite and obliging salesman, and caused the very goods to be handled with cheerfulness that was a marked contrast to his fellow-clerk, whose customer was deploring high prices, and disparaging material, in the querulous sharp tones that set some sensitive nerves on edge.

And while I waited, and made mental criticisms to amuse myself, an incident occurred a little out of the common observation of shop visitors.

A slight, small woman, pale, sad-eyed, and wearing faded black, came with a new influx of visitors, walking timidly, and casting half frightened glances at the piles of pretty stuffs.

A bright, neat material on the counter near where I stood caught her eye; she tremblingly inquired the price; when she was told, my sharp eyes saw the bill twisted in the quivering fingers with a perplexed, troubled air, and my ears heard the murmured—

"Annie would need ten yards!"

"Will you take it?"

She lifted a pale, meek face, and answered sadly—

"I cannot; I didn't think it would be so much."

She was turning away, when a gentleman, who like myself had been looking and listening, drew near, asking of the clerk,

"What does the lady want? I will wait upon her—you attend to those customers below."

The respectful manner with which he was obeyed, made me at once aware that he was the proprietor, and I was a little surprised at what followed.

"How many yards did you want madam?"

Her astonishment was amusing.

"I can't take it sir."

"I am not talking about that," with a smile, "just answer my question."

He cut off more than she falteringly mentioned, and while he was packing up she found voice to tell him that ill-health had forced her to relinquish the work with which she had obtained a support for herself and two fatherless children. But the eldest girl—barely seventeen—was going to teach in a week, and she needed a dress to make her presentable.

He made no reply, taking in silence the poor little bill she offered—the very last of a small hoard—and from his own portemonnaie added a greenback, the amount of which I could not see, slipped both in between the cords which bound the parcel, and handed the latter to her with—

"There, tell your daughter a stranger wishes her all success."

He walked away hastily to avoid her tearful thanks, and the little woman looked as she turned to depart, like one in a dream.

It was a simple act, unobtrusively, quietly done; and not a week before, that same gentleman had been pronounced uncharitable, because his name would not be put down to swell the list for aid toward some missionary scheme.

He may withold his benevolence from a popular enterprise that would promulgate his name to the world, but for true, unostentatious charity (since I've learned that this was not the only case) he is—I thought then, and think now—one of "Nature's Noblemen."

Dearly I should like to give his name, but it would seem like desecration to draw aside the veil from such noble goodness. So let him in secret dispense his charity, while angels praise, and surely God will reward.

The Two Characters.—There is a negativeness of character which is often mistaken for amiability, or impartiality, or some other kindred virtue. The person possessing it never takes sides on a question of importance enlisting the interest and action of men, and is equally well pleased whichever party wins in the contest. The future of the church, of the government, of society, of man, is of but little account to him, so that he is left undisturbed in his quiet, plodding, aimless journey through life. He avoids the opposition, strife and bitterness encountered by the positive man, but then he is practically, and for all useful purposes, nobody; accomplishes nothing in life, and dies to be forgotten as soon as he is buried.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity," as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

Present Ignorance and Future Knowledge.

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

"For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as I also am known." 1 Cor. xiii., 12.

The present and future states are here presented. The first as an imperfect one, and the other as "perfect," verse 10. "Now" we occupy the first state, even the best of us; for Paul did not except himself, who surely might, if any one.

"That which is perfect" (ver. 10) is future—yet to come. If an apostle thus speaks of himself, in contrasting the two states, how much more does it become us to speak of our present attainments with modesty, and in charity for others. Charity, or love, is the grace which the apostle is specially enforcing in this chapter; and the description he gives of it, and its value, is worthy of deep consideration by all. Without it, the highest eloquence is but as "sounding brass:" without it, the most perfect acquaintance with mysterious subjects would avail us nothing: without it, the most miracle-working faith is nothing to our real advantage: without it, the most extensive distribution of our goods to the poor would avail us nothing: without it, zeal for truth which might lead us to martyrdom, would "profit nothing." This charity is a grace that is "kind"—not "boastful"—not "envious"—does not lead to doing that which "causeth shame"—it is not exclusive, to seek only its "own"—it is "not passionate"—"thinketh no evil" where none appears—it "rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth"—it "beareth all things," i. e., all the weaknesses, etc., of others—it "believeth all things, hopeth all things, and endureth all." It "will never cease" (Syriac), "but prophesyings will end, and tongues will be silent."

Such is the character, value, and durability of charity, or love. It is pure and perfect in its nature, and stands first or chief in the true Christian character; so that if this be wanting nothing else will avail us. Present attainments are imperfect; i. e., we know but "little of much" that may be known, and that will hereafter be made clear. Our present imperfection forms a claim on us all for the exercise of charity to the full extent the apostle has described and defined.

"Then," in our text, refers to that "perfect" state (ver. 10) when our imperfection shall be succeeded by perfection. Hence that state can be no other than the kingdom of God yet future. There is to be "no night there;" knowledge will be perfect. Not that all will be known immediately on entering there that ever can be; but whatever subject we are called to exercise our minds upon, we shall see and understand without liability to error, as we now are: doubt will not disturb us, as now, as to the correctness of our conceptions. "Now," in this present state, "we see through a glass, darkly," or but imperfectly. We see and know now as by a mirror—and that an imperfect one—which gives us, not the very things themselves, but only a reflection of the realities. So that while we obtain some knowledge, it is more or less imperfect from the imperfection of the medium through which it is received. But "when that which is perfect is come"—the mirror, or glass, dispensed with, so that we see the reality itself—"then" we "shall know even as" we "also are known:" error will cease, and we shall see all things clearly and truly. Such is to be the future state, or the perfection attained by those who are accounted worthy to obtain that inheritance.

We shall now proceed to notice

I. Some of the things connected with the Perfection of the Future State, or the Kingdom of God.

1. We we may expect perfect light.

Our teachers will not be erring and imperfect mortals, but endowed with a clear and purified intellect, grasping by intuition any and every subject presented for contemplation. Under such instructors there will be no chance for error.

.2 Then we shall have perfect faculties.

"Now," we are enfeebled in all our faculties. Our understanding is darkened, and our judgment warped, oftentimes from various and unavoidable causes; causes over which we had no control, and from which, for a time at least, we could not possibly extricate ourselves. Our bodily organization is now more or less deranged, and often has an overpowering and irresistible influence on our mental operations, so that imperfection is unavoidable. Sincerely as we may desire freedom from error, and clear conceptions of truth, we cannot always arrive at it, especially in its unmixed form.

But then, in that perfect state, mortality will have been exchanged for immortality: our organization made perfect, all derangement at an end, every faculty will have free and untrammelled exercise: the judgment cannot be turned aside, because the understanding is unclouded, and the perception clear and certain. Knowledge will not then be sought by painful means or tiresome research, but will, probably, arise spontaneously on the presentation of the object for contemplation. We pass to notice,

II. Some of the Subjects of Future Knowledge.

A more clear and full knowledge

1. Of God the Father.

That our knowledge on this topic is painfully imperfect now, no one can doubt, who has ever attempted to think. Moses felt this most keenly, when, after all previous manifestations, he cried out, "I beseech thee show me thy glory." The answer he received strikingly illustrates the doctrine of our text. He was informed that now, in this present state, such knowledge as he desired could not be obtained. "Thou canst not see my face, for there shall no man see me and live." Such knowledge as he desired could not be endured in our present condition: we can know God but imperfectly now. His back parts only could Moses see. God is now only known by what he has done, or is doing. Enough is seen to satisfy the reflecting mind that "he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." "But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away:" then shall we "see his glory," and comprehend God as "eye hath not seen, not ear heard:" then shall our largest desire after the knowledge of God the Father be gratified; for Christ glorified will be our teacher in this grand acquirement; and "no man knoweth who the Father is but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him." Luke x., 22. Then—in that future state—we may expect to attain a knowledge of God the Father which shall give us unutterable delight, and be a fountain of inconceivable joy. No more painful inquiries will disturb our bosoms on this glorious theme.

2. Then—in that perfect state—shall we have a clearer knowledge of God's works in creation.

If in our present dark state we see enough of them to cause us to exclaim, "How marvellous are thy works," what may we not expect, then, when we shall no longer "see through a glass darkly!" How must our knowledge increase, and with what satisfaction, when, instead of the many doubtful speculations to which we are now subjected, God's works will be all laid open to the inquiring mind, and we shall see and know the harmony and glory of them without mistake and without doubt.

3. Another subject of future and clearer knowledge will be God's ways to us, in his providential dealings, while we were in this state.

Often we have been bewildered in looking at the mystery of his dealings with us; but hereafter all will be made plain. Our knowledge will then unravel all, and we shall admire the wisdom which—we shall then see—ordered "all things well." What satisfaction and consolation must such knowledge produce! "What I do," said Jesus to Peter, "thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

4. Another theme of knowledge is our Lord Jesus Christ.

Truly on this subject now we "see through a glass darkly;" but "that which is perfect" will "come;" "then" our knowledge of the Son of God will be such as to remove all doubt. We shall have a full and clear knowledge of him.

1. As the Fountain of our Life.

We know, indeed, now, theoretically, that "Christ is our life"—and the only fountain of life to the perishing children of Adam—but who comprehends or sees—except "through a glass darkly"—the magnitude or importance of this truth? How all but impossible is it to conceive that the entire future of our existence or life, rests on Christ alone: that without him there is no future life for any child of Adam. How difficult the conception, and how little we now understand of it; and yet a more amazing fact is connected with it, which is, that Christ will eternally remain the fountain of our life; so that no possible period of eternity to come can ever be reached when Christ will not be just as necessary to our continued existence, or life, as the first hour we entered on immortality. Amazing thought! How little dow we know of it now; yet we shall know hereafter: "then that which is in part shall be done away." "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son: he that hath the Son hath life: and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." Such is the testimony of God. Could the fountain of this life dry up, the streams would cease to flow and universal death follow. How important, then, is Christ to all who would live forever. We shall know the truth hereafter with a clearness which enters not into our hearts' contemplation now.

Another fruitful topic of knowledge, which will be seen in a fulness of which we have but a faint conception now, is

2. The Love of Christ in our Redemption.

This topic is one which defies all comparison, and to which no illustration can do justice We can talk of earthly love; we can fancy those who were high in rank, and surrounded with worldly honor and greatness, rolling in unbounded wealth, who have been led, by some exterior charm, to stoop to raise the object that has attracted their love to be a partner in their inheritance; but whoever saw one divesting himself of rank, standing and wealth—thus reducing himself to scorn, disgrace and poverty—to raise up one who was without exterior charms, and had naught but her miseries to attract and command attention? Even if such a case could be found, it would not compare with the love of Christ. The objects of his love were sinful, mortal, corruptible, condemned and dying beings. For such, "though he was rich, yet for" their "sakes he became poor; and though he was "the brightness of God's glory, and the express image of his person," yet he "made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." He endured reproach and suffering, such as mortal never, beside him, passed through! What prompted him to all this? Love: that love which all the waves of sorrow and anguish that rolled over him, and which he foresaw would overtake him, could not and did not quench. But how little do we now know or understand of all this. When the perfect future shall open up, with its unclouded light, then shall we know—and it will be a fruitful field of knowledge and delight—how much and how great was "the love of Christ."

3. The Glory and Exaltation of Christ will be another glorious theme on which to contemplate, and from which we shall derive knowledge and boundless pleasure.

Of this, at present, we see only "through a glass, darkly;" but if this dark view was so glorious as presented to Peter, James and John on the mount of transfiguration, what will it be when he is seen on the throne of his glory, with all the holy angels for attendants and servants? If a view of his glory, when he appeared alone to John on the Isle of Patmos, overwhelmed the beloved disciple, still in mortality, what shall not that glory be, when it can be beheld by saints made immortal? Connect this with the perfect knowledge of all the Son of God passed through in his love to us, to reach that height of glory, and a clear perception that he is "worthy" of the glory, and what a fountain of knowledge and enjoyment will be opened to our minds therein.

4. The Ability of Christ to do for his Followers will be another theme of contemplation, where knowledge may find stores inexhaustible.

It is only by dwelling in that rich storehouse that we can ever know its fulness. We perceive now some small outgoings of his power, but they are only as the flashing rays of the early dawn, which indicate the approach of the rising sun that is to make glorious the cold earth, and inspire it with heat and life that shall make all animate nature to rejoice.

Christ's power to do for his friends has no limit, but is commensurate with their utmost desires and capacities. To know this in the clear light of the "perfect" hereafter! O, what knowledge! and what a fountain of knowledge! "We shall see him as he is, and be like him," because "all things are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." Truly "such knowledge" will then be attained as seems now "too wonderful for" us.

5. The value of Life—and the awfulness of Death, from which we are redeemed, will be subjects of a more full and perect knowledge hereafter.

A life never to be interrupted by death, nor any of those nameless casualties to which we are now subjected, and which so often embitter life, filling it with fear, pain and sorrow, who can now comprehend its value? Such a life belongs to the future or "perfect" state. Its real value can only be understood by its actual possession. In such a life, what attainments in knowledge may be expected: how boundless and full must it be. A living, intelligent existence will then be seen in its true value, and be the source of uninterrupted and immeasurable delight and enjoyment.

By the contrast, we shall then know and understand the awfulness of death, from which we have been redeemed. When rare sights and great enjoyments are realized, even in this present state, how often do those who have enjoyed them say to others who did not, "You do not know what you have lost." And not unfrequently they add, "I would not have missed it for the world." What, then, must that death be which eternally excludes those who remain under its power—unredeemed—from a participation in the wonders of knowledge and joy of such a life as the future shall be? Can such a death be otherwise than awful? Is it not a fearful penalty for sin? Does it not present terror sufficient to awaken the most stupid and hardened? And why does it not thus awaken? Is it not to be feared one grand reason is, men, by their fellows, are assured they shall live forever—that they "shall not surely die," though they pass the present state in sin, and luxuriating in sensual gratifications? They do not believe death is certain: they fancy that somehow they shall live forever, though they now live in sin. But death, with its eternal dominion, will surely be the portion of all who do not harmonize with God in Christ, the only Life-giver. The awfulness of their fate, however, can only be fully understood and known when the immense value of life is comprehended in the "perfect" state to come. "Then" will all the redeemed know perfectly that which can be known only "in part" now, relating to life and death; that knowledge will be eternally increasing, and the value of the former be ever more and more vivid, while death can never appear less awful, and the folly of those who chose it, by living in sin, will continue to be more and more apparent.

6. One other point suggested by our text is worthy of attention. It is the more full and perfect knowledge of The Persons of the Redeemed. "Then shall I know even as I also am known."

The thought, "Shall I know friends there?" has often come over some minds. Paul has settled that question. The increased state of knowledge forbids it should be otherwise. From Abel to the last of all the redeemed will our knowledge extend; and it seems likely such will be the intellectual perfection then enjoyed, that we will not need any one to point out the ancient or modern worthies, but we shall recognize them on sight, by intuition. No sooner will an individual be presented to our attention than we shall know who he is, and what is his relation to the redeemed. The apostle's language seems to import this: imperfect knowledge has passed away, and clear conceptions of men and things have taken its place. "Then shall I know even as I also am known." If this will be true of Paul, why not equally true of all the redeemed? We think it will be: and what a source of enjoyment will this knowledge be: and how inexhaustible!

After all we have said, "Now we see through a glass darkly." How little can our highest thoughts attain toward that future knowledge. We are, at best, as little children now. How are we admonished to exercise "charity," or love toward all around us; we know but little, and that little mixed with much imperfection. The time for the "perfect" has not yet come; but we trust it is at hand. In the mean time, let all live under the abiding conviction of our present liability to err, and cultivate that patient spirit toward all men which shall make us to resemble the meek and lowly Jesus; for on our likeness to him depends our future life, and the boundless knowledge pertaining to that state.

"Cold Water to a Thirsty Soul:"

OR, AN INTERESTING LETTER FROM A GOSPEL MINISTER.

Bethlehem, Pa., Nov. 3, 1867.

My very dear Br. Storrs: This is Sunday afternoon. Thank the Lord for our Sundays! They remind us of that glorious prophecy—"But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings," etc.

Long have I wished to write to you. "I long to see you, that I may be comforted together with you, by the mutual faith both of you and me." I have known you for years. 'Tis true, I never saw you face to face—but I know you, and I know you to love you. I became acquainted with you in 1843—twenty-four years ago! I have one copy of "The Midnight Cry" left, "Vol. IV., New York, Thursday, May 4th, 1843. Nos. 5 and 6. Joshua V. Himes, Publisher; N. Southard, Editor."

In this number are several articles, written by George Storrs. That name is one of our household words. Although you have somewhat changed your views since then, even as I have, still that number continues to be highly interesting to me. It recalls the year when, through the mercy of my God and Saviour, I became a Premillenarian.

To you it will not appear strange, that during so many years, I changed in some of my opinions. Twenty-three years ago the glorious truth, "Life only in Christ," was unknown to me. At that time I did not believe in the annihilation of the wicked. Nevertheless, I had serious doubts regarding the punishment of eternal suffering. My view of the Atonement agreed with the view generally held; but, even at that time, I had my misgivings. I well remember preparing a sermon on the Sufferings of Christ. I wished to show that he suffered in our stead. I asked myself: What is our threatened punishment? Answer: Eternal suffering. And did Christ suffer eternally? Answer: No. How, then, can this be reconciled? I consulted different authors, but found no solution to this question, except that of Rambach, a pious and much celebrated Lutheran preacher of the last century. The following is a literal translation:

"None need marvel how the short sufferings of one solitary person—the latter part of which sufferings did not continue four and twenty hours—should be of efficacy to redeem from eternal death [meaning eternal suffering], a multitude of sinners, who exceed in number the dust of the earth and the sand of the sea shore, and to satisfy for the innumerable insults given to an infinite Majesty. For, what is wanting in the length of these sufferings is supplied by the incomprehensible worth of the sufferer. This gives short suffering an eternal validity; for, he was the Lord of Glory and the Prince of Life."

This, however, was not satisfactory; but, at that time, I endeavored to accept it. To proceed: The first that I heard of the annihilation of the wicked was during my theological course. Our excellent German professor used as a text book Reinhart's Dogmatics. Years after I was fortunate enough to procure a copy of this work. In writing of the Psychopannychites, or those who believe in the sleep of the soul, he says, that this doctrine finds no warrant in the Bible; especially not in the New Testament. Under the same rubric he says: "The opinion of many Socinians, that God will once destroy the souls of the wicked, is against reason and the Scriptures."

I have mentioned the above merely to show that even then, in 1831 or 1832—36 years ago—I began to ruminate on these subjects. Soon after I became a Universalist. I read much in a paper edited by A. C. Thomas, Price, and Sawyer. There were some beautifully written articles in that publication. A pious Presbyterian minister, thank God, disabused my mind of these wrong views. This happened either in 1836, or in the beginning of 1837. From that year I served as a minister in five different Moravian congregations. Since 1857 I have been principal of the Moravian Parochial School, at Bethlehem, Pa. I still occasionally preach. Since 1843 my sermons have been tinctured, more or less, with Advent truths. As regards the final state of the wicked, I merely quoted Scripture texts. Very often the words of St. Paul, in his second epistle to the Thessalonians—"Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." In 1855, a little tract (now lost) elucidating the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked, came into my hands. At last, thank God, Br. G. Storrs loomed up again. I had never forgotten the name; but why it was that I very seldom heard anything of this dear man, I cannot tell. Although not acquainted with Josiah Litch, I had the privilege of hearing him preach three times. I have his work, "Messiah's Throne and Millennial Glory." I always loved the man, but could not agree with him in every respect. I now read the Herald of Life. Praise the Lord for this paper. Much I have been benefitted by it. Thus also the sermons of Br. Storrs have been the means of feeding my soul. Do you not see that the Lord has wonderfully and graciously favored me? I am intimately acquainted with Rev. Edwin Reinke, one of the writers in the Prophetic Times. I love him as a brother. However, on the doctrine of "Life only in Christ" we do not agree. I know Dr. J. A. Piers, an excellent man. He was once a member of my congregation, in Maryland. Before I became a Millenarian, he went to Gettysburg College. I am very fortunate in having several learned Millenarian works, written by doctors of Divinity (so called), in Germany. Thus, you see, that I am not entirely ignorant with regard to the views of men on the Advent of our Saviour.

How often did I wish for an hour's talk with Br. Storrs! I would much love to see you—and, the Lord willing, I may still be favored to see you before the Lord comes. What a glorious meeting when he does come! Brothers and sisters, who never saw one another, and such who did not know each other, will then meet. Hallelujah!

And now, dear Brother, one request: Will you not drop me a few lines? Be they ever so few, they will be welcomed by my whole family. My good wife loves to read your paper: she is a thorough believer in "Life only in Christ," and a true Christian. I cannot greet you with a kiss of brotherly love; but I send it. "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and your whole spirit, and soul, and body, be preserved blameless to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it."

"Brother, pray for us." "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with us all. Amen."

Your brother, Ambr. Rondthaler.

Note by the Editor.—We do not suppose Br. Rondthaler expected his letter would get into the Herald of Life; but it is too good for us to enjoy alone, and we wish others to help us thank God for the consolation, and we know they will. We hope he may let us hear from him often; may the Lord abundantly bless him.

Nearer.

"One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er—
I'm nearer my home to-day
Than I've ever been before;
Nearer my Father's house,
Where the many mansions be;
Nearer the great white throne,
Nearer the jasper sea;
Nearer the bound of life
Where we lay our burdens down;
Nearer leaving my cross,
Nearer wearing my crown."

What is the Gospel?

G.—Good morning, Br. O. I hope you have considered the subject of our last conversation.

O.—I have, and confess that I like your views; if they were only true they would please me, for I think they harmonize more with the love of God than the old doctrine of immortality to all men, and consequently the eternal torment of the wicked. I am aware that the doctrine of future torment has made benevolent men Univers'alists and Infidels; but it will not do to let our feelings or our benevolence prejudice us against what is the truth. Against the doctrine of no resurrection life to the wicked, I confess there are some very plain texts of Scripture; for instance, what do you do with John v., 28; Acts xxiv., 15; beside some others that say the wicked will have a resurrection from the dead?

G.—You ask me what I do with the texts you mentioned. There is no need for me to do anything with them until you show me they are part of, or embraced in the gospel. You entirely mistake the tenor of our articles. The subject is, What is the gospel? We say it is a proclamation of good news, which good news is, "Life from the dead to all that believe in Jesus the life-giver." Now, it is your place to show that the gospel brings life or good news to the wicked: which you failed to do.

O.—I understand you to ask me to show by what power the wicked dead receive a resurrection; and I have given you two texts to show that they will have a resurrection; and these texts are plain and positive; neither can you give me one instance in which Christ says they will not have a resurrection.

G.—Not so fast: you are most too positive; you may be compelled to take back some things, and modify others. That the passages are so very plain, I am not so sure; one thing is self-evident, they do not receive a resurrection through the gospel. According to your understanding of the gospel, we will have to change some passages, in their reading. Jesus says, John, vi., 38, "I came down from heaven not to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me." And that we might not be mistaken in that will, he informs us, "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day," v. 54. "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day;" (improved) "but the wicked have eternal life without eating of me, and consequently will raise themselves up at the last day; for it is not the Father's will that I should do it."

O.—But you have made me say what I am not willing to admit. The Bible does not read so; and you have no right to make me say so.

G.—I am only making your objection to my views of the gospel appear in plain English; the gospel comes as a blessing to all that receive it. It brings life to the dead through Jesus Christ. It takes no notice of the wicked. It is a covenant of life to all that accept it.

O.—But give me one instance in which Jesus said he would not raise the wicked from the dead and I will believe it.

G.—Very good: we will hold you to your promise; and we will give you, and have already given you, more than one, and will prove it before any court in the land.

The Constitution of Pennsylvania says, every white freeman of the age of twenty one years, with certain qualifications shall be entitled to vote. Does it say, blacks, minors, and women shall not vote? You answer, yes; and so does every judge, and every person in the land, that has tried the issue. Yet it does not say, in so many words, they shall not vote. And in the same language Jesus says, the wicked shall not rise in the last day, when he says, "he that eateth of this bread shall live forever; and I will raise him up at the last day." He that does not eat of this bread will not live forever; for I will not raise him up at the last day.

O.—I do not see the force of your argument, neither do I see what the Constitution of Pennsylvania has to do with the subject.

G.—You must certainly see the object I have in view, which is to prove there is a positive and negative in language, as well as in every thing else; and so it is understood by the great mass of mankind, except it is those who call themselves theologians. Now for instance, take the laws of our own country. They expressly say, in the positive style, All persons, able bodied, between the age of 21 and 45 years, shall be enrolled in the Army of the United States. When the proclamation was made, the man one day over 45 threw up his hat and said, "I am clear." The minor, under 21, says, "I am not in the company:" the man who supposed he was feeble in body hurried off to see if he was included in the able bodied; and why all this? Because the negative language, understood by all those parties said, "The man over 45, the young man under 21, and the feeble bodied, and women, were not to be enrolled, or do military duty. This is the common understanding of our language. So likewise in the gospel; it includes in the resurrection those who conform to the conditions, and leaves out those who do not.

O.—It seems very clear that the principle is correct so far as it relates to our times, but that is no evidence that the same principle was understood in the days of our Lord and his diciples.

G.—In our next, we will show that the same method of expression was understood in the Bible. Yours, J. GRIM.

THE INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

"No religion has produced such abundance of enthusiasm, fanaticism, false doctrines, and intolerance, as Christianity."—Infidel.

RESPONSE. Because no religion has roused, awakened, set in motion, so many ignorant and untutored minds. Most other religions have allowed men's minds to slumber; they have allowed men to be brutal, animal; to pass through life without thinking on the great subjects of God and providence, of duty and immortality. And if men never think on these subjects, they cannot think wrong: if men never move, it is impossible for them to go astray: if they never act, it is impossible for them to act amiss. Christianity will not allow men's minds to slumber; it will have them awake and active. Its object is to make men intelligent and godlike; to make them think, and judge, and feel, and act. It aims at raising men to God: at making them sharers of his nature, partakers of his wisdom, his purity, and his love. And it is impossible to do this, without being the occasion of many and mournful excesses. Children are sure to stumble, when they first begin to walk; and the mind will stumble, when it first begins to think. We, none of us, should be able to thread our way through a wood with ten thousand false tracks, without getting, at times, a little out of our way; and the mind cannot find its way through a world of errors and delusions, without at times being led astray. It is impossible to conduct a multitude of free and thinking creatures through the measureless distances between the cradle of a child and the mansions of the cheurbim and seraphim in the kingdom of God, without tremendous risk. When I think of man's nature, and consider the object and character of Christianity, I cannot wonder that the gospel, in the accomplishment of its great and godlike, its infinitely benevolent, but infinitely difficult task, should prove the occasion of many, and strange, and mournful tragedies.

But the gospel does not cause the evils which appear in its spread; it only reveals them. It does not make the weaknesses and faults of its disciples: it only makes them manifest. It draws forth man's mind in all varieties of circumstances, in the midst of all kinds of difficulties and trials; and thus reveals its powers and its weaknesses, its noble capacities of what is good and great, and its terrible liabilities to what is bad and fearful. It is a moral or spiritual influence, making a new creation, forming a vast universe of bright and fair, of beautiful and godlike creatures; and it is not to be wondered at if, in its difficult and perilous operations, it should, at times, give rise to strange disorders, to terrible and dark catastrophies. The creation of a universe of great and godlike beings is inconceivably more difficult than the creation of the earth and heavens; and if the first creation had its chaos, no wonder that the second should have one too.

LANDIS ON ANNIHILATION.

"There is not one passage in all God's word that even implies, much less announces, the idea of annihilation in respect to man, unless it be in respect to man as man, and not in respect to his constituent parts. As to those parts the body nor spirit is annihilated, although man, viewed as a composite being, ceases at death, and continues thus till the resurrection. Such a cessation as this we ever have asserted, for it is plainly announced by most of the passages urged against us by our adversaries."—Landis, page 255.

The annihilation of "man as man" is all we ever contended for. We never did hold what Landis' insinuation affirms, that the "constituent parts," which went to make man, were annihilated. But death—as the penalty of the divine law—leaves those "parts" just in the same condition they were in before man's creation. "Dust thou art, unto dust thou shalt return," is the declaration of the LORD God. That, surely, is a perfect dissolution or dissolving of the man. Landis has granted us, in the above concession, all we have ever affirmed; and says, moreover, "Such a concession as this we ever have asserted"! We place a mark of surprise after this announcement of L.; and we think his editor ought to have done the same; for it must have been a new thought in the "orthodox" theory of immortality, which has always affirmed "the soul is the man."

AN EXTRACT.—Would Christians give up the fables, and sectarian feelings they cherish, and receive the unvarnished truth of God, and then not be ashamed to proclaim it to the world, how many thousands—who have been driven into Universalism and infidelity by the endless torment theory—would forsake the way of sin and death, and lay hold on eternal life. What fearful responsibility then, rests upon all rejectors of the truth, and especially the watchmen on the walls of Zion, who fail to present it to their people, or refuse to have it presented to them.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 13, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

OUR PAPER goes to press in the absence of the EDITOR, who has been called to Philadelphia, to attend the funeral of BR. JACOB GRIM's son-in-law. See obituary in another column.

BACK NUMBERS.

WE can still supply new subscribers from No. 1 of the present volume. Six months subscribers, however, will not receive No. 1, as we have but few of that left, and they are reserved for such as want the entire volume. If any subscriber has failed to receive either number, since the first of this volume, we shall be glad to supply it to them, if they will inform us.

NON-RESPONDENTS.

WE have continued to send to some of the subscribers of the last volume, especially in the West, who have as yet made no response. This we cannot continue to do; and we shall be obliged to part with them if the silence continues. Will they please to bear this in mind. We do not believe they wish to lose the paper: and some people do not wish to lose the kingdom, but probably many will by sheer neglect.

INTOLERANCE UNJUSTIFIABLE.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD—A DIALOGUE.

B.—NOTHING is plainer than that all the wicked dead will be made alive again. Such is clearly the doctrine of the Bible.

S.—I suppose you mean nothing is plainer to you. It is plain to me the general tenor of Scripture is opposed to the revival into life of the wicked dead. You have no right to conclude, because their revival seems plain to you it must seem plain to everybody else, any more than I have a right to conclude, because it seems plain to me the Bible teaches no future life except to those in Christ, it should be plain to every other person. You have no more right to conclude, because I do not see as you do, therefore I am blind or wicked, than I have to conclude you are so because you do not see as I do on this subject.

B.—You set at naught Christ's plain words, and thus deny his authority as a Teacher, in holding the wicked dead will not live again.

S.—It is wrong to charge me with setting at naught the authority of Christ, when the truth is, I only differ from you in opinion in regard to what Christ did teach. Would it be right for me to charge you with taking Christ's place, and holding his authority in contempt, because you happen to believe something is taught by him which I am confident he never did teach? No more can it be right in you to charge me with disregarding the teaching of Christ because I happen to believe some things are not taught by him which you believe are. You ought to study the subject of mutual forbearance. It is a small matter to err on questions of difference of opinion, let the error be which side it may; but to be intolerant—to refuse fellowship with those whose Christian character is unimpeachable because they differ in opinion on what the Scriptures do actually teach, is not a small matter. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

B.—How is it possible for a man to be a Christian, and yet deny Christ's plain doctrine that the wicked dead shall live again?

S.—It is not possible for a man to be such who denies any of the teaching of Christ: but it is possible for him to be a Christian and yet think some things not to be "Christ's plain doctrine" which you may think so. I believe every word Christ uttered, though I do not interpret all his sayings as you do. You ought to distinguish between the doctrines of our Lord and your construction of them. A man may reject your interpretation without rejecting Christ's doctrines at all: he may reverence Christ's words, but not your view of their meaning; he may most reverently bow to Christ's authority, but have little or no reverence for yours. I reject your authority unhesitatingly, but can you prove that by doing so I reject Christ's? You must go to Rome for such a conclusion.

B.—A man that denies clear, essential truths of the Bible is not a Christian.

S—That is true: but does every one deny clear, essential Bible truths who differs from you in opinion as to what are clear, essential truths of the Bible? It is one thing for a man to deny what to him is truth, and another to deny what you may think truth. You seem to take it for granted that every one who differs from you is in error; and that all such are in wilful or inexcusable error! But such a position ought not to be taken for granted.

B.—A man should understand the fundamental doctrines of the religion of Jesus Christ.

S.—There is but one fundamental doctrine, viz., Jesus is the Christ, the LIFE-GIVER. This is the foundation doctrine: all others are but the superstructure.

B.—It takes more than the simple belief you speak of to make a perfect Christian.

S.—Yes, but men may have both our toleration and love, who are imperfect Christians. They are to be received to our sympathy as soon as they are Christians at all. He whom Christ has received, we are bound to receive and honor for Christ's sake, and not denounce and cast him off because he does not see certain doctrines as we see them. Christ's disciples are Christ's scholars—learners of Christ. Shall they be shut out of his assembly—his school—the fellowship of his other scholars—because they have not yet learned everything? or because they have not learned to say their lesson as you think is right?

B.—Truth is clear to rightly-disposed minds.

S.—Is all truth clear to such minds? Is it always so at once? Do men see all truth clear as soon as they become rightly disposed? Are all such minds of the same opinion on all things? Do you mean to say, when two persons differ in opinion about the living again of all the dead, or any other doctrine, one of them is always wickedly disposed in mind? No doubt a rightly-disposed mind will be more likely to embrace truth, when he sees it, than one not rightly disposed; yet it would be folly to say the rightly disposed sees all truth clearly at once. Out of a hundred such minds there may not be two that are perfectly agreed on all points, beyond the fundamental one which brought them together.

B.—No man can be rightly disposed that rejects what Christ says of the revival of the wicked dead.

S.—Very true: but may not a man be rightly disposed and yet differ in opinion from me as to what Christ does say on that subject, or others? If he may be rightly disposed and differ from me, may he not be rightly disposed and differ from you? Are you infallible? Is your infallibility unquestionable? If so, when did you attain to that state? When I first announced my disbelief in the theological dogma of an immortal soul in man, and of the endless misery of sinners, you were not with me, but on the old dogma, while I had to stand and fight the battle nearly alone. Since then, you have changed on several points: at which point did you attain infallibility? If you have ever been mistaken, may you not find yourself so again, even on the "Life from the Dead" question?

B.—That all the dead will be made alive again, is perfectly clear and plain, and I can give no countenance to those who teach otherwise.

S.—Do you mean to say it is clear and plain to yourself? or that it is clear and plain to every honest and candid believer? Do you mean to say it is clear and plain to those who have not thoroughly studied the subject? or, to those who have? Will you not find yourself among the imperfect Christians, to say the least, if this spirit to judge others is not more perfectly subdued? Are we not all bound to cultivate a more brotherly disposition toward those who acknowledge Christ as the head of the new creation, which God will have by and by, when "all things are made new?" Life in Christ, and in him alone, is a doctrine on which many of us are agreed: on the details relating to its full development we may, and probably shall, more or less, differ, till we come into its full possession. Then shall we "see eye to eye." The Lord hasten that day.

A PLAIN STATEMENT.

IN the Spring of 1837 our attention was first called to the subject of the end of the wicked. This was by means of a tract, without the author's name, but which was written by Eld. Henry Grew, of Philadelphia, who had for several years entertained the view that the end of the wicked was destruction, and not endless life in torment. This tract was the first thing, and the only thing, except the Bible, we ever saw on the subject, till we openly espoused that side of the question about four years after. At the time of that tract falling into our hands, we had been in the ministry about fourteen years, and were at the same period of life that Moses was when he "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter;" that is, were "full forty years old."

We read the tract, and were astonished that an argument could be made from Scripture that would give plausibility to that theory. It put us to thinking as we had never thought before; but we had no idea that we should ever enter into that belief. It would, however, come up to our mind unbidden, often; and occasionally it was made a subject of conversation when in company with a brother minister—not with laymen, for fear a thought might be suggested that would lead them into error. Thus matters went on between two and three years. We found some eminent ministers were staggered as to the truth of the doctrine of endless misery, though silent on the subject.

At length we fully resolved to investigate the subject in all its length and breadth by a careful examination of the Bible, and commenced reading the Scriptures, noting every text that related to the subject. When this investigation was ended, we had become satisfied that immortality in sin and suffering was not taught in the Bible, however prominent it might stand, or had stood, in the creeds of human invention. The next step with us was to write three letters to a prominent and able minister of the Methodist E. church with whom we had been intimate. In reply, he acknowledged that he could not answer our arguments, and he never undertook it. On the contrary, after a few months he came to our house and we examined the subject together, which resulted in his advising us to publish the letters we had written him, but with a request to withhold his name.

Accordingly, in the spring of 1841, four years after our attention was first called to the subject, two thousand copies of the "Three Letters" were issued from the press and sent abroad. This was not done without counting the cost. We expected to be shunned and rejected by all the churches, and nearly all their ministers: and the thought of it was no small trial; yet believing it was the truth of God, we determined to hazard all, and did so. We never expected to be invited to preach for any of the churches any more, nor to see the views then put forth spread, during our life to any extent; but we believed the day would come when the old theory would as universally be rejected as the abominable theory of "infants in hell not a span long;" assured that it belonged to the same system of theology.

Contrary to our expectation, a few months after those letters were published, we had an invitation to preach to a small church in Albany, N. Y., and consented to become their preacher on condition that their old organization be disbanded, and they come together with the understanding that we were to receive all who gave evidence that Christ had received them. To this they assented. We commenced our ministry among them in August, 1841. Up to the Spring of '42 we had not preached directly on the immortality question, but contented ourself with using Scripture phraseology as to the final destiny of the wicked, avoiding those stereotyped phrases, "endless misery," "always dying, but never dead," "going into eternity," etc.

ORIGIN OF THE SIX SERMONS.

Early in the Spring of '42 we felt pressed in spirit to come out plainly on the subject, and could have no rest till we did so. We determined to give one sermon that should embody all that might be desirable to present in relation to it. The appointment was made one week beforehand, and public notice given in the city papers. Monday previous to the time appointed we went to our study, and there spent the entire week in investigation, meditation and prayer. Thus was the "First Discourse" prepared. Never had we a deeper and sweeter sense of the divine presence and blessing, and of being engaged in a work well pleasing in his sight; and we can as well doubt any other part of our Christian experience as to doubt that.

We found before the first week in our study was ended, that two discourses at least would be necessary to present the subject in a proper light. The time came for the first discourse to be delivered: it was Sabbath evening, and the house, for the first time since our ministry there, was full.

We informed the congregation that as our subject was a peculiar one, and liable to be misrepresented in what was said, we had determined to do what we had never done before—i. e., read nearly all we had to say. At the close we gave out to preach another sermon on the same subject next Lord's day evening. Our second week was spent in our study in the same manner that the first had been; and thus was the "Second Discourse" prepared; but found there must be a third, and so did the matter proceed till we had prepared and preached the "Sixth Discourse;" and the history of the first week in our study is the history of the six weeks, each of which was spent in the same manner as the first. All this was without any reference to ever publishing. After the Discourses were ended, several who had listened to them desired their publication. Accordingly, we spent several weeks more in revising, reviewing, and preparing them for the press, and they came forth in May or June.

Such is the origin of the "Six Sermons," as they are now called. And we have never doubted, from that day to this, but what it was of God. Our opponents, therefore, may not expect us to be easily shaken, even though they may think the views are making little progress. They have made ten thousand times more progress than we ever expected in our life time. The history of that progress we shall now as briefly as possible present.

In December, '42, under a deep conviction that we were called thereto, we revised the Six Sermons, and published an edition of five thousand, in newspaper form, in the city of New York, and scattered them over the United States at our own expense. A few weeks after that we gave them another revision and published ten thousand more and scattered them in the same manner. Thus was the seed sown, and it sprung up in all directions.

In the Spring of '43 we were invited to Philadelphia. It was well known what our sentiments on the end of the wicked were, and there was an evident desire to hear something on that subject. Instead, however, of preaching on the subject, we had the Six Sermons stereotyped in quarto form, and printed two thousand copies. These were distributed among the congregation to which we were then preaching, and there is little doubt but that most who read them were either convinced of the truth, or had their prejudices so far removed as to feel no opposition.

In the Fall of '43 we went to Cincinnati, Ohio, and spent several months. There also and in Indiana, some five or six thousands of the Sermons were scattered by Dr. Field—a minister of the gospel—and others; and we know that the seed took root in that region.

In '43 the "Six Sermons" were republished in England. The friend who informed us of this fact could not tell what number of copies were printed there, but judged, ten thousand. These were circulated through various parts of England, and must have attracted some attention, as they were referred to by several writers on both sides of the question there, previous to 1846. About that time Dr. Lees, of Leeds, broke ground in England against the endless torture doctrine, and man's natural immortality. Near the same point of time Mr. Dobney, a Baptist minister, published his excellent work on "Future Punishment," in England, which has been republished here, and has been the means of bringing many to the truth. Mr. White, a Congregationalist minister, also published his "Life in Christ," taking the same side with Mr. Dobney; and several other ministers in England were on the same ground, and among those who favored it was Archbishop Whateley; and at a later period, Wm. Glenn Moncrieff, once a minister in the Congregational church in Scotland. The work spread on the other side of the Atlantic.

But to return to this country. These truths spread all through the Western States; both ministers and laymen taking hold of them, and sinners were converted through their influence that could not be reached by the old horrible doctrine—"Ye shall not surely die"—"ye shall be kept alive eternally, and tormented." In North Carolina Dr. Lee and Eld. Pritchard, both Baptist ministers, fought the battle for the truth on this subject. Dr. Lee has there scattered several hundred copies of the Six Sermons.

In 1850 about six thousand copies of the Six Sermons, quarto, with Bishop Whateley on the "Second Death," were circulated; besides constant calls for those Sermons in the 18mo. or pamphlet form; and they were ordered, too, by the hundred, and sometimes by hundreds.

Yes, the days of superstition—the Popish purgatory of a half-way house for disembodied spirits—the doctrine of endless torture for "immortal souls," and the "mortal resurrection" notion, will share the fate of all the other "Roman dunghill of decretals," to use a phrase of Martin Luther, who once justly placed the doctrine of an "immortal soul" in man in that category.

On a review of the whole matter, therefore, while we feel deeply humbled at the unworthiness of the instrument so much employed, we see abundant cause to praise God that he ever condescended to permit us to have a part in a work so glorious, and in the advocacy of a doctrine that so humbles man, exalts God, and puts the crown of glory on the head of our blessed Lord Jesus Christ for all our salvation, immortality, future and eternal life: all glory to God and the Lamb.

Since that time the progress of the work would require a volume, instead of the space we designed to occupy in this statement; but it is better understood, by most of our friends, than the early struggle to bring to light the great truth of "Life only through Christ." That grand theme has now passed its incipient stage, and is not likely ever to be seriously arrested in its course. Its power is not in the men who have been, or may be, engaged in its promulgation. Had it depended on them, it would have failed long ago; for the hostility to it from great and small professed Christians has been such as no false doctrine could have endured for a quarter of a century, without organization, and preserved vitality, continuing to make advances, as it has, unto this hour. Let all its friends take courage. We clearly have nothing to fear from the opposition that may arise from any quarter, so long as we humbly rely on God, and are simply concerned to honor him and his Son Jesus Christ, our LIFE-GIVER and Lord. After the smoke of every battle has cleared away, we have seen, and shall continue to see, that the glorious truth of "No futuie life or immortality out of Christ," shines clearer and brighter for the assaults of its adversaries.

THE TRUE POSITION OF A CHURCH.

WE offer the following remarks on church order on our individual responsibility.

1. Declaration.—All authoritative creeds, declaration of sentiments, or confessions of faith, as well as disciplines of human construction, are unwarrantable assumptions of authority over the body of Christ, and should be resisted as an invasion of personal rights and personal accountability; yet a Church of God may know, and ought to know, what ground it occupies.

2. Standard of Faith and Practice.—The Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, are the only and sufficient rule both of faith and practice; and each member of the Church of God has the right to interpret the same according to his personal understanding of what they teach, without liability to censure for so doing, he being responsible to God alone for his faith.

3. Government of the Church.—Jesus Christ, by the appointment of the Father, is "Head over all things to the church"; therefore no other authority to legislate for that body is to be acknowledged. The members of the church have authority, in the government thereof, only to execute the laws of its Head, and are all equally bound to see this faithfully attended to. In this view, the body is congregational in its government, and the church assembling in one place is bound to execute the laws of its Head in that place, without the interference of churches in other places.

4. Test of Fellowship.—No other test is to be used in receiving to fellowship than that the person give evidence that Christ has received him, or that the individual is in a state of reconciliation to God, and is thereby "of the Lord added to the church." Such persons are entitled to continued fellowship so long as their tempers and practices are in agreement with the precepts of the Head of the church.

It will be seen by the foregoing that it is not so much the having creeds, etc., that we object to as it is making them a test of fellowship or membership. All persons have a system of belief, or their view of what the Bible teaches, whether it is written or unwritten This is unavoidable. But Christianity requires that we should not separate persons from us, nor suffer them to be separated, by authoritatively assuming that a belief in our interpretation of Scripture is essential to salvation or necessary to Christian fellowship and union.

Such we believe to be the true position of the church, and any other view seems to be irreconcilable with our Lord's prayer that his followers might all be one.

HOW SHOULD WE GIVE?

IT is my opinion that as a rule, believers but imperfectly realize the fact that they are only stewards of the divine bounty. To acknowledge the stewardship is one thing, to perform its offices in a faithful manner is another. Time is a trust; talents are a trust; money is a trust. "The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts." Men may acquire property, but is it theirs after all? no more so than it was theirs anterior to their own being; no more so than the hired superintendent and protector of an estate has a right to sell its trees, and corn, and cotton, to enrich his own family with the proceeds. If Christians were in the right state of mind, they would when the claims of God's cause were pressed on their notice, ask such questions as these: How much may I withhold and be sinless? If I am a steward, have I a right to retain any more than what is necessary to the comfort of my family, in consistency with trust in him who is a faithful provider? How many stewards are clutching their Master's money? how many are laying up treasures on earth? how many grudge to part with a trifle even of what is not their own? "Freely ye have received, freely give;" is too often rendered practically thus, "Freely ye have received, avariciously retain!" It is exceedingly desirable that these thoughts would present themselves to every reader's conscience. We love honesty between man and man; shall honesty between man and God be forgotten?

How shall the grasping stewards meet their coming Judge? Will they hear the joyous announcement, "Well done, good and faithful servants, enter ye into the joy of your Lord?" Perhaps I may be permitted to observe that in using property for the Lord's cause, it becomes us to pray for wisdom to employ it in accordance with his own will. This exercise of solemn and secret prayer, would tend to enforce upon our minds the fact of our stewardship, and, as it were, cultivate a divine integrity in our own hearts. "Lord, this money is thine, not mine, what shall I do with it in thy service? Keep me from piling it up as if it belonged absolutely to myself! teach me how to earn the crown of faithfulness, in honestly using for thy glory all that has been committed to my temporary charge."

If we would only pray thus, how soon the work of mercy and truth would prosper in the world! As it is, Christians too often part with a very little for God, rather like one who is compelled to disburse by a civil judicatory, than with the free and sublime action of an honest man.

Again, all giving from impulse should be avoided. In such a mode of distribution there is no real integrity. A steward honest by impulse, and not from a conciousness of perpetual duty, would be despised in society. Many Christians melt and freeze in the most capricious manner. A sermon moves their hearts, and they give; a fine address at a missionary meeting awakens their sympathy, and Mammon relaxes his hold on the strings of their purses. But why do they need these appeals, and thawings and relaxings? Simply because they act as if all in their custody was their own. The Lord had spoken long before the sermon, or the speech was uttered; he had said, "Ye are stewards of the manifold grace (or bounty), of God." What! are the disciples owners now, instead of guardians? Is all integrity lost, till some deep, stirring agitation shakes their hearts, and enthrones conscience on its imperial seat? My brother, let me say to the pious reader, the judgment is coming—the Lord is at your side, though invisible, at this moment; and as you are one of his representatives and stewards, he expects you to give—he commands you to give without grudging to uphold his interests in the world, and support those faithful efforts made by his efficient servants. Act on principle, and you will have a wiser head, and a happier heart: act on system—and after deliberate calculations as to his rights and your obligations. Those who wait for gales of impulse, are at the mercy, so to speak, of every calm and every breeze; but having principle as a guide—a propelling power—one is like a screw steamship, that continues and completes her voyage, though every wind should sleep or oppose.

Those in love with the life views and associated doctrines, justly exult in their biblical attainments; and are thankful to God for their emancipation from the fetters of ignorance. Ours has been a great deliverance; and we may wax loud in praise when we consider the deplorable conditions of millions the world over. Our privilege is to pity them, not to despise their ignorance; once we were as benighted as they are. And what can we do for them? what should we do? Some kind soul guides us away from the thick jungles of error, and the Lord, I may affirm safely, expects us to repeat the favor. We see our fellow-men sailing on the troubled deep, and we are bound to erect a beacon on every rock; to sink a buoy at every sand bank, or hidden danger. Oh! that we felt the claims of Jesus on our generous action for dying men. Oh! that we could live more unreservedly for him, who "though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich." If we have life in Christ, heaven grant we may have life like Christ. If it is not Christ-like, how can it be Christ-given. Paul had life from Jesus, and counted all things but loss for the excellency of the gospel knowledge; with his zeal, with a tithe of it, how useful undertakings would prosper, and how many would be turned from the ways of ruin! What the world requires is sound teaching, and gracious living on the part of disciples; the first comes with inherent divine authority; the latter is ocular demonstration of its vitalizing energy. But oh, may God forgive us, we talk of life in Jesus and act no better, at least little better, than the unredeemed; we exult in the prospect of a celestial kingdom, and sweat and toil as if we believed the present a fact, and the future a dream; we mind our own things, but who minds the things of Jesus Christ? Let us suppose ourselves—divine thought! may it yet be experienced by us all—in the kingdom of Jesus, dwelling amid those glories that as yet eye hath not seen, and drinking at the fountains of perennial joy; how will we regret our present indifference to his claims, and blindness to our responsibilities as the stewards of his beneficence. Every word spoken in his name will then be a theme of gratitude; every gift to his cause a pleasing remembrance; every prayer for the extension of his power in a wicked world a blessed event in our history. M.

SINFUL HABITS.—Be not too slow in the breaking of a sinful custom; a quick, courageous resolution is better than a gradual deliberation: in such a combat, he is the bravest soldier that lays about him without fear or wit. Wit pleads, fear disheartens; he that would kill Hydra had better strike off one neck than five heads. Fell the tree and the branches are soon cut off.—Quarles.

GLAD TO SEE IT.

BR. STORRS: The matter enclosed I clip from the Crisis of October 2d, and send it to you to insert in the columns of the HERALD OF LIFE, if you deem it best; for it seems to me that it rather favors the doctrine of a future life through Christ, of the righteous only; and I would to God that more such articles would make their appearance in that paper, to spice it with, if for nothing more. Yours, in love of the truth,

A. S. WHITNEY.

A SPIRITUAL RESURRECTION.

Does Rom. viii., 10 teach a spiritual resurrection, or a resurrection of the spirit? for this is the meaning of a spiritual resurrection.

It seems strange to me that any of our brethren should so interpret this text, when it so evidently was written by the apostle to prove a literal resurrection of the body. Any other resurrection than this is certainly not taught in the chapter, if it is in the Scriptures at all. Nothing is said in this chapter of the or a resurrection of the spirit; and surely not in the verse referred to. The word "spirit" is found in the chapter twenty-one times, but only once can it be understood as referring to us as believers. Nineteen times it is the Spirit of God or of Christ; and once the "spirit of bondage."

I again affirm that any other resurrection than a literal one of the body is not referred to or hinted at in this chapter by the apostle. Let us examine the text, verse 10: "And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness." What does the apostle affirm?

1. He does not affirm that the body is dead because Christ is in us; nor that by his being in us our spirit is raised. But he does affirm that "the body is dead because of sin, and that "the Spirit [of God] is life because of righteousness."

2. He does affirm that "if [although] Christ be in us, the body is dead"—not to sin, but because of sin; that Christ is not the cause of the death of the body, but that sin is.

3. He also affirms that "the Spirit [not our spirit, but of God] is life because of righteousness." "If Christ be in you"—in your mind, in your heart, in your body (1 Cor. iii., 16; vi., 19; 2 Cor. vi., 16), the Spirit of God, the Spirit of Christ and the Holy Spirit, the apostle affirms, here and elsewhere, dwells in the believer's body. The mind and heart are in the body, and are inseparable from it. If Christ in any sense is in us, he must be in our body.

If Christ (his Spirit) be in you (in your body), what is the effect? One writer says the apostle meant that it produced death to sin. Now, while this may be true in a certain sense, and to a certain extent, the apostle could not have reference to a death like this; for (1) he does not say sin is dead, but the body is dead. And (2) he does not say that Christ caused the body to die, but that sin did. "The body," he says, "is dead because of sin." Those who say that Christ being in us causes sin to die, contradict the apostle, for he positively asserts that it is the body that is dead. Again, those who assert that Christ being in us causes a death of any kind, also contradict the apostle; for he most plainly tells us that sin is the cause of the death of which he is speaking. Now, while it is most evident that sin is the cause of the death of the body, it cannot be itself the body, nor can it be that which dies, or is dead.

The plain import of this text, then, is, "If Christ be in you"—although the Spirit of God dwell in you, and you have the Spirit of Christ, (see verse 9)—"the body [your body] is dead [under the sentence of death] because of [on account of] sin." The Spirit of Christ which you have within you does not now free you from the death pronounced upon the whole human family in consequence of sin. You are not exempted from the common death of mankind. The Spirit which you have received has not yet made you immortal; you have not yet been raised or changed from a mortal to an immortal state, but you are yet subject to death. "If Christ be in you, the body is dead"—you are nevertheless in a condition of death; "but the Spirit is life"—Christ in you, or the spirit of God, will give you life, free from death by a resurrection from the dead.

That this is the meaning of the latter clause of this text, is evident from the verse which immediately follows. This eleventh verse teaches no resurrection but that of the body. A spiritual or moral resurrection, or any other resurrection than that of the man proper, can not possibly be found in the verse. After the apostle has told us in verse 10 that, although Christ be in us, the body, on account of sin, is dead; that having the Spirit of God dwelling now in us, does not exempt or deliver us from the death of Adam, but says the "Spirit is life;" he adds in the next verse, "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies, by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." This verse is a comment upon the last clause of the preceding verse; "But the Spirit is life, because of righteousness;" and both refer to the resurrection of the body and entire man at the last day.

What is it that is to be quickened or brought again to life? for the apostle uses the future tense—"shall also quicken." Was it our spirit, mind, affections, or any moral or spiritual part that now, in this life, is quickened, or raised up to life? He says plainly, it is our mortal bodies that are to be quickened. He says nothing in regard to quickening or raising our spirits, moral feelings, or affections. He tells us plainly what is to be quickened or raised, and how and by what means it is to be done.

It is the mortal body that is to live again, and it is to live or be quickened by the Spirit that now dwelleth in us. It cannot be "quickened except it die." The same Spirit that quickened and raised Christ will, if in us, raise also our mortal bodies. Christ's resurrection was not a spiritual one; neither will ours be. He had all the Spirit of God dwelling in him; but he died. That Spirit in him did not exempt him from death. He was under the sentence of death like us. He suffered it as we must, unless the resurrection soon comes. Being filled with all the fulness of the Spirit, he was nevertheless under the law of death. until his resurrection from the dead. So must we be. No matter how much he may be in us now, or how much of his Spirit we may have in this life; we are dead; but our life is hid with him in God, and "when he who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory."

For these reasons, and many others, I find no spiritual resurrection in Rom. viii., 10, nor in the chapter, and do not believe it is taught in the Bible. I. I. LESLIE.

OLD BETTY.

LET me tell you the story of Old Betty, said I to a friend who was narrating some sad history of domestic discomfort. It was told me by a young lady whom I met at the seaside, and though I believe it has appeared in print, I know no other version of it but the one she told me.

"Some years after I was converted," said Miss F., "it pleased the Lord to lay me aside from active occupation, and to confine me to a sick couch for full two years. This inactivity was very grievous to me, and my constant prayer was for restoration to health, and power once more to go about visiting the sick and teaching the ignorant.

"When visited by kind Christian ministers and sympathizing friends, my constant request was, that they would pray for my recovery, and that I might have faith to believe that the Lord would heal me.

"Still I grew no better. About the end of the second year I one afternoon recieved a visit from a minister unknown to me, who in God's providence was then staying at the place where I lived. He read and prayed with me, sympathized with my sufferings, and listened to my troubles. I lamented to him my weak faith, which I felt assured was the cause of my continued weakness of body.

"'Miss F.,' replied the minister, 'have you never heard of Betty, the old match-seller?' I had not. 'Old Betty,' said he, 'was brought to the knowledge of Jesus in her old age, and from the time of her conversion never thought she could do enough for him who had loved her and washed her from her sins in his own blood. She went about doing good. She was ready to speak of her Lord and Master to all she met. She would nurse the sick, visit the afflicted, beg for the poor and for the heathen. She would give to those poorer than herself portions of what the kindness of Christian friends bestowed on her. In short, she was always abounding in the work of the Lord.

"'But in the midst of this happy course she caught a violent cold and rheumatism, and was confined to her bed. There she lay day after day and week after week, and, I believe, till the Lord called her home.

"'On her sick bed Betty was as happy as she had been in her active duties; she was much in prayer; she repeated hymns and passages of Scripture; she meditated on the good things she had learned, and on the good land to which she was hastening.

"'Being visited by an old friend, a minister, who had long known her, he was astonished to see his once active and useful old neighbor so happy in her bed, and said to her, "Oh, I little expected, Betty, to see you so patient; it must be a great trial to one of your active mind to lie so long doing nothing."

"'"Not at all, sir," said she; "when I was well I used to hear the Lord say to me day by day, Betty, go here: Betty, go there; Betty, do this; Betty, do that; and I used to do it as well as I could; and now I hear him say every day, Betty, lie still and cough."'"

Miss F. told me this story as she heard it from her visitor, and she said it had a very strong effect on her mind. She began to think it was self-will rather than faith that made her so anxious to get well and be active again; and she humbled herself before God, begging for grace to bear his will, rather than seek her own. She became tranquil, happy, and contented on her sick-bed, and, almost immediately after, it pleased the Lord to restore her to health, and continue her in it to the time when I met her.

Martin Luther says, "Once I was bold to prescribe to God; but surely the Lord despised this arrogance of mine, and said, I am God, and am not to be ruled by you."—Selected.

HOW TO HEAR.—It is with the Word as it is with a salve; if a man that hath never so good a salve should do nothing but lay it to the wound, and take it off, lay it on and take it off, it will not heal the wound; and no marvel. Why? He will not let it lie on. The best salve will not heal the sore, nor eat out the corruption, unless it be bound on and let lie. So it is with the Word; many a soul hears it; heart, conscience, affections, all touched; but when he is gone out of the church, all is gone—his affections die, his heart dies, and his conscience becomes unfruitful. Why? He is still removing the salve, and will not let it lie on; therefore the word overpowers not his corruptions. The Word is like the salve; conviction of conscience is like the laying on of the salve; meditation is the binding of it to the sore.—Wm. Fenner, A. M.

COMFORT FOR THE TRIED ONES.

BELOVED think it not strange concerning the fiery trial, which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you. 1 Peter iv., 12.

DEAR BRETHREN. You who are scattered abroad, alone and lonely, tried and forsaken by the world, forsaken by kindred near and dear to us, remember we must be tried, by some process to sift out error; and shall we complain when our friends try to show us that we are in error; and if they succeed, and show us an error? Should we not thank them, and thank the Lord, that they, in his hand, have been the means of working for our good and for his glory? Again, he takes those of opposite views, and they come forward with their texts of Scripture to prove their positions; thus compelling us to search the Scriptures, to see if these things are so. For instance: they tell us all mankind must be raised from the dead and stand before the judgment seat of Christ in the final judgment. But we turn unto the word of God, and there again we see that wicked men in death remain to all eternity. Heb. xii., 14: "Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." "Yet a little while, and the world seeth me no more." Evidently the world spoken of, here, were those people of the world like those the Saviour had reference to when speaking to his diciples, "Ye are not of the world; but I have chosen you out of the world." "Ye shall die in your sins; where I am ye cannot come." "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life." "He that loveth not his brother abideth in death." Again: our enemies take us, and they leave no means untried to sift us; and if we are not thoroughly sifted when they get through with us, then I am no judge. This has been my experience; and now I thank God for this school of experience; for it works for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. All things work to gather for good to them that love the Lord. "Therefore, be ye steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." Yours, in the gospel hope. S. S. CALL.

Letters and Extracts.

FROM ELD. WM. H. FISHER.

WINDSOR, CONN., Nov. 7, 1867.

TO THE READERS OF HERALD OF LIFE: I think the cause of truth demands a few words from me. In relation to the doctrine of "Life only through Christ" it is not until quite recently that my mind has been enlightened upon that subject, although I have heard of the doctrine ever since I have been connected with the Advent people. But those with whom I associated when I was converted were very bitter against the "No life doctrine." I naturally partook of their spirit, and I very soon got so I could say as hard things as they could about it. We read, "Evil communications corrupt good manners."

Probably Br. Burbank will call to remembrance a letter I wrote to him upon the subject. Also Br. Boynton (who used to reside in Haverhill, Mass.) will recollect a hard speech I made while in conversation with him. I ask his pardon. Now, brethren, I am free to confess unto you that I was in error instead of you. My doctrine was of the devil instead of yours. I now state to you that I believe the doctrine of "No life out of Christ" to be a Bible doctrine. I have got all the future torment theory out of my creed. Hallelujah!

The coming of Christ and the Life doctrine has placed me in a condition before God that I never occupied before. I am happy now. Thank Heaven! I feel perfect acceptance before God, through Christ. Praise his name! May God speed the truth and set it home to every heart! Yes, dear friends, I expect Jesus in a few days. O, gird yourselves with the truth, that you may be ready! My dear brethren and sisters, I feel as though we had got the truth this time. Let us be ready to enter into life.

FROM MRS. ALMIRA WEST.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, Nov. 6, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I want to tell you how I prize the HERALD OF LIFE. I have had it weekly for more than a year, and I have learned to love it for the truth it teaches. Without it I should not hear one word of the blessed doctrine of "No Life out of Christ." I do not know of one Life believer here. There may be, but I have not met with any such. I have talked with quite a number of persons about this great truth, and tried in my weak way to do what I could to convince them of their error, but they are so filled with immortality they desire nothing else. O, how much need there is of a true preacher here! Why will not some one come and scatter the precious seed? for some might fall upon good ground. Surely this is a field for some one to labor in, and I hope it will not be passed by.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We very much desire that Br. Wendell may not fail to visit Columbus before he returns east. We wonder that city has been so long passed by. May the light soon shine upon it. It must be a good field in which to sow the seeds of truth on the Life theme.

FROM ELD. C. S. PERCIVAL.

MASSAWIPPI, C. E., Nov. 4, 1867.

BR. STORRS: No doubt some of the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE would like to hear once more from your "Canadian Correspondent;" so I snatch a few moments time to write a little: should have written oftener, but have been so busy. The Master finds me plenty to do, and I love him and his work well enough to do all his will; and though sometimes weary in his work, I am not weary of it. With preaching every Sunday, once or twice, superintending our Sunday school, attending the prayer meetings, laboring with my hands to supply the wants of a family of seven, with considerable sickness, and I find it difficult to find time to even write a letter. But I have a little band of brothers and sisters, around me, who are devoted, heart and soul to the work of the Lord, united in love, and strong in faith, looking for no life in the future only through Christ Jesus, the great and only LIFE GIVER. Our influence is felt, and our number is slowly increasing. Last Sunday I baptized the lawyer that I have spoken of before, and he is walking in the light, and living a consistent Christian life. Praise the Lord. Five others have been buried with Christ, in the place, this season (two by me) and added to the little flock. How glad and thankful I am that the HERALD OF LIFE is so well sustained. I keep wishing I could do something to help along; but I suppose, if the good Lord gives the means and the will to others to do it, instead of me, it is all just as well. I wish for its weekly visits very much, as long as it is needed; which, I suppose, will be till the great LIFE GIVER returns. O how precious; increasingly precious is the grand truth to which it is devoted. I propose, soon, if the Lord will, to write some, perhaps considerable, for the HERALD; for my heart, head, hands, and time, are all devoted to the work. Truth must triumph; and before the Master comes the church will have a pure gospel to preach to men. So let us gird on our weapons anew, looking for, and hasting unto the coming of redemption's happy day.

CHESTER HORSKINS, Franklin, Vt., writes: I know of no one in this vicinity holding our views. They say, if they thought death was the last of the wicked, they would not serve God; but they get most of their friends into heaven. My prayer is, that God may open their eyes to see themselves as they are; mortal, perishing beings. Yours in hope of a future life, when Christ comes.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Persons who serve God to escape eternal torments, shall, "verily, have their reward." They will escape such a doom, and God is just to give them the wages they worked for. But surely they have no claim for eternal life; as they confess they would not serve God for any such consideration. If God will only let them die like the beasts, they will not serve him: they clearly have no love to him or his service: even heaven, in their view, would not be a stimulus to serve God, only as it saves them from hell torments. They neither wish for heaven or hell; but as they must have one or the other, as they suppose, they choose heaven as the preferable place of the two; but if they would be sure of not being obliged to take either, they would give God no service. Such men are simply hypocrites.

THE FOUNTAIN OF LIVING WATER.

IT is related of a benevolent man that he lived in a village poorly supplied with water. Dry seasons exhausted the wells, and reduced the citizens to great straits. About a mile distant was a never-failing spring. The waters from this he conducted by pipes to the heart of the village, and so furnished a supply at all seasons to the inhabitants. This act of generosity touched the people, and when he was dead they erected a monument to his memory by the fountain that he had opened for their benefit.

Such a fountain has Jesus opened to assuage the thirst and save the lives of perishing men. It rises as the river of the water of life out of the throne of God and of the Lamb; and the Spirit and the bride call to the thirsting multitudes, lining its banks to approach and partake freely of its healing virtue. Shall we not erect in our hearts a monument to the author of this living fountain; a memorial of our gratitude and devotion; a testimonial of his goodness and condescension.

ORIGIN OF THE "MISSIONARY HYMN."

BISHOP HEBER, then rector of Hodvet, married the daughter of Dean Shepley, rector of Wrenham, in North Wales. On a certain Saturday he came to the house of his father-in-law, to remain over Sunday, and preach in the morning the first sermon ever preached in that church for the Church Missionary Society. As they sat conversing after dinner in the evening, the Dean said to Heber, "Now, as you are a poet, suppose you write a hymn for the service to-morrow morning." Immediately he took the pen, ink, and paper, and wrote the hymn,

"From Greenland's icy mountains," which, had he written nothing else, would have immortalized him. He read it to the Dean, and said, "Will that do?"

"Ay," he replied, "and we will have it printed and distributed in the pews, that the people may sing it after the sermon."

"But," said Heber, "to what tune will it go?" "Oh," he added, "it will go to, 'Twas when the seas were roaring.'"

And so he wrote in the corner, at the top of the page, "Twas when the seas were roaring." The hymn was printed accordingly. Thus suddenly, and by the merest accident did the church recieve from the poet's pen her greatest missionary hymn.

A LADY desired Dr. Johnson to give his opinion of a work she had written, and added that if it was not suitable to publish she could bring out something else, as she had other irons in the fire. The Doctor turned over a few leaves and replied, "I advise you, madam, to put it where your other irons are."

A GOOD NAME.—Morris Ketchum, the father of the great defaulter, in New York, is reported to have said to his creditors—

"If I could have my son back with his good name and you were all paid in full I should die content."

Such is the last ambition of a great financier. A lifetime of activity, an ample fortune its reward, and now all would be given for a son's good name. Young men—fast men—think of this.

THE REASON.—"Doctor," said a waggish parishioner of old Parson E—— to him one day, "I think I must have a pew nearer the desk than where I have it now."

"Why" said the parson "can't you hear well where you are?"

"Oh! yes," was the reply; "but that ain't it. The fact is, there are so many people between me and the pulpit, that by the time what you say gets back to where I am, it is flat as dishwater."

HONEY FROM THE CARCASS.—The bee sucks sweet honey out of the bitterest herb! so God will, by afflictions, teach his children to suck sweet knowledge, sweet obedience, and sweet experience out of all the bitter afflictions and trials he exercises them with. That scouring and rubbing, which frets others, shall make them shine the brighter; that weight which crushes and keeps others under, shall but make them like the palm-tree, grow better and higher. Afflictions are the saints' best benefactors. Where afflictions hang heaviest corruptions hang loosest. Grace that is hid in nature, as sweet water in rose-leaves, is the most faagrant when the fire of affliction is put under to distil it out. Grace shines the brighter for scouring, and is most glorious when it is most clouded.

OBITUARY.

FELL ASLEEP in Jesus, on the ninth of November, 1867, our son-in-law, JOSEPH MACFARLAND. He has been lingering several months with consumption. He was patient, and without complaining he bore his affliction with Christian fortitude. He was firm in his belief that life was only to be attained by a union with Christ, and fell asleep in the full "hope" of a resurrection through Jesus, the Life-giver. Although we sorrow, yet it is with hope; for we know that Jesus died and rose again, and we have the confidence of knowing that his life was hid with Christ; and we know that when the Life-giver shall appear, then shall all who sleep in him appear with him.

Poetry.

"YE ARE NOT YOUR OWN."

BY MARIE ROSEAU.

OUR Father! when along life's toilsome way,
Two foot-paths leading onward meet our eyes,
As we uncertain stand, while doubts arise
Through which our wand'ring feet had better stray:
While selfish feelings urge us to forsake
The sterile path for that where flowers are spread;
Let our firm feet, by thy good Spirit led,
Turn to the one which thou wouldst have us take.

No matter, then, how hard the way appear,
There let us cheerful walk, nor turn aside,
Still feeling ever that where thou dost guide,
Thy children have no real cause for fear.
Let us not pause for selfish rest or sleep—
Tired in the race ere half its course is run;
But while there is one duty left undone,
Untiring watch and effort may we keep.

When in thy sovereignty thou dost recall
The priceless treasure which thy love had given;
When ties thy hand had formed by thee are riven,
Life's best gifts covered by death's gloomy pall;
Then as we stand, sad, and bereft, and lone—
The last bright hope we cherished passed away—
Oh teach our mourning hearts in truth to say,
"Not our will, Father, but thine own be done!"

Children's Department.

THE IMPORTANCE OF COMMITTING GOD'S WORD TO MEMORY.

BY A LIFE-LOVER.

To the dear children, whose homes are visited weekly by the HERALD OF LIFE, would I speak at this time; and my theme is the importance and the blessedness of committing God's word to memory—of getting the blessed words of inspiration securely fixed on the mind. I doubt not that you all have been taught to read the Bible, and I trust many of you are endeavoring to live in accordance with its teachings; but are you, as did David of old, hiding the word of God in your heart? are you constantly committing it to the store-house of memory, to be kept as your most sacred treasure? If so, you are accumulating wealth the value of which no tongue can express: but if you are not doing this, would that I could say something which would induce you to commence the blessed work at once.

When quite young I commenced learning and reciting the New Testament as my Sunday-school lesson. Year after year I continued the practice, until all the recorded words of the evangelists, the apostles and the Revelator, had been learned: then I committed the Psalms; and as riper years came on, and I changed my position in the Sunday school from that of scholar to teacher, I felt that it was still good to hide the word in my heart. So the Proverbs of Solomon were committed to heart; and it is now my practice to commit to memory one book of the Bible each year.

But I imagine I hear some saying, What a task! what good will it do to learn so much of the Bible? Before endeavoring to answer this I would ask you one question: Do you believe the Bible is the guide-book to glory? If so, the more you know of it the better. You attend school and spend much time in committing to memory the lessons given you from your text-books. This is right; but remember that when you study geography it only gives you a description of this world, which is to be your home only a little while, but it says nothing of the land of Canaan, the saints' eternal home. Your astronomy teaches you of the heavenly bodies, but not of the Sun of righteousness—the bright and morning Star. Botany teaches of earthly plants, but is silent respecting the Rose of Sharon. Profane history gives much valuable information, but for that record which most deeply interests us, we must come to the sacred oracles. In a word, the Bible is the book which tells us of Jesus, our great LIFE-GIVER; and while I would not that you should neglect other useful books, I would that your greatest diligence should be to acquire a knowledge of God's word. But methinks I hear some say, "As this knowledge is all contained in one book, and we can refer to it at any time, why task the memory with its contents?" To this I would say, there are times and places and circumstances where it is not convenient to have the Bible with us; and even if we had it, we should not always have time to refer to it when we wanted to quote a passage; and how important oftentimes it is when conversing with others to have the words of Scripture to speak. How many times the opportunity of enforcing the truth on some precious subject has been lost because passages were not ready to be quoted at a moment's warning. And thus sometimes those who were inculcating error have seemed to gain their point because they were conversant with a few isolated passages of Scripture, which taken by themselves would seem to prove their positions true. And then, dear children, how sweet it is to meditate on the words of holy writ in the hours of silence and darkness. O I could not afford to be deprived of the rich consolations I derive from the rich treasures of God's word which I have in my heart.

Sometimes it is quite mortifying not to be able to recall some passages of Scripture. I was at a table not long since where it was the custom before partaking of the meal for each one to repeat a verse. Even the youngest member of the family was ready, and I thought the exercise a very beautiful one; but there was a visitor present who could not think of one verse to say, so after making an apology he was excused. Only think of a person having attained the stature of a man, and not being able to repeat a bit of God's word. May this never be the case with any who shall read these lines, but may you all, each day, commit more or less of the Bible; and while you do it, may the Lord help you to believe and practice it; then will we meet in the coming kingdom.

LIFE-LOVER.

TRUSTING GOD IN THIS LIFE.

When we consider that the pious are often poor; that they are forbidden to lay up treasures on earth; that their testimony often requires them to endure loss of substance; that in times of severe persecution they are driven into inhospitable situations, where it becomes impossible for them to determine how life can be sustained: when we ponder these things, and the tender sympathies of parental hearts for the helpless ones depending on parental care, we may well cherish gratitude to God for those generous words on which he has caused us to hope. He claims to be our Father, and his communications overflow with parental tenderness and solicitude. He leaves us not orphans; he is sympathetically familiar with our necessities and trials. We need a promise for the life that is, as well as for that which is to come. The visible signs of the divine faithfulness in the mortal scene, are designed to cheer us in relation to the eternal—to be a prelude and adumbration of celestial joys. It is our Father's will that we become intimate with him here; the least purpose of his heart is to keep us at a great distance. He desires that we may deal with him as the living God and thus acquire a sublime and almost transfiguring assurance that he is, and that he is even now the rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

In that portion of the sermon on the mount, recorded in Matthew, sixth chapter, we find our Lord dissuading from anxiety on the part of his followers concerning food and raiment, and the reasons may be specified under those heads: the first is founded on his paternal character; the second is his knowledge, "Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things;" the last, is the comprehensive promise, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you." A believer in want, through affliction of a personal kind; through business calamities over which he has no control, through loss of employment and sustenance on account of fidelity in Christ's service and testimony, may here draw refreshment as from a well of living water. Let him exercise faith in this assurance, "all these things shall be added unto you;" let him apprehend the promise in this plain and most literal sense, and suffer no doubt to trouble him as to his interest in them. They are his warrant from the King of kings to expect his bounty with as much certainty as a traveler expects at a given hour in the morning to behold the spring of day.

In such a case as I have imagined, the pious course to pursue is, in my judgement, the following: Let the needy child of our heavenly Father plead earnestly the above promise, or any similar ones; let him speak, in the same exercise, of the divine faithfulness, and express an unwavering conviction that the blessings will be imparted. In this way faith triumphs: in due time an answer fulfilling the promise will be returned. He may have to tarry a little, and so exercise patience; but let him rest satisfied in this, that the Lord tenderly feels for him, and will prove himself faithful. But will he perform a miracle? That, my brother, is no concern of yours; no miracle will be required, for he has angelic and human agency at his command; he wills, and his ends are achieved. It is no concern of ours how the promise is to be accomplished; infinite wisdom is surely adequate to the demands of infinite philanthropy. God rarely, so far as I know, sends his responses in the channel we select: he has taken the whole matter into his own hands, and his people have no right to interfere. They are to keep very still, and by and by they will see his salvation.

If I understand the word on this subject, God wills us to deal exclusively with himself; in this way the blessed Saviour acted when in the world, and when he had a family, so to speak, of twelve attendants depending on his prayers. Man's extremity is God's opportunity; happy they who preserve their confidence; and never run from his throne even to the dearest friend alive, as if they had discovered that his exhaustless resources were but a dream. What earthly parent of means would approve his son for requesting support from other hands? Our Father is rich in mercy; and no language could be employed better adapted to express his concern for the faithful, than this: "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Heb. xiii, 5. Oh, that we may all trust God; and by taking him at his word (which is faith) at once give him glory, and behold the forth-comings of his saving strength.

In pleading these precious promises, there is an error into which many fall, and we do wisely to avoid it. They use language of this "Lord, if it is thy will, provide for our wants; send us, if it shall seem good in thy sight, this day our daily bread." Now, it is the Lord's will to distribute to our necessities, and we ought to exclude "if" on such occasions from our petitions. It is introduced by a sense of humility—a consciousness of unworthiness; but, after all, it brings no sweet savor along with it. "If" is doubt; whereas the record is explicit, "all these things shall be added unto you." We are encouraged to display a holy boldness at the throne; and we most honor God when we turn his promises, as it were, into drafts, and expect them to be realized in the most perfect manner. This little "if" very frequently carries a heavy freight of unbelief, and that is a useless cargo.

The art—for surely it is a divine art, of trusting in God—of depending on his interposition—is one that waxes more perfect as we engage in it. The ability to trust seems to grow with accumulating vigor; every prayer answered becomes a prop to our faith in after hours; and in virtue of our weakness many props are required. Abstractly we all admit that the Lord's promise is faithful; yet, shame to us, we find theory and practice sadly at variance. We trust as we see, more so than in accordance with our reading or our reason; we are often tempted to suspect his veracity; and somehow, when it comes to the pressure, we find it easier to depend on a human than a Divine pledge. But in the most dismal hour let us have faith in God; and with a view to nourish what faith we have, let us draw liberally on the Divine love. We err in meditating on our doubts; on the turmoil of anxiety and dismay within; on our lapses from rectitude and devotion to Christ; we should occupy our thoughts with the boundless compassion of our heavenly Father, and his unsullied veracity. The question at these crises in our history is not what we are, but what he is; not what we deserve, but what he has promised to us his children, marked by manifold imperfections. Looking up, we grow calm; but if we, like Peter, turn our eyes toward the waves, confidence subsides and we sink into gloom. Blessed is the man whose heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord his God. It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes; unsolicited he sent his Son to be a sacrifice for our sins, and how much more readily may we expect him to grant us mercies that are of infinitely less value.

It may appear hard to be in such an extremity that nothing but a promise remains for our comfort; but let us recollect that the promise is a Divine one—its author cannot lie. And then, moreover, we have an opportunity of discovering the strength of our confidence in God. Many, it is to be feared, are trusting the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ for final salvation, who could not in child-like simplicity rely on him for their first meal when the sun next rises. But is not the promise as valid for time, as the other one for eternity? Think of it, trusting his grace for "glory, honor, and immortality," and yet shrinking back when the amount at stake is exceedingly small! It is beyond our province to affirm that in such instances there is no faith in the word; certainly it is feeble, and far from that comprehensive receptivity that gives glory to the Creator, who woos our confidence in a thousand ways. When, in the evolutions of Providence, godly men are made familiar with want, and discover no human resource left them in their straits, they then may experimentally learn how faithfully the promises are fulfilled. I may add, though only for the sake of perspicuity, how literally they are fulfilled. The very thing asked in the day of need is imparted; not something else: not a spiritual blessing instead of a temporal one: not a deception in place of a substantial, want-relieving blessing. As a result absolute theoretical confidence in the Divine truthfulness is companioned henceforth in our consciousness by self-observed assurances of his faithfulness; and probably these assurances will, in future times be more potent in sustaining us in trials than even our sound anterior speculative convictions on the moral character of the Creator, and the value of his testimony. Such is the constitution of our being that we are more impressed by a fact than a creed. Events are great teachers, and rise like pillars of fire on the page of our history. We look back to them as Jacob did to his blissful dream at Bethel; and ever more know the reality of heaven's care, and the proximity of heaven's guardian messengers.

These promises are designed to foster a spirit of independence in the pious mind. Each saint is warranted to regard himself as a prince—a son of the King of kings. His language should be, "I will not fear what man can do unto me: if God be for us, who can be against us?" He is to seek aid from no one except his Father: we feel painfully humbled the moment we entreat support from man. It requires a struggle; it goes home to our tenderest sensibilities. It subjects us to sufferings that our Father never intended us to undergo. His ear is open to our entreaties; his hand is never shortened that it cannot save. Friends may be proud to aid us when the Divine impulse moves their sympathy; but we are to deal exclusively with God, assuring ourselves that he needs no aid from us, when he rises in majesty to accomplish his promises. Having this assurance of the eternal care, the witnesses in ancient and more recent times were so bold and uncompromising; even the malignity of their foes could not hinder for an hour the stream of divine goodness—their wants were supplied, their confidence invigorated. Who can trust in God? If ever there was a time when holy witnesses were required, that time is now. The world is vainly experimenting—struggling for rest and abiding comfort. The vast company of professing Christians are disciples only in name; the most pernicious spiritual delusions are sweeping over the land, overturning many goodly fabrics of faith and piety, burying souls beneath accumulated deceptions. Witnesses are needed; and why should they be afraid to risk themselves on the promises? They are arks in which they may ride the waves and defy the storms.

To those who are so situated in life as to require special Divine aid, I would suggest two things.

First. Copy out the promises applicable to your circumstances: they are scattered all over the Bible, and when collected, speak most soothingly to the heart. In the hour of necessity, read them over prayerfully, and you will be strengthened bravely. Forgetting a promise has often disabled and darkened pious souls.

Second. Record your experience, of the Divine goodness and faithfulness, in a private journal. The perusal of it will help you when your confidence is tried. You will learn to trust again; you will see afresh that "he is faithful; he cannot deny himself." Oh! my brother, my sister, trust him who sustains you every moment—whose supplies are incalculably vast; and whose affection for his ransomed offspring many waters cannot quench.

NO FUTURE LIFE OUT OF CHRIST.

BY WM. WOOD; CONCLUDED.

THESE two conditions, or states of existence, embrace two extremes; each one the opposite, and also the antagonist of the other, similar to the law of life and death, or light and darkness, which can never commingle with the other; the first rays of the morning light act upon the darkness, begining to consume, until the rising of the sun, when all traces of that darkness disappears. So in that glorious morning of eternal day, as the first rays of light dawn upon a new creation, and the saints of the most high God are clothed upon with immortality, then all traces of this long, dreary night of time, this nature of darkness, of the flesh and the devil, will disappear and pass away forever. We cannot lose sight of these two conditions; for while one is perishable, the other is the only way by which we can obtain a yet future existence. Paul, in his epistles, is very particular to separate one from the other. 1 Cor. ii., 13–14, "But which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual. But the natural man . . . . cannot know these things, because they are spiritually concerned." God hath made known this law of a spiritual life by his spirit, through his Son Jesus Christ. Our Saviour in allusion to this life, and the way to obtain it, says, John vi., 53, "Except you eat (me) my flesh, ye have no life in you." The Jews, it appears, did not or could not understand these words. The reason seems very plain to me; for they did not understand the law of a spiritual existence; and therefore said one to another, "How can he give us his flesh to eat?" They knew very well that they had life; were not dead; therefore, when he uttered these words, "Except you eat my flesh, ye have no life in you," they treated him with contempt.

Again. Who are the recipients of this eternal life? 1 Cor. xv., 22. "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be alive." Without further examination of the subject this text would satisfy us, as it does others, that the all who die in Adam will be made alive in Christ. As we have spoken in another part of this of the two Adams, we repeat that the first man who was made from the dust of the earth was the Son of God under a natural law. But the second man who is of celestial extraction, or "the Lord from heaven," is the Son of God under a higher, or spiritual law. The first man is only endowed with an animal life, which is perishable. The second man has a life-giving principle, which is eternal. The first man under the law of his nature hath generative organs to correspond with that law, by which means he begets children who can only possess the characteristics of him who begets. This law of generation produces a body in, by, and through the flesh; therefore, is flesh, both mind and body; and as the mind is the organ of action to the body, the thoughts that proceed from that mind must be in harmony, in sympathy with, and of the same nature as the body; and as the body is corruptible, the mind from which issue the thoughts, which thoughts under the natural law are of the flesh, sensual, devilish, cannot survive, but must perish with the body.

The second man is no procreator through the flesh: cannot beget a body after an animal life, nor produce an infant son belonging to the race of the first Adam.

We have remarked that a body, either natural or spiritual, is not sown; a body produces nothing; but a seed or grain is sown, which can be the only method whereby a body can be produced, whether that body be animal or spiritual. "Ye must be born, or begotten again," saith our Saviour to Nicodemus; "that which is begotten of the flesh is flesh." Paul's statement is similar. "That which a man soweth he shall also reap: if he sow to the flesh, of the flesh he will reap corruption." If it is sown a natural body, you can reap nought but corruption. But if it is sown a spiritual seed, or grain, of that seed you will reap life everlasting. Nicodemus did not understand Jesus, for he saith, "Can a man go through the same process as before, when he is old and be begotten again?"

By the few thoughts we have thrown out sufficient has been said that all who are, and continue to belong to the posterity of the first Adam will never see, or be a recipient of a future life, because that life is a spiritual one, and none but those who are begotten by the Spirit can be born again; be born not of a corruptible, but from a seed that is incorruptible. Thus we reason that another life is a spiritual life, and those who may be the possessors of that existence become spiritual beings and will never fully understand the character or nature of that life until clothed upon with immortality. There are many of us who think they understand the nature of a future state, from a supposition that the Christian will inherit a beautiful city, called the New Jerusalem, the great metropolis of God's universal empire, where we shall find the tree of life on both sides of the river, the leaves of which are for the healing of the nations who shall eat of this fair fruit and live forever. If this can be so understood, what shall we do with our blessed Lord and Saviour, who is the only source or tree of an immortal existence that God hath ever revealed to man? He says, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." Again. "Cursed be every one that hangeth on a tree." Christ hung on the accursed wood, or tree, became our life; and whosoever eateth of the fruit of that tree of life will live forever. Jesus says, "I am the bread, or staff of life; he that eateth me hath everlasting life." Had we not better say that the tree of life, on both sides of the river, is our own blessed Jesus standing between the two dispensations; and whoever will partake of its fruit, or leaves, which are his teachings, will be healed with all nations who partake and live forever? Yes, there is a future life obtained only from that tree, the Lord Jesus Christ. But if there is a future tree of life we shall find it will be in harmony with other portions of sacred writ. It is evident from the gospel writings that Christ is our (all righteous persons') life; for when he who is our life shall appear, then shall we appear with him in glory. If Christ is our life, the righteous will surely not need another tree to give them life; and if those who are out of Christ have, after the age closes, access to another tree, where Jesus says, the wicked are compared to the tares, bad fish, which are separated at the end of the age from the good and cast into a furnace of fire, it is something, it appears to me, that will be difficult to harmonize. As in Adam all (who are of his nature) die, so in Christ shall all (who partake of his nature, or the tree of life) be made alive. Do all my dear brothers and sisters understand the true import of these beautiful words, "A future life," which fall upon the ear like softest music, causing a thrill of ecstacy to vibrate through every chord of our natures? The heading of this article, "No life out of Christ," expresses, conclusively, there is no other way or tree than Christ. The boundary line to the animal man is death; he can go no further; but the law of the spirit of life, through Jesus Christ, has no confines, but is eternal. Yes, we praise thee, O God our Father, that in and through thy Son Jesus Christ, all who are in him shall have eternal life.

FROM JANE A. MAYO.

NORTH AMHERST, MASS., Nov. 1, 1867.

BR. STORRS: We have an interest in every thing that tends to spread truth, and think the tract fund is one mighty means. You will find inclosed $2 for that purpose. I thank my Heavenly Father that he ever turned my feet into the narrow path that leads to life. It was in 1822; and with what light I had at that time, I walked on. In '43 I lost my "sky" kingdom; and your Six Sermons, soon after, made me poor indeed. I was brought very low. I saw the truth as I never did before, also, my dependence on Christ. I spoke of my views freely to the Methodists, as I was one of them. They told me, that you had fallen from grace, and had become immoral in your life. It grieved me exceedingly, and I wrote you what I heard, and asked if it was so? Do you remember it? You sent me a Bible Examiner, with a piece or personation. I soon learned the lesson in my own case, and had to share the same. I often felt as though I was facing a storm of hail and wind, which so blinded me that I had to shut my eyes for fear of losing them; but still kept on. When the storm was over, I found the air clearer, and that I could see further. Thank the Lord. They expelled me for my ugly views; but that was good, also; now I feast on the word of the Lord. I cannot find a second resurrection in the word; it is not a Scriptural expression. 1 Thess. iv., 17, does not teach it; "the dead in Christ shall rise first;" that is, before the living are changed. To me there is something very lovely in it. Jesus, when he arose from the dead, said, "Go tell my brethren, I have risen." I think it is not altogether fancy that those risen ones will go, or send word to the living saints that they have risen. This would be a stimulus better than all the time movements ever got up. Having "part in the first resurrection." Christ was the first, and we shall never be raised if we have no part in him. He told Peter that if he did not wash him he had no part in him. I am sure of that.

"The shaking of the nations, by W. M." He says, "The chart by which we have been guided seems to have run out. We know no other waymarks, to lead us further in the future." Is not Jerusalem trodden down by the gentiles? Is not that on the chart? And what mean all the prophecies yet unfulfilled? Ezk. xxxvi. "Therefore ye mountains of Israel, hear ye the word of the LORD: thus saith the LORD God to the mountains and to the hills, to the rivers, and to the valleys, shoot forth your branches and yield your fruit to my people Israel, for they are at hand to come," etc. Chap. xxxvii., we have the valley of dry bones, which is the whole house of Israel. Chap. xxxviii., we have, I think, a very plain description of the last battle of God Almighty, which will be fought on the mountains of Israel, not in Europe; the shaking they may and will bring about—that which is determined to be poured upon the desolator of the land of Israel, to make a way for that people to return to their land. In Zech. xiv., we have a clear place on the chart. Thank the Lord for his word. All that has not been fulfilled will be as sure as God lives. My eyes are toward the land of Israel for signs of the coming of the Messiah. But things move very slow in that direction. I love to read the promises made to that people. I love to feel that I am grafted in to their olive tree, and a partaker of the promises of God made unto the fathers. May the Lord bless all the scattered ones, and help us to fill our places. I am thankful to God that enabled you to stand fast in the storms of malice and falsehood that you have had to endure. I know you was raised up for the purpose which you have so far fulfilled. I hope you will live until the Messiah comes, if it is for the best. Your sister, with a "good hope."

ON all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. EARTH, NOT HEAVEN, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. THE SOUL SAVED OR LOST. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. MORAL DEPRAVITY; by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. DOOM OF THE UNGODLY: or, THE WICKED DEAD REMAIN ETERNALLY UNDER DEATH'S DOMINION. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. THE WAGES OF SIN: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. LETTERS TO A CLERGYMAN; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. FINLEY, Pittsburg, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for 2 cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our own expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent for 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. THE ESSENTIAL BAPTISM; by the EDITOR of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

The following are 12mo. Tracts, of 24 pages each:

MAN'S NATURE AND DESTINY; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by GEO. STORRS. Price, 5 cents.

THE ATONEMENT, by GEO. STORRS, and THE GOSPEL HOPE, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price, 5 cents.

All letters in relation to any of these works must be addressed,

TERMS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE.

Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar for six months; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York City, 48 cents additional.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, pre-paid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658,
NEW YORK.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to GUESS them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE JUDGMENT.

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

MUCH has been said and written on this subject, but we fear a large portion has been "words without knowledge," and that no really definite and practical ideas have been the result. The general notion of the judgment is that of a great assize or court, at which the entire race of Adam are to be assembled in one vast concourse, and that each individual case is then and there to be examined, and all the thoughts of his heart, actions of his life, words of his lips, as well as the motives which have governed him, are to pass in review, and his case be decided upon the evidence then appearing, after which the sentence is to be pronounced, and the execution to follow.

Against this view there are great and (with present light) insuperable objections. In presenting them, however, we are aware we shall have to encounter an almost impassable barrier in the minds of many sincere souls, who have had the common notion interwoven in all their religious thoughts and instructions.

Far be it from us to approach such time-honored sentiments with rude hands, and far from us be the wish to unsettle any mind in such a cherished idea, unless we can offer them a more Scriptural one, and one that shall be more practical in its influence upon their hearts and lives. Believing, however, that it is possible the popular view may be erroneous, if not pernicious in its influence, we shall proceed to state some objections to it, and then see if the Scriptures do not warrant and require a different view of the subject.

To the correctness of the view generally entertained, we suggest, first, an objection as to the time necessary to such a procedure. We are not to rush upon a conclusion blindly: and it is doubtless true that not one in a thousand, ministers or people, ever have exercised their thoughts on the time that must be occupied to conclude the judgment, if the popular theory be the true one.

The position we are to occupy on this subject is not that of a dogmatist—or positiveness—but of investigation, to find, if possible, the truth on a subject of such absorbing interest to every serious and reflecting mind.

THE TIME necessary to an examination of each individual case in the formal manner expressed or implied in the common theory, is an insuperable objection to it.

As to the number of the human family, it is impossible to arrive at anything like certainty; yet we are not of those who suppose the number has been so great they could not all stand upon the globe at one time, as some have affirmed. For a basis of calculation, we will suppose one generation of the world lasts thirty years. This would give 200 generations in 6,000 years. We will now suppose the number of the inhabitants of the globe to be eight or nine hundred millions, and let this number represent each generation; though, it will be seen, this, m st likely, gives us too many. Eight hundred millions, multiplied by 200, (the number of generations from Adam to the end of 6000 years) will give us one hundred and sixty billions (160,000,000,000) as the sum total of the human family to be judged, if the judgment is to occur at the close of the 6,000 years. But that the statements may not exceed the facts, we will make the number only one fourth of the one hundred and sixty billions, viz., forty billions.

Now let us allot some specific time to the examination and decision of each individual case, on the supposition they are to be judged in succession—that is, one after another.

1. Allow one second to each individual, and 1,500 years must be taken up in the process.

2. Allow one minute to each case, 90,000 years are necessary.

3. Give one hour to each, and five millions of years are required.

4. Let one day be the time for each case, and nearly two billions of years will be necessary to complete the judgment.

We do not affirm such a period will not be occupied in the judgment, but it certainly looks doubtful when the Scriptures seem everywhere to speak of the speedy execution of the sentence of the judgment on the return of Christ. There seems only one way to avoid this protraction of the judgment, and that is to suppose the examination of all, or of large numbers, is proceeding at one and the same time. This indeed is possible, but then it breaks in upon the notion that each individual case is to be examined before all, and exposed to all the race of men.

If we reduce the number to be examined and judged to one half of our lowest estimate, and then allow only one hour to each case, at least one million years would be necessary to complete the judgment, and before sentence could be executed; or a period about one hundred and fifty times as long as it has been since Adam was created.

Notwithstanding this seemingly insurmountable difficulty to the common theory, if the Scripture positively affirmed such to be the process of judgment, we would bow to its testimony; but we may find it does not; we are therefore at liberty to search to see if some other view of the judgment is not the true one.

In addition to the foregoing objection we urge another on the attention of those who believe the righteous will have a priority, in time, in the resurrection, whether that time be one hour, one day, one year, or a thousand years.

How is it to be known who are to have part in this favored class, if all in their graves have not been judged before the resurrection begins? Are the righteous to be raised and then the process of judgment to be instituted to see whether the Searcher of hearts has made a mistake? Or, are they to be tried, undergo an examination after their resurrection, as if suspected characters? Can we adopt either of these positions? If not, must it not be manifest they had been judged before being raised? And why are they raised, and not the wicked, at the same instant, except the wicked also have been judged, and found not worthy to have part in this prior or "first resurrection?"

There is no escape from these questions by those who hold all men are revived at the same time, and yet say the wicked are raised corruptible; for it is clear the righteous come up *in*corruptible and immortal. Why this distinction in the revival state, if both classes had not been judged prior to the revival? And those who have taken the unscriptural position that both classes are raised in a mortal condition, and yet a thousand years apart, do not help their side of the question; for how does it happen that one class are raised before the others, at all, if both had not been judged prior to this separation of the dead ones? Why do the righteous come up before the wicked? Why? No rational answer can be given by the advocates of a mortal resurrection, if they deny that all had previously been judged.

If these things are so, then we are brought to the inevitable conclusion that the judgment, in which character and doom is decided, is at some period prior to the resurrection. This, let it be remembered, is not saying there is not a judgment—yea, "a great day of judgment," at, or immediately upon the resurrection; but the nature of that judgment will be a subject of inquiry as we proceed.

Before going farther, we will endeavor to find out the meaning of the terms judged and judgment. They are variously applied in the Scriptures.

Judgment, in its most simple form, signifies the act of judging, or the process of examining facts and arguments, to ascertain truth, propriety and justice. It also signifies the determination of the mind, or the conclusion the mind has arrived at from an examination of things presented to its consideration. It is sometimes put for the spirit of wisdom with which a person is endowed. Sometimes it signifies the statutes, or laws and testimony of God. This is often the case, as in Psa. cxix. It is applied to remarkable calamities inflicted upon communities and nations. Also to judicial decisions, and to the execution of the sentence following trial and conviction, or acquittal.

These are the general ideas contained in the terms judge and judgment. There are judicial judgments on individuals, communities and nations. The Lord told Abraham he would "judge that nation" who were to "afflict" his seed "four hundred years." The process of judgment is definitely recorded in Exodus. Not a personal appearance of Jehovah to the persons judged; but he tested them—that is, the rulers of Egypt, by his servant Moses, and gave the sufficient evidence to have led them to regard his demand to "let Israel go," if they had not persisted, through their covetousness, to held those whom they had enslaved. The demand of Moses, and the evidence he exhibited in the name of the God of the Hebrews, was the judgment process that was to decide the doom of Egypt or her princes. Then follows the executive judgment, or the judgment carried into execution; and the Lord said, as the deciding judgment was drawing to a close, "I will pass through the land of Egypt this night, and smite all the first born in the land of Egypt . . . . and against all the gods [princes] of Egypt I will execute judgment." The executive judgment commenced that night, and terminated, or was completed at the Red Sea, when Pharaoh and all his princes were destroyed. This was judging a nation, or rather her body of rulers. The principle, we apprehend, is here brought out, that the judgment is constituted or made up of two parts, viz., the investigating judgment and the executive judgment. The one precedes the other. The first goes on while in a state of trial, and when the trial closes, and the evidence or testimony is all elicited, the sentence is passed: the executive judgment follows after at some fixed period. We might illustrate this view with several other examples from Scripture, but we judge this is sufficient for the present.

We now come to the question, Is the judgment at the end of the world—end of the age—or at the resurrection—the investigating judgment, or the executive one?

This question is an important and interesting one, involving much more than may at first appear; we must therefore examine it with care, and see that we do not come to a hasty conclusion. If it should prove to be the investigating judgment, we are thrown back on the difficulties before suggested. On the other hand, if it be found to be the executive judgment, we shall inquire at what period or time does the judgment or investigation take place? which will open a field for many solemn and heart-searching thoughts.

IS THE JUDGMENT AT THE RESURRECTION THE EXECUTIVE ONE?

With present light we are inclined to the opinion, it is; and that the investigating judgment terminates before the executive one commences, so far as relates to all men who are the subjects of this executive judgment.

1. Christ is specially the executive Judge. In this respect "the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son . . . . and hath given him authority to execute judgment:" John v.

2. The Judgment at the resurrection is by Christ. The examination of a few texts will show us that it is clearly an executive one; or if an investigating one at all, it is but faintly expressed, and is inferred rather than clearly affirmed.

1.) "The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his holy angels: and then he shall reward every man according to his works." Matt. xvi., 27.

No other idea of judgment is expressed here than that of an executive one. We do not affirm no other is implied, but the simple expression is that of execution.

2.) That which seems more to express an investigating judgment is Matthew xxv., 31. But if that portion of Scripture is carefully examined, we shall, perhaps see little cause to conclude it is an account of anything more than an executive judgment. Christ, on the throne of his glory, proceeds at once to "separate one from another," the whole account of which is embraced in two verses, 32, 33; and then he proceeds directly to the executive judgment, commencing with the righteous, v. 34. The whole is, apparently, a proclamation of the result of a previous investigation, the sentence or judgment of which is now to be executed; the whole transaction, seemingly, occupying no very protracted period.

3.) "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." 2 Cor. v., 10.

Here is a clear statement of what men are to stand before Christ for. It is to receive the reward of their deeds: in other words, that the "judgment written" may be executed upon them. There is certainly no clear announcement that an investigating judgment then takes place.

4.) Rev. xx., 11, 15, next demands our attention, as clearly affirming an investigating judgment at the last day, if any text in the Bible does. If that does not, it will be difficult to find one that does. At first view, and coming to it with the prejudices of our entire religious education, this text seems to teach that there is an investigation at that time, as well as an execution. But a close examination may serve to lessen our confidence in the idea of an investigating judgment on the occasion. Mark: "The dead, small and great"—the lowly and the illustrious—"stand before God; and the books were opened." The expression "books" is of course figurative. But what books are they? Not blank ones, now to be filled up, for they are already "written," or filled up; which was the case at the time they were opened; so that the writing must have been done prior to that time. The natural conclusion is, they are books of record, and had been filled up with testimony given at some previous period. Where there is a court of investigation, in order to a decision, the testimony is written down or recorded. At the opening of such a court, or seat of justice, no books of recorded testimony, relating to the individual to be tried, are opened. The books of law may then be opened, but it is manifest in Rev. xx., 12, that if the book of law was included, the books of testimony are specially noted: for the dead were judged out of"—ek—or, on account of—"those things written in the books;" which judgment is expressly said to be "according to their works," or according to that testimony "written in the books;" and the language repeated in verse 13, "they were judged every man according to their works," carries the idea, in connection with the context, that this judgment was an executive judgment: that is, it was the time in which, and transaction by which, the "judgment written" was executed; for, "whosoever was not found written in the book of life, was cast into the lake of fire." So then, some names were written in the book of life when "the books" were opened; others were not found there; which seems conclusive evidence that the judgment of investigation—or receiving testimony for and against, and deciding what should be the reward of every man—was a previous transaction: and the assembling now before God is in order to the execution, or to carry out the punishment and bestow the reward as found written in the books.

It cannot be denied, we think, but those whose names were found written in the book of life, at the very time the books were opened, must have been judged at some period previously, and their case determined, else their names had not been found there on opening the books; and if they had previously been judged and acquitted, so it is reasonable to suppose the others had been judged and condemned. Thus it would seem the judgment (Rev. xx., 12) is not the investigating judgment, but the executive one, or the one of execution. The several texts now examined might be enlarged upon and others of like character considered.

If the judgment, at the resurrection, or at the last day, is executive and not the judgment of investigation, When and where is the investigating judgment?—and on what principle is it conducted?

This is a solemn inquiry: may the Father of light shed his divine rays of truth on our minds, that we may be so led into an understanding of his word, that we may be sanctified through the truth, and be able to spread truth in the path of our fellow men, that they may see how holy it becomes us all to live, whose every word, every work, and "every secret thing" is to come into judgment, or be investigated before God, or pass in his view for his decision or judgment upon it.

In answer to the first part of the question before us, one word—though not exactly Scriptural in its form, yet expressing truth, and universally employed in theology—expresses the fact we wish to develop: that word is "probation." The very idea of the word is trial—examination—any proceeding designed to ascertain truth. Webster says: "In general, trial for proof, or satisfactory evidence; or the time of trial."

In this definition the idea is fully brought out, on which we wish to fix attention, viz.: As all thelogians maintain this present life, or a man's lifetime, is his time of probation, then he is now on trial, or the investigating judgment is in actual session at this moment, and every individual during his life is on trial before God, the righteous "Judge of all the earth;" and each one is, day by day, not only at the bar of the investigating judgment but is himself the witness for or against himself, and is every hour giving testimony on which the judge decides the case. Solemn thought! And here let it be remembered that "God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil." How solemn the consideration that each one of us is, every hour, testifying before Jehovah's court for or against ourselves! Every word we utter is a part of our testimony; every act of our lives is but our own testimony in our case; every temper of mind indulged or cultivated goes to make up the chain of testimony, and all our motives in life are so many links in the chain. What a life are we then living! Always in court—always on trial—always giving evidence by which the Judge is to decide our doom! Here is a practical influence flowing out from this view of the subject. Men cannot say "judgment will never begin," as most in fact do, on the popular theory. No; they are now in the "judgment of this world" they are now arraigned at Jehovah's bar, and this judgment has proceeded so far and so much testimony has already been elicited that every impenitent unbeliever is "condemned already"—is this moment under sentence of death, and the day of executive judgment is hastening on, though the judge offers to all men a free pardon through Jesus Christ, if they will accept it before the day—the great day of executive judgment arrives. He is long-suffering in the execution of the sentence. If men abuse and slight the forbearance of the Lord, the justice of their execution will be more apparent and their guilt terribly increased.

The matter stands thus: Men are now passing through the investigating judgment, and for their sins, on their own testimony—out of their own mouths and by their lives—they are now condemned to death, and the day of executive judgment approacheth. During the interval, God promises to blot out the sins of those who, with a broken heart for sin, and true faith in or reliance upon his mercy in Christ, seek to him for pardon, and he has promised to such life—eternal life. Those who embrace this gracious offer are actually pardoned—the sentence of the investigating judgment is revoked—their sins are remembered no more; and enduring in allegiance to God to the end of their trial, the testimony is in favor of their acquittal; and when the Executive Judge, viz., Jesus Christ, comes to "execute judgment upon all," those "in Christ" are first acquitted by him. This is the first act of executive judgment: "the dead in Christ rise," not to be examined to see if they may live, or to have their sins—which have been blotted out—exposed to the gaze of men and angels. No. They rise to life—eternal life—to immortality. Such is "the judgment of the great day" with respect to them.

On the other hand, Christ executes the judgment of death—perdition—"everlasting destruction" on "them that know not God and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ"—which was the Gospel of life eternal in the kingdom of God.

"Because sentence against an evil work was not speedily executed, therefore the hearts of the sons of men were fully set in them to do evil." It seems Solomen understood the "sentence had passed on evil-doers, and yet wicked men took advantage of the delay in its execution to persist in sin. Could evil-doers have been persuaded that the sentence itself was still in the uncertain future, they might have persuaded themselves that somehow they would altogether escape that also, as multitudes do now. Let them know that they are now passing through the judicial trial, and their own testimony of themselves is such the Judge has already pronounced the death sentence upon them, and their only hope is to fly at once to him, while he holds out the sceptre of mercy by Christ, and seek earnestly through God's beloved Son, pardon, not delaying till the day of execution; for then no pardons will be granted. But while the day of execution is unknown, let the condemned seek God's mercy, through the true Advocate, and pardon is certain; and, enduring in obedience thereafter to God, eternal life will be given.

THE ENGRAFTED WORD.

JAMES, in writing to "the twelve tribes scattered abroad," after assuring them that they should rejoice under the cross of Christ because of the spiritual benefits they would derive from it; entreating them to go to God, "that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not," and in faith, nothing doubting, ask for wisdom; showing them how and by what agency they were tempted and drawn away; cautioning them against hasty words and wrong tempers; exhorted them to "receive with meekness the engrafted word." The figure which he here uses, taken from the well-known custom of grafting, is at once clear, simple, and highly illustrative. When it is desired to improve the fruit of a tree its branches are taken off and others of better quality, possessing in themselves the power of so changing the nature of the stock as to cause it to bring forth fruit after their kind, are set into it. All know that when a graft is inserted in a tree, or stock, that the two unite and become one tree, the graft determining the kind of fruit.

The Mosaic dispensation was eminently an outward one. As reward for obedience to the law the people were promised certain temporal blessings, and a system of sacrifices and offerings was instituted by which the sins of participants were simply passed over, or transmitted, from year to year until God should offer a perfect sacrifice (of which those they made were types), for sins for all time: as it is written of Christ, "after he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down on the right hand of God." Paul told the Hebrews that "the law, having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never, with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect." The law, with all its ceremonies and sacrifices was only the shadow of spiritual good, the gospel being the "real image," which is readily seen when it is compared with the law; when Christ is compared with his types, or his sacrifices with the Levitical offerings; or when the ministrations of the Holy Spirit and remissions of sins under the gospel is compared with what the law afforded. The Jews did not believe that even the annual atonement blotted out their sins before God; but they continued to make their offerings, as the law enjoined, because they comprehended, more or less imperfectly perhaps, the idea that those sacrifices pointed to that which was to come. Hence, in the same epistle, Paul says the tabernacle "was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect as pertaining to the conscience." The sinner who made these offerings and sacrifices in conformity to the law, doubtless felt and was considered to have done his duty, and might, because of it, be exempted from certain legal punishments, but his conscience would feel that the guilt of sin still remained. Thus those who did the service best, continued to be imperfect, and had guilty consciences. As, then, the ceremonies and observances under the law were types and shadows of the Christian dispensation, when Christ came, announced his doctrines, and had even unto his death and resurrection fulfilled his mission, the branches of the law (its ceremonies and observances) being superseded by, or meeting their accomplishment in, the real thing, were cut off, and into the stock, the substance of the law and the prophets, was engrafted his word, his doctrines, and the tree thus improved and perfected will yield its rich harvest of precious fruit in the kingdom soon to be established. The law was given to the children of Israel only; but the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ is freely offered unto both Jew and Gentile. All are invited to receive it, and upon the same terms. As the ruined life of the tree is gradually transformed by contact with the inserted stem and finally produces fruit, contrary, in kind, to its first nature; so all are called upon to receive the engrafted word, by yielding obedience to the silent but steady and powerful influences of which, and the Holy Spirit operating in unison with it, the desires of the animal may be so controlled and subjected; our carnal natures so subdued and changed by the development of a spiritual that instead of the fruit of our own wild unregenerate nature we shall bring forth those of the spiritual, obedience, righteousness, and holiness.

In seeking to improve the fruit of a tree by grafting it not unfrequently occurs that the graft is so inserted that the sap of the roots and stock is not permitted to flow freely to the newly introduced cion, in which case the tree not only fails to bear better fruit but the graft itself, receiving no nutrition, withers and dies. So in individual experience is it with the engrafted word. It is not always received heartily, and in faith. It is not always permitted to receive the co-operation of the indwelling manifestation of the Spirit in order that the thoughts and feelings of the creature may be transformed and purified and thus fitted to produce fruit unto holiness. There is not always sufficient endeavor to control the animal passions which, having too much play, overtop the comparatively slight influences of the spirit of grace and prevent it from combining with the word to assist us in bringing the creature by will into more perfect subjection to the divine will. There is generally too little desire and effort to learn more and more of its godly nature, and origin; for little love for the word of truth. People are apt to stifle any temporary desire they may feel to know more of it, with the assurance that "after all it makes little difference if we are sincere in what we do believe and try to do the will of God:" ignoring the fact that the more perfect their knowledge of his word, the better they will understand his plans and purposes respecting the race; the higher and holier their conceptions of him the greater their love of him, of Christ, and of his holiness; and the stronger will be the help laid upon them to walk as becometh true and faithful followers of Jesus. Paul declared his ability to do all things through Christ which strengthened him. Christ strengthens by the Spirit, which he sends, and the word: the two when correctly understood always being found to operate in harmony.

If examples were needed to show the wonderful power of the gospel, the engrafted word, upon individuals, they may be formed in multitudes from its earliest history down. The case of Zaccheus, the publican, is an illustration of it. He is spoken of as the "chief among the publicans;" that is, the head, or principai tax-gatherer; and that he was rich. All are familiar with the circumstances under which Jesus accosted him, calling upon him to come down and follow, that he might entertain them at his house. He went, listened to the teachings of the Master, believedon him, and determined to become a disciple of the humble Nazarene.

And now see the wonderful change wrought in him by the words of truth that he heard. Human nature was essentially then as now; and tax-gatherers sometimes took more than was just, or than the law required; themselves keeping the excess. But so radical is the change wrought in Zaccheus, so unalterable are his resolutions that he not only proposes to give the half of his goods to the poor, but adds, "and if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation I restore him fourfold." In order to fully appreciate this latter compound of confession and resolution it is necessary to remember that under the Roman laws when any tax-gatherer had been proved to have abused his power by oppressing the people he was obliged to make restitution by returning to the injured party four fold. But here was no such proof; no such accusation, even. It was a hearty, unaffected response to a recognition of the glorious principles and faith-inspiring promises of Christianity. The Saviour knew that Zaccheus was sincere; took him at his word, and pronounced his blessing, "This day is salvation come to this house."

Paul is one of the brightest examples of this power. His first appearance upon the stage of Bible history is under the name of Saul, in connection with the martyrdom of Stephen, at which he was present and in which he took active part. Scripture language respecting him in this matter is: "Saul was consenting unto his (Stephen's) death." It is evident that the word "consenting" but imperfectly conveys the meaning of the original term, which Dr. Adam Clarke says "signifies gladly consenting, being pleased with his murderous work." However prominently he may or may not have connected himself with Stephen's death, from that time forth he became a zealous persecutor of the Christian church, volunteering his services to the Sanhedrim for that purpose, from which body he obtained a commission to ferret out, both at Jerusalem and in "strange cities," and bring to trial the confessors of the already rapidly-spreading new faith. He punished them oft in the synagogues and "compelled them to blaspheme." At Jerusalem he shut up many of the saints in prison and procured their death by testifying against them. Receiving his view of Deity wholly through the medium of the law, he doubtless thought himself serving God, and he faithfully did his cruel work. It was while travelling to Damascus in the discharge of his commission from the Sanhedrim that he was first met by him whose servants he had persecuted. Amazed, blind, and almost speechless from the wonderful and overpowering manifestations, he was sent into the city. There, humiliated, abased, and convicted, he sought refuge in prayer, in answer to which Annanias was sent to restore his sight and speak unto him the words of the Lord. Abiding for "certain days with the disciples" at Damascus, he freely and heartily received from them the engrafted word, "and straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the son of God."

He who had so unjustly and terribly afflicted believers, pursuing them even unto strange cities, and breathing threatenings and slaughter, becomes the earnest, fearless, unyielding champion of truth against whom is directed the fierce vengeance of them whose unholy cause he had so abruptly forsaken. Once the persecutor, now the pursued and persecuted, he takes his life in his hands and boldly goes forth proclaiming the gospel of Jesus Christ. In accepting the engrafted word, light flowed into his mind, and God's great, broad plan of redemption loomed up in such wondrous magnificence before him, that of those faithful disciples of a once rejected and crucified, but now arisen and glorified Saviour, he became most devoted; laboring "more abundantly than they all." These are but samples of the thousands of cases that shed their hallowed brilliance over all the onward march of truth, and that stand as beacon lights along the way, silently pointing all beholders to the power of the divine word. Why was Paul's love to God so much greater after his conversion to Christianity than before? Whence his willingness to endure reproach and suffering of almost every description and degree of intensity in the service of Christ? Had the divine character changed? No: but in receiving the word of Christ, Paul saw that a dispensation had been introduced in which a revelation of God's goodness and love toward all mankind, and purposes respecting them, is so clear, prominent and comprehensible as to challenge their love, which, keeping pace with their faith and knowledge may expand continually. No plan instituted for the conversion of sinners can be effectual except so far as by correct interpretations of the revealed word they instruct the impenitent respecting their nature, their dependencies, and the designs of God concerning them. A knowledge of these begets love, because by it is brought to their comprehension the fact that God loves them: and the moment love is excited it suggests and prompts obedience. A man might command, coax, and implore sinners until the end of time to love God and his Son, but always in vain unless he presented the evidences of God's love to them; for love is a purely responsive emotion. Its awakening is always in response to a recognition of those qualities of the object which communicate pleasure, or confer benefits. As, therefore, the gospel reveals a Creator infinitely possessed of all good qualities, a proper understanding and interpretation of it is necessary in order to insure success in assisting unbelievers to recognize in God the existence of them. Hence the vast importance of all, and especially they who set themselves up as exponents of the gospel message earnestly and prayerfully endeavoring to break the chains with which they are bound to those inexorable task-masters, pride, fear of men, prejudice, and human tradition, and thus be fitted to "receive with meekness the engrafted word." DR. HUNTINGTON ON CHURCH FAIRS.—REV. Dr. Huntington, at a recent meeting in Providence, said: "Once let the people get poisoned with the wretched falsehood that in order to carry on the work of the church and meet its costs they must contrive some roundabout device of sale, or fair, or picnic; a mixture of merchandise, cajolery, and merry-making, by which the few shall be deluded into parting with more than they want to give, and the many shall be educated into the worse delusion of supposing they are not to surrender anything to the Christ who died for them, without an ostensible equivalent taken back, and you strike at the root of all Christian charity while the name is on your lips. You cast up a treacherous highway at the Lord's feet. You hide out of sight the central reality of sacrifice, which is the giving up to God of that which costs the selfish heart something. You cast out the heart of the church to extend its outward prosperity."

REV. DR. BELLOWS writes from Germany to the Liberal Christian: "No class of persons in Germany has touched me so much as the class just above the peasants and just below the proprietors—the lowest stratum of the middle class. Serious, modest, intelligent, humble, industrious, self-respectful, there is, especially among the women, a certain promise of spiritual life, an unworldliness guaranteed by their inability to participate in the pleasures of those above them and their distaste for the habits of those below them, which seems to say that from them is likely to spring a new generation of souls, unspoiled by empty metaphysical subtleties and uncorrupted by worldliness."

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 20, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

OUR EDITORIAL.—If our readers find the editorials few and short this week, our apology is, we have been unusually hindered; especially by our sudden and unexpected call to Philadelphia to attend the funeral of Brother McFarland. That took from our labor on the paper, three days. We went to Boston some three weeks ago by urgent request of friends there, and in consideration of their peculiar situation; then Brother Ladd has been urging us for several weeks to visit Springfield, Massachusetts, and we had consented to do so. That arrangment was just made when we were called to Philadelphia: that call we could not neglect. Brother Grim came to Brooklyn, last February, to officiate at our son's funeral by our request, and we would have felt it great ingratitude in us not to return the favor at the funeral of his son-in-law. Brother Grim has two daughters, but no son. His eldest daughter had been married but about fifteen months when her husband died. Her request, and that of her family, was for "BR. STORRS to speak at the funeral." We did so, and praise the Lord for the consolation to ourself and others. But all these matters are a tax on our time and strength.

"A PLAIN STATEMENT."

THE article under the above head, last week met with a mishap in our absence. The last paragraph got transposed, or out of place. The reader will find its proper place to be before the two preceding paragraphs. Insert it there after the word "hundreds" and it will read right.

AN EXPLANATION ASKED.

"Will you please explain, through the HERALD, the passage 1. John v. 6–8?" M.

The text reads as follows: "This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not by water only, but by water and blood. And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth. For there are three that bear record [in heaven, the Father the Word and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth] the Spirit, and the water, and the blood: and these three agree in one."

It will be seen that we have inclosed a portion of the text in brackets. This has been done because eminent Trinitarian critics have pronounced that portion to be spurious; among these critics is Dr. Adam Clark. It is to us a matter of indifference whether those words are genuine or not. The expression "These three are one" is the only thing that needs explanation in that part of the text. What does it mean? We think its meaning is obvious. They "are one" in their testimony, or record. John had asked the question, verse 5, "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" The "three that bear record in heaven are one" in their testimony that "Jesus is the Son of God." That part of the text, therefore, needs no other explanation. The other part, not included in the brackets, is easily explained, we think.

John the Baptist said, "Behold the Lamb of God." . . . . "This is he" . . . . "I knew him not: but that he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water. And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him. . . . And I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God."—See John i., 25–34. The baptism with water, by John, was for the express purpose of manifesting Jesus as the "Son of God"—"the Lamb of God," whose blood was to "take away sin;" and the Spirit came to complete the testimony; so that the "three that bear record in earth" are "the Spirit, the water, and the blood; and these three agree," or meet "in one" person, viz., Jesus as the Son of God. They never have, and never can m et in another person. Therefore he is the Lamb of God, the Son of God; and it is he that taketh away sin and giveth life to dying men. The Spirit, the water, and the blood were God's three witnesses, by which he made his "record" . . . . "for this [the Spirit, the water, and the blood] is the witness of God which he testified of his son;" verse 9. "He that believeth not God, hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record God gave of his Son;" verse 10. "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son;" verse 11. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son hath not life;" verse 12.

John now sums up the whole as follows: "These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe [i. e., unwaveringly] on the name of the Son of God;" verse 13. The evidence, the testimony, the record, is full and complete that Jesus is the Son of God—the Lamb of God that taketh away sin; and, consequently, opens our way into eternal life: the full number of witnesses, viz., "three," are found on earth; i. e., "the Spirit, the water, and the blood." He that rejects these, and refuses Jesus as the Christ, the anointed LIFE-GIVER, has made God a liar," and must expect to die the death, without a recovery, which he fully deserves.

"THE DAY OF DOOM:

"OR a Poetical Description of the Great and Last Judgment: by MICHAEL WIGGLESWORTH, A. M., Teacher of the church at Malden in New England, 1662."

This work is republished "from the sixth edition of 1715," and for sale by the "American News Company," of this city. It is a curiosity, showing the views of the orthodox theologians of those days. Good and true men they were according to the light they then had; and "the times of" that "ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent"—to turn from such absurd and superstitious notions as were received on the matter of the destiny of wicked men, and infants.

Of the different classes brought up to be judged, the author presents infants as follows:

"Then to the Bar all they drew near who died in infancy,
And never had or good or bad
effected pers'nally;
But from the womb unto the tomb were straitway carried
(Or at the least ere they transgress'd),
Who thus began to plead:

"If for our own transgression,
or disobedience,
We here did stand at thy left hand,
just were the Recompense;
But Adam's guilt our souls hath spilt,
his fault is charged upon us;
And that alone hath overthrown and utterly undone us," etc.

Mr. Wigglesworth goes on with the children's plea at some length; which plea would certainly be good in any court of justice; but it does not pass heaven's court: so the Judge tells them, if Adam had stood they would all have been saved; and of that they would not have complained. But he fell, and they all sinned in him, and so justly share his liability, and of that they cannot complain. The Judge is made to say of Adam:

"If he had stood, then all his brood had been established
In God's true love never to move,
Nor once awry to tread;
Then all his Race my Father's Grace should have enjoy'd forever," etc.

"Would you have griev'd to have receiv'd through Adam so much good,
As had been your forevermore,
if he had stood?" etc.

"Since then to share in his welfare,
you would have been content,
You may with reason share in his treason,
and in his punishment," etc.

Our author proceeds with quite a long speech by the Judge in justification of his proceedings against these infants, and winds up as follows:

"You sinners are, and such a share
as sinners may expect;
Such you shall have, for I do save
none but mine own Elect:
Yet to compare your sin with their
who live a longer time,
I do confess yours is much less,
though every sin's a crime.

A crime it is, therefore in bliss
you may not hope to dwell;
But unto you I shall allow the easiest room in hell."

Such was the doctrine of "infant damnation" two hundred years ago; nor did it die out of all pulpits till the present century; and we ourself heard it preached when a boy. It may be pronounced dead now; and the equally absurd doctrine of an "immortal soul in eternal torments" is dying along with it, but dies harder; yet no less certainly.

Mr. Wigglesworth, after getting all classes of sinners into eternal torments, describes the feelings of heavenly beings and of the saved toward the damned in the lake of fire. Here is a husband in heaven and his wife in hell. He says:

"He that was erst a Husband pierc'd with sense of wife's distress,
Whose tender heart did bear a part of all her grievances,
Shall mourn no more as heretofore,
because of her ill plight,
Although he sees her now to be
A damn'd forsaken wight.
* * * * * * *
"The pious Father had now much rather
His graceless Son should lie
In Hell with Devils, for all his evils, burning eternally,
Than God most High should injury
by sparing him sustain;
And doth rejoice to hear Christ's voice,
adjudging him to pain."

We have given enough of these horrible ideas for once. They show us what reason we have to praise God that we have been delivered from the root of all such reproaches cast upon our MAKER. The root of all such blasphemy is the doctrine of an "inherent immortal soul" in man. Kill that, and the whole brood of vipers which have sprung from it perish together. Let us toil on till the work is accomplished, and Babylon sinks to rise no more, at all. Then may we shout, "Alleluia! salvation, and glory and honor, and power unto the Lord our God," etc.

THE DEAD UNCONSCIOUS:

OR, OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

Objection 1.—"The idea that the happy believer must sink in the cold embrace of death, and there remain, we know not how long, is soul-chilling, and I cannot receive such a doctrine."

As to its being "soul-chilling," if rightly understood, there is nothing more so than in the common theory. When worn down with labor it is not "soul-chilling" to think of sleeping all night without waking or dreaming: but if we believed when we lay down upon our bed we should have to spend the night half way between sleepfulness and waking, it would be a burden to think of lying down. The common theory that the righteous are conscious when dead, but still waiting for the perfection of their happiness by the resurrection of their bodies, is truly "soul-chilling." What desire can a "disembodied spirit" have, if perfectly happy, to return to a body that never has been anything but a cause of "groaning" while it was inhabited? Surely the thought can have nothing pleasant about it. The idea, if now seriously thought upon, must be repulsive. Besides, the common theory strips the resurrection of all its glory: and the ministers and churches, seeing no glory in it, seldom dwell upon it, and scarce ever urge it to animate the hope of the Christian. At funerals, instead of "comforting one another with these words" that there will be "a resurrection," and that "the dead in Christ will rise first," they try to comfort mourners with the traditions of men—that "the soul has gone to heaven," and that "it knows more than all the world," in plain contradiction of the testimony of God, that "the dead know not anything," and "David is not ascended into the heavens," and consequently none of the righteous have, unless they have had a resurrection or translation. Those who hold the common theory cannot place any value upon the resurrection; hence in the same proportion it must, however insensibly, lead them to undervalue Christ and his work. Our entire being depends upon the Lord Jesus Christ. We fall, in consequence of Adam, under death, even our whole man. Christ, the Lord from glory, is our deliverer; not of our bodies merely, but of our entire being—in him is "our life" and nowhere else. "When he who is OUR LIFE shall appear, THEN"—not before—"shall ye also appear with him in glory." That is the Christian's hope. That is the hope to which our Lord himself and his apostles always pointed us, and not to death. Let the sinner now see that he has no hope of a future life out of Christ, and make haste to him: and let the Christian understand that all his hope is in Christ and his second coming at the resurrection. The period to that time, if you fall asleep first, will be but as the tick of a watch.

Objection 2.—"The soul is sometimes considered as being the whole man, and the body the tabernacle, or house he lives in: the house may tumble down, but the man lives."

"The whole man," in a multitude of instances, is denominated "soul" in the Bible; but what is usually called soul, by theologians, we believe, is never denominated the whole man, or the man. The most that can be said of the soul as distinct from the rest of the man, is, that it is the mind or affections: and this cannot be said strictly to be distinct, or separate from the rest of the man. We might as well talk of steam on a railway without a locomotive: the most that could be said of such steam is, that it is vapor, and of no more value than the fog from the pond. Men say, "We travel by steam." But could they travel by steam if there was no engine for it to work in? Just as well in our opinion, as a soul, or mind can operate without the body. If your engine is broken, or "tumbles down," your steam is useless: so, if your body returns to dust, your soul or mind, must rest till the engine is restored; or, until the resurrection. If you have no part in that, your case is hopeless; your steam has evaporated into its orinal elements; the man is dead; is no more forever. Such is man's fate without a new life-principle. That can only be found by a union with Christ, the LIFE-GIVER.

WHAT IS RICHES?—An Arabian in the desert had eaten nothing for three days, and was on the point of death. He at last found a small leathern sack in the sand; he seized it, felt, and exclaimed, "Allah be praised! these must either be dates or nuts." He opened the sack hastily, looked in and sighed: "Alas! they are only pearls."

WESTWARD BOUND.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Monday, Oct. 21.—At a quarter past two o'clock, P. M., I bade adieu to the loved ones at home, and in a few minutes was on the train for Boston. A passenger seated behind me made inquiry about the Bible Union version of the New Testament, a copy of which he saw me reading. This opened the way for a plain unfolding of several aspects of life only in Christ, and the presentation was listened to with much interest and not a little apparent approval. My friend was an unlettered man, but seemed to be a sincere, Bible loving, unsectarian disciple of the Lord. Just as we were leaving the car, a gentleman who overheard our talk avowed himself a believer in immortality of the righteous alone, but he was not yet instructed in the view of no future life for the wicked.

In Boston I attended to a little business—pencilled a letter to the EDITOR of our paper—and at 8:30 in the evening started for Albany, where I arrived early the following morning.

Oct. 22.—After dinner, in Albany, I took the train for Fort Plain. My brother Harvey Wendell ("JAY") accompanied me as far as Schenectady, where, at a Sunday-school teachers' institute, he was to deliver an address on "The Model Sunday-school Superintendent." At Amsterdam station I had a moment's conversation with my brother Harmon. At Fort Plain station I was met by my beloved father, who lives two miles out of the village. Spent that night with my brother-in-law (my only sister's husband), who was prostrated with typhoid fever.

Oct. 23.—Visited at the parental home during a portion of the day. In the evening, at Fort Plain, I listened for an hour or more to the conversation of my learned friend, S. W., mainly on the proofs of eternal torment afforded by the account of the Rich Man and Lazarus. Said account is his stronghold for the monstrous dogma, and I have not the least expectation that he will ever see the truth on the subject. Years ago a labored article on that parable brought him some forty dollars from the Methodist Quarterly, in two numbers of which it was published. Not long ago my friend found a number of flies struggling for life in his inkstand at the bank, and he is sure that the sufferings endured by those innocent creatures were no more reconcilable with the divine goodness than is the endless suffering of the wicked! Thus placing the transient, with whatever of compensation there may be connected with it, on an equal footing with the infinite.

At 8:30 P. M., took the train for Rochester, arriving there at a little before 4 o'clock next morning.

Oct. 24.—In Rochester, early this morning, had a long and wearisome walk to find Br. W. H. Spencer, but was unsuccessful. At the house given in the directory as his residence, he was unknown, nor could I afterward, at the Earnest Christian office, learn where he lived. Br. S. is personally unknown to me, but knowing of him as a holder of our Life view, I desired to make his acquaintance. Perhaps I shall succeed better on a future trial. Called for a few moments on Dr. J. N. Narramore, a brother whom I formed a pleasant acquaintance with some years ago at Wilbraham camp-meeting. Also peeped into Corinthian Hall (a very large one), and wished that the congregations that had assembled there to heat Brn. Grant and H. Pratt might also be permitted to hear the doctrine of Life only in Christ.

At a little past one o'clock P. M., I found myself at Niagara Falls (American side), which I visited pretty thoroughly during the afternoon. I had once been to see the great wonder on the Canada side, but it was in a dark evening, and of course the visit was anything but satisfactory.

According to reputed orthodoxy, the agonies of lost sinners will not have fairly begun when they shall have been endured as many million centuries as there have drops of water fallen down this cataract since the world was made. And yet we are charged with impairing the motives to repentance because we tell our fellow men that such a doom is unknown to the Bible! How little of deep reflection do the multitudes of those professing godliness bestow upon what their creeds assert concerning the condition of the lost.

Early in the evening I took the train at Suspension Bridge for Detroit, arriving there early on Friday morning.

Oct. 25.—Three of my brothers reside in Detroit, and here I am to remain on a visit with them until Monday. Emory, my second youngest brother, is cashier of the First National Bank. He is a member of the Presbyterian church, but takes the same liberty that I do to believe that the notion of immortal wickedness and misery is of human origin.

Oct. 26.—To-day Br. Geo. W. Sprague, formerly of Poultney, Vt., an old friend of mine, and a firm believer and intelligent defender of our life view, called in my brother's bank and was a little surprised at finding me there. Br. S. is in feeble health, but is greatly cheered by the hope of the incorruptible life to be given to the faithful at the Saviour's appearing. I spent a portion of the evening at his house, and enjoyed the interview with him and his family very much. He knows of a place where I might preach to-morrow, but we both judge it best that I keep aloof from it, in order that, on my return, I may have elsewhere in town a hearing under more favorable circumstances. The arrangement contemplated will have my brother Emory's cordial co-operation. Br. Sprague, during the years of his residence here, has been "instant in season and out of season" in letting his light shine; and his position, (until recently) in a leading book store of the city, has brought him a wide acquaintanceship in the community. He knows the clergy here, and they know his views. Chaplain Anderson, whom our HERALD OF LIFE readers ought not to have forgotten, is one of Br. Sprague's converts to the Life doctrine, and a bold and uncompromising defender of the truth in the place where he has a pastorate. In all these ways the good work is marching on.

Sunday, Oct. 27.—This forenoon brother and myself listened to a good practical discourse in the Woodward avenue M. E. church. Their new and magnificent centenary church is to be dedicated three weeks from to-day. A Congregational minister (one of the city pastors—a D. D., name forgotten) was my instructor in the evening, and his sermon interested me much.

Oct. 28.—At 10 o'clock took the train for Grand Haven (en route for Milwaukee), and spent a good portion of the day in reading in the fore part of Hudson's "Debt and Grace." Until to-day I have never been farther west than Detroit. Nothing specially noteworthy in the railway ride of the day or the night steamboat trip across Lake Michigan.

Oct. 29.—Arrived in Milwaukee at daybreak. Remembering the name of Mrs. R. W. Pierce as a patron of our paper, by the aid of the city directory I sought her home at No. 141 Sixth street, where, during their breakfast hour, I was kindly welcomed by her husband and herself. I specially possessed myself of various facts which I want to chronicle in these "Notes," but as I am to halt here again on my return, I will reserve them for the present. While Sister Pierce was getting ready to take me to Br. Samuel Brown's, I climbed the remnant of a hill a few rods distant, and from it obtained a fine view of the beautiful city of Milwaukee. Was much pleased with the call at Br. Brown's, who resides on Fond du Lac avenue. Br. B. was the first white settler in Milwaukee—came here in the Autumn of 1833. He was a patron of the Bible Examiner, and has taken the HERALD OF LIFE from its start. He is, notwithstanding his known theological views, an official member (a deacon, I think) of Rev. W. De Loss Love's Congregational church; and of that church Sister Pierce was formerly a member: it adjoins her present residence, and she attends Mr. Love's ministry. Mr. Love, as I well remember, published some years ago, an elaborate article against the destruction of the wicked in the New Englander But, notwithstanding all this, he has signified his readiness to open his pulpit to any preacher of Br. Brown's views for whom (as to character) Br. B. would vouch. Thus far the promised liberty has not been used; but it is the intention of Br. B. and Sister P. to have me preach my views in Mr. Love's pulpit when I return from Minnesota. "We shall see what we shall see."

At half past one o'clock P. M. I took the cars for La Crosse, where I arrived at midnight. Busying myself incessantly with excellent reading, the trip by rail across Wisconsin was enjoyable enough. The first snow I had seen this season began to fall soon after we left Milwaukee.

We reached the city of La Crosse at midnight, and I was soon on board of the steamer Diamond Jo, which was to convey me to Lake City. We were under motion before one o'clock, and, after feasting my eyes for a while on the scenery of the Mississippi River, I sought my pillow for the rest of the night.

Oct. 30.—This day ought to have been spent by me in writing for our paper, but it was in fact spent in various other ways. The real goal of my tour—Lake City—was reached early in the evening. Having delivered my baggage to a drayman, I started to find Br Aaron G. Hudson. How I succeeded will fully appear as my chronicle proceeds—next week.

SUMMIT, WIS., Nov. 13, 1867.

DEAR HERALD: The foregoing jottings have just now (it is midday) been written at the hospitable home of Br. Parker Sawyer. I arrived here yesterday afternoon, and am going to Milwaukee (30 miles) on Friday morning, and expect to preach there on Sunday. Next week I expect to see Chicago, and to preach on the 24th inst. at New Rutland, Ill. Dec. 1st and 8th I expect to be in New Albany, Ind.; 15th and 22d in Cincinnati; 29th in Detroit; and early in January, 1868, I hope to return home. All if the Lord will. The weather is beautiful—my health perfect—my spirits buoyant. I am to preach in this vicinity (at Oconomowock) this evening and to-morrow evening. Have not yet seen our paper of last week. Letters may be sent to me at New Albany, Ind. Affectionately,

RUFUS WENDELL.

WHAT IS THE GOSPEL?

THE DIALOGUE CONTINUED.

O.—GOOD morning, Br. G., you promised at our last conversation to show me that the Scriptures of truth taught in the same positive and negative language, as the documents of our own time, which you referred to.

G.—I did so promise, and think I am fully prepared so to do. We will begin as early as the days of Abraham, and suppose that will be far enough back to answer our purpose. God said to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 10, positive language, "Every man child among you shall be circumcised:" Negative language, Every female child shall not be circumcised.

O.—But the text does not read so.

G.—Ask any jurist in the land if it does not mean so, and express so. Again, 12th v., Positive language says, every man child who is eight days old [and upward, shall be circumcised]. Negative: the child under eight days old shall not be circumcised.

O.—But the text does not read so, you are adding to the Scriptures.

G.—Not at all. I agreed to prove before any court in the land that the Bible taught plainly that, Jesus Christ taught the wicked dead would not have a resurrection to life.

O.—Well, you have not said one word about Jesus Christ and his teachings.

G.—Hold! Do not be so fast; allow me my own way of coming to the point and I will make all clear. We find recorded in Numbers i. 1, 2, "And the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness . . . saying, Take ye the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel after their families . . . . every male by their polls, from twenty years old and upward." Now were it not for this one clause, "From twenty years old and upward," this would all be positive language, and include the whole house of Israel on the male side. But the negative language excludes females and all males under twenty years. We find this same principle running through the whole Bible. We find many similar expressions in the language of Jesus. In John vi., positive language, "He that believeth on me hath everlasting life." He that believeth not [negative] hath not everlasting life. Positive: "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath everlasting life:" [positive] "and I will raise him up at the last day." Negative: He that does not eat of my flesh and drink of my blood hath not everlasting life; and I will not raise him up at the last day.

O.—But the Scriptures do not read so; you are supplying words.

G.—Nay: I am only expressing in positive language what is expressed in negative, and what would be understood as such in every court in the land; and as you understand every other document you read except the Scriptures. I do not see how it was possible for Jesus to express himself in stronger terms than he did, "Verily I say unto you, he that believeth on me hath everlasting life." Well, what of those who do not believe on him? Have they everlasting life? You must answer, No. And what will he do with those who believe on his name and have everlasting life?

O.—He says, he will raise them up at the last day.

G.—And what will he do with those who do not believe on his name?

O.—He does not say what he will do with them.

G.—Does he not say, John vi., 49, "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead"? That is their present condition. And why? "Jesus said unto them, verily I say unto you, Moses gave you not the bread from heaven: but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the world."

Now, in this discourse, we have two kinds of bread: one without any future or everlasting life principle in it, on which Moses fed the Jews in the wilderness; and for the want of this life principle in it they perished, and as Jesus said, "are dead." But I now come and offer you the true bread, which, if a man eat thereof, he shall not die." That is, he shall not die in the sense in which your fathers died. And why? Because the bread that I will give contains everlasting life. "And I will raise him up at the last day." We now submit our testimony, and ask if we have not proved that Jesus does, and in language so plain that it cannot be mistaken, say he will not raise any up except those that believe on his name?

O.—But is there no other way in which the wicked may have a resurrection from the dead?

G.—We answer, No; there is no other name given whereby men may have life. So says the apostle. J. GRIM.

Philadelphia, Nov., 1867.

A BIBLE CHRISTIAN.

THE following is a selection from an "orthodox" periodical; and is truly orthodox. We are almost tempted to think the author of it was designedly making a plea in favor of the position we have so long contended for, of taking the Bible as our standard, and not making any man our example in faith, experience, or practice. We most gladly insert the article in the HERALD OF LIFE, and hope all our readers will profit by it.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.

THE ONLY TRUE STARTING POINT.

You say, my dear friend, that you desire not to be a mere professor of religion, but one in heart and life, just what it is the will of God you should be. There is one way in which this object may without fail be secured. God will fulfil the desire he has himself inspired, if as workers together with him, we do our part of the work. The Bible as a whole gives a full exhibition of the will of God. I never made much progress in the divine life until I made up my mind to be emphatically a Bible Christian. I had before been the subject of much religious perplexity. I believe there has not been a period of my life to which I can refer, but I would have been willing to give my body to be burned, or my goods to feed the poor, if I were only sure the Lord made the demand. But instead of having my eyes fixed on the Bible alone, I was looking at the experience and practice of professors. It was not the source of my greatest solicitude that I had not a Bible experience, but that I had not an experience like other pious persons.

It was the beginning of days with me when I made the resolve that I would cease to compare myself with others, and make it the paramount business of my life to know the requirements of God as recorded in the written word. Light or dark, feeling or no feeling, influences impelling or not impelling, I resolved I would diligently seek to know the will of God concerning me, and that it should be the one ruling object of my life to walk in the way of his commandments.

And thus I resolved to walk all along through life, leaving emotions, manifestations, and everything else with God.

WHERE LIGHT BEAMED ON MY PATH.

"And suppose you should pass through a whole long life, and even die without further revelations from God than you have received, and then in this state appear before the flaming throne of your judge! What would you then do?" said the tempter. "I would place my trust in Christ, and my reliance on the infallible word of my Judge. I would tell him I had diligently sought to know, by searching his word, what he would have me do, and had sincerely, though in feebleness, endeavored to do it.

That moment light beamed on my path. I saw that all the way from earth to heaven was gloriously illuminated. "Thy word is a lamp to my feet." So said the psalmist and so said my soul. I now saw it was not the will of God I should walk in darkness, but have the lamp of heaven suspended over all my heavenward way. It was at this point I became more fully initiated into the household of faith. And O what an indescribably blessed consciousness of the Spirit's approval did I receive, as it was whispered to my heart that I had chosen to walk in precisely the steps in which the father of the faithful had walked, for by faith he journeyed, not knowing whither he went. He believed God and his faith was counted unto him for righteousness. Had I been permitted to choose my way, I would not now have chosen the most luminous experience I had ever heard of in preference to that which I now saw was to be gained in the path I had chosen.

HOW TO BECOME WISE AND USEFUL.

The word of the Lord is an inexhaustible mine, which though we may never in time fully explore, yet we may penetrate deeper and deeper daily, and bring up new truths; and by having these newly-discovered truths experimentally tested, we shall have new and varied experiences. You "want to be something more than a mere professor;" and by pursuing the course which I suggest you will become another sort of a professor than the ordinary race of professing Christians. You will become a wise, useful follower of the Saviour, for you will be ever receiving out of the Lord's treasury things new and old, and as you receive them your heart will be yearning over others, and you will solicitously watch for opportunities to dispense to others as God dispenses to you.

SEEKING TRUTH FOR THE LOVE OF IT.

The great error of the world in all ages has been that the holy Scriptures have not been properly regarded. People have taken the opinions of men and have founded their faith and practice on this basis, instead of making the word of God the only foundation. Thus with the ancient Jews, their faith was based and their practice regulated by the views of their prophets, who prophesied unto them smooth things. Instead of bringing these opinions to the law and the testimony, in order to test their truthfulness, they were disposed to shun the presence of those who would have directed their attention th[illegible] So generally were the prophets at one time in the history of Israel disposed to say pleasant rather than truthful things, that the king knew of but one left, and said he, "I hate him, for he never prophesieth good unto me, but always evil." So inclined is short-sighted man to seek opiates for the conscience, rather than to seek truth for the love it. Professions of godliness are popular with such as will not interfere with conformity to the spirit of the world—which will not press an identification with truths which are disreputable and leave its partisan free to mingle with the mass. It is now generally conceded that a profession of this sort adds weight to character. An individual may make a show as a professor, and Jehu-like attract much attention by his zeal, and if he will only let disreputable truth alone, and not search the Scriptures to know the mind of the Lord in order that he may deliver it faithfully to the people, he may still remain popular. Let one do as Micaiah did, that is, instead of inquiring to know how he may be most popular, inquire of God how he may be most faithful to the souls of the people, by bringing out those truths at which the carnal mind revolts but which people and pastor must soon meet at the bar of God—let one do this, and at heart the voice of many a professor will be, "I hate him for he never prophesieth good unto me, but always evil." Let us take courage. "Marvel not, my friend, if the world hate you." It hated the Saviour before it hated you; but O be careful under all circumstances that you exhibit your Saviour's loving spirit.

AN INDIAN PROPHET.

ACCORDING to the London Revival, the Rev. Dr. Duff, the well-known missionary of India, in making some remarks before the last annual Free Church Assembly in Edinburgh, referred to an extraordinary report which he had heard respecting an Indian prophet; and if true, it is an event of no ordinary importance. He said:

"From every mission field, and every quarter of it, there are calls for men and means. God's providence, God's grace, is opening up ways to us. What does this mean? It means that God, in his providence, has gone greatly ahead of us, that he is vastly before us with the intimations of his providence, that he is inviting and allowing us to come forward. We are, as it were, restraining the influence of God's Holy Spirit. How can we expect this influence to be poured out upon us, when there are calls we cannot, do not meet?

"Let me refer, as an illustration of what I mean, to a report which has just reached me concerning a district in Nagpore, called Chutteghur. The inhabitants, some forty or fifty years ago, were upward of half a million in number, and are now greatly more. The proprietors are Hindoos of the Brahmin caste, who are all-powerful there, the bulk of the population being of a low caste, chiefly employed as agriculturists, who were very much tyrannized over by those whom they regarded as a sort of demi-gods. At last one of their own number professed to be sent from heaven as a deliverer. A small number of followers gathered around him, to whom he expounded his opinions, and they became enthusiastic admirers. But this leader said to himself, 'I will get more influence over my followers if, like other holy men, I retire to the gloomy forests among the hills. I will go there for six months and fast, meditate, and pray; in short, I will set out the grand law of Hindoo ascetism, and after that I will return with my revelation to them—with my message from heaven.'

"During his absence his followers began to expound what he had been telling them to the rest of the people, and before the end of six months great expectations were raised. Upward of 100,000 people were watching for the advent of this new prophet, and, when at last he came down from the rocks and appeared among them, they were satisfied that he was sent as a prophet from heaven. He told them that his message to them was that they were to fling away their idols, to give up their superstitious worship, and were to worship the only one God, who created all things, and to worship him, not by outward symbols, but by meditating upon him and praying to him. Now this does look to be a very remarkable movement in Providence. It looks like a challenge from the heathen world to come forth and give them the pure gospel instead of the idols they worship.

"The only other case I know at all similar to this is that of the Sandwich Islands, where, you may remember that, before a missionary had landed there at all, under a feeling of intolerable restraints they were suffering from, the people had resolved to burn their idols; and at that very time our American brethren were preparing a mission to send to them, and, in the course of the next forty years, the Sandwich Islands had become completely civilized.

"I know not what others' feelings may be in regard to the case I have mentioned, but I wrote at once, on my own responsibility to Mr. Cooper and Dr. Wilson, two of my friends, and asked why they did not go up at once to see what this movement was. Why not drop any regular work to watch such a movement as this? I said, if I were in Calcutta I would step over to see and inquire, and, if it turned out to be anything like the representation there given, what results might not we hope to see! This is a singular and extraordinary case, but in all the missions there is a pressing call for additional men and additional means of support. We must remember that, up to a certain point, until the number of converts shall be so increased as to make them self-sustaining, the needful amount of support will be in proportion to the success and prosperity of any mission; and thus there must be an increasing expenditure alike in means and men."

Letters and Extracts.

FROM J. ANDERSON, MINISTER OF THE GOSPEL.

AUGUSTA, MICH., OCT. 1, 1867.

BR. STORRS: With many others, scattered abroad through this wide land, I am glad that the HERALD OF LIFE lives, and is likely to live. I may not believe all that its pages contain, but its great central truth of eternal life only through Christ, I am a firm believer in. You will bear with me when I confess that I have not yet attained to the full belief of the non-resurrection of the wicked: but when you remember that I am a Scotchman, and sixty-four years of age, and besides, educated after "the strictest sect of our religion," an Old School Presbyterian, may you not be surprised and encouraged that you have ever led me so far? I believe you are aware that for many years I have been a Congregational minister. My brethren are aware of my opinions; sometimes call me heretic, and some of my own church object to hear those doctrines from the pulpit; and yet I preach them; and not without effect either. I have not yet been brought before the Sanhedrim, and do not know whether I shall be. Whether it is soil, climate, or civilization, yet for some cause, the Western sentiment regarding creeds is a little more elastic than the Eastern. And yet, even here, this liberality is by no means uniform: like frost, it is found in streaks. But, brother, take courage: we live in an age when it is more difficult to set landmarks to mind than formerly. You cannot estimate the good the HERALD OF LIFE is doing. Remember the seven thousand men who did not bow to Baal when Elijah thought he was alone. I inclose you five dollars for the HERALD OF LIFE, and with the ardent prayer that the Master may bless you largely, and the cause in which you are engaged, I am your brother in Christ.

FROM WM. H. H. MCALLISTER.

ST. ALBANS, VT., NOV., 13, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I feel moved to let our brethren and sisters, scattered abroad, know what I am doing these days. First and chiefest, I am trying to live nearer to God each day of my life; and I think I can see some advance in spiritual knowledge from day to day. I am studying my Bible more, and, as opportunity offers, saying more to those with whom I meet. I am determined to let the gospel light kindled in my heart shine out more and more. It was not made to put under a bushel, and though some may be offended it must shine: and already I am in hopes some good is being done. I have a few young men anxiously thinking over these things, and they give a ready ear when I meet them. With one of them, not long since, I had a conversation substantially as follows: He said he did not believe God would torment a man eternally for the sins of a brief life. He would not be a good God if he did. I asked him if he believed all men would be saved? He said he couldn't believe that. I then asked him if he believed in a future life at all? He said he did, for the good. I then asked, how he could extricate himself from his dilemma? and he could not tell. Here was just the chance for me. Orthodoxy could not help him and Universalism was impotent and untrustworthy. He was right as far as he had gone, and I gave him a helping hand. I told him our glorious faith obviates all his difficulties and shows that God can be just in rewarding the righteous and punishing the wicked. This is my first, and, thus far, my only conversation with this man; but I trust not my last. As I left him, I asked him if he believed there was something in the future worth living for? and he said he did. I asked him if he was living for it? Says he, "I am going to." I told him that was not the right and safe way. I told him that now is the best time to begin to serve the Lord, and I hoped he would take it into serious consideration.

The way seems to be opening finely before me, and I think God is answering my constant prayer that I may be the means of bringing some to acknowledge of the truth. I feel that a work is to be done here in St. Albans, and that I am to be instrumental in its accomplishment. I am trying to purify myself so that he will work through me to bring a knowledge of the precious truth committed to our charge to this people. How much I need grace from on high to help me in this work. Pray for me, all, that I may be a faithful and acceptable laborer, and that the glorious work may prosper at my hands. Yours, for life through Christ.

LAKE CITY, MINN., NOV. 12, 1867.

BR. STORRS: Br. Wendell has been with us; he had a good hearing. This is the result—believers have been strengthened and made to rejoice; the weak have been confirmed, and many hitherto uninterested have been led to inquire, Are these things so? We thank God and take courage. Br. Wendell is a workman that need not be ashamed. His head, heart, and hands are in the work. The brethren of Lake City, with one voice invoke the blessing of God upon him, and unite in recommending him to all who love our Lord Jesus Christ. And we would suggest to our brethren that our brother cannot travel without money; and that he has a family at home; and if we want him to labor for and with us, we should remember the family; and in our opinion the most effectual way of saying "God bless them," will be to give Br. W. a few greenbacks. We sincerely hope the brethren along the route will give him such assistance that he may be induced at no distant day to come this way again.

LAKE CITY, MINN., NOV. 13, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I send you two more new subscribers for the HERALD OF LIFE. Br. Wendell has been with us, and on Monday last he started on his return trip eastward. We were greatly pleased with Br. W.'s labors among us; and we all feel that we have been benefitted, strengthened and built up in the Christian life by the blessed words of gospel truth which he preached unto us.

Many who do not hold our life views are searching the Scriptures to see if "these things are so." This is a great point gained; for if the people will only search we know they are sure to find. We had large and attentive audiences each evening; and with the exception of a few who are wedded to their "idols," all expressed themselves much interested in the subjects Br. W. so ably presented to us.

FROM DR. JOHN BILLINGS.

BANGOR, ME., NOV. 15, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I returned from the West last September; not because of persecution, but because of ill health of my family. The West is a large field for labor. But little comparatively has been done, or can be, till the Advent people can be sufficiently enlightened in regard to the first steps of apostacy; to break away from what some of them call "the one man power." When the creed power, which holds nearly all the Advent people East or West, is taken off, so that fear will not control the judgments of men in matters of faith, then the truth will spread and dispel the cloud of sectarian darkness that has and does keep the people from the truth, through the working of the religious oligarchies. We look back to the old mother church. For example: When the few in Rome took to themselves the power and right to dictate in matters of faith, then it became necessary to have a creed brought into existence. To effect this, a council was called; a faith was voted. What next must follow? Proscription. Next, persecution; and so on.

Now, if the great law of God and nature is true, i. e., the law of cause and effect, I ask our brethren to cast their eyes over the Advent people, and then inquire what must be done to save them from falling into the same gulf the old mother church has fallen into? This creed power is strengthening; and no pains or expense is spared by its oligarchical head, or heads, to keep the people from investigation. This power or influence is what hinders the truth from spreading in the West. During my stay there I found this to be the worst influence I had to meet. I found plenty of men that had an ear to hear, and did hear, and were about to take a stand for God's word, but when a voice was heard from the North, then our eyes beheld the evil of the creed power.

Then fear controlled the judgments of men, and convictions of truth were smothered; the right of speech suppressed, and all done that could be to turn the word of God out of our place of worship. But we are thankful that there were found some noble minds that could not consent to have their mouths shut, and stifle the truth, but chose rather to suffer reproach for the sake of the truth than to have a respectable standing in a respectable God-forsaken church. To all such I say, contend earnestly for the faith, and make no compromise with the demons of the nineteenth century.

EDWARD MORSE, Thomaston, Conn, sends three new subscribers, and writes; I am satisfied the HERALD OF LIFE is the paper for the times in which we live. "No life out of Christ" is the doctrine by which error can be most successfully met. By a little effort I have obtained these new subscribers and find others willing to read the HERALD.

IN MEMORIAM OF JOSEPH MCFARLAND.

IT is not our habit nor in accordance with our feelings to write obituaries; and there is a delicacy about it, when the individual is one of the family. But we will try, for the sake of the truth, to forget for the present that there was any relationship between us. Our acquaintance has been a long one. Over twenty years ago, when quite a boy, Joseph came to my house, and asked the privilege of joining a class to learn the rudiments of Phonography. All the members of the class were of mature years but himself. He soon outstripped the class and the teacher, and by hard study and severe practice became a proficient in the art.

This attachment, so early formed, was kept up through the intimacy existing between his father and myself. Joseph would walk out with us on Sunday afternoons, and hearing our conversations upon our pecular views, imbibed them. He was studious and ambitious, and was possessed of many and rare natural abilities. He was deprived of the advantages of what some call an early education. His parents being poor, he was desirous of rendering them all the assistance in his power. He early sought a situation for himself in a book store, where he made himself useful to his parents and his employers, whose recommendation speaks for itself. Through hard study and incessant labor he impaired his health. His great desire to make his parents comfortable caused him to forget himself. About three years ago a situation was offered him as amanuensis and corresponding clerk in one of the largest chemical works in the country, and he accepted of it: but the tax upon his brain, and the unwholesome and poisonous atmosphere, of the counting room were too much for his delicate organism, and under it his constitution gave way. About five months ago, his wife thought a change might do him good, and they came to spend a few weeks with us; but we soon discovered that his situation was too much for him, and advised him to immediately give it up and remain with us; which he did; but unfortunately it was too late. The fatal disease, consumption, had already seated itself and commenced preying upon his constitution. Some ten years ago he felt it his duty to make a public profession of religion, and joined the Episcopal Church; but his early impressions followed him into the church, and he was led to ask his minister some questions which soon led to a separation with the church and caused him to cast his lot with us. He was baptized, but soon after embraced the fact, that the baptism of the Spirit, and not water, was the essential one. He took an active part in our meetings, and the cause generally, until dissensions sprung up, when he retired from active co-operation with the brethren. But his heart has always been in the cause. During all our long acquaintance there has never been a word to mar our friendship or cause an unpleasant feeling. We have had many pleasant interviews together; and every new thought in the advancement of truth was examined and embraced, if found to accord with his idea of truth. He was naturally skeptical, and slow to believe. Though making no outward show, backward, diffident, and reticent, yet, when fully understood, was a warm and devoted friend; a true Christian; a great lover of the life doctrine. It required a close acquaintance to appreciate his worth. We have often heard it said, "Your doctrine is a good one to live by, but a poor one to die with." We have witnessed the fact in the case of our brother, that it is good to live by; for he was patient in his sufferings. In all the five months, which he spent with us, we never heard him complain or murmur; always trusting in the Lord into whose hands he said he had committed everything: and though he had a strong and ardent desire to live, he frequently told his wife, it was a happy thought that they would meet again in the morning of the resurrection; and his dear wife, though young in years, says she never realized the beauty of her faith until brought to this trial. She says, while she looked upon the cold form of her husband, it is a satisfaction, to know he is asleep; and that she is not grieving his "immortal spirit," hovering over her, by its seeing her weeping and grieving; for she thinks there can be no happiness to a departed spirit, and it must be grieved if it beholds relations mourning over its happiness; but she lays him away, with the full hope of meeting him in the resurrection. We have now paid the last tribute to a son, a husband, and a brother in Christ: one whose sense of justice was so keen, we think, it was impossible to get him to do a moral wrong.

SPEAK GENTLY.

SPEAK gently!—it is better far
  To rule by love than fear.
Speak gently—let no harsh words mar
  The good we might do here!

Speak gently!—love doth whisper low
  The vows that true hearts bind;
And gently friendship's accents flow,
  Affection's voice is kind.

Speak gently to the little child!
  Its love be sure to gain;
Teach it in accents soft and mild:
  It may not long remain.

Speak gently to the young, for they
  Will have enough to bear;
Pass through this life as best they may,
  'Tis full of anxious care!

Speak gently to the aged one!
  Grieve not the care-worn heart;
The sands of life are nearly run,
  Let such in peace depart.

Speak gently, kindly to the poor,
  Let no harsh tone be heard;
They have enough they must endure,
  Without an unkind word.

Speak gently to the erring—know
  They may have toiled in vain.
Perchance unkindness made them so:
  Oh, win them back again!

MARY'S TEMPTATION.

I AM going to tell you something which happened to me when I was a child. My father had for his study a little plainly-furnished chamber, whither he went to write every evening as soon as I had gone to bed. He would have been quite alone elsewhere, for my mother was dead, and I was his only child, but there he found company in his books, which were mostly on scientific subjects, though there were a few volumes of history and general literature. I knew that for a long time he had been employing all his leisure on a work which he considered of great importance. I had often seen him put his manuscript carefully in a drawer and lock it up. But one day through forgetfulness, no doubt, he left it lying on his table, and as it happened, unluckly, that same day I went to the study to get a book which I wanted, and to reach which I was obliged to climb up on the table. A great bottle of ink was standing there, which I did not notice till my dress overturned it.

As soon as I was aware of this mischance, I jumped down, frightened at the thought of the ink-spots with which my dress would be spoiled. I did not suspect the extent of the mischief, but my dress was soon forgotten when I saw that my father's manuscript received the chief share of the inky deluge. It was covered and saturated with ink, so completely that at least three-quarters of it were quite illegible. In great terror I called to my nurse:

"What will become of me?" cried I, bursting into tears, "see, Prudence, what I have done."

"Well, well, it is better that the ink should have been spilled on that worthless paper than on your pretty dress," said she. "How lucky you are; there are only a few spots which a little lemon will take off at once. We will throw these papers in the fire, and sponge the table clean, and it will be as nice as ever when father comes back."

"What are you talking about, Prudence? Throw these papers in the fire? why, they have cost my poor father a whole year's work, perhaps more! It is a dreadful misfortune! Oh, cannot we take out these ink-spots and dry the leaves? If I could only read it I would copy the whole. But I cannot do it; the stain is too deep; you can hardly make out a word. Oh, what shall I do?"

I wrung my hands. Prudence was frightened, too; she was just beginning to comprehend the greatness of the disaster, and saw clearly that it was without remedy.

"What troubles me the most, said I is my father's disappointment. He has so little leisure to work, and now all his labor is lost."

"He will be very angry with you, I am afraid," said Prudence, sorrowfully.

"No doubt he will; he has good reason to be. Oh, why did I ever get up on that table? I wanted so to please my father, and now I have made him a great deal of trouble. Perhaps he will never forgive me."

"Do you know what you must do, Miss Mary?" exclaimed Prudence; "he must never know that it was you who did it. It can be managed very easily. The white cat is poking about everywhere, and she is so big and fat that it would be no wonder if she overset the ink bottle. I will take care of it. You need not say a word."

I did not answer, for a great struggle was going on in my mind. I had always dreaded to displease my father, and though I felt most for his disappointment, the thought of his being angry with me was very bitter. I certainly would not have told a direct falsehood, nor allowed any other person to be accused in my place. But a cat—that was another matter—at least, so it seemed to me at first thought.

In a few moments the ink was wiped up, the study put in order, and I noticed that Prudence, to give a look of truth to her story, had blackened with ink the two fore-paws of the poor cat, who, very much suprised at this strange proceeding, sat looking at them in great perplexity.

My father came home at the usual hour, and Prudence, who had had time to prepare her part, was all ready for him.

"Oh, sir!" cried she; "such a misfortune! that horrid cat!—the ink bottle has been thrown down and your papers are soaked."

"My papers!" exclaimed my father, who at once thought of his forgotten manuscript. "How did that wretched cat get in there?"

My father hastened to his study, and I followed. I could easily see that he had not dreamed of the extent of the evil.

"It is ruined, entirely ruined," he cried, examining the manuscript which we had put to dry on the corner of the black marble mantlepiece; "it is illegible—all my two years' work!" Then turning round, frowning and gloomy, he demanded: "Who let that creature in?"

At this point I stepped toward him; he had not perceived me.

"Papa," said I, "I did the mischief. I got up on the table to reach a book, and was so unlucky as to overturn the ink bottle on your manuscript. I am so very sorry: I know how much time and trouble it has cost you."

My father looked at me astonished.

"What did Prudence mean by saying it was the cat?" he asked in a severe tone.

Prudence stood in the doorway, trembling, suprised, and, as she afterward told me, entirely out of her wits at my conduct.

"Don't blame her, papa," said I, "she only meant to save me from your displeasure."

"And shall I not blame her for having tried to teach my daughter to deceive me? I had more confidence in her."

Prudence hung down her head, frightened, for she stood greatly in awe of my father, who had more than once had occasion to reprove her for her want of straightforwardness. My father then turned to me, and instead of the stern looks which I had expected, I saw in his fnce an expression altogether new to me.

"Papa," said I, timidly, "is it a loss that cannot be made up? Have you no other copy?"

"No," he replied: "my work was finished and I burned the rough draft of it this morning. But I do not call anything a real misfortune which shows me that my child has a beautiful respect for the truth."

Then he embraced me, and told me that as he was now sure that I was conscientious and desirious to do right, he would no longer treat me as a little child, but as his friend.

"Prudence shall not stay with you," he added, with returning severity; "I cannot forgive her for having tried to induce you to deceive me."

"Oh, papa!" cried I, "I ought to have refused at once to do so, instead of allowing myself to be tempted. Do forgive her, she does not know any better."

"You are right," he answered, after a moment's reflection; "I will pass it over for this time, and we will try to give her better notions of duty and conscience. I know now that you can resist temptation, and am not afraid of her evil influence. She may stay."

I was very glad of this, for Prudence had a feeble old mother whom she supported. Besides, she had taken care of my mother during the last months of her life, and I was fond of her.

From this time my life was quite another thing. My father confided to me his anxieties, and even made me the companion of his hours of study. He began by allowing me to help him in saving from the ruins of his book, whatever could be saved. A few pages were quite unharmed, and on the worst, here and there a word could be made out. I copied all that I could, and he made use of it as a help in reconstructing the whole. It was the best way of consoling me for my misfortune. How happy, too, was I in the thought that I had not deceived my dear father, and that the tenderness with which he treated me, was not due to a falsehood, but belonged to me truly and honorably.—Springfield Republican.

CONDITIONAL PROPHECY.

THE position taken by some, that a portion of the prophecies were conditional, and failed of a fulfilment because the Jews rejected Christ, places the almighty Author of them before us as anything but an omniscient being. Indeed, it reminds me of a certain merchant who, during the late war, would one day prophesy with regard to the future of our success, and the next day prophesy exactly the reverse; so one or the other of his predictions was pretty sure to come to pass. So with the Almighty. He has given two distinct lines of prophecy; one to be accomplished if the Jews did accept Messiah, the other if they did not.

Now we purpose to notice one or two of the prophecies which are thrown away as "conditional" by the advocates of this theory, and in doing so we shall endeavor to be governed by the principle laid down by themselves—that "all prophecies or promises of the Old Testament not fulfilled at the first advent, if they are yet to be fulfilled, are reiterated either by Christ or his apostles." "The New Testament," they say, should be regarded as a key to the Old." Very well; in this we agree; but we ought to be very careful and not turn the key the wrong way, and thus "lock up" the Old Testament instead of unlocking it. The only way to use the new Testament as a key to the Old successfully is to compare passages of the New with analogous ones of the old. Thus the New Testament teaches us where to locate prophecies of the Old.

The first passage we will notice is Isaiah xi. This entire chapter is thrown out as conditional. It failed to be accomplished because the Jews rejected Christ. But I will prove by analogy that this prediction could not be fulfilled at the first advent. 1st. In verse 4 Christ is represented as "executing judgment" and "slaying the wicked," while Christ himself declares, in John xii., 47, that he came not to judge the world at his first advent; and 2 Timothy, iv., 1; Rev. xix.; 2 Thess. i., 7, 8, and a host of others, shows that he is to judge and slay the wicked at his second advent. There is not an intimation in all the predictions relating to the first advent that he should then execute judgment on any or slay his enemies. On the contrary, he was to appear "as a sheep dumb before its shearer"—to be led as a "lamb to the slaughter," etc.

2d. Isaiah ii. predicts a "complete restitution of the brute creation to its original docility," and Peter informs us that "the restitution of all things spoken by the prophets" awaits the return of Christ from heaven. Now if Isaiah xi. had been an exception—if so glorious a prediction was not to be counted in the "all things," surely Peter ought to have informed us of the fact. Would he not have done it? With these facts before us, we are constrained to believe that the advocates of this theory are extremely blind, so far as this prophecy is concerned. We will now briefly notice Zech., chapter xiv.

It is indeed lamentable that this prophecy should be regarded as "conditional" by those who profess to believe the Bible to be the word of God, when there is not an "if" nor "and" in the prediction. It is "yea and amen." "Behold the day of the Lord cometh!" Peter says, "The day of the Lord cometh as a thief in the night," referring to the second advent of our Lord. Verse 2: "For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle." Christ says, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations." Matt. xxv., 31, 32: "The throne of his glory" is "the throne of his father David," which the angel informed Mary "the Lord God would give him." Luke i., 31–33: The "throne of David" was "on Mount Zion, in Jerusalem;" hence, when he "sits on the throne of his glory" he will "reign on Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously." Isaiah xxiv., 23. Then, surely, if he "gathers all nations before" him, they will be gathered to Jerusalem; and by referring to Rev. xix. it will be seen that they are gathered to "battle."

Some one may say, "the gathering of the nations spoken of by the prophet" and "that spoken of by the Saviour" do not seem to be analogous. We reply, they seem to be as much so as that spoken of by the Saviour and that spoken of by the Revelator, and yet all concede that they both refer to one and the same event. The three are but three different views of the same scene, like a landscape or city viewed from different localities or standpoints.

But in the fifth verse it is declared, "The Lord my God shall come, and all the saints [holy ones] with thee." Now I ask, is not this reiterated in the New Testament? Jude says, "Behold, the Lord cometh, with ten thousand of his saints" [holy ones]. Jude xiv. But it is contended that the "holy ones" here spoken of refer, doubtless, to the holy angels, which Christ would have called to his aid, had it been necessary to the establishment of his kingdom had the Jews accepted him as their king.

Allowing this rendering to be correct, the exposition does not necessarily follow. It should then read: "The Lord my God shall come, and all the holy angels with thee." Now I ask if this is not re-affirmed by the Lord himself, and applied also? "When the Son of man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him," etc. And in the absence of a single prophecy that he should thus come at his first advent, we are forced to apply this prediction to his second coming.

Again, it is stated in verse ix., "The Lord shall be king over all the earth.' Is not this re-affirmed by the Revelator (xi., 15) and other New Testament writers? Yea, and applied at the "sounding of the seventh or last trump" and appearing of our Redeemer.

But where is it stated in all the word of God that "He should be King over all the earth" at his first advent? Surely, just nowhere at all. I know the devil offered him the dominion of the world if he would fall down and worship him; but you see he did not accept the offer, and had he done it, I fear that even this prediction would hardly have been accomplished.

Now, brethren, according to the "principle" laid down by the advocates of this "conditional" theory, have we not, analogically and theologically, located these prophecies (Isaiah xi. and Zech. xiv.) at the second advent of Christ?

We are aware that there are "promises" contained in the Old Testament Scripture given on condition. Indeed, almost all the promises of God are conditional. But a promse is one thing and a prophecy is another and iquite a different thing. The promises of God given to man will all be fulfilled if man complies with the conditions; but every jot and tittle of the prophecies must be fulfilled. There is no condition about them; they are what the prophets of old, inspired by the Holy Spirit, saw would come to pass. May we not be "slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have written."—Selected.

GOD'S BITTER CUPS FOR SICK SOULS.

GOD is the wisest and best of physicians. He understands precisely the soul's diseases. He never selects the "wrong bottle," and never gives one drop too much of corrective medicine. My brother, can you not trust your Heavenly Father? Do you fear that he will give you poison in his cup of chastisement? Do you try to avoid the draught which he has prepared, and with a wry face push it from you? "The cup which your Father gives you, shall you not drink it?"

God often comes to one of his own children and finds him in sore need of spiritual medication. He has become sick from indulged sin and eating of forbidden fruit, or else he is utterly debilitated in all his powers and affections. His pulse beats low; his graces are weak. Perhaps this very Christian used to pray for more grace, for more strength, or humility, or patience, or assurance of hope. God takes him at his own word. The Christian asks to be make purer, better, stronger, and more Christ-like. And the very first thing that his Heavenly Father does is to mingle for him a cup of bitter disappointments or afflictions. Instead of relieving him, God seems to be smiting him. Instead of increasing his joys and hopes he seems to be blighting them like Jonah's gourd.

Perhaps this is the way, my reader, that God is treating you. A bitter cup of trial has been commended to your lips. But it is your Father's cup: drink it. What does faith in God mean but just this very thing, that you will trust him though he slay? What is faith but the firm and delightful belief that when God goes into the laboratory of his secret purposes and mingles for you a bitter draught he knows just what he is doing, and also just what your soul's disease requireth? It may be bitter, but the disease is worse.

I call you to witness that those confiding souls who have taken God's medicine of trial in the right spirit have found their prayers answered in their afflictions. Behold! the very graces they prayed for—the patience, the meekness, the heavenly-mindedness—were in that cup—that bitter cup! If the cup had not been drank the sweet, coveted blessings had all been lost. If God had not dealt with them precisely as he did the spiritual disease would have raged on and the soul have been sick unto death. Do not then push away that tear-draught of sorrow which your merciful Father is pressing to your trembling lips. The cup is encircled with this precious inscription: "Whom I love I chasten: all things work together for good to them that love me." Will you refuse to drink it?

O, what blessings are afflictions to those who can bless God for afflictions! "O!" said a bright-hearted young man, who was tortured with a fatal and painful bodily disease, "when I have the most pain in my body I have the most comfort in my soul. When Christ suffered he had none but enemies about him, and they gave him gall and vinegar to drink. When I thirst I have beside me the friend that sticketh closer than a brother. The cup that he gives me, shall I not drink it? I do not doubt but that there is love in the bottom of the cup, though it is bitter in the mouth." There was a fine Christian philosophy in this last thought of the suffering youth, that at the bottom of the cup lay the precious blessing. He must, therefore, drink the whole bitter draught in order to reach it. Depend upon it, brethren, that many of the purest and grandest displays of Christian grace can only be reached under a regime of severe trial. Faith's anchor is never so fully tested as in a hurricane. Patience never shines so lustrous as in a midnight of black adversity. Courage never shows so grandly as when Death on his "pale horse," is careering down upon us over a battle-field strown with defeat and disaster.

There is a patience of hope, a joy under tribulation, and a sense of the immediate support of Jesus that never can be reached by us when we are in a condition of ease and outward prosperity. These rich graces lie in the bottom of trial's bitter cup. And God esteems these graces of such priceless value that he mingles for us just such cups of suffering in order to bring out the graces in their beauty and power. God so esteemed faith in Abraham that he proved it with a knife flashing over the throat of his darling son. He so esteemed patience in Job that he stripped him of all his wealth, and left him the richest soul on all the earth. What a cup of compounded trials did he mingle for the heroic apostle! Yet that apostle gratefully acknowledges that "the trial of his faith, being much more precious than of silver and gold, though it be tried in the fire, would be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ."

Be not surprised, my friend, when God mixes for you a bitter cup. He sees that you need it. Disappointment and bereavement do not put sugar into their cups; they are meant to be bitter. So are the best tonic medicines bitter, but they quicken appetite and invigorate the system. Many a cup of wormwood has braced a Christian's graces. Many a sore loss has proved an everlasting gain. Bereavements are often full-brimming cups of tears, but they have been a medicine to the soul more healing than the sweetest "balm" of Gilead. God never mingles a cup of trial for one of his children without a merciful purpose. He either means to cure a soul's sicknesses or to save it from eternal death. The cup which our Father gives us, shall we not drink it? Let us all be careful how we choose a cup for ourselves, and insist on having it. Children choose confectionery always sooner than medicine; one may bring sickness, the other health. God sometimes lets us have our own selfish way. He left rebellious Israel to their own way when they grew tired of heaven-sent manna and lusted for the quails. He sent them the food they asked for, and while the "flesh was yet between their teeth" they were smitten with a terrible plague.

So has many a Christian lusted for what has proved a plague to his soul. I have known professed Christians to choose for themselves a cup of great worldly prosperity, and it made them drunk! There was Satan's sorcery in the cup. Their heads grew dizzy, and they were lifted up with pride. They grew greedy for lucre, fond of fashionable follies, self-indulgent, and neglectful of their religious duties. Prosperity spoiled them. It has ruined thousands in our churches. Ah! had all these foreseen what was in that cup of worldly prosperity, they might well have cried out, "O, Father, I pray thee, let this cup pass from me!"—Independent.

A SEVERE REBUKE.

ONE writes to us that his Christian hope is wholly overclouded. He leads a circumspect life before others; but in his own heart lies an overwhelming mass of doubts, that rob him of his spiritual peace. He has become a chronic doubter. What Thomas was for one evening this poor man is for nearly every day and night of his existence. It has become habitual with him to distrust the word of God, to distrust its precious promises, to distrust the reality of his own conversion. He hardly knows what it is to grasp a revealed truth firmly, and cling to it, and rest on it, and grow by it as his hungry body eats and thrives on his daily bread. If the Apostle Paul should come to him and say, "I know whom I have believed," he would be very apt to reply, "Paul, how do you know it? I never have any assurance. I sometimes doubt whether my Bible is true, or whether Christ ever died to redeem me, or whether God's Spirit ever converted me: I am a terrible doubter."

Yes! friend, you are, indeed. It is your own work. The man that does that miserable doubting lives and walks in your shoes. There is not another person's sin against you, but your own sin against your own soul, and against your God. It is your besetting sin. Not merely your misfortune, observe, but your fault. God commands you to believe him, and you disobey. Christ bids you look to him, and you look away; to trust him, and you only stand off and question his truthfulness and love. He promises you that, if you seek the grace that is sufficient for you, he will answer your prayers. You are no exception to his fixed law. If Paul received from him pardon, peace, assurance, strength, and spiritual joy, so can you. There is a vast deal of self-conceit in that heart of yours, which pretends that what sufficed for Paul and for millions of others, is not clear enough, or strong enough, or efficacious enough for you.

In addition to this subtle self-righteousness, you are also guilty of no little obstinacy. You hold fast to your doubts, instead of holding fast to Jesus. When these harrassing doubts come to your heart's door, instead of bolting it in their face, you let them in, and sit down and parley with them. You harbor them; you do not resist them. Your duty is to treat them as summarily as Joseph treated the loathsome proposal of Potiphar's impudent wife. To every sly, skeptical whisper of temptation, stoutly say, get thee behind me, Satan! Cry at once, in prayer, for faith. Grasp hold of a promise, as sinking Peter stretched out his arms to Jesus. Turn away from unbelieving suggestions, to God's own declarations. That terrible habit you have contracted of disbelieving the Lord Jesus must be dealt with as a tippler must deal with his habit of indulging in the intoxicating glass. You must break it up, at whatever cost. Lay hold, with a death-grip, of God's word, and say to yourself, "If I go any further in this way, I shall become an infidel, and a wretch. I will never tamper with my Saviour again. I will cling to him, if I perish. Lord, I BELIEVE! Help thou me to conquer that accursed unbelief!"

Depend upon it that you will never attain any sunshine or spiritual peace, or any power as a Christian, until, in the divine strength, you overcome this guilty and deplorable habit of doubting. What have you ever gained by it? What has it ever done, but insult your Saviour? If you expect to venture on him in the dying hour, why not do it now?

It is said that Dr. Merle D'Aubigne, the great Swiss historian, was sorely oppressed with doubts during his student days. He went to his old, experienced teacher for help. The old man refused to answer them, saying, "Were I to rid you of these, others would come. There is a shorter way of destroying them. Let Christ be really to you the Son of God, the Saviour: and his light will dispel the darkness, and his spirit lead you into all truth." The old man was right. He saw the fatal habit which the young student was acquiring. He knew too that the glorious SUN of righteousness could alone scatter, by his divine effulgence, the clouds that make a human life dark and dreary.

'Tis midnight with the soul till HE,
Bright morning sun, bids darkness flee.

"Essex, Mass., has a little girl three years old who plays over two hundred pieces on the piano."—Exchange.

AT a Sunday-school celebration on Long Island lately, prizes were given to those children who recited from memory the greatest number of Bible verses. Of course the mnemonic performances were many and varied, and were all accounted wonderful by the listening parents of the several prodigies. The achievement of one infant phenomenon was recalled to mind by the item above quoted. A little pale-faced girl of only four years old actually gabbled off one hundred and eleven verses of St. Mark's Gospel. Did the mothers of the two-hundred-tune girl or of the hundred-and-eleven-verse martyr ever suspect that these children are being slowly, perhaps, but none the less surely, murdered by the stupid, criminal vanity of their doting parents? If those two unhappy babies are not soon turned out doors to wade in the mud-puddles and play with the pigs, tunes and texts will speedily have done their perfect work, and the children will be taking their last sleep under the roots of the clover and the daisies.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

THE TWO THRONES:

OR, THE THRONE OF THE FATHER AND THE THRONE OF CHRIST.

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

"To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."—Rev. iii., 21.

These words are addressed by our Lord to his followers after his exaltation from suffering and death. They clearly recognize two thrones, viz., The throne of the Father and the throne of Christ.

The position that our Lord Jesus Christ occupies during the present age, we apprehend, is but very imperfectly understood; or, is too generally overlooked. He now occupies a position that may be illustrated by the case of Joseph after his captivity and suffering in Egypt, Gen. xli., 40–44. "Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled: only in the throne will I be greater than thou. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, See, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt. And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck. And he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had: and they cried before him, Bow the knee; and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift up his hand in all the land of Egypt."

Here it is seen that Pharaoh invested Joseph with supreme and unlimited authority, reserving only the right to resume that authority when the end is accomplished for which this investment was made. During the period that this authority was in Joseph's hands, all Pharaoh's kingdom was to be ruled by Joseph's word, and without his authority "no man should lift up his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt." It was only in the throne that Pharaoh reserved a superiority to Joseph; all other authority was made subject to him; even to the right to make and "seal" laws, as the king's seal was put upon Joseph's hand by Pharaoh's own act. Thus God the Father exalted Jesus after his sufferings and death to his throne in heaven.

THE THRONE OF GOD.

This is that on which Jesus our Lord sits during this present age, and which he will continue to occupy till his enemies are subdued, and he has given to him his own throne: on this throne he is now invested with "all power in heaven and in earth." That this is his present position we shall now attempt to show from the Scriptures.

1. The text asserts that our Lord now sits on his Father's throne; and that prior to his actual session there, he overcame; which imports that it was after his sufferings and death that he was exalted to that high honor and dignity.

2. The present exalted position of our Lord was a matter of promise, as we find recorded, Psa. cx., 1. "The LORD said unto my Lord, sit thou at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool."

The meaning of this text the Pharisees could not comprehend when our Lord propounded to them the question how David in spirit called the Christ, Lord, if he was David's son, as they affirmed. Truly, the Pharisees were not able to answer that question, nor was any other man prior to our Lord's ascension to the throne of God, after his resurrection from the dead. God had determined to give him the throne of his father David; but the spirit of prophecy foresaw that when he should come into the world the nation would reject him as king and put him to death. Thus he would be denied his own throne by men, at that time; but "The LORD JEHOVAH said unto" him, in promise, I will raise you from the dead, and "sit thou at my right hand"—be seated on my throne; though denied your own, viz., the throne of your father David, you shall nevertheless have a throne and be exalted to rule, till by the authority and power I will invest thee with, "thine enemies" shall be made "thy footstool." Such is the position to which JEHOVAH promised to exalt his Son, when rejected of men; for though "disallowed of men" he was "chosen of God and precious." In view of this exaltation—or, "for the joy that was set before him," he "endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God."

3. Peter took the same view of the present exaltation of Jesus, on the day of Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit had been so copiously shed on the disciples. After having spoken of his death and resurrection, he adds, "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses. Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this which ye now see and hear. For David is not ascended into the heavens; but he saith himself, The LORD said unto my Lord, sit thou on my right hand till I make thy foes thy footstool. Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ."

Here it will be seen that Peter refers to Psa. cx., 1, as having its fulfilment in Jesus' present exaltation. It should also be observed that the Spirit of God in Peter marks emphatically the two thrones—"God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified both Lord and Christ." Christ signifies anointed, and refers to his kingship on David's throne; as all the kings of Israel were anointed to that office, so was David by Samuel as God directed. Peter, then, speaks of Jesus as the anointed king for David's throne, which was on earth; but he also recognizes, and wishes "all the house of Israel to know assuredly, that God hath made" Jesus "Lord;" or had seated him at his right hand, according to the promise of Psa. cx.; and the evidence of this fact was manifest in that remarkable effusion of the Holy Spirit on that day. He does not lose sight, in the glory to which Christ is now exalted, of the fact that he is the anointed who is to sit on David's throne—or Messiah's own proper throne—an event then future, but made certain by his present exaltation, now invested with power and authority to make his enemies his footstool.

4. Paul calls attention to the present exaltation of our Lord, in speaking of "the working of God's mighty power, which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; and hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church." Eph. i., 19–22.

Here his authority on the Father's throne is fully stated, and is seen to be universal and unlimited: there is no principality, power, might, or dominion, in any part of the empire of JEHOVAH excepted. All this is done with special reference to the sanctification and final exaltation of Christ's church, "which is his body:" and is also to constitute the body of his rulers, on his throne, when he shall be put in possession of it.

5. In Heb. viii., 1, the apostle uses this language—"Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high priest who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens."

Here, not only is his exaltation to the Father's throne noted, but that while there he executes the office, also, of high priest. How glorious the thought that while invested with "all power in heaven and in the earth," he also appears on that throne in behalf of all who trust in him, or may come to God by him.

6. Peter, in another place, expresses the idea of Christ's exaltation and supreme authority on the throne of God: 1 Peter iii., 22: "Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him. Here all is clear: there is a perfect subjection to his rule fully stated.

7. In Rom. xiv., 9, the apostle tells us "For to this end Christ both died and rose, and revived that he might be Lord both of the dead and the living." He attained to his present exaltation and authority by submitting to death and being raised up from the dead. Through this means he attained to the honor of being Lord both of the dead and the living; or, the possession of unlimited power.

8. We now come to another text in which this point is fully brought out. It is Phil. ii., 7–11. "But made himself of no reputation, but took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men. And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

Here we see that Christ first subjected himself, voluntarily, to humiliation and a most shameful death. For this cause—on this account—or, because of this—"God hath highly exalted him—that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow"—as Pharaoh required all to do before Joseph. And this subjection to Jesus was of all in heaven, in earth, and under the earth; that is, it was universal and unlimited. This is more fully expressed when it is added, "Every tongue should confess that Jesus ["the man"] Christ ["the anointed" king for David's throne] is Lord [ruler on the throne of God] to the glory of God the Father," who hath given him exaltation, and now requires all beings to pay Jesus homage in that state. He that refuses to do it is a rebel against God, and does not glorify the Father.

Here then comes the test: Jesus has been rejected of men as king on David's throne, but God hath placed him on his own throne and now requires all, as the sine qua non—the indispensable condition—to confess Jesus as the supreme ruler on the throne of God by God's own appointment. The penalty for rejecting the requirement is death—the reward for complying with it is life eternal, and to be a partner with Christ on his own throne when he shall take possession of it. The condition specified in this test is mortifying to the proud hearts of men; but that pride is the very thing that unfits them to live forever, or to have part with Christ on his own throne, and hence must be overcome or we perish. Like Joseph's brethren, let us make haste to humble ourselves before him, whom by our sins we have crucified afresh. He is "highly exalted," and we are required to honor him with great honor; and he deserves it well who has loved us unto death. Let all make haste to honor Jesus—the exalted Jesus—Jesus on the throne of God—Jesus invested with supreme authority and universal sway—let us make haste to honor him as "Lord of all." The humiliation must be deep and unfeigned—no hypocritical pretensions of submission will pass here—it must be sincere and unreserved.

9. In this state of exaltation Stephen saw Jesus just before his martyrdom, as recorded, Acts vii., 55, 56—"But he, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God, and said, Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God." The testimony of Stephen, on that occasion, enraged the enemies of Christ, and they rushed upon the holy man of God with stones, stopped their ears, and slew him. Still, Jesus sits on the throne of God, notwithstanding the hatred of the human heart to this great truth, on the reception or rejection of which, where proclaimed, hangs life or death to men. God has chosen to place Jesus there, and requires all men to do him homage in that position, and tests their disposition of mind toward himself by their acknowledgment or rejection of Jesus on the throne of his Father.

10. Our Lord, himself, after his resurrection from the dead, announced this truth for the reception of his followers—"All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth:" Matt. xxviii., 19. On this truth was based the commission to "Go teach all nations:" on the reception of this truth depended the action of the disciples in their work—on the belief of this truth must depend the action of sinners to whom the proclamation should come—on the belief of this truth and a correspondent action hangs our eternal destiny. He who rejects this truth, when clearly presented to his mind, must experience the judgment of God unto condemnation.

11. We may here notice that at the last interview of our Lord with his disciples, after having announced this great and all important truth, it is recorded, Mark xvi., 19—"So, then, after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God." Thus taking his position for the present age on the throne of God.

12. Paul informs us that it was after Jesus' sufferings that he was exalted to this high station. He says, Heb. i., 3—"who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high." And again, Heb. x., 12, 13, he says—"But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sin, forever sat down on the right hand of God, from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool." Here the apostle intimates not only that it was after his sufferings that he was exalted, but that the exaltation is to continue till his enemies shall be made his footstool, leaving no hope of escape to such as continue to refuse submission to God's requirement as expressed. Phil. ii., 9–11; which we have contemplated. Submit, and live; continue to rebel, and die; one or the other we all must do.

13. But, for the comfort of those who do submit, we record one more text on this point, Rom. viii., 34, "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us."

How full of consolation to the humble soul who credits God's testimony of his Son, and who has complied with God's demand to yield him homage in the exalted throne to which he is raised. Four particulars are here stated, all full of consolation. 1. "Christ died." What then if we are called to suffering and sorrow for his name? 2. He "is risen again." Then he is alive; and because he lives his followers shall live also. 3. "He is even at the right hand of God." Then he has the power to execute all his love designs for his followers. 4. "Who also maketh intercession for us." Then our cause is safe in his hands; for the intercessor has in his hands all power in heaven and earth. What an intercessor—what a mediator—what a Saviour! O, that men could see the bliss—the joy—the honor—the inexpressible value of an entire, constant, and eternal consecration to Jesus, God's exalted Son.

Our Lord's seat on his Father's throne is not an unmeaning matter. He sits there in the administration of authority and power till the number of his associate rulers shall be completed; then he will leave his Father's throne to take his own. We now come to speak of—

THE THRONE OF CHRIST—OR, HIS OWN THRONE.

That there is such a throne to be hereafter occupied by Jesus, the Christ, we shall now endeavor to show.

1. God in addressing David, 1 Chron. xvii. makes use of this language, verses 11–14—"And it shall come to pass when thy days be expired that thou must go to be with thy fathers, that I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons; and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build me an house, and I will establish his throne forever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son: and I will not take my mercy away from him, as I took it from him that was before thee: but I will settle him in mine house and in my kingdom forever, and his throne shall be established forevermore." That this language reaches beyond Solomon seems clear.

2. "The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David, he will not turn from it, Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne." Psa. cxxxii. 11 This is but an announcement of the Spirit. God, by David, of the truth contained in the previously quoted text.

3. The prophecy of Isaiah, however, settles this point. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the LORD of hosts will perform this." Isa. ix. 6, 7. Here it is clearly stated that the "child born"—"The Prince of Peace"—is to have "the government upon his shoulder;" and that "government" is to be the "throne of David, and upon his kingdom to re-establish it, and to support it:" so reads the Septuagint. Here then the point is settled as to what throne is Christ's own. It is that which David occupied, and which was "overturned," as recorded Ezk. xxi. 27, and which the "Lord God" said should remain subverted "till he come whose right it is, and I will give it to him."

4. Accordingly prior to the "child" being "born" Gabriel was sent to Mary with the following announcement, Luke i. 32, 33, concerning "JESUS"—"He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."

Here all is plain: The long-expected child is about to be born, and the promise of God to David is now confirmed. This child Jesus is designated as the heir to David's throne; which from henceforth is Jesus' own throne.

5. We will now contemplate Psalm ii., in relation to this point. This Psalm opens with the inquiry, "Why . . . the kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord, and against his anointed"—his Christ? etc. This relates to the treatment the anointed would meet with at his first advent, and during the period that he would occupy his Father's throne—i. e., during the present age. Up to this hour, this description of the character and conduct of the rulers of the earth has been exemplified in their ungodly rule, and general disregard of the authority of God and his Anointed; even in those governments that have professed respect for that authority. They constantly outrage the great principles of the "Prince of Peace." This Psalm next contemplates (v. 4.) Christ in his exaltation to his Father's throne in heaven; "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh." The rulers of earth cast him out and slew him, and resolved that they would "not have this man to rule over them:" but God's choice opposed theirs; and He raised up his Anointed from the dead and gave him a throne in heaven; where he now mocks at all the "rage" of his enemies on earth, however high or exalted the stations they may occupy: they rage in vain; and in vain oppose the will of God concerning his Son's reign on earth; for "JEHOVAH shall have them in derision: then shall he speak unto them in his wrath," when, according to his promise to his Son, on seating him at his right hand, He shall make his enemies his footstool: for, notwithstanding, all the rage and counsel of wicked men, and wicked rulers, God says (v. 6) "Yet have I set my king"—the king of his choice—"upon my holy hill of Zion;" the seat of David's empire, and place of David's throne.

Next the anointed speaks himself, (v. 7.) "I will declare the decree: JEHOVAH said unto me, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee"—by raising him up from the dead; see Acts xiii. 33. Having thus raised him up from the dead and set him at his own right hand, on his Father's throne, JEHOVAH addresses him, (v. 8.) "Ask of me and I will give the nations for thine inheritance, and the utmost parts of the earth for thy possession." V. 9, JEHOVAH speaks of what his Son shall do to the kings and rulers of the earth who oppose the establishment of his reign on the "holy hill of Sion," and the extension of his authority over the earth, viz—"Dash them to pieces," etc. That this is the true meaning of verse 9 is evident from the language which follows, "Be wise now"—in the present time—"O ye kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth: serve JEHOVAH with fear . . . . kiss the Son, lest ye perish from the way, when his anger suddenly blazeth forth." Septuagint. The whole Psalm shows that it is the kings, rulers, and judges of the earth who use their power and authority in opposition to God and his anointed who are to be the subjects of this wrath and be broken "with a rod of iron:" and this is to take place when Christ comes to take his own throne—"the throne of his father David."

6. One text more demands attention under this general head, viz., Dan. vii., 13, 14—"I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

This text clearly establishes the fact of a throne to be given to the Son of man at the close of the present age, or after the judgment on the fourth beast, which symbolizes the fourth body of tyrannical rulers, or rulers and kings on the territory of the old Roman empire. When the judgment is in a process of accomplishment on that symbolized power, is the time for the Son of man to have given to him in possession of his own throne, to rule over the nations, in person, associated with the saints of the Most High. See verses 22 and 27.

TORNADOES: FEARFUL OMENS.

THERE has been terribly destructive tornadoes this fall in Mexico and the West Indies.

Our consul at St Thomas, under date of Oct. 31st, in writing to Secretary Seward, says that the huricane which visited the Island on the 29th of that month was the most frightful of any since 1837.

"The town," he adds, "is deserted; hardly a house has a roof, and hundreds are entirely destroyed. Our harbor is one scene of wrecks. Up to the 1st of November the bodies of 250 sailors have been washed ashore. Fortunately the hurricane occurred in the day time, from 11 until 5 o'clock. If it had occured in the night the loss of life on shore would have been fearful. Everything possible is being done for the relief of the poor."

From Porto Rico the news of a later hurricane says:

"According to the accounts so far received, the last hurricane which visited that Island was more terrible and destructive in its effects than the two previous ones.

A thousand houses are in ruins, and 3,000 buildings are badly damaged. The loss is incalculable. Immense numbers of cattle have been killed, the cane crop has been utterly destroyed, and the fields have been swept bare."

The Porto Rico Bulletin of the 14th inst. says:

"We are assured that the Island of Tortola has disappeared beneath the sea. Some accounts say it was submerged for eight hours, and that all the inhabitants perished."

This account is now discredited; though terrible destruction has occurred in that Island.

In Mexico the destruction was great. The State Department, at Washington, has received information of the effects of the tornado that passed over the City of Matamoros and the surrounding country on the night of the 7th and 8th of Oct. It says:

"The amount of losses in Matamoros cannot yet be computed. Five millions of dollars would be a low estimate. At least 600 houses have been destroyed, including many valuable warehouses containing large stocks of goods. So far as heard from, all the ranches are thrown down for thirty miles around Matamoros. At the mouth of the river the destruction was great; scarcely a house is left standing. All the river steamers were wrecked or disabled except the Tamaulipas, No. 2, which is still serviceable. Considering the great destruction of buildings, the numbers of casualities is not great—probably 20 killed, and 40 or 50 more or less injured. Brownsville suffered equally with Matamoros, very few buildings being left uninjured. Much suffering, The Commercial says, must necessarily follow this terrible disaster. When so many are left without a shelter, and all their property destroyed."

Truly, some "men's hearts are failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." Such are some of the signs of the last days. That we are fast hastening to the consummation, when the personal reign of Christ will commence on David's throne, on earth, cannot be mistaken by the student of prophecy. Worldlings see the signs of the times, but understand them not. The following, which we take from a recent New York Herald, one might be tempted to think, if it were not for its source, was written by an Advent believer. Read it.

CELESTIAL AND TERRESTIAL PHENOMENA—MORAL EFFECT OF PHYSICAL FORCES

Vesuvius is once again pouring its torrent of fire through the vineyards of Lachrymi Christi and threatening to engulph cities as it did in the days when the world was first divided between the thoughts of Julius Cæsar and those of Jesus Christ. There is terror in the valley of Mexico also, and the people are filled with alarm at the threatened activity of a volcano long extinct, whose blaze was perhaps a beacon to the adventurous Cortes and a portent to the falling empire of the Montezumas. News from the West Indies hints the devastation of an earthquake in the island memorable for its assoication with the name of Columbus and as the first seat of Spanish power in this hemisphere. From such different points on the earth's surface come the evidences that there is perturbation within; that the collision of the pent-up forces has for the time destroyed the balance. Simultaneously with these internal disturbances—dependent upon them by unknown relation—we have also wonderful disturbances on the surface—storms in the air of scarcely paralleled power, hurricanes that have blown the sea completely over great tracts of land. Beyond our atmosphere, in open space—there are storms in the stars, too—shoals of nebulous matter have lately been driving across the earth's orbit, rebounding from the elasticity of our atmospheric armor, or masses of this matter consumed by combustion resulting from the contact, or from the heat generated by the friction of their flight. In all the great divisions of visible nature there is perturbation, destruction of the common order, perhaps derangement of natural and planetary laws. Yet it was long since wisely suggested that our so-called discord might be "harmony not understood," and this is a subject on which it is hardly safe to say that what seems to us derangement is not order. In whatever phrase science may state the relation between these several wonders of the universe—for it seems difficult to believe that they are not related one with another—it is doubtful whether the phrases can do more than disguise ignorance. When Moses said of somewhat similar wonders that "the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters" he perhaps expressed the first cause quite as satisfactorily as science can do it even today.

Human observation has noted in every age that there is an agreement between the great perturbations in the physical world and those revolutions, changes, upheavals of society, those disturbances of political and moral relations that in a common view regarded as due either to human pride, passion and ambition, or to the direct interposition of a superintending "providence." Falling dynasties are associated in the oldest of human remembrances with portent of some blazing comet; and so following there is hardly an ill worthy the dignity of history but has had its attending or preceding signal in the heavens. Men readily associated these things in the ages when faith was a governing principle—when it was assumed that they saw God in all that they could not otherwise explain, and when the physical wonder that came in the same period was naturally taken as a warning of some more strictly human event. But this is an inquiring rather than a believing age; yet we must still associate great stellaratmospheric or terrestrial perturbation with periods remarkable for human changes. We associate them inevitably because they come together as a matter of fact; and then follows the inquiry, Is the relation merely one of coincidence, or did the thinkers who groped and guessed in the early dawn of intellectual light "reason better than they knew?" Doubtless this inquiry is to be answered fully only when further discovery shall exactly develop the nature, power and modes of action of that yet comparatively unknown principle—electricity. It is a remarkable characteristic of this principle that it is at once a cause and a result of the greatest operations in nature, while no more definite account can be given of varying states of humanity, whether in respect to health in the common sense or in respect to intellectual status, than consists in the allegation of varying electrical conditions. Is the vis nervosa upon which our daily health, opinions, acts depend, electricity? Many important experiments seem to indicate that it is nothing else, and that if it differs in certain respects it differs only as its natural medium of action does from those things that are the usual media of electricity. Well, this power, that so effectually determines for better or for worse our daily acts, is also the spirit of the storm, and is generated and set free in perhaps illimitable quantities by those great chemical actions of nature of which the volcanos, the comets, the atmospheric storms are only signs and symtoms. At the very time, then, that the volcano and the comet are blazing in their several ways Infinite Power is setting free an agent, impalpaple s[illegible] in results, that, acting through human brain and nerve, makes our pestilences as well as our wars, and originates the grand revolutions and changes that illuminate human history.

In the present condition of the political and moral world we may see that the agreement is still sustained between physical and human phenomena. With volcanos active in either hemisphere, with earthquakes tumbling down the towers of ancient cities, with the very earth plunging through a stream of starry ruin, we find human society undergoing in nearly every climate greater changes than any of which the records have been kept from other ages. Europe is closing a great phase in its history. Men are looking upon the last days of that religious empire (the Papal church) which, seizing the falling sceptre of the Cæsars, established a more extensive, if less material power, presided over the birth of the modern civilization of law and literature, and fostered and secured the growth and development of that system which now pushes it from its pride of place. Asia, slumbering so long under the fallen ruins of former glory, is awaking at the touch of Europe, with Russia striding toward her across the steppes, and inside rebellion aiding the outside barbarians coming by the sea to break down and throw open the only remaining one of the empires that were old in the time of Darius. On this Continent changes of the most momentous character seemed but lately to be drawing to their close, as we saw the end of the war in Mexico, the languishing progress of that in South America, and the termination of the bloody struggle that had devastated ten of our own States; but there are indications that even yet we may have popular troubles almost without parallel—eruptions that, breaking through the crust of social order, may simulate in terror and desolation some of those great natural events to which they seem allied. It seems that there may well be a new heaven and a new earth—in other words, a new religion and a new civilization—before the time comes again that all "shall stand still and be at rest."

Everlasting Punishment.

"These shall go away into everlasting punishment."—Matt. xxv 46.

We would like to see the above text harmonized with the idea that the penalty of God's law is something more than death, on any other principle than the endless suffering of the finally impenitent. If the punishment is part suffering and part death, please tell us which is everlasting. Is it suffering or is it death? If it is suffering then the everlasting suffering of the wicked, as their punishment, everlastingly precludes the possibility of their death; consequently, the idea of a total and final destruction of wicked men is an unqualified absurdity. This must be very evident to every thinking mind, not muddled by a strong desire to keep alive an unconditionally absurd theory.

But again, if the punishment for sin is everlasting death, then of course the wicked cannot everlastingly suffer, for none can suffer while they are dead. If, therefore, justice or the law of God demands that wicked dead men be raised from the dead in order that they may be punished, endless misery must be the one and only penalty of God's law. For, if death only is the penalty of the broken law, then is every demand of justice fully met, and the penalty of the law satisfied, by the death of the sinner. All our destruction friends must admit that when a man dies, he is just as thoroughly dead as he ever can be; that, if you could make him alive from the dead and kill him a thousand times, he would be no more dead than he was before he was raised at all, consequently, when it is claimed that the demands of justice cannot be met without raising the sinner to life, to suffer awhile and die again, the entire system of Life in Christ alone must be abandoned by every consistent man and woman. To attempt to claim that the punishment for sin is part suffering and part death, in the light of Matt. xxv., 46, is a monstrous absurdity. How can a sinner suffer eternally, be everlastingly dying, and at the same time be eternally dead? Why will not men be consistent?

But what saith the Scriptures? "The wages of sin is death." When, therefore, "those on the left hand go away into" eternal death, death being the only penalty of God's law, they do most certainly "go away into eternal punishment." With respect to those who are already dead, when by the last decision of the great Judge, they are doomed to eternal death, they having failed to secure an incorruptible life by obeying the conditions of the only plan that God has instituted to give them life from the dead, they do just as certainly go away into everlasting death as any that are alive when the Judge of quick and dead shall appear. With this view all is harmonious, plain and easy. The day very fast approacheth when the last decision will be passed, and the doom of all be unalterably fixed. May we all in that important moment be found among those who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that future endless life promised to the good above. S. W. Bishop.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 27, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

"Election."

It is seldom that we ever refer to this subject, considering it virtually dead; yet some attempt still to uphold the view that God, before the foundation of the world, in his "plan," elected certain individuals to eternal life, unconditionally, or so far that their salvation is inevitable, while the remainder were left to an equally inevitable ruin. One thing was long since settled in our mind, viz., No hypothesis can be true which implies that the fault of any man's failing of eternal life is the lack of help from God.

We regard the theory of the "unconditional election" of a definite number of the human family, to eternal life as inevitably dragging after it, the "unconditional reprobation" of the remainder to eternal death. Every election, choice, or selection, implies a refusal of, or a rejection of, such as are not chosen. This may be applied to every choice or selection that is made, no matter what is the subject or object. If the one who makes the choice, or elects, does it irrespective of any qualities or acts of the object selected, then the person rejected is in no way blameworthy for not possessing that for which the choice was made; and if there is any blame it must be the fault of him who elected, or made choice of the other object or person.

The term election means simply choice—to choose—to select. When applied to God it means the divine choice, or selection. Here a wide field opens; the divine choice relates to a great variety of objects and subjects. In some things the divine choice is absolute; that is, it is independent of all creatures, and is not influenced by anything they have done or can do. Thus the divine choice was to make man capable of a moral development; or, with a capacity above all other animals. In doing this, a reprobation of other animals took place, and they were placed under man. Again, God elected or made choice of the means by which a moral manifestation should be made in man, entirely in an absolute manner, or according to his own will, guided by wisdom and love. When man had sinned, the divine choice is seen in the means ordained by which man might regain life and live forever.

God's choice has been absolute in the election of particular persons or places for particular purposes, as Saul to be the first king over Israel, David to be the second, etc. Or, in the selection of Zion as the seat of empire in preference to any other place; and by that election all other places were reprobated from that honor, as were all other persons at that time, from being king over Israel, except Saul. So God elected his Son Jesus Christ to be the Head of his church, and the one Mediator; and from this high honor all the other beings in the universe were reprobated, i. e., rejected. It were easy to multiply cases where the divine choice, or its election, is absolute. And a reprobation follows it equally absolute. He has elected some men to a more perfect physical, and of course to a more perfect mental, organization than others, that is, where the superior perfection is in the brain. One man is endowed with a capacity for one employment, for which another has not the natural qualifications, and not a capacity to attain them. In all these, and in a thousand other matters, divine election is seen, and seen as preceding any acts of the creature; nor did this election depend upon anything but the divine will and wisdom. Again, some men were elected to possess five talents, from which favor another is reprobated; and yet though reprobated from five he is elected to possess two. Thus the same person may be both a reprobate and an elect. God elected some men to live before the flood; others to live between the flood and the first advent; others to live in the time of our Saviour's personal ministry; others to live in the dark ages, and us to live in these last days; all this was a matter of his own sovereign choice. But none of these elections, nor all of them put together, amount to an election to eternal life. Not one of all our race, so far as we know, except Jesus Christ, is yet elected to eternal life—that is entirely another matter; and depends entirely upon the fact whether we are found in Christ at his coming; for "God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son."

God elected the whole world to be the object of his love: and elected that his Son "should taste death for every man"—"die for all;" that was God's choice, or election. That was the first great and foundation stone, without which no man could have eternal life. God elected to raise Christ up from the dead; that was the second step of grace—of God's favor to man, without which there could be no future life, and hence no eternal life. God elects that eternal life shall only come through the living Jesus; and he elects no man unconditionally to that eternal life. The grand conditions are, faith in Christ and abiding in Christ; for, "if a man abide not in Christ, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." John xv., 6.

The election to eternal life, then, is conditional, and does not take place till our trial is ended—according as Jesus said to the church of Smyrna—"Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Rev. ii., 10.

We are now elected to hear the word of truth; if we believe it, we are elected of God to be partakers of the divine nature, in Christ our sins are forgiven, the Spirit of God takes possession of us, and we are elected to be new creatures, or babes in Christ. If we abide in Christ we are elected to a larger measure of grace, and to "bring forth more fruit." If we "hold fast the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope firm to the end" we receive the promise of eternal life. See Heb. iii., 6; 2 Tim i., 1, and Titus i., 2. Hence Paul exhorted Timothy to "fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life." 1 Tim. vi., 12.

It will be seen that we have endeavored to throw light on the term election, in general. Our position is, that God has not elected any man unconditionally to eternal life, though he may have elected them to various other things unconditionally: none of which, however, make their eternal life absolutely certain; that turns upon their compliance with conditions which God has elected for their perfection in order to eternal life.

Acts xiii., 48—"As many as were ordained to eternal life believed"—is often quoted as proof of the orthodox notion of election. Those who quote it attribute the believing to their being "ordained to eternal life;" and that the ordination is the same as God's having elected them, or "decreed from all eternity" that they as individuals should actually possess eternal life, that, without such decree they would not have believed.

If this be so it is no wonder they believed—they could not do otherwise, unless they could defeat God's decree; hence they were not acting except as the decree-power moved them, and were no more praiseworthy than the unbelieving Jews who "contradicted and blasphemed;" for had those blasphemers been elected or ordained to eternal life they would have believed too.

Now it is a fact that the Greek word translated "ordained—tetagmenoi—signifies "disposed for." "As many as were disposed for eternal life believed." There is therefore no idea in the original of God's electing or ordaining these men to eternal life, but the words of eternal life had been preached to them; the Jews contradicted and blasphemed; the Gentiles were disposed to obtain eternal life, and therefore believed.

If the notion of an unconditional election to eternal life be true, then the persons thus elected never were perishing, nor in any danger of perishing; and if they believed themselves perishing, when awakened by the truth and Spirit of God, they believed a lie, for they were eternally safe, and they feared they should perish only because they were ignorant.

While we differ entirely from the Calvinistic view on this subject, so far as it relates to an "unconditional election to eternal life," we agree that without the grace of God we could do nothing; and therefore we warn all not to quench the Spirit, and "not to receive the grace of God in vain," as surely they may, or the warning would be useless. Men perish because they quench the Spirit, and continue in disobedience.

The Sentence of Death.

"Of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die."—Gen. ii., 7.

What could Adam have understood by this threatening but the loss of his being? It has indeed been said that the death here denounced included, First, Temporal death, or a dissolution of the body; Secondly, Spiritual death, or an alienation of the soul from the holy God; and Thirdly, Eternal death, or everlasting misery of the soul in hell. But what could Adam know of this threefold theological distinction? What could he know of the immortality of the "understanding that was in his inward parts?" No revelation is recorded as having been made to him to this effect. The Scripture moreover is entirely silent on this triple definition of death. It speaks of death as of the taking away of human life—"The wages of sin is death." Romans vi., 23. And this death is spoken of in the next chapter of the same epistle as slaughter; than which there is no plainer word to express the idea of the loss of life. "Sin, taking occasion by the commandment, slew me." Romans vii., 11. The apostle elsewhere says, "The letter, or law, killeth." 2 Cor. iii., 6. Now we cannot say of a wicked soul that it shall be spiritually slain and killed to all eternity in the miseries of hell, which yet ought to make good sense if the signification of death be that which is described above, eternal life in misery. It may be well supposed therefore that neither God intended, nor Adam understood the original threatening of death in this manner; but that the curse denounced against our first parent is to be taken in a sense of an absolute forfeiture of life, and of course with that, of the hope of living forever. "Man that is in honor and unders'andeth not is like the beasts that perish." Psalm xlix. Man was created in the divine image, and made with a view to become a partaker of the divine eternity; but by a sinful desire to "become a god" he lost "the right to the tree of life" which was in the midst of Paradise, and thus forfeited both his existence and blessedness.

The sentence was not executed in the day of his sin, in consequence of the immediate entrance of the system of redemption, which prolonged his life, and gave him space for repentance and ground for hope for recovering the lost inheritance through a resurrection from the dead by the power of the LIFE-GIVER; and therefore mankind are born into the world not only under the curse of death, but under a more than remedial dispensation of mercy for those who receive the truth that they may live.

But "God drove out the man" into a region where there was no tree of life, and henceforth "his breath is in his nostrils, and whereof he is to be accounted of?" Isaiah ii., 22. "The son of man is a worm." Job xxv., 6. "All flesh is as grass, and all the goodli- thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, the flower thereof, falleth away." 1 Peter i., 24. The longing after the lost inheritance has co-operated with the inward consciousness of judgment to come, in suggesting to many nations the notion of their natural immortality; but "the expectation" of life eternal on the part of the wicked "shall perish." "The first man Adam was made" only "a living soul" (a phrase in the Hebrew of Genesis ix., 10, employed to denote creatures that died at the deluge), a creature not possessed of absolute or inherent immortality; and "as is the earthy," or man of dust, "such are they also that are earthy." 1 Cor., xv. "When the wicked do spring as the grass, and all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed forever." Psalm xcii., 7.

The Meaning of Animal Sacrifice.

"Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel that eateth any manner of blood, I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people. For the Life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul. In it is the life of all flesh; the blood of it is the life thereof; therefore I said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall eat the blood of no manner of flesh; for the life of all flesh is the blood thereof; whosoever eateth it shall be cut off."—Lev. xvii. 10–14.

Man, having come under the curse of the law was doomed to be "destroyed forever," to die. But the mercy of God triumphed over the "man-killer," "the liar and murderer," from the beginning, who had tempted Adam to his destruction. Animal sacrifice was appointed as a representation of the doom which he had incurred through sin, and as an emblem of the propitiation through which the curse of death should be removed. "The blood, or the life of the offerer," says one of the best Jewish writers, Abarbinel, "deserved to be shed, and his body to be burned for his sin; only the mercy of the divine name accepted this offering from him."

The blood of the animal did not then signify merely its happiness, but its life; and this life-shedding was a representation of the curse of the law under which mankind had fallen. Every animal sacrifice offered by divine appointment since the first transgression is a testimony against the doctrine that man now has "life in himself," John vi., 53. The rivers of blood that were poured out at the foot of the altar at Jerusalem through all generations, still proclaim from the ground, that man is "driven out" from the tree of life, and the prohibition against drinking the blood, is to be regarded as a denial of man's immortality.

Life Only in Christ.

"Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you."—John vi., 53.

The whole of the chapter whence this text is taken deserves the solemn consideration of those who would be quite sure that they are not "fighting against God" in resisting the doctrine of Life only in Christ. Our Lord speaks of himself as the "Bread which came down from heaven to give life unto the world," verse 33. "Your fathers," he says, "did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead; this is the bread which came down from heaven that a man may eat thereof and not die. If any man eat of this bread he shall live forever! As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father: so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me."

Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures; and wherefore? Because death, dissolution, blood-shedding, the taking away of human life was the curse of the law. He gave his life "for the life of the world."

The Messiah was "proved to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead." Rom. i., 3. "In him was life, and the life was the light of men." "The life was manifested," and the object of his manifestation was to destroy the works of the devil, and to abolish death through the introduction of a resurrection-power which will confer "life everlasting" on all his saints, in the heavenly paradise. Revelation xxii., 1–6.

The Lord's Supper is intended to represent the manna of immortality. The Jews were strictly forbidden to drink the blood; but we drink that blood which is the life of the divine Life-giver. We see with our eyes, we look upon, we handle with our hands, we eat and drink the divine pledges of an absolutely endless duration of life, conferred upon us through the tender mercy of Him "who hath delivered us from the wrath to come," which we through our sins have deserved. By the light of this doctrine it is manifest that "justification of life," Romans v., 18, is, and can be, only through Christ.

The Lord's day is the perpetual monument and pledge of resurrection to immortal life, the sign of eternal redemption accomplished, and of death swallowed up in victory.

Eleven Days in Lake City.

October 30.—About two hours before I left the steamer I made the acquaintance, on board, of E. Sandford Blake, of Sparta, Wis., whose destination also was Lake City. There is an Advent society at his place, with which he, though a member of the Baptist church, is in full sympathy. He says he feels almost no liberty in using his gifts in the Baptist prayer meeting, but both heart and mouth are full when he worships with the Advent brethren. He is deeply solicitous that his Christian companion shall be led to see the truths in which he rejoices. Br. Blake, after we had become acquainted, expressed much regret that we had not found each other out early in the day: he thought we might as easily as not have arranged it for me to preach to the passengers. Anticipating that Br. B. might hear my opening discourse at Lake City (in case we should have a meeting on Thursday or Friday evening, for I knew he could not remain over Sunday), I refrained from ascertaining whether we agreed as to the view of no future life for the wicked. Next morning, however, in answer to an inquiry made by Br. Hudson, and afterward repeated, Br. B. expressed his hearty assent to that view.

It was near 7 o'clock in the evening when we arrived at Lake City. I learned from a draymen that I would find Br. A. G. Hudson at the store of Mr. H. F. Williamson; and in a few minutes Br. H.'s hand was in mine. He guessed instantly who I was without being told, and gave me such a welcome as tended powerfully to dwarf the distance (1,322 miles) that stretched between me and my Salem home. A second edition of this welcome issued at once from the lips of Br. John M. Willis, to whom Br. H. introduced me. We three were old friends at once, and conversation commenced in good earnest; I felt at home, and knew that I should enjoy my visit in Lak City. Passed the night at Br. Hudson's—retired late.

Oct. 31.—Several consideration decide our brethren in delaying until next Sunday morning to commence our meetings. The election of next Tuesday is to determine the question—of much interest to the people here—whether or not the Wabashaw County-seat shall be removed from Wabashaw to Lake City. Br. Hudson, though not addicted to politics, leaves home this morning, at the solicitation of many citizens, to speak on the subject to-night and to-morrow night in remote parts of the county: I shall therefore see no more of him until Saturday.

Early in the day I took up my quarters at the home of Br. Willis. (He is building a beautiful residence, and occupies the wing of it, no other part being yet completed). Brn. H. and W. last evening expressed the hope that an application for the use of the Congregational meeting house for our meetings would be successful: the matter will be decided by the church this evening. During the after part of the day Br. Willis introduced me to nearly every body we met, and invited all such to come to our meetings. Nearly all whom I speak with are from New England or New York; and if I could forget the journey I have made it would be easy for me to believe, so far as the society here is concerned, that I was in a stirring Massachusetts town. But the bluffs behind me, Lake Pepin before me, and the bluffs on the Wisconsin side of it, tell me plainly enough that I am not in the old Bay State.

November 1.—The Congregational friends decided last evening by vote that we cannot hold our meetings in their house. They were less particular in the case of Moses Hull, to whom not long since they granted the use of it some ten days. But I must not forget that "circumstances alter cases." Mr. Hull used the meeting house to preach the abominable doctrines of Spiritualism and to deride the Bible, whereas we want it for the purpose of unfolding the truth of life only in Jesus Christ. Of the church in question Br. Willis was formerly an active member and liberal supporter. As they are at present without a pastor, our occupancy of their house, even on Sunday, would have put them to little or no inconvenience. But we must be patient with the blindness which would interpose obstacles to the spread of the great theological reform of the age. Our duty is plain, and we must move right forward. Armored with the weapons of inspiration, we must as a people wage a determined warfare against the errors that have their source in the unscriptural notion of natural immortality.

Br. Willis and I took a walk this forenoon of several miles to visit the top of a bluff called the "sugarloaf," and the prospect which it afforded richly repaid the tramp. We were back home in time for dinner.

This afternoon Br. Willis had an opportunity, on the street, to introduce me to the resident Methodist pastor, Rev. T. M. Gossard, with whom his own acquaintance was but slight. Conversation turning upon the union temperance meeting which it was proposed to hold in the Methodist place of worship (a hall) on Sunday evening, Mr. G. suggested that our meeting for that evening, at Williamson's Hall, be given up, and that I should take some part in their temperance meeting. When Br. W. in reply spoke of this as impracticable in view of the limited time of my proposed labors here, Mr. Gossard volunteered the suggestion that probably we would "do more good" in the temperance meeting than in our own! Br. W. took this remark as an uncalled-for fling, and characterized it accordingly. This brought out a frank avowal of Mr. G.'s belief that our view of the divine penalty tends to paralyze the fidelity and zeal of those Christian professors who embrace it, etc. Quite a little controversy on the merits of the point raised by Mr. G., and of the view we hold, at once ensued between Mr. Gossard and Br. Willis. At length an opportunity offered for me to take part in the interchange of thoughts; and Br. W. being obliged to leave on business, Mr. G. and myself were left to compare views in the presence of a constantly increasing crowd of interested listeners. The substance of our colloquy will be hereafter embraced in a brief article.

Nov. 2.—To-day we published in the Lake City Leader a notice of our contemplated meetings. We also get out large handbills (signed by Brn. Hudson, Willis, and Kelley), in which we announce as subjects of discourse to be considered in the light of the holy Scriptures—"the mortality of men, the unconsciousness of the dead, the final extinction of the wicked, the resurrection from the dead, future life and immortality for the righteous alone, the second personal coming and reign of Christ." We state that "Liberty will be given to persons attending these discourses (ministers and others) to ask questions and to controvert the interpretations of Scripture that may be offered by the speaker."

Had the pleasure of forming an acquaintance with brethren Dr. John Kelley and Henry H. Arnold, both firm believers of the life view. The same cordial greeting came from them that awaited me on the evening of my arrival.

Br. Hudson returns from his speech-making campaign weary enough, but a good night's sleep will give him the needed refreshment.

Sunday, Nov. 3.—Snow has fallen during the night, and the weather has an unpropitious look. Still, we have a good congregation this forenoon at the Hall, and an encouraging beginning made in presenting the life theme. In the evening the weather was fine, and the congregation much larger than in the morning. Both the discourses were long—good attention was given by all who came to hear—and it is believed that a strong impression in the right direction has been made in some minds. Most of my leisure time to-day was passed with Br. Hudson and family, and a brother and sister (names forgotten) who came from a distance to attend the meetings.

Nov. 4.—Good congregation this evening. Mr. Gossard, the Methodist preacher, heard the first part of the sermon, but an engagement (of which he informed me before I commenced to speak) prevented him from remaining to the close. This I greatly regretted, for I knew that truth was brought which he ought to understand and preach.

Nov. 5.—(Election day). No preaching this evening. Our brethren supposed last evening that our hall would be used as the voting place, but it was not. Still, it may be just as well that the meeting is allowed to go over till to-morrow night.

This afternoon I called on Rev. Mr. Gossard at his home, and we had a long talk on the subject of the destiny of the wicked. A further reference to this will accompany my account of the street discussion—when I write it!

Nov. 6.—An excellent congregation in the evening. Our meetings are stirring up a good many to inquire into the doctrine presented.

Nov. 7.—Our hall is used this evening by the Congregationalists for a festival, and so we have no meeting. Dr. Kelley this forenoon drove into town and took me to Br. H. H. Arnold's, where we dined and had an excellent visit. Late in the day the Doctor took me to his own home on the lake shore, and with him and his estimable wife I had another good visit. Remained with them over night.

Nov. 8.—Dr. Kelley brought me to Lake City. Took tea with Br. A. W. Durkee and family. Had a good congregation in the evening.

Nov. 9.—In the afternoon Br. Arnold came into town for me and took me to his house, where I visited until it was time for us to start for the evening meeting. At the close of the discourse, at the hall, I had a long conversation (in the presence of quite a company) on our views with the principal of the Lake City public school. Trust he was enabled to see some matters more clearly than before. Made the acquaintance of Br. Jacob Libby, whom Br. Hudson had often spoken of during the week, but who could not until now come to Lake City and be at our meetings. Sister L. is with him, and they will remain over Sunday.

Sunday, Nov. 10.—Morning congregation excellent—the sermon one hour and twenty minutes long, and devoted wholly to practical godliness. Spent the afternoon pleasantly with brethren and their families. Preached my seventh discourse on the life theme in the evening; after which we had a conference meeting and the Lord's Supper. Thus ended my labors in Lake City. Shall have more to say of this Minnesota visit hereafter. R. W.

REGENERATION.

"SEE that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently: being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth for ever. For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away; but the word of the Lord endureth forever. And this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you."—1 Peter i., 22, 23.

The necessity for regeneration is based upon the fact that man is sinful, and that he is mortal. He has lost love to God, and with that his hope of eternal life; for "the wages of sin is death. He must therefore be begotten again to a hope of life, spiritually and physically. His mind must be renewed in the divine image, and he must be born again from the tomb, in order that he may enjoy endless existence. Hence the resurrection is also termed the regeneration. The sinner ere he can see the kingdom of life must be supernaturally made a "partaker of the divine nature" of the Adam from above. The old Adam-nature must be superseded by a new nature from on high. Christ must live in him. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." The power of the Highest must overshadow the man ere he can boast in the Lord as an heir of endless being. Then he becomes related to the Immortal Deity, and puts on the white robe of everlasting righteousness. This holy transformation consists in the passing of the mind out of the kingdom of evil and darkness into the light of communion with God, through "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus." Romans viii., 1. Truth is the instrumentality employed, "the word that endureth;" but the agency of the Infinite Spirit is as direct as in the creation of the world.

The signs of the transformation of the "earthy man" into the saint or "heavenly," are conviction of sin, and faith in the truth; "deadness to the world" (in conformity with the moral design of the sacrificial and propiatory death of Christ on the cross, Romans vi.) and a joyful love, as the spirit of filial obedience. "He that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God." "He that loveth him that begat, loveth them also that are begotten of him. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death." 1. John.

The great transforming process will be "quickly" completed at the second advent of Christ to destroy the apostacy of Christendom, 2 Thess. ii., 1–9, when he will summon from the graves all holy sleepers, and change the living saints, raising both in spiritual bodies to be "forever with the Lord."

The doctrine of life in Christ is not merely a question of future punishment, as is often supposed, but it affects our view of the constitution of man, of the fall of Adam, and its sonsequences to th human race, of the gift of life in the redemption of man by the Lord Jesus Christ, and of the nature and results of regeneration by the Holy Spirit. The question is not, What are the tendencies of the doctrine? but Is it true? If it is true, the tendencies will all be good, and God in both his attributes of justice and mercy will be glorified. God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him. He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love. In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. 1 John iv.

LOVE FOR CHRIST'S APPEARING.

"HENCEFORTH there is laid up a crown for me . . . . and not for me only but unto all them also who love his appearing."

In this quotation from the writings of Paul is given a test of Christian character, so simple that concerning it there need be no mistake. It is so entirely suited to every grade of intellect that every member of the church of Christ may possess it. It does not depend in the least upon an intellectual comprehension of abstruse questions of theology. Neither has it for its basis any mathematical computation of prophetic numbers, or learned historic delineations of prophetical events: else the humble and unlearned would fail at last of the crown of life. The doctrine of Paul in this text is in harmony with all correct principles of Christian philosophy. The really renewed heart does, by a principle of intuition, love the appearing of Christ. He loves the appearing of Christ on the same principle that the mother loves her child. The mother need not to be educated up to a certain point to make her love her child. God has implanted in her nature the love of her offspring. So when any one of Adam's race is really converted, he has implanted in his moral nature an intuitive principle of love for all that is truly good When by the eternal Spirit the truth of God is so written on our hearts as that we are "made partakers of the divine nature," this is conversion in the true sense of that word. This imparted spiritual nature, so alters the affections of the mind as to cause us to love the good, and shun the evil. It begets a relationship to the divine. It makes us sons of God. So far then as we are made partakers of the divine nature we are adopted into the family of God. This spiritual union will so direct our affections as that we shall love all the members of our Father's family. Christ is our elder brother. Consequently, the very fact of our union with God, through the imparting of a spiritual life principle to us, leads us to love our great LIFE GIVER, Jesus Christ. As we love him we shall rejoice to know he is coming back to earth. No individual can love a friend and dislike the idea of being in his personal presence. So no one can love Christ and not long for his coming. And while he may not be able to comprehend, and therefore fail to believe, all that may appear to be evidence to another that shows his advent near, still the longing desire of his heart is to see the King in his beauty. And all the real evidences that his capabilities of intellect, and his opportunities for research can afford him, will be grasped by him as sure tokens of coming future joy. So to the well-instructed Christian, it is the only beacon light of hope. Around it clusters all of future good promised in the word of God. And ofttimes in the dark hours of earth's trials and temptations, he involuntarily exclaims, When will the morning come? When shall earth's dark night of weeping pass away? When will the day of glory dawn? The very breathings of his inner life are, "Come Lord Jesus." Come and give life to thy anxiously waiting bride. Thank God, her prayer will soon be answered, and he who is the hope of his people will bring the crown of life. Amen. S. W. BISHOP.

"THAT TEXT."

"O," SAYS one, "if I could get around that text in John v., 28, 29, I could fully receive the doctrine of life only through Christ."

The first thing we will notice is, that two classes are here mentioned, the righteous and the wicked. The righteous, or they the good having done, come forth in a resurrection of life; which of itself, plainly teaches that those, the bad having done, will not come forth to life; but will, as the text says, come forth in a resurrection of condemnation, damnation, death; which is the final issue of the wicked, as is not only taught here but everywhere else in the Scriptures.

In Judge Halstead's Theology of the Bible, in speaking of this verse, he says, This verse cannot, and was not intended by the Christ to show that the wicked will be raised; it would overthrow the uniform and unbroken testimony of Scripture to the contrary. So it seems to me, when we consider Psalms xlix. "Nevertheless; man being in honor abideth not; he is like the beasts that perish;" or, in other words, perishes, or dies like the beast. Who says the beast will have a resurrection? But in the same Psalm, David says, "But God will redeem my soul from the grave." Thus we see the contrast between the natural and the spiritual man. In Eccles. iii. chapter, we find corroborative testimony on this point; he says that they are beasts; as one dies so dies the other. That is, the natural man. Also, in Isaiah xxvi., we find the contrast still. In speaking of a class of wicked tyrants he says, "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise." But of the righteous he says, "The dead men shall live; together with my dead body shall they arise." And many other texts we might bring to prove that none but the righteous shall live again. Now, here is another point I wish to make. I plant a kernel of corn, and in due time I look for the blade, but find none. On removing the earth I discover that the kernel is decaying and no signs of life. I plant another that looked just like the first, and in due time it springs up and goes on to perfection in life. Hence I see that one kernel had the germ of life in it, while the other had not. So man dies and goes down to the grave; and if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken (make alive) your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you. Rom. viii., 11

MOVEMENTS OF SPIRITUALISTS.

THE Spiritualists in the State of New York met in Rochester, Nov. 7th, and held a State convention for two days, during which they formed a State organization. In the opening speech, the Hon. Warren Chase said "There are Spiritualists enough in this country, if united and organized, to control it politically and religiously. It is absolutely necessary to organize. Having the power, we are determined to carry it out. We have double the power of any church, not excepting the Catholic."

The Third National Convention of Spiritualists, held in Providence, August, 1866, sent "an address to the citizens of the United States," in which occurred the following language: "Before we, as Spiritualists, will consent to have the infallibility of the Bible, the deity of Jesus, and the political authority of these quondam friends of God crammed down our souls as part of the Constitution of our Republic, we will fight until the buzzards are gorged with the spoil. And of this we give all timely and ample notice."

At the late National Convention, held this year in Cleveland, Ohio, one of its members thought the language just quoted was a little too strong; but the leading members of the Convention spoke in its defense.

Mr. J. S. Loveland, formerly an able Methodist preacher, now one of the leading Spiritual lecturers, when referring to the foregoing quotation from the address sent out by the Third National Convention of Spiritualists, said:

"I believe that the Spiritualists of the country are ready to say and to do all that is contained in that paper. Therefore, we will not condemn this able address, which sets forth our views so clearly, because there is in it a rhetorical flourish which appears to some like a declaration of war."—Banner of Light, Oct. 19th, 1867.

Said Mr. Dyott:

"Let us glance for a moment at what the churches have done—with a religion that is as filthy rags in comparison with the glorious teachings of Spiritualism."

It is said straws show which way the current runs. So the foregoing show the spirit of Spiritualism. The whole system is antichristian, and yet it claims to be the highest type of Christianity. The following is part of the preamble at the head of a resolution adopted at the Cleveland National Convention:

"Whereas, The philosophy of Spiritualism embraces within its range every movement toward the elevation and reformation of mankind."

The opposite of this is true. It "embraces within its range every movement tending toward the ruin of mankind."

Said M. A. Dyott, at the Convention in Cleveland, when referring to the origin, progress and effect of Spiritualism, it "has proved a saviour to millions of earth's children, freeing them from the fear of death, the terrors of an imaginary hell, a mythological devil, and a more terrible God." Thus it is boldly declared that Spiritualism frees the people from the God of the Bible, who is called "more terrible" than the devil; and to cap the climax, Spiritualism is said to "be synonymous with Christianity. We do not think it possible for men to make more untrue statements. In the language of Dr. P. Randolph, we would say, we believe Spiritualism "to be the most tremendous enemy of God, morals and religion, that ever found foothold on the earth—the most seductive, hence the most dangerous form of sensualism that ever cursed a nation, age, or people." He truly says it is "anti-Bible, anti-God, anti-Christian." Dr. Randolph said the foregoing after he had been a medium eight years, made three thousand speeches, and been in a trance state twenty-five hundred times. Notwithstanding all these horrid facts connected with Spiritualism, it is rapidly spreading in all directions. And now the Spiritualists are laying plans to control the political and religious institutions of the world. Look out for the "mark of the beast." Let no one who expects to be accepted by Jesus when he comes, have any connection with Spiritualism. It is anti-Christian in all its elements; and is daily becoming more hostile to the Bible, the God of the Bible and all who uphold the sacred Scriptures. It is to the moral system what arsenic is to the physical —a deadly poison.—World's Crisis.

THE PRINCIPLE OF EVIL.

"THE principle of evil is first expressed in Scripture figuratively, by a serpent. There must have been a liability to err in the first pair, or their condition would not have been a state of trial."

The above quotation is from "HALSTEAD'S Theology of the Bible," page 464, and in it is contained a great and true sentiment—though, as yet, but little understood; for a "liability to err" must always be connected with that perfect freedom in which one must be left who is to choose between right and wrong, and so without this liability man could not be put on trial; and without trial he could never become better than he was first made, either in character or condition. And who, we ask, would now be willing to be fixed in his present condition and character, with no hope of change for the better, that so he might be secured from the liability of becoming worse.

Man wants improvement, even though the chance to improve is offered him with the risk of becoming worse if he shall fail to improve. In fact man must improve in character, and so in condition, or his present state would soon become as wretched as any condition he has reason to fear as a result of his effort to improve: i. e., man must either advance, or retrograde; he cannot remain fixed in any character or condition in which he has or may attain in his present life.

We see, then, that this "principle of evil," as it is called, by which man was brought under trial, was designed for his good, and it only seems evil to us, now, because man failed in his trial, and did not develop a character "in harmony with his Maker," as he might have done; for if man had not failed in said trial, but had obeyed his Maker's commands, we never should have thought of regarding that principle, by which said development of character was effected, as an evil principle; but rather as a good. But as man was left free in this matter, why should he now regard this principle, or trial, as evil. Might he not, with the same propriety, regard his Maker, who put him on trial and gave him said prohibitions, as an evil being? For was not this whole arrangement, God's arrangement? It seems quite clear, to us, that if any "evil principle" is here to be found, outside of man himself, it can only be found in God who arranged the whole. We fail to see how any blame can fall on a third party. Indeed, we do not see a third party in all this trial, unless man's "own lusts," by which he is "drawn away and enticed" to disobey his Maker's commands, could be called a third party; and is not all this seeking to find a principle, or being, of God's forming, with which to divide the blame of our wrong doing, which God would lodge wholly on us, an indirect way of charging our Maker with a part of the blame of our sins? This disposition to excuse ourselves shows pride; and if we succeed in this fancied excuse, then we say, we have not sinned; and this must be our ruin. The thing amounts to just this: God charges man with sin, which is the transgression of his law; man rises, in his pride, and offers an excuse for what he has done; and just when he thinks he has given to his Maker a reason for his acts, which God calls sin, just then he tells his Maker that he has lied; for if I can give a valid reason for any act I have done then I have proved that said act is not sin; because no reasonable act is a sinful one, Who shall dare do this—"make God a liar," by saying, "I have not sinned?" I will not do this, but rather confess my sins. "I will be sorry for my sin," and so find a pardon: for God has "found a ransom;" praise his name. H. YOUNG.

Pittsfield, N. H., Nov., 22, 1867.

REPOSING IN CHRIST.

ANOTHER branch of blessedness, is a power of reposing ourselves and our concerns upon the Lord's faithfulness and care, and may be considered in two respects: a reliance upon him that he will surely provide for us, guide us, protect us, be our help in trouble, our shield in danger; so that however poor, weak, and defenceless, in ourselves, we may rejoice in his all-sufficiency as our own—and further, in consequence of this, a peaceful, humble submission are in our views and desires. Surely, in a world like this, where everything is uncertain, where we are exposed to trials on every hand, and know not but a single hour may bring forth something painful, yea, dreadful, to our natural sensations, there can be no blessedness, but so far as we are thus enabled to entrust and resign all to the direction and faithfulness of the Lord our Shepherd. For want of more of this spirit, multitudes of professing Christians perplex and wound themselves, and dishonor their high calling, by continual anxieties, alarms and complaints. They think nothing safe under the Lord's keeping, unless their own eye is likewise upon it, and are seldom satisfied with any of his dispensations: for though he gratify their desires in nine instances, a refusal in the tenth spoils the relish of all, and they show the truths of the gospel can afford them little comfort, if self is crossed. But blessed is the man who trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is. He shall not be afraid of evil tidings: he shall be kept in perfect peace though the earth be moved, and the mountains cast into the midst of the sea.—John Newton.

"WATCH."

"WATCH ye therefore. And what I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch!"—Mark xiii., 35, 37.

Who, of all men in the world most needs this exhortation? The Christian. Why?

1. Because he is a soldier surrounded by enemies, who are waiting to destroy him. They are ready to take advantage of his carelessness or neglect of duty; they are vigilant, they are numerous; they are subtle. Therefore he should watch.

2. Because he is a pilgrim, travelling through a hostile land. There may be snares in his way; stones over which he may stumble, pits, into which he may fall; enticers who would lure him from his heavenly home. Therefore he must watch.

3. Because he is a steward. He has precious treasures to take care of—himself, his talents, his time, his Master's honor. He must take care that he does not lose the first, misuse the second, waste the third, and endanger the fourth. Therefore, the Christian must watch.

4. Because he is a servant. His Lord is now absent: when he comes back he will expect all to be in readiness for his reception—each one at his post, each one looking out for him. Therefore, the Christian must watch.

Christian reader! you are a soldier—you have entered Christ's army by your profession; his enemies are yours; his cause is yours. Are you watching?

Christian reader! you are a pilgrim—you confess that earth in its present state is not your home, that you are dwelling here but for a time; you know that you are surrounded with dangers. Are you watching?

Christian reader! you are a steward. Christ has given precious treasures into your possession. Are you watching?

Christian reader! you are a servant—you profess to be expecting the return of your Lord. Are you watching?

Your Captain, your Lord, your Master says to you, "Watch!" and pronounces you "blessed" if you watch. Rev. xvi., 15.

HOW PROVIDENCE TRAINS MEN.

IT is interesting, often, to trace the method by which God prepares men to render eminent service to the church or state. If all human biography was written by an inspired pen, we should find that many in our day, like Joseph in the patriarchal age, are raised up by a special providence for important positions. The Edinburgh Witness gives the following sketch of the origin of a Governor General of India:

More than half a century ago the affairs of a worthy draper in the town of Coleraine, in the county of Londonderry, became embarrassed. He sent his son, who assisted him in the business, to Manchester and Leeds to arrange with his creditors. The young man was harshly received, and after having failed to effect a settlement, arrived at Liverpool on his way home. His honorable spirit was lacerated by the treatment he had met with; and, dreading still more the disgrace and reproach he expected to encounter on his return to his native town, he, in a fit of desperation, enlisted as a private soldier. The young draper's regiment was ordered out to India, where his good conduct soon brought him into notice, and the excellent education which he had received paved the way for his promotion. He rose by steps until he reached the rank of colonel. He served his country with honor, and in time gave two sons to the military service, having first imbued their youthful minds with Christian principles. Their valor and military accomplishments shed lustre on that earnest piety by which they were characterized. The two young soldiers to whom we refer were Sir John Lawrence the Governor-General of India, and the late Sir Henry Lawrence, known as the defender of Lucknow. Both of them have done honor and good service to their country, and neither of them was ashamed of the cross of the Lord Jesus. It is gratifying to find that neither piety nor humble birth will prevent talent and worth reaching the highest offices and honors.

FROM MRS. R. W. PIERCE.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Nov. 19, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I suppose by this time you will want to hear of the whereabouts of our Brother Wendell. He is here with us now, but starts for Chicago to-morrow morning. He is so driven with business that he cannot get time to write even to you; so I have undertaken the job for him. He says, give my love to Br. Storrs, and tell him that I am enjoying my trip West hugely.

We have had a blessed time; but it has tried our faith somewhat. God knows what is best for us. Br. W. got here Friday morning. In the afternoon Br. Brown took him to see the pastor of the Spring street Congregational Church, Wm. DeLoss Love. He had got his permission to have Br. W. preach in his church before he came. When he told him what he wanted to preach about, Br. Love didn't know whether it would do or not. He said he did not want to shut his pulpit against him. The result was, that he preached Sabbath evening to a congregation of about 300. What the effect will be is known only to the Lord. This morning he and Br. Brown called upon Br. Love and had a precious time.

They met and parted as brothers in Christ should, with mutual good feelings all around. I believe the Lord sent him here in answer to prayer, and he has used him just as he has seen fit; for the Lord doeth all things well. We like Br. W. very much indeed; and would love to have him stay longer. I think there are a great many here who would receive the life views if they could only hear them. O, Br. Storrs, when I see such a multitude going down to death, without any hope in this life or in the life to come, I feel as though I could not rest day nor night, till God would send some means to awake the sleeping church, and arrest this heedless, thoughtless throng. Isn't it time for those that think they have got the light of life, to let it shine? Pray for me and mine. Love to all. Your sister in Christ.

TO THE HERALD OF LIFE.

DEAR HERALD: I love thy weekly visits, and rejoice in thy prosperity. I feast upon thy dainties, and proudly invite my neighbors to share with me thy rich repasts; especially so when all thy various dishes are free from the slightest flavor of personality or unkindness; when thy all come smoking warm from the heart and hand of thy numerous contributors, emitting grateful fragrance of love to God and man.

Then, though the meat be too strong for my digestion, or is not seasoned exactly to my peculiar taste, there is such a rich variety, and such a delicious odor of liberty to think and speak for myself, that I can find no fault, but rather praise God that such a weekly banquet is ours to enjoy. Then let us each do our best to help furnish this rich feast whereof we all partake so freely.

If all the tiny rain drops should refuse to leave the clouds, because they are not lakes and rivers, how soon the earth must parch for want of genial showers.

So if we all refuse to write because we cannot write sermons, how are we to have a "variety?" I. R. C.

FROM ELD. SAMUEL L. WALTER.

CENTRALIA, ILL., Nov. 20, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I am at this place. I got here last evening, after a visit to Lebanon, where I preached last Saturday, Sunday and Monday: had a good hearing, and found the lovers of truth alive to the fact that we must be in Christ in order to live again from the dead. I hope that the light of the gospel of the ever blessed God will increase until error and fable shall be overthrown, and men shall look for a life "more abundant," which the LIFE-GIVER has said that he has "come that they (my sheep) may have." Thank God that life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel. I left Fulton County about the last of August; preached to them at Clyde. But to meet my expenses, and my wife being ill for the last three months, I found that I must do something in order to improve our finances, and meet other obligations and obtain clothing which was much needed. So I went to work for two weeks to help get along. I found those at Lebanon that remembered me in the right way. I pray the Lord to reward all his dear children. I am glad the cause of truth is in the ascendancy among the brethren scattered abroad; and for the determination that the truth shall be kept before the people. I wish we could get it into the hands of all that will read: then I do believe that there would be such a mighty host raised up against the God-dishonoring theology of the day that its advocates would be few and weak, and would wither before the word of the Lord.

A. W. DURKEE, Lake City, Minn., writes: We had a feast of good things, in the shape of sermons by Br. Wendell. It did me good and made my heart rejoice to hear the Scriptures so easily and so clearly explained; and though the minds of the people are so filled with prejudice they could but exclaim, "That was the best sermon I ever have heard." My prayer is, that the truth may be treasured up, and that great good may be the result. Yours in hope of life only through Christ.

ENOCH HOLT writes to have his paper changed from Globe Village, to Blackstone. Mass., and says: We feel lost without its weekly visits, and can't afford to have it delayed one day on its journey, we are so anxious to hear from the loved and scattered ones all through the land. As others say, "I love the paper more and more;" but I do not know how that can be for I loved it so well before.

PROPHETIC CHART.

THE new and large chart for churches and lecturers will be out about the first of January, 1868. This is the largest and best prophetic chart ever published. Its size will be nine by six feet. It is to give the chronology of the world, from Paradise lost to Paradise restored, in 1875. It also gives the Jubilees: the Twenty-three Hundred Days; the Thirteen Hundred and Thirty-five Days; the Twelve Hundred and Ninety Days; and the Twelve Hundred and Sixty Days, as given in the Bible, and confirmed in history. The symbols are large and clear: the Image as in Dan. ii.; the Beasts as in Dan. vii. and viii.; and the symbols of Rev. viii., xii., xiii., and xvii.

It will be on cloth, and can be folded and sent by mail, or express, at a small expense.

With the above chart we shall publish a new work from the pen of Br. Sheldon, of about two hundred pages, which will set the chart in a clear light. This work will be entitled, "ADVENTISM:" What Is It? Its relation to theology and prophecy. In two parts. Part first: Its relation to theology. Part second: Its relation to prophecy.

Both the chart and the book will be published without delay. We shall make an effort to get them both ready by the first of January, 1868.

The chart will cost about $10, and will be richly worth $15. But it will be sold to churches and preachers for $10.

The book on Adventism will cost about forty cents in cheap binding at retail, but where a quantity is taken for distribution they will be put at a much lower rate.

Orders should be sent without delay to J. V. Himes, Buchanan, Michigan.—Voice of the West.

Footprints of Love.

Life beareth many footprints
  On the golden sands of time;
Footprints of high and noble deeds,
  And, alas! of many a crime.

Footprints of kings and warriors,
  Of the conquerors of earth;
Footprints of busy little feet
  Gathering around the hearth;

Footprints of stern high daring,
  And of deeds as soft and mild;
But the sweetest footprints I have seen
  Were those of a little child.

The little steps went in
  A dungeon walled around;
They went with gathered flowers to cheer
  A prisoner chained and bound.

The little voice was heard
  In whispers soft and low,
And the little hand was gently laid
  On a dark and troubled brow.

And trembling words lisped forth
  The Saviour's precious name,
Till o'er that captive's sullen mood
  Repentant feeling came.

And the little steps went out,
  But the footprints long remained;
Remained, too, in the softened heart
  Of that prisoner bound and chained.

Footprints they are in time:
  But not in time alone;
Eternity, in living light,
  Those blessed steps will own.

Then, little one, go thou
  And do some loving thing;
Leave footprints on the sands of time,
  Whence blessed fruits may spring.

Children's Department.

Cowards.

When Fred came home from the Sabbath school, he found his father reading aloud. He sat down on a cricket by the fire, and kept very still. He did not mind what his father was reading, he was thinking of his Sabbath school lesson. It was about Peter.

Peter was one of the twelve disciples of the Saviour. Peter had great reason to love Jesus: Jesus loved him; he had raised him from an humble fisherman to be a disciple; he had cured his mother, who was near dying of a fever. Peter thought he would do anything for Jesus; he said he was ready to die, if he could but serve him. By and by a mob of wicked Jews came out against Jesus with swords and staves; they rudely seized him, and bound him and led him to court. Peter was so frightened he did not know what to do. As he stood looking, hardly knowing which way to turn, somebody came along and cried, "Here is one of Jesus Christ's followers. Here he is." Peter thought they were going to seize him and carry him to court." "I don't know what you say. I do not know Jesus," he cried in a fright. Soon after somebody else said the same. Peter flatly denied it. A third one came up, and pointing to him, said, "Here is one of his followers."

"I am not," cried Peter, angrily. "I do not know him."

Oh, Peter, Peter! Jesus then turned around. Peter caught his eye. That look went straight to his heart. He went away alone and wept bitterly. This was Fred's lesson.

After his father and mother had gone out of the room, his cousin Helen asked him what he was thinking of. "I am thinking about my Sabbath school lesson, Helen. It was about Peter. I do not like Peter, he was such a coward. I hate cowards. Afraid to own he knew Jesus, when Jesus had been so very, very good to him. Afraid of those wicked Jews. I would not have done so; I would have fought for him, rather than deny him so cowardly."

"Did you know there were Peters now-a-days?" asked Helen.

"What do you mean?" a ked Fred.

"I mean there are those now who have not always courage to own the truth; who, like Peter, are afraid to come honestly out on the right side. Every time we are afraid to do right, we are cowards," said Helen.

"Like Peter?" asked Fred, looking much surprised.

"Yes, like Peter; afraid to do what Jesus Christ expects of us," said his cousin. "He expects us to be on the side of truth, that is Jesus' side. He is your Master and mine. He expects us to own him, and obey him."

This was a new side of the matter, which Fred had not thought of. "Every time we are afraid to own the truth, we are cowards, like Peter; we are disappointing the Saviour." Fred said this to himself two or three times: it troubled him. Fred always hated cowards, but he began to fear he might be a coward sometimes; he could not bear to think of it. "You don't mean, do you, Helen, that any time when we do not own the truth, we are denying Jesus, do you? Are we cowards to him?" asked Fred, looking very seriously.

"Certainly, this is one way of denying him. He is the way, the truth, and the life; if at any time we fail to own the truth, we fail to take our stand on the Lord's side; we are too cowardly to do right."

"Well, I do not mean to be a coward, I hate cowards," cried Fred; "and, beside, a coward to Jesus Christ, who has been such a friend to us."

The two cousins talked together a long while. Helen loved the boy, and was very anxious to see him a true follower of Jesus. The supper-bell at last rang, and put an end to their interesting conversation. Fred could not keep the subject out of his mind; he thought of it while he ate, he thought of it all the evening. His heart was tender; there was nothing he loved so much to read about as Jesus Christ. He often wished he had lived in Judea when Jesus was there; he was sure he would have left all, and followed him. He desired to know Jesus, and to have him his friend now; to deny him seemed a very dreadful thought.

Fred went up to bed earlier than usual. His little bed-room was next his mother's chamber. Before undressing, he always kneeled and prayed. This night he kneeled and prayed longer than he had ever done before. Many things which Helen had said troubled him. He begged Jesus to take away his sinful, cowardly heart, and give him an obedient, courageous heart; a heart not afraid to do right; a heart fully set on the side of truth in all things. At last he arose, and, taking off his jacket and trowsers, jumped into bed. He fell asleep thinking of Peter.

Fred was not like many other boys, who think they want to do right, but are loth to try; and fancy it must be very hard to keep trying every day. Perhaps it is hard at first; but Jesus will surely help every boy who tries, and soon it will become a smooth and peaceful way. It is the way of the transgressor which is really hard. Fred was for trying. As for himself, he meant to keep on Jesus' side. He did not sleep away all his good purposes; no, he awoke with them in the morning as fresh and clear as ever.

Do you want to know how Fred got on? One day his uncle Thomas lent him his knife: it was a fine knife, with two blades; a small one, very sharp, to make pens with, and a large one to whittle with. Fred was mending the baby's cart.

"Be very careful of it," said uncle Thomas, in handing it to him. "I suppose you know which blade to use, Fred."

"Yes, sir, the large one. Thank you, uncle," and he skipped away as pleased as could be, with the prospect of spending the afternoon in company with a sharp knife. Fred liked a good sharp knife right well. George Cole came in. Together they went to the wood house to work. Fred showed George the knife; they both thought it was a beauty. Fred worked for some time with the large blade. He said it was a grand blade. Then he shut it and opened the small blade.

You are not going to whittle with that, are you?" asked George; "your uncle will not like it."

"No, I only want to look at it. See how it shines," rubbing it across the palm of his hand two or three times. "Oh, is it not sharp? sharp enough, I tell you." He then tried the lower end of the blade upon a piece of pine; just tried it, said he—snap! the sharp little blade was broken.

"Oh," cried Fred, turning pale, "what am I to do? the little blade is snapped." How sorry was Fred. How sorry was George.

"You had better not have touched it," said George, "a great deal better not."

"I know it;" cried Fred, "I know it; what shall I do?"

It proved a sorry afternoon to Fred; he had no heart either for more work or play. As supper-time drew near, he trembled at the thought of meeting his uncle; he could not go in to supper; he said he was not hungry; he would play with the baby in the kitchen. After supper he dared not enter the sitting-room. He said he was tired, and wanted to go to bed. His mother was afraid he was sick. He forgot to say his prayers, in his haste to tumble into bed and forget himself in sleep. Ah, Fred had not courage to own the truth.

The next morning he heard uncle Thomas call him; his heart beat quick, and away he scampered down behind the barn. When he went to fetch the milk he stayed as long as he could, in order not to appear at breakfast. Poor Fred; did he not see that he was a coward?

He could not get excused from family prayers: he sank into a corner, never looking up. His father read and prayed. One petition in his father's prayer went to his heart: "'Lead us not into temptation, deliver us from evil,' and give unto each one of us O, Lord, strength to do right."

"That's for me," though Fred, who always minded his father's words, and tried to feel them; his cowardly conduct burst upon him. "I am a coward, I am a Peter," and he felt as if he should sink to the floor with shame. It seemed as if Jesus' eye was looking right at him.

Fred prayed for courage to own the truth. Soon the family arose. Uncle Thomas was going out the door. There was room for Fred to escape telling quite yet. "No, I will go and tell uncle now." He ran and twitched his uncle's coat-sleeve. "May I speak with you, sir?" said Fred firmly. Handing him the broken knife, he told what had happened. "I am very sorry; I do not think I am fit to be trusted again."

"I am sorry, too," said his uncle; "it was a valuable knife. You must be more careful the next time."

Fred was greatly humbled when he saw what a coward he had been; he blamed himself more than he did Peter. "Peter had all the wicked Jews about him, and I had only my dear uncle to be afraid of." But it helped him to see into his own heart: it made him more careful in judging of other people. He found it was far easier to find fault with others, than to do right himself.

"Oh," sighed he, "I never thought before I was a coward." He felt how weak he was. He felt the need of praying often, "Dear Saviour, give me courage to own the truth, and to stand upon thy side, which is the right side."

Do not all the children who read this, see the need of offering this prayer for themselves? Are not you apt to prov a coward sometimes? Look at yourself and see. Oh, be strong and courageous on the side of truth.—Selected.

Swedenborg's Bible.

There is one fact in relation to the writings of Swedenborg which ought to be known in these days of his increasing popularity. He excludes from his canon of the Word of God, many of the most important books in the received Scriptures, and particularly the writings of Paul The following is his manifestation of his views on this subject.

"The books of the Word are all those which have the internal sense; but those which have not the internal sense are not the Word. The books of the Word in the Old Testament are the five books of Moses, the book of Joshua, the book of Judges, the two books of Samuel, the books of Kings, the Psalms of David, the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, the Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi; and in the New Testament, the four Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, Luke and John and the Revelations." This list excludes Ruth, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon, in the Old Testament; and the Acts, Paul's fourteen epistles, the epistle of James, the two epistles of Peter, the three epistles of John, and the epistle of Jude in the New Testament.

The above citation may be found in a note appended to the 66th section of Swedenborg's "Heavenly Doctrine." The same statement appears elsewhere several times in his writings, but it is not put forth into much prominence. He seems to have avoided all discussion of it, and to have chosen a silent, rather than a violent and offensive method of ejecting the writings of Paul and others from the Bible. He nowhere speaks against the great apostle directly. Indeed, he admits that the writings which he excludes may be useful, as the Apocrypha is thought to be useful by many. But he never quotes Paul as an authority, and very rarely refers to him in any way. In the appendix to his "Apocalypse Revealed" there is an index of the passages of Scripture referred to in that work; and of the whole number which is more than five thousand, only twenty-three are passages from the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistles of Paul, James, Peter, and John. This is a fair specimen of the proportion of attention which he gives in all his writings to those books of the New Testament.

And even when he does refer to any of the epistles, it is either in the way of condescension to the prejudices of those who have some respect for their authority, or for the purpose of combating the impression which they make on men's minds. Thus he says in his "Divine Providence," Sec. 115, "They who are in faith separate from charity, and have confirmed themselves from the saying of Paul to the Romans, that man is justified by faith without the works of the law, iii. 28, adore this saying like those who adore the sun, and become like those who fix their eyes earnestly on the sun, from which, the sight becoming blunted, does not see anything in the midst of light." And again, in the "Apocalypse Revealed," Sec. 571, he says, "The doctrine that faith alone, that is faith without the works of the law, justifies and saves, is not from the Word, but from a single expression of Paul misunderstood. Rom. iii. 28."

His estimate of the intellectual and spiritual attainments of the apostles, and primitive Christians may be seen in the following extract from his tract entitled, "The Doctrine of the New Jerusalem respecting the Sacred Scripture," Sec. 24. "The reason why the science of correspondences, which is the key to the spiritual sense of the Word, was not discovered to later ages, [i. e., ages subsequent to the patriarchal dispensation] was, because the Christians of the Primitive Church were men of such great simplicity that it was impossible to discover it to them; for had it been discovered they would have found no use in it, nor would they have understood it."

This mutilation of the Bible is a feature of Swedenborg's system which seems not to be generally known, or at least not to have attracted the attention which it deserves. There is no allusion to it in the popular sketches of his life and doctrines, such as that in the Religious Encyclopedia. It may be doubted whether many of those who are becoming fascinated with his speculations and marvellous stories are not wholly ignorant of the fact that he sets aside the authority of the apostles, and tears out the best half of the New Testament.

"After this the Judgment."

"As it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment; so Christ was once offered." Heb. ix. 27, 28.

The death spoken of here, is an "appointment." See verses 7, 25, 26. "But into the second went the high priest alone, once a year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and the errors of the people." . . . . "Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others. For then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now once, in the end of the world, hath appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." Now, as the forgoing represents the service of the high priest, so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many. He is to come again "without sin." He will not come the second time to put away sin by the offering of himself; but to save the humble, the meek, the believing and waiting ones; "for, by one offering he has perfected forever them which are sanctified."

The judgment spoken of, is an appointment: also it belongs to a series of services to be performed by the high priest on the great day of atonement. This judgment is not appointed for the trial of the party, said to be appointed to die but is a part of the service the ordained priest had to perform on the great day just referred to. The apostle supposes we have understood him up to this place in the account; and evidently has in his mind the facts quoted. Verses 7, 25, 26, 27. As it is appointed. Since it is thus and thus, in the law and in the types, so Christ (conformable to those directions in the law, and as anti-typical of the high priest entering once a year into the most holy place), "so Christ was once offered." . . . . "After this the judgment." Jesus is the priest and the judge on the occasion; "For God hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness. by that man whom he hath ordained, where of he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead."

The reader will find it of consequence (in this connection) to refer to Lev. xvi. and xxiii. chapters.

But what a strange sense some give to this Scripture. To make it emphatic, they add, "all." "As it is appointed to all men once to die, but after this the judgment." The judgment, in their view of it, is for the trial of the men ("all men"); all to be raised to life for the purpose; some of whom are allowed to live right on; others die to live no more.

Thus in their haste to prove the reliving of the impenitent, they contradict their proof text, "appointed once to die." Allowing this interpretation of men in general, and universal, being appointed (or, "ordained") to one death, and a second death is out of the question.

But another objection to this thoughtless interpretation. It would be a reproach on God's government and code of laws if it were admitted, viz., to judge men worthy of one death, according to law, and inflict two, contrary to law. Again: it would be to sentence men to death, and then judge them afterward! What could we think of a statute that would hang a man upon his indictment and judge him afterward? The laws of the present civilization indicts first, on complaint and one-sided evidence; afterward there is to be a patient and fair trial. Also, according to the higher law, criminals cannot be put in jeopardy twice for the same offence. God's law and administration ought not to suffer in comparison with that which is human and imperfect.

Temptation.

This subject is one of importance to every Christian, from the fact that every Christian is daily subject to temptations, which, if yielded to, brings condemnation, thus losing peace. We hear much said by good people about the work of the devil with them; laying every temptation and transgression upon him, placing themselves as instruments for his use, having no superintendence over themselves because of the great power he exerts over them. Here is one of the many mistakes of Christian people. They do not understand that the natural man is at enmity with the law of righteousness; hence do not see that every man is his own devil. The divine nature, which is given us of God, is at war with our human nature; and the warfare of the two natures shows plainly from whence comes temptation, from the fact that we are aware which is right and which is wrong. The apostle James speaks plainly upon this subject when he says, "Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed." He teaches first, that we are not tempted of God; and the idea of being tempted by a personage called the devil does not for once enter his inspired mind. Our own lusts, says the apostle, are the seat of the difficulty. Now, what are our own lusts but our own natural desires? And being enticed, is being invited to yield to or satisfy those desires. The being drawn and enticed is not sinful; it is the working of that natural man, whose workings no man is free from. Yea, I, for one, do not believe that Christ himself was ever entirely free from them while he partook of our nature; yet he sinned not; though tempted as we are he yielded not. Now we come to the difficulty. When lust hath conceived it bringeth forth sin. Lust conceives when we yield to the temptation, and this conception takes place in the heart. The conception and the outward workings may not be at the same moment, yet we are sinners from the conception; for when a man stands ready to transgress a known law of God, we judge him from the position. As a man thinketh in his heart so is he. Though he may never have an opportunity of doing the act, yet he is guilty, and needs repentence, that the thoughts of his heart may be forgiven him. Evil thoughts arise in the minds of the lust of men; yet we are not condemned, if they do not conceive. It is therefore well not to allow the mind to dwell much on evil things; and there is ample scope for it upon the great subject of salvation. Therefore we should strive to bring every thought in subjection to the will of Christ. When we see where the difficulty lies, that it is with our own selves that we have to contend, it strikes me that there will be less giving away to temptation by christian people. All talk about having the Spirit of God, and all have that precious gift that are God's children. Now that Spirit makes us sufficient for the overcoming of the natural man. If we are partakers of that Spirit we are partakers of the Divine nature by which Christ was made an overcomer. As he overcame, so may we overcome; else what instruction or consolation do we find in his language when he says, "In the word ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." If we are not granted all we need to be overcomers, then we might say put us on equal footing with Christ and we can live without sin the same as he. But we are left without excuse, for we are taught that a way of escape will be furnished us; and it is our fault if we do not gain the victory. The Son of God was begotten of the Spirit of God. The same Spirit rested upon John from his birth. The same Spirit is given unto us, when we give our hearts to God. How much God has done for us; yet how little we are doing for ourselves. We may as certainly be kept in the hour of temptation as was Christ. How muchit is our privilege to enjoy freedom from sin in this present life. "If our own hearts condemn us not, God is greater than our own hearts, and knoweth all things. If our hearts condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God." We should remember that that same Spirit that witnesseth with our spirit that we are the children of God brings condemnation when we transgress. God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things. Let us who are of the day see to it that lust conceives not to the bringing forth of sin; for sin, when it is finished bringeth forth death.

Is it Literal Fire?

Dr. Willard, of Haddonfield, N. J., addressed a letter to the Editor of the Israelite Indeed, in which he takes the ground of the destruction of the earth and sinners by literal fire; though he says "I understand that all mankind will not be conscious subjects of conflagration," etc. The Editor, G. R. Lederer, replies as follows:

We shall not enter upon a dispute with our beloved brother, Willard, concerning the fate of the wicked, whether they will be destroyed on the stake, and the righteous will have the amusement of the grandest "au to dafe" that ever a Spanish grand-inquisitor has prepared for that country, or be mowed down like grass and be dried like hay (Ps. xxxvii.), or in any other way; because we have enough to do and to watch that we may not be fonnd among them that shall perish, but among those who shall inherit the earth. But, as to the burning up of the earth, we do certainly differ from our brother, and again maintain that what Peter said, and what all others said, of a destruction or renewing by fire, is but figurative, and not literal. God has sworn never again to destroy all created things, never to bring the deluge any more over the earth. Has God made that oath with the mental reservation that he would once destroy the earth by fire? What is the difference betwen drowned and shot dead?

Fire is, throughout the Scriptures, the emblem of wrath, punishment, and purifying; but can seldom be understood literally. For instance, when God said: "Ye have kindled a fire in my nostrils—it shall burn forever." (Jer. xvii. 4; also, xv. 14.) "In my distress I called upon the Lord. . . . There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured; coals were kindled by it." (2 Samuel xxii. 7 and 9.) A similar passage is to be found in Psalm xviii. 9. Also in Job and elsewhere. Now we trust that our brother will not say that a literal fire or a literal smoke is here meant; or does our brother believe the last verse of Isaiah to be literally understood? We think not, for it would be in conflict with all, or most of the passages to which he referred in his letter. No, dear brother, we believe with David when he said: "The heavens are Jehovah's, and the earth he gave to the children of men." Did God give the earth to all men? No, he gave it to the meek; they shall at last, be the everlasting heirs of it. We believe with Solomon when he remarked, that "Generations are going or passing away, and generations are coming; BUT THE EARTH SHALL STAND FOR EVER."

Br. Storrs: You have my sincere thanks for the papers you sent me. Works devoted to the truth are badly needed in this section. Ninety-nine out of a hundred "never heard (as they express it) of such a notion." I have conversed with some in the village, and I think there has been some interest excited upon the subject; and were I able to follow it up with suitable works there might spring up some fruit. My education and means are very limited; but thanks be to God, I have been able to tear the veil from my eyes, and am no longer a slave to immortal-soulism. I was raised in the old notion that I was by nature immortal, etc., and it was hard to get over it. Your Examiner, of '48 and '49, was of great benefit to me. I am only a beginner in the cause of Christ. Twelve months have scarcely passed since I confessed the Lord Jesus. If you have any tracts for gratuitous distribution, there is no better field for them than here. I shall send for the Six Sermons and other works as soon as I can spare the money from my household necessities. May the Lord abundantly furnish you unto every good-word and work. Yours in the hope of immortality.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not Heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. Moral Depravity; by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. Doom of the Ungodly: or, The Wicked Dead remain eternally under death's dominion. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. The Wages of Sin: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. Letters to a Clergyman; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. Finley, Pittsburg, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for 2 cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our own expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent for 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. The Essential Baptism; by the Editor of the Bible Examiner, 32 pages. Price, 7 cents.

The following are 12mo. Tracts, of 24 pages each:

Man's Nature and Destiny; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price, 5 cents.

The Atonement, by Geo. Storrs, and The Gospel Hope, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price, 5 cents.

TERMS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE.

Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar for six months; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York City, 48 cents additional.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, pre-paid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658,
NEW YORK

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE TWO THRONES.

[Concluded from last week.]

BEFORE Christ takes actual possession of his own throne,

HE RELINQUISHES HIS FATHER'S.

This relinquishment, however, does not occur till some time subsequent to, or after, the second advent of our Lord: for,

1. At his advent "the Son of man shall come in the glory of the Father," Matt. xvi., 27, importing that the surrender has not then been made, nor can it have been according to the expressed determination of JEHOVAH, that Christ should sit at his right hand, or upon his throne, "until" Christ's enemies are made his footstool. Till that time, though the advent has occurred, our Lord retains his Father's throne.

2. That this is the case appears also from our Lord's words when the high priest "adjured" him "by the living God, to tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God." "Jesus saith unto him, thou hast said: nevertheless, I say unto you, hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Mat. xxvi., 63, 64. This answer shows that at the time of his appearing he is still on his Father's throne—"the right hand of power," where we have seen he took his seat at his ascension into heaven.

3. In further confirmation of this view we look at Paul's epistle to Titus, ii., 13—"Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Here it appears at the manifestation of Jesus from heaven, he will be in the glory of the great God; or, still invested with the glory and power with which he was clothed at his exaltation to the right hand of God.

4. We come now to the most important text to be examined under this head. It is 1 Cor. xv., 24–28. The general subject of this chapter is the resurrection of the dead. The apostle had affirmed that "every man" is to be made alive "in his own order" [Gr. tagmati] band, or cohort. He then says—"Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming;" not necessarily implying all men that will ever be saved, but a specific class; viz., they who are his at the time of his coming, and are then asleep in the dust of the earth; these constitute one band, and now have their resurrection, because they are the associate rulers, to prepare whom for partners of Christ's throne this present age has been allotted. "Then"—after the resurrection of them that are Christ's at his coming—"Then cometh the end." "End" of what? This is an important question. Various have been the interpretations given this text and context; but we confess nearly all we have ever seen are entirely unsatisfactory, and our own mind has been much perplexed with the subject; but if our previous positions, in this discourse, are correct, we think we have now the key which unlocks the apostle's argument. Christ has, up to this time, occupied his Father's throne, and ordered the affairs of heaven and earth to prepare a body of rulers to sit with him on his own throne. The time allotted to that object now ends—this body of rulers are raised from the dead, or changed, if alive at his coming. The time he was to occupy his Father's throne—or sit at his right hand now ends. His work on that throne of putting "down all rule" of his enemies, "and all authority"—that stood in opposition to his authority on earth—"and" all "power"—that was exerted against his right to David's throne—or his dominion over all nations: this work is ended. Hence, the purpose for which he was seated on the throne of the Father is accomplished, and the time which the Father said he should sit at his right hand is at an end. So then the period of his reign on that throne has found its termination, and Christ now delivers up that throne—that "kingdom—to God, even the Father," from whom he had received it after his death and resurrection. "For he must reign"—upon his Father's throne—"till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy"—that stands in Christ's way of taking possession of his own throne, with his associate rulers—"shall be destroyed;" and that enemy is "death." To this end, that Jesus, the anointed king, might remove every obstacle in the way of the peaceable possession of his own throne, the Father exalted him to his throne in heaven, when he had been rejected by men on earth: that end is now accomplished, and Jesus, who by the pleasure of the Father had occupied his Father's throne as co-ordinate ruler thereon, now delivers up the kingdom, or throne, that he had been entrusted with, and the Father gives him his own proper throne, viz., the throne of David, which men had refused him.

In taking his own throne he delivers up, or surrenders his co-ordinate relation and becomes sub-ordinate, or is, henceforth and forever, "subject unto him that put all things under him," to the end "that God may be all in all," as Christ had been while he sat upon his Father's throne. This, with present light, we believe to be the true interpretation of this portion of Scripture. "The end," we think, is no other than the end of the present age, and the co-ordinate rule of Christ on his Father's throne. The resurrection of the righteous, or of Christ, and they that are Christ's at his coming, is the main topic of 1 Cor. xv.

5. There is one more text we shall just notice under this general head which goes to show when Christ takes his own throne. It is Mat. xxv., 31—"When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." It is not till his return in glory that he receives actual possession of his own throne, then he will occupy it; and it implies the relinquishment of that previously occupied. The view we have taken of the kingdom delivered up to the Father, and the time when it is delivered up is further confirmed from the fact that,

THE KINGDOM AND THRONE OF CHRIST ARE ETERNAL.

His own proper kingdom is never to be surrendered or delivered up. He takes the subordinate relation to his Father on receiving his own throne; and the kingdom of God is resumed by the Father at the same time that his Christ takes possession of his own kingdom. Hence

1. At the sounding of the seventh trumpet, Rev. xi., 15, "great voices are heard in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become of our Lord and of his Anointed—his Christ; and he [the Christ] shall reign forever and ever." The kingdom or throne on earth, then possessed by the Anointed—the Christ—is eternal: no delivering it up; but at the same time the elders are heard saying, "We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty . . . . because thou hast taken [or assumed, as the original also signifies] to thee thy great power and hast reigned." God Almighty assumes again to himself the "all power in heaven and in earth" with which he invested Jesus when he set him at his right hand, and which Christ now delivers up to take his subordinate throne in the companionship of his people. Thus "the kingdom of God comes," or returns to himself in all its strength and glory, at the same time that the kingdom of Christ comes, and his undisturbed rule on his own throne, and over all nations.

2. The seventh chapter of Daniel is equally clear as to the reign of Christ on his own throne, with his associates, being endless. They shall "possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever;" verse 18. Again, verse 27, "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Here the same truth is reaffirmed of the endless reign of the saints—holy ones—of whom Christ is the head.

3. Once more, Heb. i., 9 affirms the same truth—"Unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever." This is a quotation from Psa. xlv., 6, 7—"Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever; the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre. Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." These texts must suffice in proof that it is not the proper throne of Christ, or his kingdom, that is to be delivered up; for that throne and kingdom is settled endlessly on Christ and his associates.

CHRIST'S THRONE SHARED WITH HIS FOLLOWERS.

What a thought is this! It is indeed overwhelming. What! worms of the dust, who have sinned against God, and who are deserving of death, be raised to the high honor of sitting with Christ upon his throne! Such an exaltation who shall dare aspire to! And who would dare believe it possible if he who is "the truth," as well as "the way and the life," had not promised it! If we can believe this, we surely need not stagger at anything God and his Christ have spoken! But is it so? Let us see.

1. Our text positively affirms it, or rather Christ, now on his Father's throne, and speaking with that authority with which he is there invested, promises "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne." If we had no other testimony, this must be sufficient to settle the question. But we are not left to this alone:

2. Daniel vii., 27 confirms the same truth, as we have already seen. But

3. Paul clearly asserts this, 2 Timothy ii., 10–12—"Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sake, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory. It is a faithful saying; for if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him: if we suffer we shall also reign with him."

4. Our Lord said to his disciples, Luke xii., 32, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

5. Again our Lord said to his followers, Luke xxii., 28–30, "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations, and I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." This language is clear and explicit, at least so far as his disciples are concerned.

6. Paul gives us his view of all the sons of God, viii., 14–17, "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are they sons of God: and if children then heirs: heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him that we may be also glorified together."

7. Finally, Jesus, when he sits "upon the throne of his glory," Mat. xxv., 31, says to his friends, verse 37, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom," etc. Surely, to inherit means something more than merely being subjects—it can signify nothing less than partnership in the throne and government of the kingdom. Let it be remembered that this honor is

"TO HIM THAT OVERCOMETH."

It is not, then, to the indolent, the thoughtless, the worldly-minded: it is not to those who wait to be dragged along. It is to him who marches to the conflict in the spirit of self-sacrifice such as characterized our Lord in his conflicts, and in which he overcame.

To help us to achieve this victory, and be overcomers, the first act of Christ, after his exaltation to his Father's throne, was to send the Holy Spirit on his followers, and to give it ever after to all "them that obey him." He told his followers, while here on earth, John xvi., 7—"I tell you the truth: It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart I will send him unto you." Not unmindful of his promise, after he was exalted he shed down the Holy Spirit according to his word: see Acts ii., 1–4, 32, 33—"This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we are witnesses. Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this which ye now see and hear." The gift of the Spirit is not confined to those who are of one class, but is the blessing promised to all who obey Christ; and it is a gift without which we never can "overcome." It would be easy to enlarge on this point, and to show that this promise is not restricted, but is a blessing to be expected and sought for by all who would sit down on Christ's throne, or who would ever achieve the victory which shall entitle them to that exaltation. Surely the encouragement to go forward in the struggle for victory is abundant, and the help offered ample. The certainty of a seat on Christ's throne, if we overcome, should be enough to arouse every soul, and to urge us on in the Christian course without fainting. To do so, however, we must have in exercise that faith which keeps the high honor before our minds, and which never lets us lose sight of the throne of Christ's glory presented for our consideration and our inheritance. Let all earth's allurements—the suggestions of the flesh, and the temptations of the wicked, disappear in our minds before the immortal prize which Jesus, our Lord, holds up to the eyes of our faith: thus "looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who" while on earth, "for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God," we shall be able always to triumph in Christ, through the word of truth and the power of the Holy Spirit; and "in due time we shall reap if we faint not."

OF EVIL—THE DEVIL.

OR, JUDGE HALSTED'S FIRST REPLY TO "D."

The spirit of evil—the de'evil—d'evil—devil—of evil.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD OF LIFE: Your orthodox correspondent "D.," a Methodist minister, will agree that the spirit of evil expresses what orthodoxy means by the devil; and that spirits of evil means the same as spirits of devils in the orthodoxs Rheims, and English versions of Rev. xvi., 14; and that spirits of devils, in Rev. xvi., 14, means the same as unclean spirits in Rev. xvi., 13.

We are to show, how the letters d e v i l, and the word devil are to be got. We are to show that devil means of evil. That by putting the Ital. de' before evil we have de'evil—of the evil, i. e., of evil, (for the Ital. definite article like the Greek article, before a noun in the abstract, is not to be rendered in English, as will be seen); and that by striking out the first e in de'evil we have d'evil; and by striking out the apostrophe we have devil. By a shorter process, as will be seen, we can begin with the Ital. d' before evil; and by striking out the apostrophe only, we have devil, of evil. And of evil (without the Heb. ruach, breath—Gr. pneuma, breath—Latin spiritus, breath—before of evil) means the same as the Rheims and E. V. spirit of evil; and in the plural of the words in the different languages, means the same as spirits of evil, and the same as the Rheims and E. V. spirits of devils in Rev. xvi., 14, there given as meaning the same as their words unclean spirits in Rev. xvi., 13.

We take up first, "D.'s" statement that de is not an Ital. preposition. And we begin by citing a few verses which, taken together, decline the Ital. article il—the. They will give us some instruction besides. 1 John v., 18; Gr., ... ho poneros (the nominative masculine) the evil i. e., evil (without our article) does not lay hold of, or fasten to, him; the Ital. is, il maliquo—the evil, i. e., evil: Rheims, the wicked one toucheth him not; E. V., that wicked one toucheth him not.

Mat. xii., 19; Gr., ... ho poneros; Ital., il maliquo; Rheims, the wicked one; E. V., the wicked (one).

Rev. xii., 10; Gr., ... hoti, that, or, for, kateblethe (first aorist passive of kataballo, defined, to strike down, conquer)—was conquered, that, or, the, kategoros—accuser—of the brethren of us, the accusing them before the God of us day and night; Lat. accusator—accuser; Ital. the accuser de' nostri fratelli—of the our brothers, i. e., of our brothers, is been (i. e., was) thrown down, the which them accused. Rheims, because the accuser of our brethren is cast forth, who accused them, etc; E. V., for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night. The Rheims is, before its cast forth, and E. V., is, before its cast down, are wrong: the Gr., and the Ital. have was. The brethren means, the saints—holy ones; and verse 11 says, Gr., And they enikesan—conquered him through the blood of the Lamb; Rheims and E. V., And they overcame, etc. Now the blood of the Lamb cleanseth from evil—sin. What, then, had the saints conquered? Was it not evil—sin? They who have become holy have conquered evil. Would orthodoxy's devil accuse the brethren before God? Of what would he accuse them? Would he accuse them of sin? It is plain that the accuser means evil—sin, (here again personified). The word kategoros—accuser in verse 10, means the same as diabolos—accuser, for which word, diabolos, the Rheims, and E. V., often wrongly give devil; and in Rev. xii., 12, we have an instance of such wrong rendering. In that verse, for the very same accuser in verse 10, the Gr., uses diabolos—accuser; but the Rheims, and the E. V., for the very same accuser, there give, the devil, i. e., de'evil—d'evil—devil of evil—accuser of evil. And in Rev. xii., 9, this same accuser is called, Gr., "that serpent the original, called diabolos and the satanas—accuser, and the satanas the Heb. stn of the Old Testament—adversary, which, or, the planon—leading astray, or, seducing, the whole habitable globe. Rheims, who seduceth the whole world; E.V., which deceiveth the whole world. In verse 12, the Gr. is, ... hoti that katebe (second aorist of katabaino, defined, to alight, descend; metaphorically, says Donnegan, to descend to; to condescend; to stoop to)—alighted, condescended, stooped to, you, that or, the diabolos—accuser—(the accuser in verse 10). Here the accuser, evil—sin—is represented as flying, and alighting; and that over, and alighting in every part of the habitable globe, i. e., wherever man is found; for where man is found, evil—sin—is. The Rheims in verse 12 is, because the devil is come down unto you; E. V., for the devil is come down unto you. Heb. iii., 13, Gr., ... that not sklerunthe—be hardened, or, made to be hard humor (equivalent to, of hard breath—spirit) any one of you by seduction, or, deceit, of the sin, i. e., of sin (another of the numerous personifications of sin—evil: and what is there that is not personified in the Scriptures? The Ital. is, by inganno, cheat, trick, del (for de il—of the) peccato—of the sin, i. e., of sin; Rheims, through the deceitfulness of sin; E. V., the same. Here we find, in so many words, that it is sin—evil—that seduceth—deceiveth. Is it anything else in the verses just given from Revelations, where the Rheims uses seduceth; and the E. V. deceiveth? The Rheims, and the E. V. word deceitfulness, in Heb. iii., 13, is not right. It may have been used by the Rheims, and followed by the E. V. (the Rheims was published more than 20 years before the E. V.) to avoid personifying sin, which the Gr. and the Ital. here do; for, to personify sin, and make sin seduce, cheat, trick, makes the orthodox devil.

I have said that sin—evil is represented as flying, etc. Among orthodoxy's women and children, this is no figure, but the literal truth. And though their devil gets movement from place to place by flying, yet he is present everywhere at the same time! Now we know that there is one thing that is in every spot where man is. Can orthodoxy guess what that is? It is evil, the breath—spirit—disposition of evil—proneness to evil—sin. We wonder if orthodoxy can understand that this is its devil?

Ps. xxi., 11 Gr., Hoti—For—they have bent towards thee evils; Ital., For they projected del (for de il) male—of the evil, i. e., of evil, against thee; Douay, For they have intended evils against thee; E. V., For they have intended evil against thee. The Ital. of evil is right: not all evil, or all evils, but evils, as the Gr. and the Douay have it; that is, evil (things). Ephes. iv., 27; Gr., Neither give topon, place, or, opportunity, to the diabolous—the accuser, i. e., sin—evil; another personification of sin, which accuses us to our conscience. Diabolos is the word used for the Hebrew stn—satan, as we shall see. And in Titus ii., 3, speaking of women, we have, "not diabolous" accusers; Lat., not criminatrices—accusers; Ital., not false accusers; Rheims and E. V., the same. Why did not the Rheims and E. V. make devils of the women in Titus ii., 3? The Ital., in Ephes. iv., 27, is al (for ail) diavolo—to the evil spirit; i. e., to the pneuma—breath; Lat., spiritus—breath—spirit of evil. For diavolo, Graglia's Ital. (and of course Romish) dictionary gives, devil, evil spirit; so that devil and evil spirit, each being equal diavolo, are equal to each other. The meaning is, either to the breath—spirit—of evil; i. e., to evil speaking, or, to the power, influence, or seduction, of evil—sin. The Rheims is, Give not place to the devil; E. V., Neither give place to the devil; i. e., we say to the of evil.

2 Thess. iii., 3. Gr., ... will preserve, guard, or defend, you from tou ponerou—the evil—i. e., from evil; Ital., will defend, or, guard, you dal (for da il) maligno—from the evil; i, e., from evil; (similar to Ephes. iv., 27, preserve you from giving opportunity to the accuser; i. e., to evil—sin.) The Rheims in 2 Thess. iii., is, will keep you from evil; E. V., shall keep you from evil. Why did not the Rheims and E. V. say here, keep you from the devil? The Greek is, from tou ponerou, and the Ital., dal maligno, and for these two Gr. and two Ital., words, though they often give from evil for them, yet now and then, as if to keep their hand in, they give the wicked one for the Gr. ponerou—Ital., maligno.

Rom. ii. 9. Gr. Affliction and perplexity, or, distress, upon, or, to, every psuche anthropou breath of man—(for, every person) doing the evil; i. e. doing evil; Ital., Tribulation and anguish ad—(the Ital., ad and a are prepositions expressing the dative)—to agni anima d'uomo—every anima of man that doeth il male—the evil; i. e., evil; (the nominative and accusative of il are the same); Rheims, Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that worketh evil; E. V. . . . that doeth evil,

Luke xi., 4; Gr. . . . . put preserve us from tou ponerou—the evil; i. e., from evil; Ital., liberate—free, release, us dal maligno—from the evil—i. e., from evil. The Rheims here is, lead us not into temptation; E. V., but deliver us from evil. The word deliver, taken from the Ital., is not the right word; it does not express the true sense; as by substituting the words the wicked one, which the Rheims, and the E. V., sometimes give for the Gr. tou ponerou—Ital. maligno, will be plain. It would then be, deliver us from the wicked one. The meaning of the verse is like that of 2 Thess. iii., 3, and Ephes. iv. 27, before given.

John xvii., 15, Gr., . . . but that thou guard, preserve, them from tou ponerou—the evil; i. e. from evil; Ital., dal (for da il) maligno—from the evil; i. e., from evil; E. V., shouldest keep them from the evil. Equivalent to 2 Thess. iii., 3 and Ephes. iv., 27, before given; and equivalent to, enable them to overcome evil, in 1 John ii., 13, given below, where the Rheims and the E. V. have, overcome the wicked one; i. e., orthodoxy's head devil. And an orthodox marginal note maker to the edition of the E. V. I use—Brown's Bible by the Pattersons—seemed to be afraid that the Rheims and E. V., would too often lose sight of orthodoxy's devil; for to the E. V. words the evil, in John xvii., 15, he gives in the margin, the evil one; making the E. V. verse read: I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil one. How is it that men of this age can be so wedded to a Romish theory as not to see that the words from tou ponerou in John xvii., 15; Ital., dal maligno, mean the same as in Luke xi., 4, and 2 Thess. iii. 3, before given, and in other places.

Ephes. vi. 16, Gr. . . . to stifle, or, extinguish, all the inflamed arrows tou ponerou—of the evil, i. e., of evil—sin (another personification of sin); Ital., all the darts on fire dal (for da il) maligno of the evil; i. e., of evil; Rheims, all the fiery darts of the wicked one; E. V., ... all the fiery darts of the wicked.

1 John i. 7; Gr., . . . purgeth or cleanseth us apo pases amertias (genitive singular) of every sin (the Gr. APO is OF as well as from); Ital., d'ogni peccato of every sin; Rheims, from all sin; E. V., from all sin.

1 John i. 9, Gr., If we confess the sins of us, upright he is and worthy, or, meriting, in order that aphe (from apto) he may bind, or lay hold of, for us the sins, and purge, or cleanse us of every injustice, or, iniquity; Ital., d'ogni iniquita—of every iniquity; Rheims, from all iniquity; E. V., from all unrighteousness. The verse simply shows that forgiveness of sin is through the merits of Christ.

1 John ii., 13, Gr., . . . ye have conquered ton poneron (accusative masculine)—the evil, i. e., evil; Ital., il maligno—(il is both the nominative and the accusative)—the evil; i. e., evil. The Rheims (the Romish) version here has, you have overcome the wicked one; and the E. V., here follows the Rheims—ye have overcome the wicked one (that is, orthodoxy's devil). Did not the English versionists feel the blush of shame in taking the wicked one from the Romish version? Conquer, overcome, orthodoxy's devil! What an awful fight this must have been! Conquer orthodoxy's devil, which it makes more powerful over our race than God himself, who must have made the crittur, supposing him to exist. The text means, simply, ye have overcome evil. And, if my memory serves me, we have, somewhere in the E. V., overcome evil with good.

Rom. xii., 9, Gr., . . . hating to' ponerou (accusative neuter) the evil; i. e., hating evil; Ital., abhor il male—the evil; i. e., evil; Rheims, hating that which is evil; E. V., abhor that which is evil. Why do the Rheims, and E. V., insert that which is? Why not, as they do in other places, omit the Gr., and Ital., article (evil here being used in the abstract sense), and say, hating evil—abhor evil? What is the true rendering of the Gr., and of the Ital.? In 1 John ii., 13, before given, for tou ponerou (accusative masculine) the Rheims and the E. V. give, the wicked one; i. e., orthodoxy's devil. In Rom. xii., 9, for to' ponerou (the accusative neuter of the same word, poneros), they give, that which is evil. Why so? Why not give the wicked one for the accusative neuter, as well as for the accusative masculine of the same word? Is it that they think orthodoxy's devil is masculine, and not neuter? How have they discovered his gender? And for this same Gr. word, poneros (for which the Ital. gives maligno), for which the Rheims and E. V. often give evil, they give the wicked one in Matt. xiii., 19, and 1 John v., 18, before cited, and in Ephes. vi., 16, before cited. For the genitive of the same word, the Rheims gives, of the wicked one; and the E. V. gives, of the wicked. And in John xvii., before cited, for the same word in the genitive, the Rheims gives evil and the E. V., the evil; the margin there gives, the evil one. Now the wicked one, and the evil one being orthodoxy's devil (we say, de'evil, d'evil—devil, of evil), we have in the Rheims and E. V. of preceding verses, evil and wicked one, for the same word poneros; Ital., maligno; and evil one in the margin of John xvii., 15. Perhaps the Rheims and the E. V. preferred the wicked one, and the margin, the evil one instead of devil (of evil) for the genitive of poneros, because evil and of evil sounds so much like devil, in view of the Ital. de', that they were afraid devil might be taken for of evil. And what would be more apt to suggest that devil means of evil than the margin to John xvii., 15, the evil one, i. e., the of evil, the (thing) of evil—sin. Why did not the Rheims and the E. V. and the marginal note maker insert the word thing instead of the word one?

[To be Continued.]

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We regret that we are compelled to divide Judge Halsted's article; and at the point where we do; but our printer tells us his italic type is all exhausted, so it has become a necessity to stop where we have till next week. Our readers must, therefore, preserve their papers till they get the whole, so as to read it all together. It will well pay them for their labor, if they really wish to understand the subject under consideration.

A DAY WITH METHODIST PREACHERS.

IN my "Eleven Days in Lake City" article is an omission which I wish now briefly to supply. On the evening of November 4th, by request of Rev. Mr. Gossard, I read to our congregation a notice of a meeting of the "Red Wing District Ministerial Association," to be held the following Wednesday in Lake City. By invitation of Br. G., I attended the meeting; was by him formally introduced to the Association, and, upon a motion which he offered, was also made an "honorary member" of the body. There were present, beside other Methodist preachers, the Presiding Elder of the District; Rev. Cyrus Brooks, D. D., pastor at Red Wing; and Rev. Jabez Brooks, D. D., President of Hamline University, located at Red Wing. After appropriate religious exercises, the sessions of the forenoon and afternoon (their evening preaching service I could not attend) were occupied with the reading and criticizing of essays and sermons. The presiding officer afforded me an opportunity, with the rest, to offer strictures upon the various productions that were read. I uniformly declined saying anything, except on the last piece. This was a short sketch, by the Presiding Elder on the text "Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish." When he announced the passage, I was at once curious to see what he would do with its penal term—"perish." He made no formal reference to it, but yet found occasion to speak of the unrepentant as condemned to "everlasting ruin and woe;" and this I saw was designed to explain how the wicked will "perish." When the essayist was through reading, the strictures followed. One of the points made against it, by Rev. Mr. Gossard, was that it did not explain the meaning of the term expressing the consequences of impenitence. He thought this point should not have been lost sight of by the writer of the essay. The last one called on for strictures was myself. Rising up, I responded by briefly making two points: 1. That I deemed Br. Gossard's criticism (mentioned above) not well taken, for the reason that the essayist had explained his understanding of the term "perish" in what he had said of "everlasting ruin and woe." I suggested that, from their standpoint, nothing more definite or orthodox could be needed. 2. I objected to the "woe" part of the essayist's statement of the doom of the wicked, on the ground that the penal term of his text denotes extinction of being. It was quite late in the afternoon, and I did not feel free to occupy time to justify my own view by argument. So I merely stated it and sat down. I knew that what I had said was sufficient to elicit some kind of reply from the essayist, and for this it was only that I mainly cared.

The Presiding Elder then rose to notice the several criticisms which his sermon sketch had called forth. In answer to that offered by myself, he said that he could not accept my view of what it is to perish. On the contrary, he preferred the sentiment of one of their hymnologists, as expressing the true penal theory. Here is the verse to which he referred:

What! to be banished from my Lord,
And yet forbid to die!
To linger in eternal pain,
And death forever fly!

If I came away from the Association wondering at the essayist's preference, perhaps it was because I had somewhere read—"If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die." But the reader will form his own estimate of the new definition. I shall not wonder if he concludes that Presiding Elders "are not always wise."

Had there been time for it, I would have been called on for an essay; and in anticipation of this I had prepared a brief piece entitled "A Methodist Interpretation with Two Resulting Inferences." It was, of course, an argument for life only in Christ, but as I had no chance to read it, I cannot guess how it would have been criticized by the assembled wisdom of our (?) Ministerial Association. I should hardly have felt that I could afford the time to be a Methodist so many hours, when other matters needed my attention, had it not been for the hope that I should have a chance to hear these ministers (including a brace of learned D. D.s) give off-hand opinions on an argument subversive of their eternal torment theory.

I was tempted to propose to them that I would bring our Williamson Hall congregation over to their evening preaching service, provided that they would permit me to occupy a portion of the time in presenting our life doctrine to the joint congregations. But I thought better of it on fuller reflection, and so went about my own work. And perhaps it was best that I did so, for own congregation was large, and there seemed to be no lack of matter with which to fill up the evening.

"THE GLAD TIDINGS."

A MONTHLY MAGAZINE, devoted to the subject of Christ's second coming, his literal reign upon earth, and the promotion of practical Christianity in its primitive purity.

This is the title of a live, stirring 32-page Monthly, which we propose to issue as soon as we obtain sufficient number of names to warrant its publication. It will be a faithful co-laborer of all who love Bible truth and Bible Christianity. Standing out boldly for the right, it will speak in no "uncertain tones" against the evils of the day, and present God's truth in its fulness and power, with Christian meekness and love.

The enemy of all righteousness is flooding the land with soul-destroying literature, and earth is becoming one vast scene of corruption, while but few faithful publications are spreading the truth of God to arrest it. There is always work for reformers; and there is always room for publications that come up faithfully to the conflict with the powers of darkness. Such shall be the character of "The Glad Tidings." By the help of God we will endeavor to make it such a publication as the "perilous times" of the world demand—that will be a bright and shining light to the pilgrim's pathway, and a lamp to guide sinners to the ark of safety.

We intend to issue it in a neat form, suitable for binding and for tract distribution, and, with the assistance of an able corps of writers, to make it of such value that no Christian family can well do without it.

As our sole object in its publication is to do good by spreading Bible truth, we shall furnish it as cheap as personal economy and labor can make it.

Now, friends and brethren, take hold of this matter in earnest, and help spread the "Gospel of the Kingdom." Send us your names and post office address. Get your neighbors and friends to subscribe for "The Glad Tidings" and let us have a thousand names to commence with. Sent free to the poor as far as possible. Show this to your acquaintances, get them to sign it, and forward their address to us immediately.

TERMS.

One copy per annum, to be paid for upon receipt of first number, . . . $1 00
One copy six months, ... 50

To any one sending five subscribers one copy gratis, or a commission of 20 per cent, on the issue of the first number.

The first number will be issued as soon as we receive a thousand names. Send us your names immediately that we may issue it as soon as possible.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 4, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

A GENEROUS OFFER.

I AM desirous that subscribers to the HERALD OF LIFE, of all others, should have such aid as the book entitled "THE THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE" affo ds in support of the system of truth so ably maintained in that invaluable weekly paper. I will therefore mail a copy of the second issue of the said book (containing the full index, appendix, and notices of the book), and will pay the postage, on receipt of a letter from any such subscriber enclosing $2, directed to me, 417 Broad street, Newark, New Jersey. O. S. HALSTED.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—In addition to the foregoing we have made arrangements with Judge HALSTED to furnish the work as follows: Any person who will send us $3 shall have the remaining numbers of this volume of the HERALD OF LIFE, and we will send them "THE THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE" free of postage. Thus they will get at least 36 numbers of the HERALD and the book for the retail price of that work, viz., $3. Will not every one avail themselves of this chance to get one of the most useful works ever published? To those who are now subscribers for the HERALD, Judge Halsted's offer is very generous, and we hope none will fail to embrace it, and write to him immediately for it; yet they can save fifty cents by sending a new subscriber to this office, as above directed. The book is one to study; and with its aid your Bible will be more perfectly understood and valued.

ERRATA.—In the 14th and 18th lines from the top, on the first page, 4th column, for maliquo read maligno in both places.

LOST NUMBERS.—We give notice once more if any of our subscribers have failed to receive their papers, since the commencement of this volume, if they will inform us soon, we will supply them with any No. except No. 8, of which we have run short. Of all numbers except one and eight we have at present an abundant supply, and we intend soon to send them off as tracts, if our subscribers do not call for them. Any new subscribers who wish all the numbers of this volume must state their wish explicitly, or we shall not send them.

AN EXPLANATION ASKED.

ST. ALBANS, VT., Nov. 25, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I know of no better way when I am at loss to explain passages of Scripture, than to go to those who know more than I do about these matters.

I would like to inquire when and where the marriage of the Lamb will take place? I cannot reconcile Matt. xxv., 10, and Luke xii., 36. The former seems to place the event after his coming; the latter before. Yours for the whole truth. W. H. H. MCALLISTER.

Our brother's difficulty is only a "seeming" one; for Luke's recorded language is a caution given by our Lord for his diciples to be always ready for his return, "like unto men that wait for their lord, when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately." The point of this text is, that Christians should at all times be "like" such servants, who are literally waiting for their master to return with his bride after the wedding.

In Math. our Lord speaks—in figurative language, of course—of the event of his final union with "his body, the church," under the idea of a wedding. The whole representation is in parabolical language. Both texts teach the importance of a constant preparation to meet our Lord at his return.

The event which is set forth under the idea of a marriage between Christ and his church, takes place after the "HARLOT" church, or, "that great city Babylon" is "thrown down, and shall be found no more at all;" Rev. xviii., 22; and "her smoke rose up forever and ever;" Rev. xix., 3. It is then that it is said, "Let us be glad and rejoice . . . . for the marriage of the Lamb is home, and his wife [his gunee—betrothed] hath made herself ready," etc. Rev. xix., 7. After this the Revelator is shown the true church, glorified, under the symbol of "that great city, the holy Jerusalem:" and he is explicitly told, that is "the bride, the Lamb's wife." See Rev. xxi., 9, 10. That city, or glorified church, now takes the place, on the earth, of "that great city Babylon," which had corrupted the earth with her abominations, and which had been so signally destroyed. Into the holy city—or, the glorified church—"there shall in no wise enter any thing that defileth, neither that worketh abominations, or maketh a lie," etc. Rev. xxi., 27. The marriage has then taken place; and none that are unholy can be numbered as of the bride. All who have neglected personal holiness are forever excluded from being of that "holy city." Let us watch, therefore, and see that we are "holiness to the Lord," and keep ourselves "like unto men that wait for their lord"—have our work done, so that we may be accepted of him in the day of his coming to glorify his "betrothed."

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

THE wicked see them, but seem at a total loss what to make of them. We may say of such persons what our Lord said of the wicked of his day: "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin: but now have they both seen and hated both me and my Father." The signs which cause such fearful "lookings for" something, are plainly foretold by our Lord Jesus as those things which were immediately to precede his second coming in "great power and glory" to judge, or rule this world.

The following is from the N. Y. Herald of yesterday:

SIGNS IN THE HEAVENS ABOVE, IN THE EARTH BENEATH, AND IN THE WATERS UNDER THE EARTH.

Recently the earth passed through a torrent, or what seemed a torrent, of fiery matter. Simultaneously with the appearance of this deluge of fire the floodgates of the great deep were opened up, and a local flood was experienced in many parts, particularly in the West Indies. At the same time strange grumbling noises were heard in the earth beneath, earthquakes abounded, volcanic eruptions became general, and the smouldering fires of Vesuvius burst forth anew with tremendous fury. Whether the earth is still on the trail of the late fiery visitor, and to a certain extent under its influence, or whether there was any connection between the signs in the heavens above, the signs in the earth beneath and the signs in the waters under the earth, we yet await some learned Loomis to inform us. It is at least undeniable that the earth and its inhabitants are yet under some strange and rather extraordinary influences. Politically, socially, materially, we are evidently, whatever the cause or causes, passing through a peculiar crisis. In the old world and in the new, men's minds are filled with strange thoughts, and what is to be the character of the immediate future is a problem to all. Vesuvius, according to our latest news, was still in flames. In the West Indies, a special telegram informs us, earthquakes are abundant and the watery deluge has not yet subsided. There are many inferences which might be legitimately drawn from this state of things.

LEAVING MINNESOTA.

MONDAY, Nov. 11.—Until within a few days past it was my purpose to include in my present tour a brief visit to St. Paul and Minneapolis. Though the river trip there and back would cost me nothing, and though I would be glad to see those noted places, and to take by the hand any Christian friends whom I might find there, I yet feel compelled to forego the pleasure in deference to other plans of more importance. Should duty ever call me this way again, I should expect to see what could be done to gain a hearing for the life views in the places I have named.

At a little past 9 o'clock, while I was busied with packing my luggage, Br. Willis notified me that a down-river steamer was in sight. With his and sister Willis's help I was ready in a few minutes; then came a hasty leave-taking of the families of brethren W. and Hudson, and of friends at Mr. Williamson's store; and in a few minutes more, accompanied by Brn. Hudson, Willis and Libby, I was at the steamboat wharf. At a little before 10 o'clock the last adieus had been exchanged, and my Lake City visit was ended. I feel thankful to the brethren for inviting me to visit them, and am glad that I came just when I did. When I was with our dear Br. Wolcott in tent labors I feared that I was putting off Lake City to an unseasonable period, and that I should almost certainly be overtaken by bad weather. But it has been quite the reverse, and it is now very gratifying to me that I did not tempt Br. Wolcott to let the tent go into Winter quarters earlier than it did. Our operations would now seem to have been quite incomplete had they ended short of Mariner's Harbor. (See elsewhere what Br. T. M. Sother writes me about their progress in that place.)

Every kindness has been shown me by the friends in Lake City, and I leave them feeling very grateful for these poorly-merited attentions. In making the personal acquaintance of Br. Aaron G. Hudson I have gratified a wish cherished for years; and I shall henceforth love the dear brother as I never have loved him before. The estimation in which his abilities are held by his fellow citizens is indicated by the fact that he was a member of the convention which drafted the constitution of Minnesota, and also a member of the first State Senate. He has never devoted himself exclusively to preaching; and the exacting demands of the large business which he supervises for Mr. Williamson have rendered it impracticable for him to give much attention to public labor on the Sabbath. He has plans, however, which look to a change for the better in all this. He sees how much laborers are needed in every direction, and he hopes to be in a position by and by to give his undivided attention to the work of proclaiming what he regards as the crowning truths of the Gospel. With intensest conviction does our brother believe the doctrine of life only in Christ. He grasps the subject, both in its principles and in the Scripture exegesis which it involves, with a clear and incisive intellect, and possesses withal a manifest aptness to make others see what he sees and as he sees. Gentle, uncompromising, thoroughly wide-awake, and as youthful as forty-five years will let him be, he is just one of those men that our Eastern brethren, if they knew him, would long to see out in the field battling with voice and pen against the tottering dogmas of immortal-soulism. May the Lord of the harvest guide in all this matter: I believe he will.

Over a year ago Br. Hudson held a series of Sunday afternoon discussions on the life theme, in Lake City, with a Congregational minister. He thoroughly routed his antagonist, and did much to help forward the truth to the acceptance of the people who heard the investigation. He is not at all likely to find another man very soon who will meet him on this subject.

In Br. John M. Willis the life truths have an earnest and efficient worker. In age he is with myself on the shady side of thirty-nine. As a life believer he is yet hardly two years old, but he has a matured conviction that natural immortality and endless torment are God-dishonoring errors; and he is fearless and constant in his endeavors to bring his fellow men to a Scriptural knowledge of man's nature and destiny. It is refreshing to witness his zeal in getting subscribers for the HERALD OF LIFE; several of the men engaged upon his new house have at his solicitation begun to take the paper. England is Br. W.'s native land, and in that country his venerable father still lives. Him he and sister W. visited many years ago, and he desires to visit him once more. When he goes we may be sure that he will carry the Life views along with him.

Br. H. H. Arnold is a farmer and lives near Lake City. He loves the Life truth ardently and rejoices to see the good cause prosper. His venerable and beloved father, not long since deceased, is reported to me as having been deeply versed in Scripture and an earnest believer of life only for the righteous. He sleeps in Jesus. Dr. John Kelly, living on the Lake shore above the town, is a white-haired brother of sixty-six years of age. He has been for many long years at war with orthodoxy, and stands firmly by the reform which our people are striving to promote. His present (second) wife is a Congregationalist, but he was led during the progress of our meetings to rejoice exceedingly in seeing her gradually yielding to the force of the Bible arguments for life in Jesus Christ. Her willingness to be led by the teachings of the inspired word, regardless of life-long convictions, justifies the hope that she will come fully into our view. May great grace crown the closing years of their lives. I will add here that Dr. K. has a copy of Judge Halsted's work and seems to have studied it thoroughly.

I ought not to close my references to Lake City without mentioning the longing desire which our brethren there have to see our venerable and beloved EDITOR, Brother Storrs. His name is a household word among them, and I only wish he could give them an opportunity to testify personally, by their warm hospitalities, to the deep affection they cherish for him. Br. Hudson hopes some day to take him by the hand in New York, but over and over again he requested me to "shake hands" with Br. Storrs for him. If Br. S. will undertake a tour to the West, next season, he will have it in his power to gladden many hearts; and I give him notice that, if his life is spared, he will be invited by and by to say yea or nay to a proposal in this direction. Don't say no, Br. S., till you first hear the argument on our side.

Now, turning my face southward, I will in brief complete the record of the day. My time on board the steamer was industriously occupied in writing letters. Yesterday (Sunday) morning the mail brought me ten letters; and this morning I received three—one of them being an invitation from Br. James E. Sebring (formerly of New York) for me to visit Ripon, Wisconsin; Br. S. promising to get me a church or hall to preach in, if I will come. I write him that arrangements already made render a compliance with his request impracticable. Still, I would like to go to Ripon.

Our steamer made La Crosse just in time to be too late for the Milwaukee train. So I took lodgings at the International Hotel and had a good night's rest.

Nov. 12.—Rose at 5 o'clock—wrote a letter home—walked to the railroad station (nearly a mile) and at 6 o'clock took the eastward train. The first station we stopped at was Salem; this reminded me of home. The next was Bangor, and this again carried my thoughts to dear New England. My destination to-day by rail is to Nashotah station—169 miles from La Crosse, 26 miles west of Milwaukee. Between 8 and 9 o'clock I borrowed of a fellow-passenger Dr. Holland's new work, "KATHRINA," a poem of 287 pages. I found it intensely interesting, and read it through. This done, I pencilled a postcript to the letter written in the morning, and then mailed it at Watertown Junction as we passed through that place. Nashotah was reached at a few minutes before 3 P. M., and I left the train to go in quest of Br. Parker Sawyer. A note of Br. Macdonald in the paper had led Br. Sawyer to think, that I would go from Lake City to New Albany, via St. Louis, and so miss of visiting Summit. Br. S. wrote me at Lake City, and I promptly assured him of my purpose to visit him on my way back to Milwaukee, and signified my willingness to preach two evenings wherever he might appoint. When I came to Lake City, I had not yet learned that Br. S.'s home was near the La Crosse R. R., but I intended to find out and act accordingly.

MARINER'S HARBOR, STATEN ISLAND.

ONE of the dear brethren on Staten Island who invited the "Life and Advent Mission tent" there, two months ago, was THOMAS M. SOTHER, Secretary of the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company. Years ago, Br. S., when connected with the Reformed Dutch church, greatly endeared himself to the people of Mariner's Harbor by his Sunday labors among them in publicly expounding the word of God (doing this by invitation of his pastor) and in building up the Sabbath-school cause. But in process of time Br. S. embraced the view of the unconsciousness of the dead and immortality only for the righteous, and in this way forfeited his prestige as an orthodox Christian. According to a relation of experience given by him in our tent, his first suspicion against inherent immortality was awakened by the reading of 1 Cor. xv., 18, "Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are PERISHED." His full rejection of the immortal soul theory was accomplished by a publication ("Pauline Theology," I think) placed in his hands by Br. Mersereau, of Mariner's Harbor. And his acceptance of the crowning truth of life only in Christ is due, under God, to the tent meetings held at that place.

The following communication from Br. Sother is extracted from a letter on business which I had the pleasure to receive from him when I arrived in Chicago last week. The project which he announces will gladden many hearts; I am sure it will make Br. Walcott rejoice. Br. Sother is an Englishman, and an excellent speaker; and I doubt not the efforts contemplated will have the divine blessing. R. W.

LETTER OF BROTHER SOTHER.

We are preparing at Mariner's Harbor to commence regular Sabbath morning services. To this end, I have instructed Br. Mersereau to negotiate with the proprietor of the hall, which is already fitted up as a chapel (and used every Sabbath afternoon by the Episcopalians—Dr. Huntington, etc., etc.) for a lease for a year. This he will do forthwith. I shall give them the benefit of my humble efforts from Sabbath to Sabbath—except when more efficient services can be obtained, which we shall look for frequently. I am anxious we should start, that we may have a location and a name, and more from the hope that we may be of service to many darkened minds in that region. Truly, the "light" to me has been "sweet," and my dear brethren there equally rejoice in their illumination; and together we long to diffuse like enjoyment. I do hope we shall have all things in order in our "BEREAN SOCIETY" by the time you reach New York.

I did myself the pleasure of a visit to Newark to thank personally our dear friend HALSTED for his valuable work. I had a most delightful interview with him, and have since been favored with a call at No. 9 Pine street. I cannot tell you how highly I venerate and esteem the excellent man, nor how much I thank you for numbering me among his friends.

My prayers and sympathies have followed you in your round of labor. I have no fear but that the good seed you scatter will spring up an hundred fold. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Be sure and give me an early call when in New York.

Ever affectionately and truly yours,

THOS. M. SOTHER.

THE LIFE CAUSE IN CINCINNATI.

[THE following warm-hearted letter from Bro. Franke awaited my arrival at Chicago, November 20th. I offer it for publication because I think that our brethren and sisters of "like precious faith" scattered abroad will enjoy its perusal as much as I have myself. In going to the "Queen City of the West" (as I expect to week after next), I shall think of it as one of the important scenes of our beloved EDITOR's labors soon after he became the exponent, in this land, of the doctrine expressed in the dear old Bible Examiner motto: "No immortality nor endless life except through Jesus Christ alone." If this is to appear in the paper, will Br. STORRS please append a note stating when he visited Cincinnati, how long he remained there, what topics he preached upon, etc., etc.? Did you proclaim your immortality views? And what about the SIX SERMONS—were they then in the field?

Br. Franke may be quite right in supposing that labor in his city ought to extend beyond two Sundays. I trust that when I get there I shall be found willing to follow the indications of Providence in regard to the length of time to be occupied in united efforts to spread light and awaken an interest in the theme of life only in Jesus Christ.

New Rutland, Ill., Nov. 25, 1867. R. W.]

Cincinnati, Nov. 13, 1867.

DEAREST BRO. WENDELL: Yours, dated Lake City, the 8th inst., has just reached me.

I can scarcely find words to express my joy upon noticing that it is in your programme to come to Cincinnati. It shall afford me the utmost pleasure to extend to you a brotherly welcome and the hospitalities of my home during whatever length of time you may deem it profitable to stay with us. I think two Sundays and the intervening week scarcely long enough to have you preach here. However, you can decide upon this yourself when you are here.

There is no one in this city, with whom I am acquainted, who holds to our views of life only in Christ. There are a few Advent brethren here who hold to the reliving of the wicked dead, and who lay particular stress upon certain passages of Scripture, such as "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life," and others of like import; which they construe to mean—if I understand them rightly—that believers are now actually, really in possession of eternal life, and are already now in the kingdom of God (in some way); and not that they have eternal life by promise, to be realized at the appearing of our adorable LIFE-GIVER. They are very strenuous advocates, too, of a weekly celebration of the Lord's Supper. I have been to their meetings several times, and have been asked to join them. Their views not being in harmony with mine, I have thought best not to do so, inasmuch as I wish to be untrammelled by any creeds. I have had enough of them. Nevertheless I consider and esteem them as dear brethren, and who, so far as I know, walk worthily in the Lord. I think a paper called the "Prophetic Times" is their mouthpiece. Of this I am not certain however.

Besides these brethren, there are a few here who were last year subscribers to the HERALD OF LIFE. I made it my business last Summer to hunt them up, and met with one—Bro. Wright—who promised to come to see me, and also to tell the other brethren of my whereabouts. He has not called, nor have any of the others. Among the orthodox ministers there is one who preaches the second advent. He is a Congregationalist. I distributed two Sundays ago to the people who go to hear him our tract "QUESTIONS ON IMMORTALITY. I have sent, too, to nearly all the ministers in this city, both orthodox and others, our Bible Examiner Tracts, and to a few the HERALD OF LIFE besides. If they will only read them, and acquaint themselves with what we regard as truth, you will have the advantage, when you come to discuss these subjects, to speak to some at least, who cannot claim to be ignorant of our views.

Now, dear brother, I shall await with great pleasure your further directions as to the plans you intend to adopt for prosecuting the good work in this city, as well as information as to the time you expect to be here.

May our dear Lord direct your steps, and may he crown your labors with great success, is the sincere desire and prayer of your brother, in hope of eternal life,

CLAMOR FRANKE.

PAPAL LAMENTATION.

THE world has recently again witnessed the promulgation of one of those singular emanations from the Vatican, the encyclical letter of the Pope. One of its points of singularity consists in the fact that it breathes far less of confidence and arrogance than former ones, though it might be far more deficient in the latter quality. In reading this strange document, or circular, we are struck with the strong contrast in the experience of the present occupant of the "chair of St. Peter," with the experiences of some of his more fortunate predecessors. At their frowns earthly potentates trembled. At their bidding, kings were either crowned or dethroned. They issued their decrees of excommunication, and rulers and mighty men came to appeal for pardon and reconciliation. When the Vatican's angry thunders rolled, principalities and powers were shaken until they tottered and fell. But poor Pius frowns, threatens, raves, yet nobody trembles or turns pale. He denounces, and denouncing exhausts the vocabulary of abusive epithets, but no frightened and humiliated emperor patiently waits for three days, shivering with cold, in an outer court of the castle, seeking the pardon of "his holiness." He launches forth his most fearful anathemas, but they are as unheeded as the sighing of November winds. With painful anxiety he watches the rapid waning of his power, and watching, groans in agony, for he is sorely tormented. The encyclical is addressed to "all the Primates, Patriarchs, Archbishobs, and Bishops of the Catholic world, being in grace and communion with the Holy Apostolic See." Listen to his futile ravings:

"Hence all the iniquities, all the evils, and all the injuries we behold with the utmost grief of our soul. Hence these numerous arrays of men, who walk in iniquity, serving under the banner of Satan; upon their forehead is written falsehood; and who, called by the name of rebels, and turning their mouths against Heaven, blaspheme God, sully and contemn every sacred thing, and, treading under foot all divine and human rights, only breathe carnage, like rapacious wolves. These are they who shed blood, lose their souls by most serious scandals, and seek most unjustly to profit by their own malice."

Thus it is he denounces that band of faithful patriots, worthily and nobly represented by those unconquerable terrors to tyranny, Mazzini and Garibaldi—men whose uncompromising devotion to the cause of Italian unity and independence, and stern, unyielding adherence to that inspiring motto, "Liberty, God, and humanity," have done so much, under God, toward securing the final destruction of the "mother of abominations." Garibaldi once issued a proclamation in which was the following language: "In recompense for the love you may show your country, I offer you hunger, thirst, cold, war, and death; who accepts these terms, let him follow me." If from such "rapacious wolves" the harlot power seeks not vainly to be preserved, it must be because they are incompetent to properly avenge long and vilely-outraged justice and truth. If these enemies to papal power and tyranny are serving under the "banner of satan," then is satan arrayed against himself, and will surely soon fall.

"These men, animated by an altogether diabolical spirit, desire to hoist the standard of falsehood even in our beneficent city, near the chair of St. Peter, the centre of truth and Catholic unity."

Unfortunately for the peace and welfare of Europe, papacy is not the only power that regards any tendency on the part of its people toward republicanism as "altogether diabolical." But what a pity that Italian unionists persist in ignoring their obligations to Roman beneficence. And, too, what a crying shame that they will insist upon raising that detestable "standard of falsehood," freedom, in that ancient and "beneficent city, the centre of truth" and "unity!"

"But we are further reduced to deplore other evils over which we cannot sufficiently groan. You are well aware—notably through our consistorial allocution of October 29th, last year, and subsequently by a printed summary, furnished with supporting documents—by what calamities the Catholic church and its children in the Empire of Russia, and the kingdom of Poland, have been miserably tortured and torn. It is with incredible sadness of soul we acquaint you that two decrees have recently been published by that government (Russia) since our last above-mentioned allocution. In the decree of May 22d, last, by a horrible audacity, the diocese of Podlachia, in the kingdom of Poland, has been entirely suppressed, with its college of canons, its consistory general, and its diocesan seminary; the bishop of the aforesaid diocese has been torn from his flock and forced instantly to quit his diocese."

This seems strange language to hear from that power which was so long accustomed to hold tyrannic sway, and was "drunken with the blood of the saints." The Revelator was shown a woman sitting "upon a scarlet-colored beast, full of all names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns." "Upon her forehead was written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS, and abominations of the earth." That the papacy is the harlot power here brought to view, the great majority of Bible students are agreed; and that France, under the Napoleonic dynasty, is the "beast that carrieth her," they have become well nigh equally agreed. It is a matter of simple history that Napoleon has for years past sustained the papal power; for the fact is notorious that except for French bayonets it must have long since ceased to be of political significance. In the explanation which John received respecting the vision of the beast that carried the woman, he was informed that the ten horns, which he saw upon the beast, "shall hate" the woman, and "shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire." Political occurrences in Southern Europe conspire to favor the view that the Italian States are the horns of the beast. In consequence of the very extended diffusion of the principles of republicanism among the twenty odd millions of people who inhabit the states, demanding and will be satisfied with nothing less than the unity of Italy with Rome as its capital; principles and measures violently opposed by the Pope, because their success would crush the comparatively small remnant of his temporal power, and of necessity seriously impair his ability to enforce his spiritual dominion; those states (the horns) hate the woman, and are putting forth efforts that will surely result in stripping her of her seat of power. Thus depriving her of her territory, and accomplishing the triumph of state over church, they may very properly be said to "make her desolate and naked," and "eat her flesh, and burn her with fire." We have said that with the destruction of the temporal power of the Pope, his, so-called, "spiritual power" necessarily falls. This fact he fully appreciates; for see how he agonizes and groans over the, to him, "horrible" exemplification of it in Poland and Russia. By reason of legal enactments, he has really little power over his communicants in Poland or in all the Russian dominion. No wonder, then, he sees in Central and Eastern Europe, as well as in Italy, evils over which he "cannot sufficiently groan." Ah, remember, feaster upon the blood of martyrs, that thou, in thy day, "receivedst thy good things, and likewise" they who strove to maintain points of "faith once delivered unto the saints," evil things; but now they, as many as accept the pure gospel of him whose servants thou hast killed are "comforted" with precious assurances of the Master's speedy return, and thou art "tormented." Well mayest thou grieve, "deplore," and "groan," for as the far reaching streams from the grand old source of outward light and warmth kindle the eastern horizon, and, constantly increasing in power and brilliance, pierce and chase away the darkness until the advent of the great luminary drives the last trace of night from a sleeping world, so those ghastly, loathsome forms of error and superstition, with which thou hast heaped Christendom, are being dispelled by the penetrating light of life and truth shed from and reaching ahead of him who shall consume thee "with the spirit of his mouth," and shall utterly destroy thee "with the brightness of his coming." When his glorious advent shall occur, all those vile, damning doctrines, conceived in corrupted carnality, which thou hast fostered, and under which the religious world is writhing, shall share thy fate.

But hear further.

"We desire that there be ordained in your dioceses a triduum of prayers within six months, dating from this day, and within a year, in countries beyond the seas. In order to arouse the zeal of the faithful to assist in these public devotions and to pray God themselves, we mercifully grant in the Lord plenary indulgence and the remission of their sins to all and each of the faithful of either sex who, having confessed and communicated, shall assist devoutly in the prayers during these three days, and who shall pray to God, in accordance with our desire, for the present needs of the church.

"To the faithful who, contrite at least in heart, shall have done the works prescribed upon one or other of the aforesaid days, we grant, following the habitual forms of the church, an indulgence of seven years and seven forty-day periods for the penitences of any sort they may have incurred. All these indulgences, remissions of sins and penitence, we grant in the Lord to the souls of the faithful in Christ who, united with God in charity, have departed this life, application being made to them thereof through representatives, and this notwithstanding any opposition to the contrary."

These are the blasphemous utterances of that poor, weak, miserable old man, who stands at the head of that church upon which now culminates the fierce vengeance of a just and long falsified God. Fit words are they to emanate from such a source, and fit representative is he of the accursed system that reared him. The gathering clouds that now darken the political sky of Europe portend the near approach of that angry storm which will sweep both beast and rider into perdition, from whence the beast came. In the meantime, let all who look for and love the appearance of the Son of God hold up their heads and rejoice, for events indicate that our "redemption draweth nigh."

FROM SAMUEL BROWN.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., NOV. 24, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I write to let you know that Br. Rufus Wendell has been with us, and that last Sabbath evening he sounded the trumpet of No life out of Christ; and, if there be no resurrection, then they that are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. I had the good fortune to get him a hearing in one of the largest Protestant churches in the city, the Spring Street Congregational Church, the Rev. Wm. De Loss Love, the Pastor: and although he considers our views on the destruction question an error, yet he treated Br. W. with all the respect and consideration that he would if he had not differed with him in his theology. Mr. Love preached in the morning and Br. Wendell in the evening. He invited Br. W. into the pulpit with him in the morning, asked him to read a chapter and a hymn, and also to pray, which did not a little toward drawing a congregation for the evening; for no one can hear that dear brother read the Holy Scriptures and pray but will have his heart drawn toward him, if he has any of the spirit of Christ; even those that have not, can but admire him for his kindness and gentlemanly bearing toward all, and his desire that they may accept of salvation in Jesus Christ, and thus receive eternal life.

I shall never forget the pleasant interviews I had with him; and especially those rich feasts in bowing with him around the family altar. I could not help thinking of Jonathan's love for David. I felt a little of it in my own breast Br. W. had a large congregation in the evening; nearly twice as large as we commonly have; and he held them for nearly two hours; and a more attentive congregation I never witnessed; you could have heard a pin fall, it was so still, when for a moment he would stop speaking. I trust good was done; we begin to see the effects of it. The subject has been opened publicly and questions are being asked. We have a Bible class on the Sabbath and Br. Love is the leader. We had a large room full to-day, and not more than two or three questions were asked before one of the brethren that wanted light turned the subject into life, through Christ, and the rest of the hour was spent in discussing that and the destruction of the wicked; all very pleasantly, with a Christian spirit by all. The question is now an open one, and all seem to feel that they have a right to ask questions, and they are not satisfied without a Bible or Scriptural answer. Bless the Lord for that. Ministers have got to meet it, and the people will have an answer, and they want something beside tradition or human reasoning, and will have it; they will not be put off. I was passing the door of one of our wealthy dry goods merchants, the other day, he called me in, and entered into conversation on this subject; regretted that he did not hear Br. Wendell. He said he had never been satisfied with the doctrine of endless torment for the wicked, as preached by those that call themselves orthodox; he said he could not reconcile it with the love of God. He has been a member of the church for years, and a prominent one, too. I gave him BIBLE VS. TRADITION, and said to him, when he had read that I would give him more. The ball has started to roll. Let the truth spread, and God be glorified is my prayer.

FROM DANIEL L. OSBORN.

FINDLEY'S LAKE, N. Y., NOV. 25, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I am at home again, after an absence of six months, travelling many hundred miles by railroad, and quite a number on foot, with that beloved and interesting friend and brother J. Lewis, the one-armed preacher, whom I knew before only through the good HERALD OF LIFE, and whom I now know better by our almost constant companionship for something over two months in the service of the blessed Jesus. He has endeared himself to me in a manner which tongue can hardly express, by care and watchfulness, in looking for my comfort and health, as a stranger among strangers, and far from home; and the union which always existed between us was remarkable, and I must say that I never was in company with a brother so long before, with such perfect harmony, in my life. This made everything pleasant and very agreeable. And we had generally very interesting seasons trying to hold forth the word to our fellows; and I think it might be said of us, in some measure, "See how these brethren love one another." This travel will long be remembered by me, and perhaps I will prepare some time a brief account of my journey for the HERALD. After I left Illinois I had some very interesting meetings in Clarendon, Michigan, in a new place. I preached five times, and they wanted I should continue.

TO MRS. N——, GROVELAND, MASS.

A LETTER BY A. BOYNTON.

"FEED my lambs," said Christ to Peter. The good shepherd cares for his flock, and is anxious that they be nourished and strengthened, inasmuch as they are among wolves in sheep's clothing. As they are to be harmless and blameless, how important that the good minister of Jesus Christ feed them. Especially the little ones—the lambs of the fold, that they receive strength, being nourished up and fortified against all the wiles of wickedness and temptations of a carnal heart. Now, in running the Christian race we are to learn to hear and mind the Shepherd's voice. "My sheep hear my voice, and they follow me." He speaks to us by the Spirit, through the word. Obeying this word is following him. Here then is our life-work. As we receive Christ by a renunciation of ourselves, and in childlike simplicity, so are we ever to retain him; never to suppose for a moment that the faith of to-day will suffice us for to-morrow. No, the just, or they who are seeking justification are to seek it by faith, walk by faith, live by faith. A steady habitual confiding in God, by believing and resting on the truths of his word is as necessary as our own constant breathing to sustain life.

The growth which I feel anxious for you to attain, is not of that sudden mushroom nature, rapid, yet weak, but a growth which will make you strong in the Lord and in the power of his might—a growth which will enable you to stand in the evil day—to stand fast in the liberty of the gospel. This growth is only attained by the knowledge of the truth. God's ways cannot be improved upon. The beaten track which prophets and apostles walked, is ours to-day. Fearfu' as many are of doctrines, and much as they may say of practical religions, dear souls, they only can practice what they know. Then the more we know of God, his character and government, the better we can love and serve him. "Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of the truth." These go together; and I very much question whether a growth in grace can be made without a corresponding one in knowledge. Perhaps one might retain a measure of grace and have a dwarfish kind of Christianity, but to become a vigorous member in the body, a shining light, we must not put asunder what God hath joined together. Learn, then, to consider religious things and a Christian life not as a spasmodic action, or thing, but a sober reality; God's word as reliable as a bank; Jesus' love as truthful, rational, constant, as our best friend's. Having taking him as our all, ever commit all to him, and expect all from him: expect it not so much transportingly as in a sober, confidential manner; expect it because the holy utterances of the record assure thee of it.

But as we cannot have faith while sinning, see well to this, that our wills are yielded up to his; that we do those things bidden us of God; not waiting for a great amount of feeling on the subject, but following an enlightened judgment, made thus by the plain word of the Lord. For this purpose it will be necessary that we study, meditate, think much on this word; for this is what sanctifies us; purifying our hearts—a loving belief of the truth. "Think on these things; give thyself wholly to them;" then shall we become strong in God and in power of his might.

As the possession of the Holy Spirit is the only pledge of eternal life, and as this Spirit is our strength, for "without me ye can do nothing," be careful of the retention of this by obedience. This is not in doing some great thing, but in maintaining that humbleness of mind which does the things (even little things) just when and how God would have us; doing not for ourselves, but for, and to the Lord. Here is another important item in our Christian faith; and one too often lost sight of, or at least seen but dimly by many, viz., in all our labor—yes, in all our works and ways, ever seek to abase and lose sight of self, and seek to honor God by blessing or doing good to others. This characterized Christ's mission, and should ours. Blessings should not be sought for their sake merely, but only as a means by, or through which to bless the more. Maintaining this position we shall never fail of peace and joy; for gladness of heart is the result of singleness of heart, or purpose.

Another thing, the appreciation, or love for truth. This is proportionate to our knowledge and obedience of it. The more constant, then, we study and obey, the more lovely it will appear, and the stronger will its influence be over us. O, how do God's truths all blend most beautifully; all tending to his praise and man's exaltation. Again I say, be hearty, make these things realities; for although they are such they become less so to us as our actions fail to correspond with them. It is good works, not words only, which bless the world.

With these brief hints, the result of over thirty years' experience in the school of Christ, I leave you with this charge. However, accept them not as from me, but try them, as well as all other by the word of the Lord; that is the perfect rule of faith and action: in which may you grow in knowledge, and abound in all goodness and grace, that you may become meet to be a partaker with the saints in light, even in that glory which awaiteth them at his coming and kingdom.

West Batavia, N. Y.

FROM WM. R. WARNER.

CAMBRIDGEPORT, MASS., Dec. 2, 1867.

DEAR HERALD: Yesterday Br. Cooper and myself listened to a sermon, on the annihilation of the wicked, by the oldest Baptist minister in Cambridge, Rev. Wm. Howe; and truly, if this is a fair sample of the argument brought against our belief, the doctrine of endless misery is ready to give up the ghost. Such a sermon nerves me to action. My friends, we have only to present our views to have them received.

He told us, the immortality of man was assumed all through the Bible, and had always been believed from the earliest time, and if it came from God it must be true. It is singular he did not remember that it came from that old liar the "serpent," six thousand years ago, when he said to man, "Ye shall not surely die." He did not prove that man was different from an animal in any particular. He did not speak once of death being the penalty for sin. I took the liberty to send him some tracts: one "The Animal Man and the Spiritual Man" and asked him to answer them, as he says he is going to preach another sermon and will prove that all the terms used by annihilationists to prove destruction mean something else. We hope Br. Storrs, Wendell, or some other laborer will make it in their way, before long, to come to Cambridge and preach life through Jesus Christ alone.

Yours as ever.

AARON KIMBALL, late of Brooklyn, N. Y., now living at Natick, Mass., writes: I have been very sick with bilious fever, but am now much better. Thank the Lord that he spared me, so that now I can read one of your sermons in the HERALD OF LIFE if I can't hear you at Sawyer's Hall, Brooklyn. The HERALD comes laden with precious truth, and the true light shines more and more in every paper. Praise the Lord forever—"No life future only through CHRIST." I send you one new subscriber. Your brother in Christ, waiting for the kingdom.

AMANDA RIDER, Scotland, Conn., writes: I want to send some money to aid the Tract Fund. I see by the HERALD, tracts are often called for to aid in spreading the glorious gospel of the Son of God, who plainly taught the Sadducees that those who were thought "worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead . . . . cannot die any more;" but some men say, "the wicked will come up to die again." Why do the people not understand? Because they "will not come unto me that they might have life," said our blessed LIFE-GIVER. Yours, in the hope of eternal life at the appearing of "Christ, our life." I send $2 for the Tract Fund.

LORY JENCKS, Dansville, N. Y., sends $3 for the paper and writes: 'I wish the HERALD OF LIFE, had a more extensive circulation; for it advocates a blessed truth that no other paper, to my knowledge, does; and that is, the non-resurrection of the wicked dead; or, "No life out of Christ." O, how lovely, how reasonable, how justifiable this doctrine makes the character of God, who delighteth not in the death of a sinner, and represents himself in his word, to be more merciful to men than parents are to their children. But for him to make alive the wicked dead, thus making a new creation of them for the purpose of killing them again, makes his character anything but lovely, reasonable, or justifiable. Such inconsistency is not to be charged upon God who "is love." Let truth take the place of error, even though error may be time honored.

H. H. ARNOLD, Lake City, Minn., I do rejoice and feel thankful for the weekly visits of our dear HERALD OF LIFE; and our prayer is, that our Editor may have life, health, and a sound mind continued until the appearing of our blessed LIFE-GIVER. We truly have had a feast of fat things, and been greatly strengthened as well as edified through the preaching of the word of life by our beloved Br. Wendell, whom I loved before seeing him, and still more after seeing him face to face. I think if he could only be sustained in the field as an evangelist he would do much good in the cause of truth.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We think so too, and have long seen that is Br. W.'s calling; not to locate himself in any one place, but travel continually, especially into new and important fields. We hope he will become fully satisfied on his present tour that such is God's will concerning him. Let him make up his mind to that one work, and we have no fears but he can be "sustained." May he thus give himself to the Lord.

A SISTER sends 50 cents to the tract fund, and writes: I see that the contributions are small. O that God's goodness might so fill the hearts of Life believers that they may come up to the help of the cause as they did for the paper. The Lord would so bless them that I know he would not let them want for any good thing, for he does not let me want, although I am a widow and have to support myself by my needle and do not have near the work I had formerly: yet I am happy all the day and my heart goes up to our Father in heaven for his blessing on this cause, that the means may be forthcoming, that the people may have his blessed word sent in those welcome messengers that shall make their hearts rejoice in the Lord's truth. I know the tracts will do the people good, if they do his will, and the light is kept before their minds. May the Lord pour out such a blessing on the people that they cannot contain it, but have their hearts enlarged so as to run over with the love of God, by his Spirit. How I have been praying that the Lord would send me better work so that I could do more for this blessed cause; my heart is so filled with love that I want all the people to be blessed as I am. I wish I could send something every week; but all I can do is too small to name, but will do all I can, for it is uppermost in my mind all the time.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—This sister says, "Please do not put my name in the paper." Well, we will not: but we remember, One watched those who put into the treasury, anciently, and saw "a poor widow cast in two mites," and he said she put in more than all they who had cast in of their abundance. May the same gracious One cheer thy heart, beloved sister; and may many others be stimulated by your example, and so our "Tract Fund of $500" soon be completed, and the work go forward.

REFUSING TO BE BENEVOLENT.—A female, the head of a family in comfortable circumstances, her husband doing well in business, and all of them attending an evangelical ministry, was waited upon for a subscription for a missionary association. Before the subject of the call was named, she occupied the friend with detailing how good God had been to them, in giving them health, prosperity, and other mercies. After some time spent in conversation in this strain, the friend named her errand, suggesting that so much kindness had been experienced, a trifle might be devoted as an acknowledgment to him from whom all came. At once the countenance fell, and the tone changed. She began an enumeration of the calls made upon them; she dwelt upon the number and the wants of her family; she could spare nothing for such a purpose. Within a day or two afterward, she was herself seized with an alarming illness. Where not a few pence could be found for the service of God in the Gospel, pounds, not a few, had to be paid for the attendance of physicians. Troubles of various kinds thickened round the family. The husband became unfortunate, as we say; no business prospered with him; and at length he found himself in jail; and ere long, they who once had plenty, found it hard to live.

I do not positively pronounce that the refusal of the subscription was the cause of their calamities; but it was at least singular, that, up to that time according to their own showing, all went well with them, and by my own knowledge, from that time all went ill with them.—Pittsburgh Ch. Advocate.

THE CLEANSING BLOOD.

A VISITOR among the poor was one day climbing the broken staircase which led to a garret in one of the worst parts of London, when his attention was arrested by a man of peculiarly ferocious and repulsive countenance, who stood upon the landing-place, leaning with folded arms against the wall. There was something about the man's appearance which made the visitor shudder, and his first impulse was to go back. He made an effort, however, to get into conversation with him, and told him that he came there with the desire to do him good and see him happy, and that the book he held in his hand contained the secret of all happiness. The ruffian shook him off as if he had been a viper, and bade him begone with his nonsense, or he would kick him down stairs. While the visitor was endeavoring with gentleness and patience to argue the point with him, he was startled by hearing a feeble voice, which appeared to come from behind one of the broken doors that opened upon the landing, saying: "Does your book tell of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?" For the moment the visitor was too absorbed in the case of the hardened sinner before him to answer the inquiry, and it was repeated in urgent and thrilling tones: "Tell me, oh! tell me, does your book tell of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?"

The visitor pushed open the door, and entered the room. It was a wretched place, wholly destitute of furniture except a three-legged stool, and a bundle of straw in a corner, upon which were stretched the wasted limbs of an aged woman. When the visitor entered, she raised herself upon one elbow, fixed her eyes eagerly upon him, and repeated her former question: "Does your book tell of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?" He sat down upon the stool beside her, and inquired: "My poor friend, what do you want to know of the blood that cleanseth from all sin?" There was something fearful in the energy of her voice and manner as she replied: "What do I want to know of it! Man, I am dying; I am going to stand naked before God. I have been a wicked woman, a very wicked woman, all my life. I shall have to answer for everything I have done;" and she groaned bitterly as the thought of a lifetime's iniquity seemed to cross her soul. "But once," she continued, "once, years ago, I came by the door of a church, and I went in, I don't know what for; I was soon out again; but one word I heard there I can never forget. It was something about blood which cleanseth from all sin. Oh! if I could hear of it now! Tell me, tell me, if there is anything about that blood in your book!" The visitor answered by opening his Bible and reading the 1st chapter of the First Epistle of St. John. The poor creature seemed to devour the words, and when he paused she exclaimed: "Read more, read more." He read the 2d chapter—a slight noise made him look round; the savage ruffian had followed him into his mother's room; and, though his face was partly turned away, the visitor could perceive tears rolling down his cheeks. The visitor read the 3d, 4th, and 5th chapters before he could get his poor listener to consent that he should stop, and then she would not let him go till he promised to come again the next day. He never from that time missed a day reading to her until she died six weeks afterward; and very blessed was it to see how, almost from the first, she seemed to find peace by believing in Jesus. Every day the son followed the visitor into his mother's room, and listened in silence, but not in indifference. On the day of her funeral, he beckoned him to one side, as they were filling up the grave, and said: "Sir, I have been thinking that there is nothing I should so much like as to spend the rest of my life in telling others of the blood which cleanseth from all sin."

Thus the great truth of free pardon through the blood of Christ breaks the heart of stone, which nothing else could touch, and turns the abandoned persecutor into the zealous teacher of Christianity.—Selected.

MORTALITY.

I see, like Autumn leaves, I'm fading,
Ere life's Summer work is done—
Sinking 'neath life's ponderous burden—
Fainting 'neath life's burning sun.
As wearily I press life's journey,
Drooping, like a plant at noon,
All tell me plainly I am mortal,
Swiftly tending to the tomb.

O for rest a little season
'Neath some cool, refreshing shade,
Where, free from sight and sound discordant,
There's rest for weary heart and head!
But O! such rest earth scarcely gives us,
Till we rest among the dead;
Only there is quiet resting
For eyes, and ears, and heart, and head.

Then, O my Saviour, give me courage!
Let me still abide in thee!
I would wear thy yoke so easy,
While by faith my rest I see.
Th n welcome toil, and care, and danger!
Only thou my portion be;
Yes, welcome toil, and care, and danger,
While I meekly learn of thee!

Then O! the life of bliss and glory
Which Jesus gives, beyond the tomb,
Is life of love, light, peace, and joy,
Where sin and death can never come!—
Is life without i s griefs and burdens,
Where no flower droops at noon;
It's life eternal; glory! glory!
Life without a cloud of gloom!

"PLAYING DOCTOR."

WE ask the pardon of the "medicals" for relating the following suggestive anecdote, at the same time we invite fathers and mothers to "make a note of it:"

"Harry was the son of a physician, and often amused himself by playing doctor, compounding his powders and pills out of the sand and gravel of the garden. One day, while thus engaged, a large toad hopped near him, and seating itself leisurely upon its haunches, proceeded to open and shut its mouth, as if inviting the doctor's attention. It was catching flies.

"'Good morning, Mr. Toad,' said Harry, delighted at the idea of having a live patient. 'Come to be doctored? Got de dropsy, p'raps.'

"Mr. Toad winked and gulped, as much as to say: 'Yes, sir, very bad.'

"'Yes, yes, I underst: n l your case, 'zactly. You jes please to wait a minute, and I'll cure you, double quick.'

"Now it happened that Harry had seen his father prepare some compound rhubarb pills that morning, and it occurred to him that here was a favorable opportunity to test their efficacy. In less time than it takes to write it, the aspiring young doctor secured one of the pills and dropped it into the open mouth of the confiding patient.

"'Guess I've fixed you now,' soliloquized the doctor. 'When I cures, I cures, and when I don't cures, I kills.'

"Mr. Toad gulped and swallowed, and began to bloat and bloat, until Harry thought he must be the very frog alluded to in his 'Reader,' that tried to outdo the ox. A moment more, and the poor patient turned a livid purple, gave one last gasp and expired. His fly-catching days were ended! His doctor had killed him!

"Harry buried his dead patient with a grave face, and sat down to meditate upon the virtue of compound rhubarb pills. Whatever was his condition afterward, he could with difficulty be persuaded to take his father's medicines, always objecting upon the plea, 'They killed the toad.'"—Watchman and Reflector.

TOUCHING LETTER FROM A REBEL SOLDIER.

A "COMFORT-BAG," sent, with other articles, to the Christian Commission from a town in Massachusetts, contained a letter from the little girl who made it. The following reply was received:

"GETTYSBURG, August 7, 1863.

"MY DEAR LITTLE FRIEND: I received your present, the comfort-bag, and it is thrice welcome, although it was intended for Union defenders. It was given to me by a Christian woman, who lost her holy anger for Rebels (for such am I) in her bounteous sympathy for the unfortunate. My little friend can imagine my thankfulness for the favor, when I inform her that I have no friends this side of heaven—all gone—father, mother, sister and brother—and I am all alone.

"The dear comfort-bag I shall always keep as a memento of true sympathy from a generous heart in the loyal State of Massachusetts. I hope you will not be disappointed by this, coming as it does from a Rebel; for I was forced into the ranks at the point of the bayonet, for I would not go willingly to fight against the dear old flag, whose ample folds have always shielded the orphan and made glad the oppressed.

"I have read your note a thousand times over, and wished it could rightfully have been mine.

"'Do they think of me at home?'

"Silence, all is silence.

"Not so with the Union soldier—a thousand tokens tell him, yes.

"I was wounded in the second day's fight, and am now packing up my all to be exchanged or sent back a cripple for life. I am seventeen years old, and now I am turned out with one arm to carve my way through the world; but my trust is in my heavenly Father, who will forgive and bless.

"Hoping that God may in mercy reunite us all again as brothers and sisters, is the prayer of your unworthy friend, E— A—,

FUNERAL OF A BEE.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Glasgow Herald transmits the following: "On Sunday morning last I had the pleasure of witnessing a most interesting ceremony, which I desire to record for the benefit of your readers. While walking near Falkirk, we observed two bees issuing from one of the hives, bearing with them the defunct body of a comrade, with which they flew for a distance of twelve yards. We followed them closely, and noted the care with which they selected a convenient hole at the side of the gravel walk—the tenderness with which they committed the body, head downward, to the earth—and the solicitude with which they afterward pushed against it two little stones, doubtless 'in memoriam.' Their task being ended, they paused for a moment, perhaps to drop over the grave of their friend a sympathizing tear, and then they flew away to their hive."

FRIENDLY INTERCHANGES OF VIEWS.

ALLUSION has been made in my Lake City daily notes to interviews which it was my privilege to have with Rev. T. M. Gossard, the Methodist pastor of that place. In the former of these, after Br. Willis had called his attention to sundry Scriptural proofs of our main position on the nature and destiny of man, I ventured to asked Br. Gossard what, in his opinion, would have become of the human race if Jesus Christ had not risen from the dead; citing him at the same time to what the apostle Paul says on the subject in 1 Cor. xv., 18, and stating that John Wesley (as also other expositors before and since) interprets the term "perished" in that passage to mean—"HAVE LOST THEIR LIFE AND BEING TOGETHER." I told him that this is the sense in which I understand the word. My friend promptly dissented from the interpretation given from Wesley, and explained the text in question to mean that, if Jesus had not risen, the departed were in a wretched condition as to their immortal souls. (These were not his words, but they express his idea in substance.) To this it was objected—as we should never fail to object—that the perishing of our passage cannot relate to a living immortal entity, for the reason that Paul applies the term to personalities that have "fallen asleep." The force of this objection Br. Gossard sought to turn aside by claiming that many declarations of the New Testament must, in respect to the question whether they refer to the human or to the divine nature of Christ, be interpreted according to circumstances; and he would have a like principle apply to man's body and soul. In reply, it was insisted that this would not help the case in hand. The New Testament use of the term sleep, in relation to the departed, settles it beyond all controversy, that the word belongs to that which actually dies and needs a resurrection—not to that which is deathless, and which, for that reason, cannot be raised from the dead. This position was fortified by a direct citation of text after text. Now behold the result! Br. Gossard—in defiance of the ground he had taken and sought to defend by argument, and without any formal admission of its untenableness—said that the apostle, in 1 Cor. xv., 18, intends "simply" to teach that, Christ being unrisen, the body of man will remain in death forever. When asked what, if Jesus had not risen from the dead, will become of man's immortal soul, Br. G. could only say that Paul does not in this chapter tell us anything about that. What a ground this for a cultured Christian minister to assume! How could our apostle's reasoning be more effectually turned into the flattest nonsense then it is by this second interpretation of our brother? Redemption, or the atonement, supposed to be a failure, and the astonishing announcement made that the house the man lived in had gone into hopeless decay, while the fate of the man himself is not so much as hinted at! What would Br. G. think, for example, if, in the accounts of the recent tornado at St. Thomas, the public journals of the day should "simply" record the destruction of steamers, vessels, docks, coal yards, dwellings and factories, and wholly fail to chronicle the loss of hundreds of precious human lives? Would he not indignantly denounce the omission as the wickedest trifling? And yet he offers a view of the Holy Spirit's utterances which presents an analogous folly, magnified to infinitude. How much better to let the inspired Word predicate extinction of being of the supposition that the life of Jesus ended forever in his grave.

My further discussion with Br. Gossard disclosed a harmony of view between himself and my friend Dr. Hawley, of Fort Plain, N. Y., which surprised me. He affirmed that Christ is the "first-fruits of the wicked as well as of the righteous dead, and that this is taught in 1 Cor. xv., 20; also that the wicked are as much included as the righteous are in the description which Paul gives of the raised, in verses 42–44, 49, 51–55! While I was drawing him out on these matters (we were out doors with a crowd around us), a Universalist acquaintance of Br. G.'s, with smiles on his face, patted him approvingly on the shoulder, seeing as he did that the whole ground claimed by Universalism was virtually conceded by Br. G. I did not fail to assure the latter of my appreciation of the necessity he was under of either admitting our view, or taking a position which logically involves the eternal well being of the race. He, however, wanted me to admit that he was consistent with his belief that the wicked are to be raised from the dead and live forever. To which it is sufficient to answer, that such consistency costs vastly more than it is worth. We may freely grant, that if the wicked are to rise from the dead, the question, "With what body do they come?" is both reasonable and pertinent; and we should expect an answer to it in the writings of one who treats so fully as Paul does upon the subject of a future life. But, since he omits to bestow a word upon that subject, it is far more consistent to deny altogether the revival of the impenitent, than to make them equal partners in all that is affirmed respecting the resurrection condition of those who, having sown to the Spirit, have the promise of God that they shall reap life everlasting. Endless exegetical bewilderment must accrue to those who attempt to expound the disclosures of the Bible concerning a future state, while they fail to grasp the truth of life only in Christ by a resurrection at the last day. Mr. Gossard does no worse in the matter, on the whole, than other leading exponents of nominal orthodoxy, nor can he do any better than they.

Incidentally, in our friendly discussion (for such was its character throughout) I quoted 1 Cor. xv., 22; whereupon Br. G. remarked that he would want no better proof than that affords of the future life of the wicked. But we could not turn aside from other points to consider it; though if we had the reader can judge how impotent must have been the attempt to overthrow our view.

While referring thus to 1 Cor. xv., 22, we may as well repeat an admission made by John Wesley, who says; "Nay, from this place we cannot conclude that mankind in general shall be delivered from any death at all, seeing it does not relates to mankind in general, but wholly and solely to them that are Christ's." Let these weighty words of Wesley be well pondered by his sons in the gospel. It were well if Methodists knew better than they do what the "illustrious founder" of their denomination has written about some of these important matters. The information could hardly fail to remove some prejudice from their minds, and so aid in preparing them for an unfettered investigation of the grounds of our life view.

In the friendly interview which I had with Mr. Gossard at his house, the greater portion of our time was, through his leading, spent in an interchange of views concerning the relative value of our respective penal theories as incentives to repentance. At length the way opened to consult the inspired record; and my first work was to show cause why 2 Cor. v., 10 cannot bear Mr. G.'s interpretation, viz., that the whole human race are to appear before the judgment seat of Christ." I was not a little surprised to find my friend in a very little time, saying that if he should admit that that passage related solely to the righteous, there was one other from which he thought I would find it difficult to exclude the wicked. This looked to me like a virtual surrender of his claim on the passage he had first named; and it only shows how poorly prepared our opponents are to maintain positions absolutely vital to their system. But it is gratifying to find men who are willing to converse freely on that subject in the kind spirit which Br. Gossard manifested.

The other text referred to by my respected brother was Rev. xx., 12, 13. I instantly informed him of my belief that the right ous only are brought to view in the passage; adding that I thought of preaching on the subject in Williamson's Hall, and that I would be glad to have him hear me.

Mr. Gossard was the only Lake City pastor with whom I was brought into contact. On the morning of my coming away I was told that he had on the previous day preached a discourse against our views, and had censured Christians for coming to hear me preach. But I could get no particulars, and what I did learn may not have been wholly correct. If I am wrong, Br. Hudson or Br. Willis will set the matter right. Meanwhile they have nothing to fear from opposition, for they understand its essential weakness. R. W.

"THE LORD LIVETH."

THERE dwelt in the east of Scotland a pious clergyman, who had presided for a number of years over a small but respectable congregation. In the midst of his active career of usefulness, he was suddenly removed by death, leaving behind him a wife and a number of helpless children. The small stipend allowed him by his congregation had been barely sufficient to meet the current expenses of his family; and at his death no visible means were left for their support. The death of her husband preyed deeply upon the heart of the poor afflicted widow; while the dark prospect which the future presented filled her mind with the most gloomy apprehensions. By her lonely fireside she sat, the morning after her sad bereavement, lamenting her forlorn and destitute condition, when her little son, a boy of five years of age, entered the room. Seeing the deep distress of his mother, he stole softly to her side, and, placing his little hand in hers, looked wistfully in her face, and said: "Mother, mother, is God dead?" Soft as the gentle whisper of an angel did the simple accent of the dear boy fall upon the ear of the disconsolate and almost heart-broken mother. A gleam of heavenly radiance lighted up, for a moment, her pale features. Then snatching up her little boy, and pressing him fondly to her bosom, she exclaimed: "No, no, my son, God is not dead; he lives, and has promised to be a Father to the fatherless, a Husband to the widow. His promises are sure and steadfast, and upon them I will firmly and implicitly rely." Her tears were dried, and her murmuring forever hushed. The event proved that her confidence was not misplaced. The congregation over which her husband had worthily presided, generously settled upon her a handsome annuity, by which she was enabled to support her family, not only comfortably, but genteelly. The talents of her sons, as they advanced in years, soon brought them into notice, and finally procured them high and honorable stations in society.

"WHAT IS THE SECOND DEATH?"

"THE second death" is final death. It is not to die a second time. It is a death into which all the wicked fall and remain. It is called a second death because it deprives its subjects of a second life which the righteous only will receive. It is the first death perpetuated: a death which shall not result in a second life as the death of the righteous shall; a death preceding, not following a second life. It is the failure of a second life, and not a cutting off from a second life, and it is very properly called death, and "second death," because the subjects of this death might have secured a second life. It is more than a state of non-being which we may fancy one to have been in before he ever had a being. It is the ending of one's being, abortively; a falling short of a destined end; a ruin never designed. It is the state into which the entire race falls, except the quickened ones. But it is only the first death to the righteous and innocent; because it only cuts them off from the first life, and does not deprive such of the second: while it is both the first and second death to the wicked, because it not only cuts them off from their first or present life, but also deprives them of a second life: i. e., the state into which the wicked go at death, is two deaths in one; a death which cuts them off from the life they have lived, and leaves them without a promise of the life to come. And this seems to us very economical as well as merciful; for it is reaching the same result, to wit, "the second death" with only the trouble and pain of one execution. Amen. So let it be.

CHRISTIAN WARFARE.

IN order to bring about a successful result, there is always a necessity of an education to that end. The mechanic, the merchant will tell us that they had to acquire a certain amount of information to quali y them to fill their respective positions, and do credit to their professions: so with the doctor and the lawyer and scholar; they all had to undergo a rigid examination before they appeared as professors, or claimed to know whereof they affirmed. Education, then, is essential to the full development of life's varying and various callings. Now it does seem that the Christian should not claim exemption from as severe a test of discipleship as any of these: therefore may his career be well called a warfare, a journey, a striving; all who have set their hands to the plough intent on not looking back, will agree in this, that life is before them; real, earnest life! their relations to the One under whom they wage this warfare is of no mean character; his appointment is not one of party politics; nor is he likely at any time to be superseded by another. No! His appointment comes from the Most High, from Him who has the unquestioned right to say, "Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies." Christian warfare, then, is as noble a calling as he is mighty who hath called him; and in this light I wish to call the attention of those who profess his name.

You have volunteered, and by your profession signed the articles of war. You enter (or should enter) on your duties knowing the result of defeat or victory; and it remains with you to determine, in this signal conflict, whether you will faithfully obey our commander, which can only result in victory, or whether you will go over to the enemy: it's serve God or Mammon; and cowards are not wanted in this army. The gain to be secured is great; the loss awful; therefore be wise, Oh ye servants! strive lawfully; don't beat the air: but be clothed with the whole armor of God: your loins are to be girt with truth; your breast to have the righteousness of God; your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; and above all take the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. Thus armed and equipped, you can, if you will, fight the good fight of faith, and at last lay hold on eternal life. That great gift, that gift of gifts, that free gift. Secure it by a patient continuance in well doing: ever let the example of those who have gone before you, and have thus shown by their lives and devotion how greatly they prized the proffered boon.

In this light, then, I wish to estimate the Christian warfare; in its dignity, its uncompromising and steadfast character. Above all things never yield to the enemy; and feel in yourselves the dignity of your calling; and do not whine out your existence as though you were ashamed to own to whom you belonged; for, as sure as you do, the coming day will declare it.

In its uncompromising character, also, just think how unbecoming of you to stand on one side of the river (as was done in the late war) and the enemy on the other; and in order to feel friendly toward the destroyer of your nation's best interests, you exchange friendly salutations! can these things be, and you maintain your loyalty? It had been said, and I accept the statement, "whosoever, therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God. By this I do not think it necessary we should jostle against all who are of the contrary part, and create a furor; to live in which can only lesson our usefulness and increase the ranks of the enemy, which are even now legion.

"Be ye steadfast, unmovable"; never give way to the enemy thinking it's of no use longer to contend; for they only are crowned who endure to the end; and ever remember for whom you fight and for what. Our lives are short, they are fast ebbing out; the day of the Lord draweth nigh, and the time of reward will soon be here. Let your watchword be "Jesus and victory." G. W. YOUNG.

ON SILENT WORSHIP.

DEVOTION, considered simply in itself, is an intercourse betwixt us and God—betwixt the supreme, self-existent, inconceivable spirit, which formed and preserves the universe, and that particular mind with which he has animated a portion of matter upon the earth, that we call man.

It is a silent act, in which the mind divests itself of outward things, flees into heaven, and pours forth all its wants, wishes, hopes, fears, guilt, or pleasures, into the bosom of an Almighty Friend. Although this devotion in its first stages may be a wearisome or insipid exercise, yet this arises merely from the depravity (weakness) of nature, and of our passions. A little habit will overcome this reluctance. When you have fairly entered upon your journey, the ways of this wisdom will be "ways of pleasantness, and all its paths—peace." True devotion doubtless requires a considerable degree of abstraction from the world. Hence, modern Christians treat it as a vision: hence, many modern writers have little of its unction. But it glows in the Scriptures; it warms us in the Fathers; it burned in an Austin, and in many others of the persecuted martyrs. That we hear but little of it, is not wonderful. It makes no noise in the circle of the learned, or of the elegant. Under a heap of worldly cares, we smother the lovely infant and will not let it breathe. Vanity, pleasure, ambition, avarice, quench the celestial fire; and these, alas! are too much the gods of mortals. Ever since the world began, writers have been amusing us only with shadows of this piety, instead of giving us its soul and substance. Superstition has placed it in opinions, ceremonies, austerities, pilgrimages, persecutions, an august temple or splendid imagery, which have little connection with sentiment or spirit. Enthusiasm has swelled with unnatural conceptions, and obtruded a spurious offspring on the world, instead of the engaging child of Reason and of Truth, while the lukewarm have rested in a few outward duties, which have had no vigor, and as they spring not from the heart, never enter the Temple of the Most High.

Real piety is of a very different and of a much more animated nature. It looks up to God; sees, hears, feels him in every event, in every vicissitude, in all places, in all seasons, and upon all occasions. It is theory vivified by experience; it is faith, substantiated by mental enjoyment; it is heaven, transplanted in the human bosom; it is the radiance of the divinity, warming and encircling man; it is a spiritual sense, gratified by spiritual sensations. Without this all ceremonies are inefficacious; books, prayers, sacraments, and meditations are but a body without life, or a statue without animation.

That man is capable of such an intercourse with his Maker, there are many living witnesses to prove. Without having recourse to the visions of fanatics or the dreams of enthusiasts, it may be proved to spring from natural and philosophical causes. God is a spirit, so is the mind. Bodies can have intercourse, so can minds. When minds are in an assimilating state of purity, they have union with their Maker. This was the bliss of Paradise. Sin interrupted it, and holiness must restore it. To a soul thus disposed, the Creator communicates himself in a manner which is as insensible to the natural eye as the falling of dews, but not less refreshing to its secret powers than that is to vegetation. The primitive saints speak of this when they are describing their transports. David felt it when he longed for God, as the hart panteth after the water brooks. St. Paul experienced it when he gloried in his tribulations. It was embodied in him when he was carried up into the third heaven, and heard things impossible to be uttered. St. Stephen was filled with it when he saw the heavens opened, and prayed for his murderers. By it martyrs were supported when they were stoned and sawed asunder, and until we feel it in ourselves, we shall never fully know how gracious the Lord is. If you can acquire this spiritual abstraction you will at once have made your future for eternity. It will be of little moment what is your lot on earth, or what the distinguishing vicissitudes of your life; prosperity or adversity, health or sickness, honor or disgrace, a cottage or a crown, will all be so many instruments of glory. The whole creation will become a temple. Every event and every object will lead your minds to God, and in his greatness and perfections you will insensibly lose the littleness, the glare and tinsel of all human things. If I wished only to set off your persons to the greatest advantage, I would recommend this true, sublime religion. It gives a pleasing serenity to the countenance, and a cheerfulness to the spirits beyond the reach of art or the power of affectation. It communicates a real transport to the mind, which dissipation mimics only for a moment; a sweetness to the disposition, and a lustre to the manners, which all the airs of modern politeness study but in vain. Easy in yourself, it will make you in perfect good humor with the world, and when you are diffusing happiness around you, you will only be dealing out the broken fragments that remain after you have eaten. This devotion, however, though essentially a silent intercourse betwixt the heart and God, yet to creatures, consisting of matter as well as mind, must be nourished by external forms. It must strike the senses, in order to awaken the imagination.—Selected.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

ON all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? It unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Two Dollars a Year; or, 52 numbers: One Dollar for six months; or, 26 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York City, 25 cents additional.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid, in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,656, New York.

ALL NAMES of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY, AND STATE must be given, and written plainly; and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE OBJECT OF CHRIST'S MISSION.

EXTRACT FROM A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

IF the question were asked, "For what purpose did our Lord Jesus Christ come into the world?" how would it most probably be answered? especially according to the general "theology" of the age in which we live? Some one would reply, "He came into the world to save us from hell." But what do you mean by "hell"? "Why, a place of eternal torment, where 'undying souls'—immortal sinners—will suffer eternal torture." That is the reason why our Lord Jesus Christ came into the world, is it? "Yes! admitting of course, that he came to save us from our sins, and consequently from eternal misery."

We are aware that "theologians" recently, have seemed considerably less dogmatical in relation to the doctrine of the endless torment of the wicked. Many of them do not express their views as fully and as distinctly as in former years: but nevertheless, the grand object of Christ's mission was to save men (according to their theological view) from endless torment and burning flame. But what reasons do the Scriptures present for Christ's advent into the world?

We will permit the Lord Jesus himself to reply in his own language, as recorded in John x., 10. "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." Or, as the Syriac version reads, "That they might have that which is excellent." In other words, an excellent life.

Here, then, is Christ's own explanation. Will you accept it? "Oh, yes," replies the theologian, "I will accept that declaration of Jesus, but"—"But"—what? These are his plain, positive words; and there is not one word about his coming to save men from the "endless misery of hell."

"I am come that they might have life," he declares. Can you understand him? "And that they might have it more abundantly."

"Yes, but then, life does not mean existence—it cannot mean that." Why not? "Because every man has an undying soul, and will have an eternal existence." Indeed! So, then, Jesus Christ stands corrected by modern theology. He is not quite accurate! Instead of saying, I have come that men might have life," he is corrected, and made to say, "I have come that men might have a happy, or a blessed exissence."

Is it to be supposed for a moment that Christ could not have used these words as well as our theologians? He addressed the common people, and they "heard him gladly."

They did not find it necessary to procure the services of some profound lawyer in order to have his words explained; nor did they need to be told that life meant nothing of the sort, or, rather, that life meant "happiness." While hearing such misrepresentations made, we have been impelled to exclaim—"Get thee behind me, satan: thou art an offence to me. Thou savorest not the things that be of God, but of men." They pervert the plain and obvious interpretation of the words of Christ; whether intentionally or not, God will judge. If our Lord meant "happiness," could he not have said it? Surely the Greek language, in which the New Testament was mainly written, is not lacking in words to exprsss bliss, enjoyment, happiness, and similar ideas. We find such words scattered throughout the New Testament; therefore, if our Lord intended to convey such ideas, we repeat, he could as well have used the language adopted by our theologians as to have used that he did. It is evident, then, that he did not mean what they claim as the proper signification of the words.

But they affirm, man has an immortal soul, and consequently their interpretation is necessary to meet their views. Moreover, they inform us, the "church" had "committed to the doctrine of the immortality of the soul," and they are accordingly bound to defend it.

Now it is remarkably strange that the church should have had committed to it such a doctrine, when there is not a text from Genesis to Revelation that speaks of it. We would like to ask, who committed this doctrine to the church? Was it Jesus Christ, the apostles, or prophets? They are all silent respecting it. We would sooner believe that he who said, "All the kingdoms of the world are mine" had committed it to the church. The church did not receive it from God, neither from the apostles, nor from the prophets. How strange that we should be denounced as "infidels" while the Scriptures nowhere teach the soul's immortality. Are we, then, "infidels?" We charge our opposers with infidelity.

Take the language of the text—"I am come that they might have life." Now, infidelity is, in other words, disbelief; and when you say the life there spoken of does not mean life—conscious, or living existence—who is the "infidel" then? Who now believes the plain, positive testimony of Jesus Christ?

By way of confirmation, let us examine other texts in relation to the point—that Jesus did mean life, proper; literal, living existence.

Turn to the case of the young man who asked our Lord what he should do to inherit eternal life. In Matt. xix. we find him described as a young man of more than ordinary intelligence—as a ruler or person of note. "And behold one came running, and said unto him, Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?" Here we would remark that it was perfectly natural that a person should have come to Jesus for information relative to the matter and theme of his discourses. Very likely this young man had heard what Jesus taught the people, and he went to him to be instructed in regard to a matter that lay near his heart. See him as he comes "running!" Does he ask what good thing shall I do to escape eternal torments? What shall I do to escape an eternal hell? Is there an intimation of any such thing in his question? Not a word of it.

Look at the simplicity of his words—"What shall I do to inherit eternal life;" or, "that I may have eternal life?" How plain, how simple this question is, upon the supposition that man is a perishing being, and passing away in death. Without revelation there is no evidence of a future life—no evidence of a life without end. The whole scene of man's history, in this world, is one of mortality, corruption, and death. He may speculate concerning it as much and as anxiously as he pleases, but he can learn nothing positive or definite in respect to the future, apart from revelation.

The young man becoming interested in the subject, comes to Jesus and makes his plain and simple inquiry. Now mark the reply. "He said unto him, Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is God: but if thou wilt"—escape endless torment! if thou wilt save thy immortal soul, that can never die! Does our Lord speak thus? Thus would the theology which claims to be orthodox, in this age, have spoken; but not so does Jesus speak. Hear him—"If thou wilt enter into life," etc. Such is the divine utterance; and it harmonizes with the whole theme of the preaching of our Lord and his apostles. Jesus Christ was endowed with the "power of an endless life," and came to bestow it on the perishing, if they would accept him as their DELIVERER. That life was the great theme of all his preaching, declaring, "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him him up at the last day." Clearly announcing the bestowment of an endless life as the great end of his mission; and also the means by which that bestowment is to be consummated, viz., by a revival from the dead at the last day. In order to this, there must be faith in Jesus Christ as the LIFE-GIVER—the DELIVERER from sin and death: a cleaving to him as "our hope," and as the only medium between God and us—the "one mediator." Such shall have life from the dead "at the last day," and die no more: they shall "be as the angels of God in heaven:" and because their Redeemer lives to die no more, so shall they. Such is the life the gospel proclaims. Those who reject or neglect this proclaimed mercy perish from life—"shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them;" and death holds them in its eternal dominion—they have no connection with the LIFE-GIVER, and by an obstinate rejection of him have quenched forever the Spirit of God, by which alone any soul of man is raised up from the dead at the last day. "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii., 11. That Spirit is received only by a union with Jesus Christ, the fountain and medium of all God's communications to dying men.

Whoever ye are to whom the gospel proclamation comes, make haste to Christ as your Deliverer. Soon that voice of mercy will cease to you: and, out of Christ, death will close in on you with the darkness of eternal night—a night from which there is no awaking, and on which no sun will ever rise.

OF EVIL—THE DEVIL.

OR, JUDGE HALSTED'S FIRST REPLY TO "D."

The spirit of evil—the de'evil—d'evil—devil—of evil.

1 PETER iii., 10; Gr., ... let him restrain the tongue of him from evil, Ital. let him keep, or retain back, his mouth dal (for da il) male—from the evil; i. e., from evil (equivalent to, his pneuma—Latin, spiritus, breath—spirit from evil; for neither the tongue, nor the mouth, can speak without breath. And in Psa. xxxiii., 6, we have, by the ruach, Gr., pneuma, Latin, spiritus, Douay, spirit; Ital., breath; E. V., breath, of his mouth. And in Isa. xi., 4, we have, with the ruach, Gr., pneuma, Latin, spiritus, Douay, Ital., and E. V., the breath of his lips. The Rheims in 1 Peter iii., 10 is, let him refrain his tongue from evil; E. V., the same.

1 Peter iii., 11; Gr., let him bend or recoil from evil and do good; Ital., let him withdraw himself dal male—from the evil; i. e., from evil, and do il bene—the good; i. e., and do good. (This language of the Gr. and Ital. personifies evil—sin It is figurative, representing evil as to be bent from, recoiled from. It is metaphorical; meaning, in literal language, let him avoid sinning). The Rheims in the verse is, let him decline from evil, and do good; E. V., let him eschew evil, and do good.

1 Peter iv., 1; Gr., ... hath ceased of sin; Ital., hath ceased dal peccato—from the sin; i. e., from sin; Rheims, hath ceased from sins; E. V., hath ceased from sin.

2 Thes. ii., 7; Gr., for that mystery tes anomias, of the lawlessness, i. e., of lawlessness, (for evil—sin) at present energeitai—energizes, influences, or is active, but that which holding, or continuing, at present, until out of midst it be, or become.

2 Thes. ii., 8; Gr., kai—but, or, and, at that time shall be unveiled that anomos—lawless—hon—whom or which, the Kurios—analosei—will annihilate by the pneuma, Latin, spiritus, breath; Douay, the spirit; of his mouth; E. V., with the spirit of his mouth. The Ital. in verse 7 has, dell' (for de la) iniquita—of the iniquity, i. e., of iniquity; and in verse 8 has, by the spirito della (for de la) sua bocca—of the his mouth; i. e., of his mouth. Who cannot see that evil—sin is meant in these verses? The Rheims in verse 8 has: And then the wicked one shall be revealed; E. V., and then shall that wicked be revealed. The meaning is, there will be an end put to evil; there will be no more sin. The word unveiled, in this verse, personifies evil—sin. What more apt personification of it than to represent it as under a veil, concealing its deformity; which the unveiling will expose.

In the plural, i—the, and gli—the, are the nominative and accusative of the Ital. article il; and dei—of the, and dei abbreviated de' of the; and degli—of the, are the genitive plural of il; and ai, or abbreviated, a'—to the, and agli—to the, are the dative plural of il; and dai, or abbreviated, da'—from the, are the ablative plural of il.

Rom. iii., 8, Gr., as some say we say, that we may or should, do the evils (i. e., evil things), in order that may come the goods (i. e. good things), Ital. . . . . we may or should, do i mali—the evils, to the end that may come i beni—the goods; Rheims, let us do evil, that there may come good? E. V., let us do evil, that good may come?

Mat. ix., 34; Ital., de' demoni—of the demons; Rheims, of devils; E. V., of the devils.

Mat. xii., 25; Ital. de demoni of the demons; Rheims, of the devils; E. V., of the devils.

In Mat. viii., 33, is an instance of the Ital. degli—of the—the genitive plural of gli—the, formed by putting the preposition de (without any abbreviation of it) before gli: the Gr., there is, ton daimonizomenon (genitive plural) of the daimonized; Ital. degl' (for degli) indemoniati (genitive plural)—of the demonized; Rheims, concerning them that had been possessed by the devils; E. V., to the possessed of the devils.

Luke viii., 36; Gr., ... how was preserved, or, carried through (we say, brought through), that, or, the daimonized; Ital., how the demonized—had been freed; Rheims, "how he had been healed from the legion;" E. V. by what means he that was possessed of the devils was healed. Of is the right word, as in this verse, and Mat. viii., 33, and not possessed with devils; just as we say, cured him of the fever. What does "D." think of the word healed applied to one possessed of orthodox devils? This single word is enough to show that healed—cured—of devils, or of a devil, means, healed—cured—of some disease. The daimonized man was a lunatic, and a mad, and bad one. Is not lunacy a disease, and a bad one?

Luke viii., 27; Gr., . . . a man hos—who, or, which, had daimonia from times long; Ital., a man the which had i, the demoni; Rheims, who had a devil now a very long time; E. V., which had devils long time. Orthodoxy would have it, the devils had the man. Not so: the man had the devils, and would, no doubt, have kept them as long as he lived, if he had not been healed—cured. We have generally given demon for the Gr. word, but this is only an adoption. The definitions by the lexicons, of daimonian and daimonios would make it thus: My Donigan, the man had unfortunates, providences; i. e., bad providences; my Schrevelius, had miserables, bad fortunes: my Rev. Groves, misfortunes, unfortunates: my the Hedeiru Lex. miserables, misfortunes. And we know from Scripture that the Jews, in idolatrous times, worshipped Fortune as a god. Providence is a common word with us. It is often used in the sense given by Donnegan to daimonios, namely, proceeding from the Divinity, and to daimoniodes, which he defines "affected by supernatural influence." And the Jews, as Mc Knaught well says, and as was naturally derived from the Theocracy, considered everything as coming from God, i. e., as a providence. But the Rev. Groves, in his Lexicon, defines daimoniodes 'like a spirit, or, demon.'

In the verses I have given, the Ital. definite article, il, is declined nominative singular, 1 John v., 18, il. Genitive singular, Heb. iii., 13; Psa. xxi., 11; Ephes. vi., 16—del for de il—of the. Ephes. iv., 27; al, for a il—to the. And in Rom. ii., 9, ad—to—the exact Latin preposition expressing the dative. And in Graglia's Ital. dictionary the preposition a is given, defined to; and the preposition ad thus, "Ad (a), prep. to," putting a in parenthesis. Accusative singular—il male (it is il both in the nominative and the accusative)—the evil, for evil in the abstract; also, Rom. ii., 9, and in xii., 9; and, il maligno in John ii., 13. Ablative singular, dal (for da il)—from the, in John xvii., 15; 1 Peter iii., 11.

And in the nominative plural of il, which is i, i mali—the evils, in Rom. iii., 8. And de' (for dei)—of the, in Matt. ix., 34, and xii., 24. And degli—of the, in Matt. viii., 33. The dative plural of il is ai, and abbreviated a' to the; and agli—to the; and the ablative plural dai, and abbreviated da', from the; and dagli—from the, as "D." will see by looking into Graglia's grammar, prefixed to his dictionary. And we have found d' uormo—of man, in the singular, Rom. ii., 9; and d' ogni—of every, in the singular in 1 John i., 7, and i., 9.

We now take up "D."s objection to the way in which we have proposed to find the letters d e v i l, and to make the word devil, used in the Douay, the Rheims, and King James's English versions.

On page 464 of "the Theology of the Bible" we say: "The word devil is a mongrel word, compounded from the Lat. and Ital. de, of and the English word evil. According to the Ital. mode of expression, of evil would be written de'evil, of the evil; but where two vowels come together one is struck out, so that here it would be d'evil of the evil; and as before a noun used in an abstract sense, here evil, the Ital. article is not to be rendered, as we have seen, the is not to be used before evil. This gives, for d'evil, of evil; and striking out the apostrophe, we have devil; used for the principle of evil. Hence devil (a thing) of evil is proper enough for an idol. So a disease is (a thing) of evil; and we shall see that the Rheims, and the E. V., New Testament call a disease a devil, and diseases, devils." This is the way in which we have put our case.

Now, does "D." think, that if there is no such being as a personal devil, he could get the word devil in any better way? Does his uneasiness arise from the way in which we get devil, or from his notion that there is really such a being as his devil, and his unwillingness to have his notions disproved? If the latter, the question between us and him is resolved into the question, whether there is such a living being. Why, then, does he put his dispute upon the very unimportant question, how the English word devil can be got? Why not go to the real question involved, and attempt to show that the Bible teaches a personal devil?

But to his objection. He says, there is no such Ital. preposition as de: that the Ital. preposition is di, not de.

Answer: The Ital. forms its cases not by different terminations, but by prefixing prepositions, as does the English. Now we have seen that the Ital. expresses the ablative of its article il by prefixing its preposition da, making da il, which is contracted to dal—from the. And expresses the dative of its article il by prefixing its preposition a, making a il, contracted to al—to the. Does "D." really think, then, that the Ital. has no preposition to express the genitive case—of? He would seem to think so, for he says: "There is a masculine singular definite article, il, of which the genitive is del or dello, and dell' before a vowel." He would thus make del to be the genitive of il without any preposition before il. Do you mean that, minister "D."? Is there no preposition in del? How do you propose to get the genitive of il without a preposition before il? The Ital. forms its cases by affixing prepositions. But he don't really mean to say that he can; for he proceeds to say: "If, then, Judge H. wishes to compound an Italian and English word, he must use the following method: di evil, or dell' evil. Let him choose the one most fitting, and it will not give him his devil by any legitimate method of contraction." Now we are at the Ital. article il, and not at the Ital., article lo. And (to quote "D."'s language) "right here our learned friend strikes his great error." He says: "There is a masculine singular definite article, il, of which the genitive is del or dello, and dell' before a vowel. He makes dello—dell' before a vowel, to be the same as del; and makes each of them, as well as del, to be the genitive of il. An unskilled handler of edge tools is apt to get his fingers cut. Dello—dell' before a vowel—is the genitive singular of the Ital. article lo, and not of the Ital. article il; and dello—dell' before a vowel—is for de lo—of the; and de is the Ital. preposition here (expressing the genitive of) prefixed to the Ital. article lo making of the; the double l in dello—dell' before a vowel, being for better pronunciation: But del, a contraction for de il, forms the genitive of the article il, de before il, being the Ital. preposition expressing of. And in del (for de il) it is not the e that is struck out but the i in il, leaving the preposition de untouched. And if our learned friend will look at his Ital. grammar (page 10 of Graglia's) he will find that the Ital. has three definite articles, il, lo, both masculine, and la, feminine. And that the article lo is declined, nominative, lo; genitive, dello (for de lo); dative allo (for a lo) ; accusative, lo; ablative dallo (for da lo.) And that la, the feminine article, is declined, la, della (for de la) alla (for a la); la, accusative; dalla (for da la) ablative. And if he will look at his Ital. dictionary he will find that a—to, and ad—to, are prepositions, expressing the dative; and that da is a preposition, expressing the ablative; and that the Ital. dative and ablative are formed by prefixing these prepositions. But the Ital. has the genitive case also. Has it any way of expressing the genitive different from that in which it expresses the dative and ablative, namely by prefixing a preposition? Could this be imagined by any one acquainted with the structure of the Ital. language, or by any one who knew that the Ital. expressed the dative and ablative by prefixing prepositions? "D." says: "Judge H. must use either di evil, or dell' evil. Let him choose the one most fitting, and it will not give him his devil by any legitimate method of contraction." Now first, as to dello—dell' before a vowel, "D." will not expect us to choose that after being informed that he was mistaken in supposing that dello, contracted to dell', expresses the genitive of il, but that it expresses the genitive of lo. We will take del, which expresses the genitive singular of the article il: del is a contraction of de il: and we presume "D." will admit that the genitive is, of; that the Ital. il is the, and its de il—contracted to del, is, of the. And the Ital. strikes out one vowel, the i in il, and writes del for de il—of the, leaving the de intact. Now what does de in the contraction del express? Does it not express the genitive of? And is not of in English a preposition? Can we possibly be wrong, then, in saying that the Italian de, which expresses the genitive of, is a preposition? We think not. The Ital. expresses its cases in the same way the English does, by prefixing prepositions: and the Ital. de in del is just as much a preposition, (expressing the genitive), as its a in al, and its ad, are prepositions expressing the dative, and its da in dal is a preposition expressing the ablative. We "choose," therefore, first del evil—of the evil. But the Ital. article is not to be rendered here in English, (as before shown), a rule which "D." failed to notice in stating, at the beginning, what he calls our claim. We, therefore strike out the l, standing for il—the, and write de evil—of evil; and two es coming together, we strike out one, and write devil, of evils, i. e., the principle of evil.

We now take the alternative that "D." gives us: and he gives us this alternative rightly, dievil (of evil). Now, if he will turn to page 10 of the same grammar, he will find at the foot of the second column, that di is made d' before a vowel: so that dievil is to be written d'evil, and we have only to strike out the apostrophe (to which "D." makes no objection) and we have devil. And by turning to Rom. ii., 9, before given, he will find the Ital. d'uomo rendered of man, in the Rheims and E. V. And in 1 John i., 7 and 9, Ital d'ogni, of every. We thus show that d' for di is "a legitimate method of contraction." And our first method of contraction from del, "D." may, since the correction of his mistake in taking dello to be the genitive of il, as del is, now think an equally "legitimate method of contraction." And his language, "Let him choose," etc., shows that if either of these is a "legitimate method of contraction," we are at liberty to adopt it, and thus to form our "mongrel" word devil. But "D." has procured a "written statement from a professor of modern languages in a New England College for over 25 years." And the Prof. tells him, that de is a Latin, not an Ital. preposition; for in the Italian it is di. The Prof. says: "True, in the genitive singular of the definite article il we have del." Just so, Professor, and del is the word we have just now taken. Unfortunately for "D." he went beyond the instructions of the Prof., and made dello—dell' before a vowel (the genitive singular of the article lo,) to be the same as del (for de il) the genitive singular of the article il. The Professor did not make that mistake; for, in the singular he stops at del as the genitive singular of the article il, and della (for de la, two els being used for better pronunciation) as the genitive singular of the feminine article la. The Professor says, that "For the genitive of il we have del, from which one might infer that this contraction was for de il, but that this is not the case, inasmuch as de is never alone, not being really an Ital. word." Does the Professor really mean to say that del is not a contraction of de il, and to give as a reason for the assertion, "inasmuch as de is never used alone"? Does the fact that this Ital. preposition when used alone is written di prove that de can't be used in connection with the article il, as in de il contracted to del? What does de in del mean? Does it not mean of? The il (l in del) means the. What does the de in del mean? Does it not mean of; and is not of a preposition? I think the Professor must have been an orthodox minister long enough to have got the orthodox method of so-called reasoning. The Ital., as before said, forms its cases by prefixing prepositions. How will the Professor form the genitive of il without prefixing a preposition? Will he make ili the genitive of il? Did he ever see any such Italian as that? Now de being used in connection with il—the, in de il contracted to del, the de and del expressing of, can't be anything other than a preposition. And the genitive of the feminine article, la, is della (for de la) of the; as in 1 John iii., 4, della legge—of the law; and in 1 John iii., 19, della verita—of the truth: della is for de la, two ls being used for shorter pronunciation. Now la is the. Is it not the de that expresses the of in of the? And is not of a preposition? It is no answer to say that de is used for di: di is of; and de used for di is of. For my purpose the only question is, does the Ital. de express of? In connection with il, then, as in del for de il, de is of. This is enough for the way we get devil: thus del evil—of the evil, i. e., of evil, as before. And striking out the il—the, contracted to l, we have devil—of evil; and striking out one e, we have devil—of evil.

Now for the plural. The Professor says, "In the plural dei or abbreviated de', meaning of the." Certainly, in the genitive plural, as in Matt. ix., 34, and xii., 24, before given. But why do you say meaning, Professor? Do not dei, and de' abbreviated for dei, express of the? And here, too, it is the i that is struck in the abbreviation, not the e: the de is left intact. Is it not the de that expresses of? And in the Ital., gli is the, and de gli contracted to degl' before a vowel, as in Matt. viii., 13, before given, is of the. Is it not the de that expresses the of? And here, too, there is no contraction or abbreviation of the de. And prepositions are the same in the plural as in the singular. We do not say ofs houses; nor does the Ital. write des, but de, only, for the genitive plural as well as singular. Now we take the Professor's own de'—the abbreviation of dei—of the; and put de' before evils, and make de' evils—of the evils; and by omitting the article (because not to be rendered in English), and striking one e, and the apostrophe, we have devils—of evils; that is, (things) of evil, such as idols, frequently called devils in the Douay and E. V. of the Old Test.; and such as diseases (which are things) of evil, and called devils in the Rheims, and E. V., of the New Test. We say of a man in a fit of melancholy, he has the blue devils. Of what color are orthodoxy's devils?

Thus by taking the Professor's de' (an abbreviation of dei) of the, and striking out the article and the apostrophe we get devils—of evils; and by his own show we get rid of all orthodox devils at one swoop. O, but (perhaps the Professor will say), the plural devils, won't include the singular devil. Why not, Professor? Is not your head devil, a devil? And if we get rid of the devils do we not get rid of him? And would the Professor keep his head devil without any imps—little devils—to help him do his work? Leave him to do alone all the work that orthodoxy assigns to him and his under-devils? I think his orthodox satanic Majesty would say, he wouldn't undertake to do it all himself. But if the Professor prefers that we should not include the Devil in the plural, the devils, we will now get rid of his Highness the Devil by a very short process: di is written d' before a vowel, as we have seen. So that di evil is written d' evil; and we have only to strike out the apostrophe, and we have devil.

I think that "D." was quite sure he was appealing to orthodoxy in appealing to this Professor; and that the Professor would do his best to help him defend the Romish and yet widely received Protestant theory—the orthodox devil and devils.

Having thus shown conclusively, we think, that the Ital. de is used as a preposition, I ask "D." to look again at my language, quoted by himself rightly enough in this respect. My words are: "The word devil is a mongrel word composed from the Lat. and Ital. de, of, and the English word evil." Will any one say, after the above citations, that the Ital. de is not used for of. And that is all I need. If "D." still thinks it is not a preposition, let him enjoy his own opinion as to that; but will he say that the Ital. de is not used to express of? He may have it a preposition or not just as he pleases. For ourselves we are even better satisfied than before with the way in which we got the word devil.

Having thus disposed of "D."'s objection to my way of making our word devil, and being unwilling to trespass further on your columns in one issue of your most invaluable paper, I defer answering the other matters in "D."'s article to a future, and I hope an early day.

A Generous Offer.

I am desirous that subscribers to the Herald of Life, of all others, should have such aid as the book entitled "The Theology of the Bible" affords in support of the system of truth so ably maintained in that invaluable weekly paper. I will therefore mail a copy of the second issue of the said book (containing the full index, appendix, and notices of the book), and will pay the postage, on receipt of a letter from any such subscriber enclosing $2, directed to me, 417 Broad street, Newark, New Jersey. O. S. Halsted.

Note by the Editor.—In addition to the foregoing we have made arrangements with Judge Halsted to furnish the work as follows: Any person who will send us $3 shall have the remaining numbers of this volume of the Herald of Life, and we will send them "The Theology of the Bible" free of postage. Thus they will get at least 36 numbers of the Herald and the book for the retail price of that work, viz., $3. Will not every one avail themselves of this chance to get one of the most useful works ever published? To those who are now subscribers for the Herald, Judge Halsted's offer is very generous, and we hope none will fail to embrace it, and write to him immediately for it; yet they can save fifty cents by sending a new subscriber to this office, as above directed. The book is one to study; and with its aid your Bible will be more perfectly understood and valued.

Lost Numbers.—We give notice once more if any of our subscribers have failed to receive their papers, since the commencement of this volume, if they will inform us soon, we will supply them with any No. except No. 8, of which we have run short. Of all numbers except one and eight we have at present an abundant supply, and we intend soon to send them off as tracts, if our subscribers do not call for them. Any new subscribers who wish all the numbers of this volume must state their wish explicitly, or we shall not send them.

That Sermon.

Cambridgeport, Mass., Dec, 9, 1867.

Br. Storrs: Yesterday we had the promised sermon, from the old Baptist minister, on the Annihilation of the wicked. Taking for his text Ezekiel xviii: 4, "The soul that sinneth it shall die" and Rom. vi: 23, "For the wages of sin is death."

His argument reminded me of a fly entangled in a spider's web, the more he struggled to get out, the more he got entangled. In trying to prove man immortal, he proved all animals, swine, etc., entitled to the same immortality. He labored to prove that death means life: that destruction means preservation forever; and that to perish means to abide forever in everlasting pain.

He seemed to make great reliance on his Greek dictionary. He read part of the tract, "Animal and Spiritual Man," skipping over the most important points, but using it more however than his text; frequently using Mr. Storrs' name, in both sermons, as the "champion of this doctrine."

These sermons against our views have probably brought them before the people, as nothing else could; and may lead some to investigate them for themselves. I think the tract on "Man's Nature and Destiny" is a very hard thing to answer; it contains so much scripture; that, which cannot be contradicted; and it ought to give light to the most stubborn. Why is it men will not see the light? Men may labor hard to change these terms, "The wages of sin is death"—"destroy soul and body in hell"—"in that very day his thoughts perish"—2 Peter ii: 12, "These as natural brute beasts . . . . shall utterly perish in their own corruption."

Jude speaks of some who are "sensual, having not the Spirit." These texts will always stand as God has placed them in his Word, and so that the poorest and weakest of his creatures can read and understand; and all the cunning and philosophy, of man can never change them. Thanks be to God that he has set life and death before men in such plain and clear language. But he has said to some Ezekiel xiii: 22, "With lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad; and strengthened the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life." W. R. W.

What we should Know.

I know—that my Redeemer liveth. Job. xix. 25.)

I know—in whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. 2 Tim. i., 12.

Ye know—that he was manifested to take away our sins. 1 John iii., 5.

We know—that all things work together for good to them that love God. Rom. viii., 28.

We know—that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. 2 Cor. v., 1.

We know—that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. 1 John iii., 2; v., 15, 18, 19, 20.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 11, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not; he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

One Number More.

Another number of our paper completes the first quarter of this volume. We have continued to this time to send to many who, as yet, have paid nothing on the volume; though this has been contrary to our usual custom. Is there one of this number who would willingly be deprived of the papers, thus far sent, for the subscription price of the entire volume? If there is, we wish they would let us know it at once, and we will cease to send more.

We have no duns to make, we do not deal in that article; we never send them; but if any of you, who have thus far made no remittance toward the present volume, have a mind to help the paper, we shall be glad to hear from you before we enter on the second quarter; which will be January 1, 1868. What we shall do, if we do not hear from you, we will not now say: but one thing you need not fear: we shall not send you a "Bill" asking pay.

Those who made "pledges," at our anniversary, or since, will confer a favor by redeeming them in whole or in part at the earliest time possible.

The present number of our newspaper comes to you with an improved margin, and we think otherwise improved in its appearance; but of that you will judge.

Now, will you not give us a few hundred subscribers for the remainder of this volume, and so secure a copy of "The Theology of the Bible" for yourselves, or for some friend? See the "Generous Offer" in another column.

That the cause we advocate is now rapidly taking hold of many thinking minds, is clear. Our friend, Dr. J. K. Finley, author of the "Letter to a Clergyman," formerly of Pittsburg, Pa., now residing in Niles, Mich., has sent us seven new subscribers for the present volume, and those from among most intelligent men; and expects to send more. Such things are encouraging. We are satisfied that if all our friends would exert themselves a little in earnest, our list might soon be doubled. Will you not give one day in "Christmas" to this work?

Errata.—On the first page of this paper, in the last column, second line from the close of the first paragraph, for devil, read deevil.

"Of Evil: The Devil."

The article by Judge Halsted on the above subject, commenced last week and finished this, cannot fail to interest those who wish to see a thorough investigation of the question. To such, the length of the reply to "D" will be no objection. One who takes the unpopular side of a theological subject, must, of necessity, take more time, and occupy more space, than his opponent, who has the popular prejudice on his side, and hence needs less argument to carry his point with such as do not like to think they may have been wrong.

To us, Judge Halsted's argument is of uncommon interest, and we think triumphantly establishes the origin of the term devil. Let our readers carefully examine the whole matter, and decide for themselves. If the idea of a personal spirit-devil is an error, it is a most mischievous one, leading men, really to divide their worship, or homage, between God and his satanic majesty, and lessening their respect for God, under the idea that he either lacks the power or disposition to put an end to so mischievous an enemy to the feeble creatures he has made. To suppose the God of love permits such a being as the theological devil to be everywhere, working woe, sin and death among such helpless creatures as men, is an amazing tax on human credulity, and we cannot help thinking the "cloven foot" was an invention of wicked priests, in the dark ages, in order to get money from an ignorant people to aggrandize themselves. But the invention has been transmitted through papacy into Protestantism, till Christian men seem to think that belief in a spirit devil is as essential to religion as belief in a God. Truly, this seems like dividing our homage between two, little less fatal to pure and loving Christianity than the attempt to "serve God and mammon" which the Saviour said "Ye cannot do." Let us give to God an undivided heart, and "overcome evil with good."

Definite Time for the Advent.

We have often in the past twenty years expressed our mind decidedly against the idea that any prophetic period gives us the day, month, or year, of the second advent of Christ. We have not felt disposed to denounce those who have held and promulgated an opposite view; yet we have felt grieved that any should bewilder themselves and others by laboring to establish the idea that definite time is revealed in the prophetic numbers for the glorious appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ, being fully persuaded that such efforts are labor lost, and will most assuredly end in disappointment to all concerned in them, if not ultimately leading them to undervalue the Scriptures themselves from these repeated failures in definite time searching.

We wish to treat all kindly who are honestly believing in such a view of time; but they must excuse us from taking any part in it: to us, with present light, it would be presumption and a sin. We do not object to endeavors to understand the prophetic periods. What we do object to is, the assumption that any of those periods give, or were designed to give, the exact time of the second advent. We are satisfied they do not.

That they give us events which bring us "near" that advent we believe; and if investigated with a view to learn that we are near that glorious revelation, and for that purpose only, we rejoice in all the light that can be shed on the subject. But it seems that the greater portion who look at the time of prophetic periods, immediately conclude to start some precise time for the advent itself. This we consider a great mistake and an evil, as it tends to weaken confidence in all prophecy, and leads persons to follow fancy and feeling, rather than the word itself. Those who have been leaders in these movements ought to have learned wisdom by their repeated failures. Some of them have, but others continue, persistently, to assume they have found new data, and rush on as confident and as positive as if they had never failed. Alas for the sheep who are fed by such shepherds.

Our faith in the matter, that definite time in the prophetic numbers is nowhere given, has not been moved for the last twenty years or more. We have had no faith in any of the set times, which have been numerous during those years; we have none now in the '68 movement, but we do believe the event is "nigh, even at the door."

We have received several long communications from a highly respected and aged brother on the subject of time. He fixes it with certainty, by mathematical accuracy, in '83 or '84. We really desire it may not be as far off as that, but fear it will be even farther away, if this fixing definite time is not put an end to soon; for "Ye know not when the time is;" and "In such an hour as ye [my friends] think not, the Son of man cometh."

It is a settled fact, in our mind, that the Son of man will never come in any set time fixed upon by any of our race. The sooner, therefore, an end is made of this waste of time and money to find out the exact time of the event, the better will it be for the cause of truth.

Let all remember it is love for the appearing of Jesus Christ that will constitute us heirs of life when he comes, and not the love or knowledge of the exact time of the event. Saith an apostle, "Though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not love, I am nothing." But nowhere does the Bible make the knowledge of the exact time—hour, day, month, or year—a condition of life eternal to any man; nor the profession of such knowledge a proof of being among "the wise," in respect to the second advent.

Let us all watch and pray, and be always in that state of mind, and in that employment that we would rejoice to have our Lord come in his glory. So shall we be accepted of him in that day. "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

Hell the Foundation of his Religion.

An eminent minister, not a thousand miles from Brooklyn, N. Y., is reported to have said in his pulpit, not long since, "Take away hell and you will take away the foundation of my religion." Being of the "orthodox" school, he must be understood as saying, "Take away the doctrine of immortal souls in endless torture, and you take away all my hope of going to heaven, and all my love to God and Christ." If hell torments is the foundation on which he builds, we think the "floods and winds" which are sweeping over it, will leave him on the "sand." True, thousands listen to him now, and his fame is wide spread, but that will not save his hell foundation. It was laid in heathen superstitions, nourished in the papal corruptions, and at twilight was spawned into Protestantism; but the light of truth has at last so far shone into the darkness that men begin to "see light in God's light," and the shocking blasphemy against the character of God is fast disappearing—"The rain is descending, the winds blow, and the floods" of truth are "beating against" this clerical "foundation;" and some of them seem to be crying, "O Baal, save us"—"O hell, thou art our only foundation: without thee I have no religion."

We really hope these men are better than their foundation; for if what this clerical gentleman says of himself is true, we have not the least doubt that, with all his eloquence and reputation for piety, he is as destitute of the "religion" of the Bible as the most benighted pagan. The religion of the Bible has for its foundation, "God is love;" and, "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him." Not that we might be saved from eternal hell torments through him. No: it was life—eternal life, that men needed: it was to be made partakers of the divine nature, viz., love; for, "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." "He that loveth not knoweth not God, for God is love." Love, then, is the "foundation" of all Bible "religion;" and Paul prayed that the Ephesians might be "rooted and grounded in love." A blessed soil; a good "foundation;" much more likely to make a Bible Christian than "hell" torments." God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "Not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." "Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit." And what is "his Spirit," here spoken of? It is clearly his spirit of love, "for God is love." That spirit of love is what constitutes Bible "religion." Its "foundation" is love: its root is in love: its blade is love: its fruit is love. How wide is all this from a "hell foundation!"

How long will men professing to be gospel ministers utter such reproaches against the government of God, as that reported of this clergyman? May they soon learn "the ways of God more perfectly," and not drive men away from God by such representations of the foundation of religion. God has directed us to "Say unto them, As I live, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live: Turn ye, turn ye, for why will ye die?"

Here is no hell-religion. No, it is the voice of deep and earnest love, calling men from the path to death to the way of life. Let this manifested love of God be the foundation of our religion; then shall we be built up in Christ, and bring forth fruit unto holiness, and the end will be everlasting life.

"Hit Him Again."

The following hit at the Voice of the West, which maintains the resurrection of the wicked to die again, we cut from the Advent Herald, a paper holding to inherent immortality and eternal torments for wicked men.

SO WE THINK.

The Herald of Life advocates the extinction of the wicked at death, and teaches that they will have no resurrection. The Voice of the West holds that at death there is a cessation of being, but that the unjust will have a resurrection and then be blotted out of existence. The following, from a correspondent, appeared in the latter paper recently "without note or comment," and is expressive of our opinion respecting the difference between the two views:

"I endorse the doctrine concerning the wicked which the Herald of Life advocates: but regard the difference (as held by you) of a very trifling nature: for it is certainly but a very small matter as to whether the wicked remain dead, or whether they are raised to life and then destroyed altogether. For we will place the question in its most appropriate form, and it reads: 'What is the end of the wicked?' Don't we both point to the same text for our evidence? 'They shall be as though they had not been.'"

Note by the Editor of Herald of Life.—There is, however, a vast "difference" between hanging a man once, and making him alive to hang him again. "The wages of sin is death." And "it is appointed unto men once to die;" and "when they are dead, they are as dead as they ever can be." To make them alive, to kill them again, looks too much like savagism to correspond with the idea that "God is love:" and as the penalty is "death"—not dying, nor the pains of dying, but life extinct, we rather think, God will not twice execute the sentence. It makes a mighty "difference" respecting the character of God, which view we take. We should certainly conclude a government was too savage to be tolerated which executed the penalty of death on even murderers, if they should hang them by the neck till almost dead, then cut them down, and revive them, so as to hang them a second time. It is time to be done with such representations of the Divine government.

Dr. Finley on the Devil Question.

I have been much interested in the discussion that has been going on for some time past, in the Herald, in reference to the personality of the devil. Judging the question by the light of reason alone, I have felt that it was not giving us a fair chance in the race for immortality, to bring us into existence with a strong natural tendency to sin, as the Bible tells us, "prone to sin as the sparks to fly upward," and surrounded by so many and such powerful incentives to evil; and then, in addition to all this, to subject us to the continued assaults of a most malignant, and ever-present adversary, who is according to the general belief invested with some of the attributes of God himself, such as omnipresence, and omniscience, knowing our thoughts, and capable of influencing our most secret feelings and conduct; it certainly does not look reasonable.

We are represented in the Bible as creatures of the dust; frail, without any inherent strength, and of ourselves incapable of doing anything acceptable to God. The most impressive figures are made use of, to teach our weakness, and our perishing nature. "For he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust. As for man his days are as grass: as a flower of the field so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more." Some of the widely-accepted articles of our creeds even go so far beyond the teachings of the Bible itself, as judged by unprejudiced common sense, really remove us beyond the bounds of moral responsibility. See question 25th, Assembly's Larger Catechism.

Notwithstanding the apparent unreasonableness of subjecting us, in addition to our own natural and inherent weakness, to the machinations of such a powerful enemy, influenced in his desire to ruin us, by the most inveterate hatred of God and everything that God loves, I have yet always believed that it was so plainly revealed in the Bible, that I have not dared to doubt the truth of the commonly-received views. Doctor Fondey's articles in their favor, published in the Herald, appeared to me very strong, almost unanswerable. He writes too in such a good spirit, manifesting only a desire to discover what is the truth, exhibiting also so much Scriptural research, that I was almost inclined to drop the further investigation of the subject, thinking it could not be so satisfactorily settled as to be placed beyond doubt.

For a long time I felt much in the same state of mind, with regard to the question of the resurrection to life of the wicked. The Scriptural arguments of yourself, Curry, Wendell, and others, almost brought me to a conviction that the Bible taught their non-resurrection; still there were one or two texts that seemed to lie in the way, and interfered with a perfect confidence in what I now believe to be the truth. Romans viii., 11, finally dissipated any remaining doubts. I do not mean to say that I was convinced by this text alone, but it served as the capstone to perfect the symmetry of the whole argument. It was the keystone in the arch, strengthening and sustaining all the rest.

In regard to the personality of the devil, I concluded to do as I did with this question, just hold it in abeyance, and wait for more light. Within a few days the light has come upon me from an unexpected quarter; in fact from a passage that has heretofore appeared strongly to favor the idea of a personal wicked agent. In Hebrews ii., 14, we read, speaking of the Christ, "That through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil." In turning this passage over in my mind lately, it occurred to me, that the Bible nowhere ascribes the power of death to the devil as a personal being; but everywhere teaches that it is caused by, or in consequence of, sin. The whole proofs is very clearly described in James i., 14–15; "Any man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then, when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin when it is finished, [or, as the syriac has it, matured,] bringeth forth death." Passages teaching this truth might be multiplied to any extent. This text then in Hebrews is one in which sin, or the principle of evil, is clearly personified; and if in this place, why not in all the others? I think the Bible generally, and most likely always, furnished, within itself, a key for the solution of all such doubtful questions, and especially where one side of the question runs counter to the clear dictates of reason or justice

In this case I would say also, that if this text stood alone, it would not be sufficient to produce full conviction, but according with our sense of the right, and taken in connection with the published views of various writers, and especially with the light brought to bear upon it by the philolosphical investigations of ex-Chancellor Halsted, it seems to place the matter beyond any reasonable doubt. I remain truly yours. J. K. Finley.

Niles, Mich., Nov. 25, 1867.

Jacob Grim, at West Chester, Pa.

Philadelphia, Dec. 4, 1867.

Br. Storrs: I received an invitation last week to go to West Chester. After making the appointment with Sr. McCullough, I was taken quite sick, with a heavy cold, and thought it would be impossible for me to fill my engagement. My wife and daughter wished me to drop a note to that effect; but as they had made the appointment and engaged the hall, I declined doing so; but thought it would be best for me to go and do the best I could under the circumstances. If I failed through being unwell, I would have the satisfaction at least of trying to fill my appointment.

I did not expect to have an audience of more than twenty or thirty at most. But, to my suprise, when I entered the hall, which was the large Horticultural Hall, there were between three and four hundred persons present. I wondered what had stirred the people up. The flaming handbills posted on the trees, corners, and market places, as follows: "Life only through Christ. Jacob Grim, of Philadelphia will present the Bible views on the above subject, on Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, and again in the evening at 7 o'clock. All lovers of Bible truth are affectionately invited to attend." This explained the matter, somewhat. This, as near as I can reccollect, was the advertisement. In the afternoon I felt quite unwell, but endeavored to give them man's condition in death. I first showed what man was by creation; what he lost, his trial, condemnation, the penalty, and wound up my discourse by stating that I had merely made a diagnosis of man's disease and condition; but if they would favor me with their presence in the evening, I would give them the antidote and cure. The fact was, I thought I was about used up. I never felt so bad in my life after speaking. It seemed to me as if all the magnetism in my body was exhausted.

In the evening the congregation was larger than in the afternoon. My text was "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto life (Murdock) to every one that believes."

When I looked over the audience and thought it might be the last time they would ever have the privilege of hearing of "Life only through Christ," it seemed to fill me with new magnetic force. There is always something in the beauty and simplicity of the gospel of life that warms my heart; and after I commenced presenting the grand truths of life by the resurrection of the dead, I forgot I was sick, and spoke for one hour and a half, to the most attentive audience I ever addressed. At the close a gentleman asked the privilege of asking a question. It was granted. The question was, "Do I understand you to teach the doctrine that the wicked will not rise?" I thought the question altogether out of place; for, I do not think there was one individual in the house but what knew that was the burden of my discourse; for, in the midst of it, I challenged the audience for any power in the Bible that could give a wicked person life, and waited a reply, but in vain.

He asked me what I did with Daniel xii., 2; John v., 28–29; Acts xxiv., and the "better resurrection." After replying to several, he asked the privilege of making some remarks. It was granted. When in a very gentlemanly way, he commended the gospel as I presented it, and said there was much in my discourse he could approve; but was sorry that after so long study of the Bible, I was unable to find the doctrine of the resurrection of the wicked taught there. After his remarks, I made a short reply. It was now nearly half past nine, by my time, and the audience seemed perfectly contented to remain; but as it was impossible that evening to answer all his texts—for he quoted about all on that side—we closed. I was informed there was persons present who had not been inside of a meeting house for many years.

Well, the truth is, between four and five hundred persons heard the subject of life presented as they never heard it before. Whether any good will come of it, the author of life only knows. One thing is true, it was, and will be the town talk for some time to come; and it will wake up some of the ministers, of West Chester, to look after their flocks for fear they feed on some strange pasture. I have suffered considerable since I came home, and should have written sooner, but have not felt able.

Note by the Editor.—We rejoice that Br. Grim has been to one new place. We hope he will let his light shine in many such; for there are many perishing in such places for the lack of faithful men to call their attention to the real teachings of the Bible on the great and glorious truth of "Life only in Christ." God has given Br. Grim ability to set forth this subject in a clear manner; and we do earnestly desire that he may be employed therein to the utmost that his time will allow.

Wisconsin Jottings.

Nov. 12.—At a little before 3 P. M., I left the train at Nashotah station, 26 miles west of Milwaukee on the La Crosse Railroad. Finding that I must walk to Br. Parker Sawyer's (three miles distant), I sought directions as to the route, and started at once. When I had been on my way twenty minutes, a voice from the roadside arrested my progress, and in a moment more the wayfaring pedestrian learned the pleasing fact that his saluter was Parker Sawyer himself! We walked together to Br. S.'s "Home Grove." Br. Sawyer's age is forty-nine. Sister S. received me with much cordiality. Learned from Br. S. that I am to preach two evenings in the adjoining village of Oconomowock. Notice of our meetings was read last Sunday by the Methodist pastor of that place, but the favor was refused by the Presbyterian pastor.

Nov. 13.—Spent my forenoon leisure in writing for the paper. After dinner, Br. S. carried me to Nashotah (not the R. R. station), where I posted my articles and other mail matter. Took from the P. O. last week's Her-

ALD OF LIFE, and felt while scanning its columns that I was in the presence of an old friend. Long may it live to gladden the hearts of the life company.

Nashotah is a sort of an Episcopal see in Wisconsin. A bishop resides here, and they have an Episcopal college in the place. Br. S. drove me over the grounds, and we spent a little time in the church edifice.

Our evening meeting at Oconomowock was tolerably well attended. A Methodist festival in the village hindered a considerable number from coming out. The Methodist pastor listened to a portion of the discourse (which was from "dust thou art, etc."), but could not remain to the close. Br. Sawyer followed me with excellent remarks on the immortality question. He is a clear and forcible speaker; and, while listening to him, I could but wish that he would often afford the people within his reach opportunities to hear such instruction from his lips. A drive of four and a half miles brought our family load seasonably back to our home in Summit.

Nov. 14.—Br. and Sister Weeks, from Hartland, spent the afternoon at Br. Sawyer's, to visit with me and to accompany us to the evening meeting.

Our evening audience was much larger than it was last evening, and included Rev. Mr. Jones, Methodist pastor, Rev. Mr. Mills, Methodist local preacher, and Rev. Mr. Montague, the Presbyterian pastor. The last, by invitation, took a seat on the platform, but took no part whatever in the meeting, though personally invited to do so near its close. The discourse was on 1 Cor. 17, 18, and I was favored with much liberty in presenting the subject. Various questions were asked and answered, and it is hoped that some of the seed sown may spring up and bring forth fruit. The principal of the village school kept his pencil in motion throughout the discourse, evidently taking full notes of what was said.

In reference to the resurrection of the dead, one gentleman started a difficulty based upon the assumption, which he had heard somewhere and taken for granted, that the human family, if raised from the dead, would cover the entire surface of the globe to the depth of three feet! My instant answer was that the claim was a prodigious mistake, made in ignorance of the facts of the case; and, seizing a piece of chalk, I placed on the black board behind me some of the data by which a schoolboy in mathematics could readily test the matter and explode the assumption. My friend seemed perfectly satisfied.

When Br. Sawyer went to get his team after meeting, he found that he had been despoiled, by some thief, of a fine new buffalo robe, which had been left on the wagon. We started homeward, with thoughts of those who "took joyfully the spoling of (their) goods." It was after midnight when we retired.

Nov. 15.—A. M., Br. Sawyer started with me and my baggage for Nashota station, and remained there with me till the train for Milwaukee arrived, at 5:30. We parted expecting to meet again on Saturday evening or Sunday. Reaching Milwaukee at 7 o'clock, I took up my quarters at Mr. R. W. Pierce's. Learned from Sister P. that Br. Brown had obtained consent for me to preach next Sunday in Mr. Love's pulpit.

A delightful surprise awaited me after breakfast. Going to the P. O. to get my mail, I found only a drop letter containing these words:

"Rufus: Call at once at 407½ Main Street.—W."

Wondering "whereunto this would grow," I hastened to obey the summons, and speedily found myself in the family of my uncle (father's half-brother), Rev. Washington Wendell, a Methodist preacher, less than two years my senior, whom I had not seen in about twenty years, and of whose being a resident of Milwaukee I was wholly ignorant. The meeting was a happy one.

My uncle's knowledge of my purpose to pass through Milwaukee was accidentally obtained by the mistake of the city postman in carrying my letters to his house. He held on to my mail matter and brought me to his hearth-stone in the way related above.

At about 11 o'clock I called in the rooms of he Young Men's Christian Association, chiefly with the hope that I might get a glimpse of the new Congregational paper, The Advance, recently started in Chicago. It was not there, but the Independent was handed me instead. As I was about leaving, at 11½ o'clock, the young man in charge (who knew nothing concerning me) asked me if I would lead their midday prayer meeting. I told him that I would be glad to do so if I could get back seasonably; so I hastened to Mr. Pierce's partly to report myself and partly to adjust my toilet. Found that the postman had brought me six letters, but these I had to leave unread and hasten back to the prayer-meeting—not without a hint from Sister P. that I ought in some way to bring out our views in the meeting. I was on hand seasonably and opened the meeting in the usual manner. For a Scripture lesson I read chapter xv., of 1 Corinthians, from verse 35 to the end of the chapter; and then I occupied a few minutes with remarks on the subject of the resurrection of the dead. The result astonished me. The resurrection became at once the topic of the speaking and the praying. I wish Adventists could have heard what I heard in that forty-five minutes. One silver-haired old gentleman declared that the Resurrection was "the sweetest doctrine in the Bible;" the city missionary related an affecting incident illustrative of its consoling power in bereavement.

O, thought I, if ministers could only let their people know what God's word declares on this grand theme, how joyfully would it be accepted by thousands of those whose views of the future life are—to borrow the words of Professor Hoppin, of Yale College, "vague, contractory, and unimpressive." What sacrifices should not we as a people gladly make, if God will use us as instruments in uprooting the fable which has turned away attention from that which constitutes the glory of the gospel revelation!

In the afternoon Br. Brown called to see me, and we drove to the house of Rev. Mr. Love, whom Br. B. desired me to see, and whom he wished himself to see in order that a definite understanding might be had in regard to my preaching on Sunday. Mr. Love was not at home. In the evening, however, Br. B. found him, and in conference with him, learned that Mr. Love was not a little perplexed to know what to do about the matter in hand. After some time, Br. B. came to Mr. Pierce's, reported to us, and wished me to call with him at his pastor's study. I did so, and we had a long interview. Of this I shall speak elsewhere. Finding that we could have the church if we wanted it, the question with us was whether under all the circumstances we ought to accept it. Closing the interview with Mr. Love, we conferred with Sister Pierce, and it was decided that it was our duty to go forward, in the name of the Lord, and use the privilege that was offered us. Br. Brown returned and told Mr. Love of our conclusion. We would have preferred the morning hour, but, in deference to Mr. Love's wish, arranged to occupy the evening. (The result proved that this was greatly to our advantage in respect to the numbers in attendance.) Br. Brown then took a notice of my discourse (embracing a full statement of our Life view) to the city paper, so that it would appear on Saturday morning. I spent the night at Br. Brown's.

Nov. 16.—Br. Brown dined with me at my uncle's. Was variously occupied during the day. Toward evening went to my uncle's, expecting (per arrangement of yesterday) to accompany him seven miles out of town, and preach for him to-morrow morning. (He supplies, under the presiding Elder, a Methodist charge at Granville.) But he had abandoned going, the expected conveyance not having come for him. I was on the whole glad, for I preferred to remain in town.

SUNDAY, Nov. 17.—Took part in the morning services at Rev. Mr. Love's church, and listened to an instructive sermon on Christian beneficence. After the service, Deacon Taintor invited me to attend their Sabbath school, which I could not well spare the time to do. A moment before a gentleman whom Mr. Love introduced to me invited me to preach the latter part of the afternoon in the open air somewhere in the city. I wanted to oblige him, but felt compelled to decline from a fear that out-door speaking would unfit my voice for the labor of the evening.

As I was passing out of the church, a brother and sister Remick sought my acquaintance. They are Adventists, lived formerly in New England, and remembered having seen me at the Wilbraham camp-meeting of 1862. They especially remembered the meetings I held that year with the children. At that time Br. R. had not become a disciple of the Saviour; his conversion, I believe, has taken place within the past two years. In the afternoon Br. and Sister Sawyer (who yesterday came to town in their own conveyance) came to Mr. Pierce's and took tea with us.

In the evening, I preached one hour and fifty minutes, on the Life theme, in Mr. Love's pulpit to an attentive congregation of probably, double that of the morning. Br. Love, before closing the meeting, followed me with extended remarks. I shall elsewhere say more about this interesting occasion.

Nov. 18.—Went early to Br. Brown's, and had a brief visit with our dear Br. and Sister Sawyer before they started for home. My visit at their house, last week, was a happy one, and will be long remembered by me. Knowing, before I went to Summit, of Br. S.'s dissent, on some important points, from the views of his Life brethren, I feared (without any valid cause, I grant) that I might find him dogmatical—possibly censorious; but in all this I was agreeably disappointed. He manifested a gentle and loving spirit, and our intercourse was fraternal in every respect. Br. S. is a man of books, and deeply interested in theological inquiries. His belief of life only in Christ dates back to about 1843 (when he resided in Vermont), and he feels a lively interest in the progress of our great reform, which he declares his purpose to help forward more in the future than he has in the past. Not willingly shall I ever pass over the La Crosse Road without turning aside for a visit with Parker Sawyer and his dear family. But my hope is that they will leave their present rural home and settle in some village or city, where social and educational facilities, such as they need but cannot have in Summit, will be within their reach. I ought to add here that Br. S. has in his employ a young man, a Norwegian, who believes the Life view and feels a deep interest in the subject. I believe something was said about his becoming a preacher of the doctrine among the people from his native land, of whom there are many in the West.

When I returned to Mr. Pierce's I was informed by Sister P. that a lady, who heard me last evening, had called first at Mr. Love's and then on her to have an interview with me, avowing herself a believer for years of the doctrine I preached. Her name was Mrs. Fifield. I called on her at once (her residence being but a little way off), and had a very pleasant interview. When I casually spoke of my purpose to visit New Rutland, Ill., and of Br. Geo. H. Fisher as the one who invited me there, she informed me that Br. Fisher was her husband's cousin. Mr. F. presently came home. These friends came from Maine, and are familiar with the names of Dr. Billings and other Life believers. Sister F. accepts our Life view fully, but has been almost starved out from never having been able to hear anything on the subject in Milwaukee. Now that she has become acquainted with Sr. Pierce, will know Br. Brown's family, and intends also to subscribe for the HERALD OF LIFE, she will breathe more freely. She showed me the most dilapidated fragment of a copy of our paper that I have ever seen. I shall carry it with me to New York to show our EDITOR.

One of Br. Brown's associates in the deaconship of Mr. Love's church is Deacon Taintor (already mentioned!) At the house of the latter Br. and Sr. B. and myself took tea and spent the evening. Deacon T. and his wife are with us on the sleep of the dead and destruction of the wicked, and have now perhaps almost no remaining doubt on life only in Christ. A portion of our happy evening visit was spent in explaining passages presenting difficulties to our Life view. Br. Taintor has for many years been Secretary of the Milwaukee and Prairie du Chien Railroad. May the day not be far distant when every one of the seven deacons in the Park Street Congregational Church shall unite with Brn. Brown and Taintor in disowning the doctrine of eternal torment. A good beginning has been made; let the ball of progress be kept rolling on.

Nov. 19.—Br. Brown and myself had a long and interesting interview with Rev. Mr. Love. No words can too strongly express my grateful appreciation of the noble-heartedness of this excellent Christian Minister. His whole bearing toward Br. Brown and myself, under circumstances which to him could not have been otherwise than peculiarly trying in sundry respects, has deeply impressed me with the feeling that he is a man of rare transparency of character, of sterling integrity, sincere piety, and utterly incapable of ungenerous demeanor toward anybody. My worst wish concerning the dear brother is that he may yet become an earnest advocate of the doctrines he permitted me to preach to his people. I do not suspect him of having the least leaning toward those views at present; but I feel sure that, should he ever embrace them, he would be much better able to defend them than he is the dominant doctrine of the divine penalty.

The relations existing between Br. Brown and his pastor are those of confidence and brotherly love. The former when changing his relation from the Plymouth to the Spring Street Church, made a frank avowal of his religious views to Br. Love, and had the latter deemed it advisible, would have been glad to state them fully before the entire church. Much as Br. Brown would deprecate any interruption of fraternal and peaceful relations between himself and the church to which he belongs, he feels deeply the importance of the precious truths committed to his trust, and loyalty to these truths he fully means shall ever be paramount with him above all other considerations. May he have all needed wisdom from the Lord, so that he may know how most successfully to promote the cause he loves.

Br. Brown and I called on Sister Remick and her little daughter. The latter has given her heart to Christ and rejoices in his love. What sight is more beautiful than to see children growing up in the fear of the Lord. Br. Remick purposes moving soon to Iowa, but they would probably abandon that if Advent meetings could be established here. They hunger for what they cannot get in any of the churches in the city.

I took tea at Mr. Fifield's and had, I trust, a profitable visit with them.

Having packed my baggage at Mrs. Pierce's, and made a good-by call at my uncle's, I went to spend the night at Br. Brown's, "ready to depart on the morrow."

The pioneer character of our dear brother and sister Brown interested me much. Br. B. came here in the Fall of 1834 (not 1833 as I have wrongly stated), and Sister B. took up her abode here the following Spring—the first white woman who settled in Milwaukee. (Sister Pierce's parents were the first white settlers who came here after Br. Brown's.) Br. B. is sixty-four years of age. As Br. Brown's and the family of Sister Pierce were the first to bring civilization to Milwaukee, it seems fitting that they should also be pioneers in our theological reform in this city. In going from this place, I feel convinced that here is a most inviting field for labor on the Life theme. It seems to me that an earnest movement should soon be made to bring our views fully before all in this city who could be induced to come and hear them. The indications are that there would be many such, and that an interest could be awakened here that would tell powerfully against the acceptance of the doctrine of immortal suffering by the masses of professed Christians. The single fact that our views have had one hearing in Br. Love's church would do much to enlist the attention of many, even among those who know of the occasion only by hearsay. Let us pray that the friends of truth in Milwaukee may be quick to discern their duty in regard to this matter.

Nov. 20—At an early hour Br. Brown took me to the cars, and at 7:30 I started for Chicago. In passing through Kenosha, Wis., I thought of Br. Sereno Fisk, with whom I have a personal acquaintance; but I had not time to stop and visit him. At a quarter past 11 o'clock I arrived in Chicago—this being my first visit to Illinois. R. W.

MEETINGS IN BROOKLYN, N. Y.—Preaching every Sunday evening in Sawyer's Hall, corner of Fulton Avenue and Jay street, at 7½ o'clock. Entrance on Jay street, at the sign of "SAWYER'S PIANOFORTE ROOMS." The main subject is, The Scripture Doctrine of a future Life, connected, as it is, with the Coming and kingdom of Jesus Christ.

"IS SAUL AMONG THE PROPHETS?"

No one thought it possible that such a man as Saul could be among the prophets; and it is little less strange that the N. Y. Herald should produce such articles on passing events, and with such headings as those we have recently copied from its columns; and this week we find another of like character, from which we give the following extract.

SIGNS AND WONDERS IN THE HEAVENS ABOVE AND IN THE EARTH BENEATH.

Since the beginning of October we have had to chronicle a succession of hurricanes and earthquakes that did immense damage in the West Indies and on the Gulf coast. First we had to record the tornado at Galveston, Brownsville and Matamoras on October 3d; next came the destructive gales at Martinique and St. Vincent islands on October 7th, followed by the still more disastrous hurricane that tore all before it in St. Thomas on October 29th, and in Porto Rico, St. Domingo, and at Cape Haytien on the following day. All the steamers plying in the Gulf of Mexico reported tempestuous weather in the beginning of the first and second weeks of October and November, and the United States steamer Wilderness, with ex-Minister Romero on board, had a rough experience of the gale at the beginning of November. Succeeding each of these hurricanes were shocks of earthquake, following the same course traversed by the tornadoes, and corresponding in violence to the preceding gale. The most violent of these convulsions was felt at St. Bartholomew, St. Martin, St. Croix, St. Thomas and Saba islands, at Mayaguez, in Porto Rico, and St. Domingo City on the afternoon and night of November 18th and 19th. The observations made at Mayaguez establish the fact that the course of this tremendous earthquake was from east to west. At that place water spouted out of the earth, while the earthquake caused such an upheaving in the Virgin islands that some of the smaller ones are reported now as totally destroyed.

We do not pretend to have the gift of prophecy, nor have we any desire to alarm people of weak nerves; but, in view of the fact above stated, it is our duty to call attention to the shaky condition of our globe at the present time. Almost every day for some time past we have published startling accounts of terrible earthquakes; of volcanic eruptions from old craters and from new clefts in the crust of the globe; of the sinking down of islands beneath the ocean; of the rising of the sea fifty feet above its ordinary level; of tornadoes such as have hardly been known since the flood; of showers of meteors, and of general disturbance in the heavens above and in the earth beneath. What all these things portend we do not pretend to say, but they are ominous. The first question that arises is, has the world become so wicked that the vials of wrath spoken of in the Apocalypse are now being poured down upon it? And here we think the writers on prophecy, the expounders of Daniel and St. John the Evangelist, are at fault and behind the times. Where too, are the Millerites?

The prophets and revealers of prophecy and the penetrating mediums being unable to satisfy us, we must ask what are men of science doing to explain this startling phenomenon? They, too, seem to be ignorant. But our scientific men, appear not to have any knowledge of the matter. Mr. Dellisier, a French savant, it seems, actually predicted the earthquake and hurricane at St. Thomas and other parts of the West Indies. He even gave the date the 12th of November, and it was on the night of the 11th that the convulsions of nature commenced or were preceded by a "terrible display of electrical light." From that time to the 19th, Jamaica, St. Thomas and a large portion of the West Indies were in a fearfully convulsed state. Mr. Dellisier, it is said, made his calculations from astronomical observations and from the influence of planets on the surface of the earth. It is reported he is preparing a work on the subject to be read to the Academy of Sciences at Paris. This work will be looked for with great interest, and when we get it the religious and spiritual prophets may be helped out of their dilemma. We may then know whether the spheres of the universe are going to jostle against each other and bring the world to an end. But where is philosopher Loomis and all our other savans just now? The earthquakes and hurricanes have bewildered them as much as the meteors did. It is evident that if we must have information about such phenomena, so as to be able to "sleep o' nights" without fear of the earth being smashed up, we shall have to find more watchful and abler astronomers at home.

In profane history, among the earliest accounts of remarkable convulsions of the globe is that which destroyed Herculaneum and Pompeii in the year A. D. 63. Sixteen years after these cities were buried in the ashes from Vesuvius. Some countries are frequently visited by earthquakes. Calabria, the southern extremity of Italy, and the neighboring island of Sicily are examples. From February, 1783, to the end of 1786, less than four years, this country was in a continual disturbed state, when nearly a thousand shocks were felt, and most of them of great violence. Ancient Antioch, in Syria, was visited several times by earthquakes, and in A. D. 526 the most disastrous one occurred of which there is any record. Gibbon states that two hundred and fifty thousand people perished at that time. In more modern times that of Lisbon in 1755, of Java in 1772, and in Chili in 1822, are the most noted. In six minutes sixty thousand persons perished at Lisbon. Humboldt estimated that the extent of the earth's surface shaken by that earthquake was equal to four times the area of Europe. At the Java earthquake one of the loftiest volcanoes, with an area fifteen miles long and six broad, sunk down and carried forty villages with it. . . . . We call upon the people and politicians to cease from wickedness and sectional strife, for when "the times are out of joint" we may expect the forces of nature to war against us.

COMFORT FROM LITTLE THINGS.

THE heart in its despondency may be cheered by trifling incidents, and nerved for strength and endurance. An old lady, who had moved from cultivated society to a desolate region, was once asked if she did not feel homesick and gloomy, and she replied: "Only once during an almost uninterrupted succession of snow-storms. We could not get out for any purpose; our supplies were running low. Save a neighbor in the cabin at the extremity of the woods, the only living creatures that we knew were a pack of wolves, that sometimes swept by; on one occasion there was not less than thirty of them. That was a dismal time; my heart almost sank within me. Just then, when I felt like giving up entirely, I heard a sweet song—a clear, cheerful piping of a bird. You cannot tell how it cheered and thrilled me. I looked from the window, and there right on the corner of our dwelling, it sat carolling just as sweet as if it were June. This gave me fresh courage. Said I to my husband, 'If that wee bit of a thing can sing, much more can I;' and I struck up a hymn of praise to God, and his bass voice made an excellent accompaniment. We felt better, and that was the last of our blues."

FROM EMELINE T. HOBBS.

CAMBRIDGEPORT, MASS., Nov. 29, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I enclose $1 for a new subscriber to the HERALD OF LIFE.

I was again disappointed in not seeing you during your recent visit to Boston.

I am interested in the paper, in its teachings generally, and am greatly encouraged, from time to time, at the signs of progress manifested.

A most encouraging feature is the fact that so many young men of intelligence and character are becoming interested.

"Old men for counsel, young men for war" is an old saying, and we, who have committed ourselves to these truths, have got to "fight it out on this line." And we will do it, by the help of the God of battles, who can "teach our hands to war and our fingers to fight," whether with the pen or living voice. We can come off more than conquerors through him that hath loved us. If we take with us the sword of the Spirit, we can put to flight the armies of the aliens, and turn orthodoxy to searching the Scriptures.

I listened to a very fine and most Scriptural discourse on the resurrection by an "evangelical" minister. It was spoiled, in a measure by a mixture of "immortal soulism," but I live in hopes of seeing the truth prevail.

An evening or two since I stepped into prayer meeting, and the leader, in closing, told us, in authoritative tone, without a word of proof, that we have "immortal souls, and we should exist as long as eternity." Alas, what gross darkness covers the land. But we have the light which will illuminate and make to shine these dark places, where orthodoxy has sown its seed. I am glad to worship with any people, be they orthodox, Baptist, Methodist, or by whatever name they may be called, providing they follow Jesus our Lord and Master.

We must have in lively exercise the Christian grace of charity, which suffers long and is kind; hopeth all things and endureth all things, and endeavor by the help of the Lord to show up the false teachings of the day. They will by and by, Babylon like, "sink to rise no more."

FROM ESTHER G. MCCULLOUGH.

WEST CHESTER, PA., Dec. 8, 1867.

BR. STORRS: Well, Br. Grim paid us a visit last Sunday and gave two lectures, one in the afternoon, the other in the evening, in the Horticultural Hall, and they were well attended. The audience, I am happy to say, were of the intelligent part of the community, and seemed to be qnite interested in all he said. I am sure that good will result from his visit here. The clergy are warning their congregations against going to hear them. We think we will have Mr. Grim to pay us another visit in February, while court is in session here, as there are generally a great many people in town at that time, and we would like to have him come then.

FROM MRS. D. C. FIFIELD.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Dec. 1, 1867.

I CANNOT afford to do without the HERALD OF LIFE, or some other paper of this kind, now that I have ascertained how to obtain it. I have been a believer for some time and can read your paper with pleasure and profit. It may not be uninteresting to you to know we moved from Maine here, three years ago last August. One discourse of my belief is all I have heard, which was at the Spring street orthodox church, by Rufus Wendell.

Rev. Mr. Love, pastor of the church, thought an apology necessary for allowing it, which he made in a Christian manner at the close of the services.

Br. Wendell being a stranger to me, no time was lost in making his acquaintance, which was more interesting on finding he knew some of our Eastern friends, and was going directly to visit others in Illinois.

By this accidental favor, found there were some believers here, which made me glad. Hope there are more still, and some one will come and preach the gospel to us ere long. I feel encouraged by seeing Br. W. and pray his visit this way may be of great profit.

Your sister in Christ.

A LOVE-FEAST IN S. C.

THE South Carolina Charleston Advocate, a Methodist paper, speaking of a Love-feast among the colored people, gives some of the expressions of these freedmen, samples of which are as follows:

"'Master Jesus is here—never day like this—my soul is bursting full.' 'I feel like the King's daughter "all glorious within"—my joy is more than tongue can tell.' 'I feel new-born to-day—Jesus runs about in my poor heart. He has broken the chains which bound my soul to satan—I will praise him.' 'I sought God by digging deep till a living spring burst in, and like a fountain it flows this moment.' I feel God all within and all without.' 'What a morning is this! No whip for going to meeting now. Bless Massa Jesus and Massa Sherman. No selling babes and my husband now. I can't help serve my God better.' 'I am not ashamed or afraid to own my Jesus. My old massa said he would whip my religion out of me, but every cut made me cling closer to the God who delivered Daniel, and that God delivered me.' 'I once thought I was something, but I prayed and prayed till I found I was nothing; then I felt the arms of Jesus.' 'Jesus burst daylight into my soul four years ago, and I walk in the light.' 'Long years ago I joined church and followed Christ afar of. Three weeks ago I took another hold, and now I feel the pulling; glory to the Lamb.' 'Good morning, brethren and sisters in the Lord! You all look like angels! The preachers are Joshua and Caleb—they give us Canaan fruit in cluster. We camp on Pisgah's top.' 'Once I thought most of water, and I was a Baptist; but when I learned to think most of the Spirit, I became a Methodist, and now I sing, "I'm a Methodist by name, and hope to live and die the same." But I do love Jesus and all his children. For sixty years I served God in the dark hours of bondage, but since I'se free seems like I have wings. We ought to serve him better now.' 'I walked twenty miles to this quarterly meeting, but my foot was noways tired. Love is different from the lash to move the foot. Oh! how I love my Jesus, and, my brethren, do help me to praise him.'"

Thy Kingdom Come.

BY JEAN INGELOW.

Thy kingdom come.
I heard a Seer cry: The wilderness,
The solitary place,
Shall yet be glad for him, and he shall bless
(Thy kingdom come) with his revealed face.
The forests: they shall drop their precious gum,
And shed for him their balm: and he shall yield
The grandeur of his speech to charm the field.

Then all the soothed winds shall drop to listen
(Thy kingdom come).
Comforted waters waxen calm shall glisten
With bashful tremblement beneath his smile;
And Echo ever the while
Shall take, and in her awful joy repeat
The laughter of his lips—(Thy kingdom come):
And hills that sit apart shall be no longer dumb;
No, they shall shout and shout,
Raining their lovely loyalty along the dewy plain,
And valleys round about.

And all the well-contented land made sweet
With flowers she opened at his feet,
Shall answer: shout and make the welkin ring,
And tell it to the stars, shout, shout and sing;
Her cup being full to the brim,
Her poverty made rich with him.

Her yearning satisfied to the utmost sum—
Lift up, O Earth! prepare thy song,
It shall not yet be long.
Lift up, O earth! for he shall come again,
Thy Lord; and he shall reign, and he shall reign—
Thy kingdom come.

Children's Department.

My Father's Brake.

To the Little Folks: When I was a boy my father used to raise flax, which was manufactured into thread and cloth. The process of preparing the flax for the spinner was a slow and somewhat tedious one. Perhaps your grandparents will tell you all about it, if you desire them. I will speak more particularly of one thing, and that for the purpose of illustrating and enforcing the truth, which I hope will greatly benefit you. After the flax was made tender by rotting, as it was called, it was ready for the dressing process, the first part of which was the Brake. This was a kind of form six feet long, with four strips of board set on edge, with others to mesh between them which were fastened into the heavy head of the brake. The flax was taken in one hand, by the operator, while the head was raised by the other, and the flax was placed between its huge jaws: then down came the upper jaw with a great crash, breaking the brittle flax to shivers. I can almost hear that terrible smashing even now, it so affected my young mind, as it went bang, bang, from morning until night; and its sound might be heard as far as a gun! But our interest was the more awakened as we saw how fast and perfectly it crushed the brittle stalks between its long jaws! Well, you see this was for the purpose of separating the stalk or woody part of the flax from the bark or fiber which makes the thread and cloth. This stalk was necessary for its growth and the production of its more valuable part (the fibre); but now that the time has come for its destruction, a higher use being required even that, perhaps of the production of a fine collar or handkerchief for a good child.

The Moral, here taught us, is, the destruction of one thing (which has had its use) for the purpose of making another for a superior use or benefit.

Our application is this: Man is a creature possessing volition, or will: we choose or will to do or act so and so; then we perform the action. Our nature being only an animal one, we only will and act according to the natural senses with which we are endowed. But as God has a higher destiny or purpose in our creation, he has instituted means for its accomplishment; this is embraced or comprised in what is called the Gospel. Our will is selfish, i. e., seeking to promote our own happiness without regard to that of others. But God, having a higher object in view toward us and for our acceptance, comes to us with his great Brake of discipline. To make good children they must submit their wills to that of their parents, as saith the Word: "children obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right." Eph. vi., 1. This obedience teaches us to live not for ourselves, but for others: this is the first grand rudiment of Christianity. God says to us, "Son, give me thy heart."

Jesus, as our pattern, says to his Father, "Not my will, but thine be done." The subjugation of our self, mind, or will, to our dear Father in heaven is our life work: and his means to bring us into this subjugation are called chastenings. These, like the flax brake, are awfully severe; but, as in that case, are as truly necessary for the future use or advantage sought for. And let us always remember that be the discipline or scourging, ever so severe, is none the less the administration of a God of love; for, "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." Then in all your little or big trials and troubles think of the Brake, and the fine linen as its results. As a glorious immortal nature, by a resurrection from the dead, was the result of Christ's perfect obedience, or a complete subjugation of his will to that of his Father; so you, too, by like submission may have a like nature and reward. Severe trial, prolonged discipline, are necessities of our condition; but an exceeding great reward as surely shall be their result, if all be wrought in God, or if we in all things seek his pleasure and glory. As we value things proportionate to what they cost us, let us give all to, and do all for Christ; then shall we receive all in, (or, through) Christ, even eternal life in his everlasting kingdom.

"Assumptions."

I noticed an article with the above heading, in the Herald of Nov. 6th, from the pen of Br. J. S. White. I agree with him that many of the points mentioned in his article are assumptions, of the most absurd and unwarrantable kind, although some points are not. But speaking of assumptions reminds me of a discourse by one of our brethren last Fall, at Exeter, in this State. He was at the time a believer in, and a preacher of, the coming of the Lord in 1867, basing his argument upon the assumption that the "abomination of desolation," spoken of by Daniel the prophet, refers to the Papal power. In the discourse I refer to, while speaking of the 2300 days (or years) of Daniel viii., after mentioning the fact that that prophetic period was variously translated—some rendering it 2200, some 2300, and some 2400 days—the brother came to the conclusion that 2300 is the right rendering, giving his reason for that conclusion in the following words: "I am under the necessity of assuming this position, in order to sustain my theory." Those are his words, verbatim.

In another part of his discourse, the brother spoke of the shortening of the days referred to by Christ, as recorded by Matthew and Mark. He said Christ had reference to the 1260 days, and that they were shortened twelve years. He referred to Daniel i., 34—"Now, when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help," etc.—and taking the position that the "little help" spoken of by Daniel, referred to a cessation of the papal persecution, he located that cessation of persecution between the darkening of the sun, in 1780, and the beginning of the French revolution, in 1792; giving his reason for so doing, in precisely the same words that he used in the case of the 2300 days. He also gave precisely the same reason for another conclusion in the same discourse.

While listening to the frank admission of the brother, that those main pillars of the 1867 argument are based upon mere assumptions, I could but think that such an argument was built upon a very sandy foundation. And yet, notwithstanding the whole "definite time" argument is sustained by nothing but assumptions of this kind, we have been considered as the veriest heretics if we do not swallow it all down, readily.

But while speaking thus freely of the glaring errors into which some of the brethren have fallen, I remember that they are my brethren, cherishing the same blessed hope that I do; that I myself held many of the same ideas in 1854, and for some time after; and also I remember that the apostle says, "Charity suffereth long, and is kind." Although some of our brethren have taken positions concerning the fulfilment of prophecy which have led them to many wrong conclusions, our love for them should not abate one whit; knowing, as we do, their sincerity and honesty of purpose, and knowing that the Lord makes more account of an honest heart, even if the theology be imperfect, than he does of an orthodox head, worn by a hypocrite.

Life from the Dead.

In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Gen. ii., 17.

God gave a positive command to our first parents, and also announced a penalty to be inflicted if they did not obey. Thus a law was given. This law was violated. Hence the sentence must be executed, "Thou shalt surely die;" and he did die before the day of the Lord had run out. Did the death of Adam meet the demand of God's law? We think it did; for he suffered all that was threatened.

As Adam was our representative, and we being possessed with his nature, the whole race are subjects of death; or, in other words, after man had sinned by eating the forbidden fruit, death passed through upon all his posterity, and we are all going down to the grave without any hope of ever being extricated from it, if it had not been for our heavenly Father's love and mercy. He gave his only begotten Son, to die and go into the tomb. But he rose a mighty conqueror and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. He now has the keys of death and hades. He has thus purchased the right of redemption.

We want to find if there are any conditions attached to the resurrection of the dead. Jesus says, He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. John xi., 25. Paul says, If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you. Rom. viii., 11. Much more Scripture might be quoted to show that the resurrection is conditional, but we think this is sufficient. If the reader thinks it is not, please read John vi.; there we find all the Father has given to Christ he will raise up at the last day. These promises necessarily exclude those who do not believe in him, and who have not his Spirit, from the promised resurrection, or there is no meaning in language.

To illustrate the case. Suppose I should give out word that I would pay every man that would come and work for me two dollars a day. Who would think of claiming pay if he did not come? No one. And the promise of life from the dead is on the same principle. O, how God did love the human family to institute a plan that extended down where men had gone, and gave them a chance to repent of their wicked deeds, so when the time comes that this earth will be more glorious than it was in its infancy, then those who have been partakers of the divine nature, or have been begotten by the Spirit of Christ, will be raised from the dead; and in consequence of being raised, they cannot die any more; for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. So says the blessed Son, of God, Luke xx., 36. When he comes to be admired in all them that love him, all the human family who have made a covenant with him by sacrifice, will be made immortal, and have a share in the earth made new. O, what sweet consolation to the weary pilgrim when he can say, with confidence, this hope is his; and more especially, those who expect to realize their hope shortly. O, what a glorious thought to contemplate on the plan of salvation and redemption! How it did rejoice my poor heart when I fully believed that a future life was conditional; and unless the conditions were complied with, the whole race would be held in the embrace of death. But when we understand the nature of man, that he has no immortal part until he is begotten again and made a partaker of the divine nature, then it looks plain. O, what a God of love, and the excellency of his beloved Son, as they are in harmony with each other.

According to the word of God, we see it was of importance that Christ should die and be raised from the dead; for, if he had not been raised from the dead, death would have been an eternal sleep. But the grave could not hold him; death was only a shadow to him and to them who are his, while it is a substance to the wicked.

How glad I am that these things are so. Bless the Lord, O my soul. "God is love." Now if God is love, when the whole race had the seed of mortality sown in their nature, and, in consequence, all would forever remain in death, had it not been for the plan of God through Jesus Christ who gave his life a ransom for many, would that plan be made with a penalty that was not in the law? We think not. Let us look at the record. The angel of the Lord said, Fear not, for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people; for unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. Luke ii., 10, 11. Now, if this would make any one's condition worse, would it be great joy to them? We think not. Most of our Advent people believe that if Christ had not been raised from the dead, there would not have been any resurrection of the dead: and we think this was Paul's faith, 1 Cor. xv., 12, and onward. If the view is correct that wicked men are to be made alive from the dead to suffer the pains of dying a second time, the birth of Christ could not have been good news to that class, most certainly. We think all reasonable men will admit this to be a fact; so we come to the conclusion that his coming did not effect the resurrection of them that die without the Spirit of Christ. If it did, what shall we do with the message of the angel to the shepherds?

To illustrate the case. Suppose a fond mother had a darling child, that was the joy of the family and the idol of their hearts, and that child was taken sick, and after many days of pain and suffering it sweetly falls asleep in the embrace of death. The fond parent mourns the loss of her darling child; and just before they are to carry it away and lay it in the cold grave, a man comes along and says to the mother, Weep not; for behold I bring you glad tidings of great joy. I know a man that will cause your child to live again. The mother has confidence in the man's word, so the person is sent for. He comes and says he can make the child live, but it will only live to suffer the most excruciating pain and then die again. Is this good news to the mother? Not at all. She would say, Let my darling rest; and so say we. Let the wicked quietly sleep; and so they will, according to the inspired word. Now for a few texts on this point. "Drought and heat consume the snow waters, so doth the grave those which have sinned: the womb shall forget him; the worm shall feed sweetly on him; he shall be no more remembered; and wickedness shall be broken as a tree." Job xxiv., xix., 20.

"Like sheep they are laid in the grave." Psa. xlix., 14. "Man that is in honor and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish." Psa. xlix., 20. Isaiah says, "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise: therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." Isa. xxvi., 14.

Jeremiah says, "In their heat I will make their feasts, and I will make them drunken that they may rejoice and sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake saith the Lord." Jer. li., 39. Read, if you please, Daniel v., and see if that prophecy has not been fulfilled. We think it has.

We have come down the stream of time from where the law was given to Adam, showing by a few of the many texts that wicked dead men will never be make alive. Now may the reader and writer be found worthy of a share in the kingdom of our God when Christ comes to reign on mount Zion. I pray God to so enlighten us with his truth that we may be ready in that glorious morning which is about to dawn; then those who have courted the favor of God, instead of the favor of the world, will be sharers of the matchless love of God with all the blood-washed throng, and in peace and love enter the kingdom to go no more out forever. Now for the sake of that life that is to be given to them that put on Christ, let us shake ourselves from everything that is unlike Christ, and be washed in his precious blood so we can be presented blameless when he comes. Amen.

Your brother in Christ, the Life-giver.

Breaking up of the Jaffa Colony.

The Jaffa colony about which so much has been said in the papers during the past year, originated in this section. Twenty-three of the ill-starred colony returned to this State a few days since, having been assisted by the charities of managers of steamships and packet lines. Some of these persons tell hard stories of Adams, the leader. They looked upon him as an impostor and swindler of the deepest dye. Had it not been for the American Consul in Jaffa, the colony would have starved to death for the want of means, Adams having from the start managed to become custodian of the funds. Appearances would indicate that the followers of Adams have become sadly demoralized. Although rejoiced to again tread the soil of their native heath, they find themselves without cash or property, having invested and lost their all in the visionary schemes of Adams. They left their homes in good circumstances, and were, all or nearly all professing Christians of the Baptist or Methodist persuasion. Many of them now return undone, entertaining the faith of the infidel. After months of untold suffering, the veil is removed, and Adams, instead of being inspired of God to raise up a "new nation" beneath the shadow of Jerusalem, was only a tool in the hands of Brigham Young to establish and propagate Mormonism. The Christian world is thankful for the failure of the Jaffa scheme.—Boston Advertiser.

Antichrist.

This shall be the mark whereby you may know him: He shall set himself against God and against Christ, for he is an enemy of the cross of Christ. Why then, say you, are not the Jews, and Mohammed, and the Turk, either all, or the most wicked of them, so called, seeing they utterly refuse all Christian religion? Because none of these sit in the temple of God, which is the place where Antichrist shall advance himself: and because Antichrist shall not in open show set himself against Christ as doth Mohammed, and the Turk, but subtlely and craftily, like an evil and ungracious servant. He will not openly speak his blasphemies, or spit at the gospel of God, or defy the name of Christ; but he will call himself "the servant of God;" perhaps, "the vicar of Christ:" and perhaps, "the servant of God's servants;" or perhaps, "the head, or the chief member of the church." [Titles assumed by the popes.] He shall say he is led with the zeal of God's house, and shall do nothing less; for he shall seek himself, he shall say, he seeks the glory of God, when all that he doth is for the enriching and ambitious enlarging of his own worldly pomp and vanity.

In matters of princes, if any take upon him the name of an ambassador, or deputy to a prince, having no commission thereto, and in this boldness presume to levy and raise a power, and force the subjects to follow him, although he work all this under the name and by the color of the prince's authority, as is the manner of rebels to do, yet he is a traitor, and his doings are not well thought of because he deals in the prince's matters without warrant from the prince.

Even so Antichrist; he shall come in the name of Christ, yet will he do all things against Christ, and under pretence and color of serving Christ, he shall devour the sheep and people of Christ; he shall deface whatsoever Christ hath taught; he shall quench the fire Christ hath kindled; those plants which Christ hath planted he shall root up; he shall undermine that house which Christ hath built; he shall be contrary to Christ; his faith contrary to the faith of Christ, and his life contrary to the life of Christ. Is any man desirous to know Antichrist? His coming shall be notable; it shall astonish the world. By this mark ye may know him: he shall be contrary to Christ. To show you at large this contrariety, by comparison of things contrary in Christ and Antichrist, would ask long time. It shall be sufficient that we consider only some few wherein they are manifestly contrary, that by them judgment may be made of the residue.

St. Paul saith, Heb. x., With one offering hath he consecrated forever them that are sanctified. Again: We are sanctified by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once made. What is he then that saith, I make priests to offer a daily sacrifice for the sins of the people, by whom the offering up of the body of Christ is made every day? He is contrary to Christ; he is Antichrist.

St. Paul saith, Eph. i., God hath appointed Christ over all things, to be the head of the church. What is he then, that saith, I am the head of the church? which saith, All the churches of God are knit in me; you must understand as I understand; you must hear with mine ears, and see with mine eyes; I will govern and direct you? He is contrary to Christ; this is Antichrist.

Christ ordained that the communion should be ministered under both kinds, Matt xxvi. What is he, then, that delivers it to the people but under one kind? He is contrary to Christ; he breaks the first institution of the Lord's Supper; he is Antichrist.

Christ saith, John xviii., My kingdom is not of this world. What is he, then, that saith, I am lord of lords, and king of kings: I have a right to both swords; my power and authority reacheth over all the kingdoms of the world? He is contrary to Christ; he is Antichrist. Christ washed his disciples' feet, John xiii., What is he, then, that gives his feet to be kissed of kings and emperors? He is contrary to Christ; he is Antichrist. Christ paid tribute to Cæsar, Matt. xvii. What is he, then, that exempts himself and his clergy from the temporal sword and authority? He is contrary to Christ; he is Antichrist.

Christ allowed marriage, and reproved fornication. What is he, then, that allows fornication and forbids marriage? He is contrary to Christ; he is Antichrist. Christ saith, John v., Search the Scriptures. What is he, then, which saith, Give not that which is holy to dogs, neither cast pearls before swine; ye may not search the Scriptures? He is contrary to Christ; he is Antichrist. These are the certain and undoubted marks of Antichrist—Br. Jewell, who died A. D. 1571; one of the best and most able of the British Reformers.

Mission to Colored People.

New York, Nov. 26, 1867.

Br. Storrs: As I have just received a barrel filled with clothing, beans, and pork, from the friends in Middlebury, Vt.; and as it was requested to be acknowledged in the Herald of Life, and as there are many of the readers of your paper that have desired me to write, through the Herald, to them of my mission work; with your permission I will say a few words, though time is very precious, and we are very busy, now the weather has became cold, visiting from house to house, and in the lanes and alleys of this great city. I have taken a house in almost the center of the lowest and most degraded locality in the city; and as our work is entirely among the colored people, we have opened our mission house where they can come without hats, bonnets, shawls, or coats, or shoes on their feet. If you was to see our congregations, you would wonder were they came from. It looks almost like a ragged school till we have them washed, combed, and go to our barrels and clothe them, and then you do not know them.

We have been enabled, by the assistance of the readers of the Crisis, to administer to the wants of hundreds in the garrets and cellars. Some we found sick, without food, bed, table, or chairs, as all had been sold to pay the rent and the next month was nearly due. Our first business is to get nourishment for the body; and we sometimes buy it, take it home, cook it, and carry it to them. Next, get some straw for them to lie on; a tick, if we have it; a clean sheet, bed quilt, and make them comfortable. Then we can sing and pray and they will listen attentively to all we have to say. And then we go again to do the same thing somewhere else. So our time is filled up day in and day out. Some days we have visited 78 families; and three or four of them in about the condition we have mentioned.

The colored people of these streets Leonard, Laurens, Thomas, Thompson, and Jersey streets, are in a deplorable condition. Some of the rooms are back in the rear so far that sunshine never touches them, and so dark that we have to take hold of each other's hands to guide us along the stair ways: and when we get on the stairs, they shake so that we think we will fall. Before we reach the top of the house, we find one of the Lord's little ones hid away, sick, alone; no one to pity, no one to take any care of them, until, as they say, "The Lord puts it into somebody's heart to visit them." Then again we go into a house and find a family of seven, the father lying in consumption; the mother pale and emaciated, trying to earn a living by washing and ironing; some of the children picking cinders; some at home because they have not got shoes to go out. So we find them, all kinds of cases, and all kinds of diseases. And this is why we have started this mission down town, right among them, so that we can get those we visit through the day out to meeting at night, and to Sunday school, and to meeting on Sunday. Thus far we have succeeded admirably. The Lord has been with us and supplied all our wants; and we feel still to trust in him,

We have no "backer," as the world calls it. We have taken this place for the mission and missionaries; and are trusting to the Lord to support it. We feel he will do it; and when it is not supported, we shall conclude that our work is done. I have been in just such a strait place many times in my missionary experience; but never knew the Lord to leave or forsake me: bless his holy name. There are but three of us laboring, and we find enough for six to do. In fact, we are doing too much; more than we are able to do long at a time. For the body will break down. But thus far the Lord has given strength according to our day: and our confidence is in him, and not in man,

Do pray, brethren and sisters, that we may have grace to do our whole duty; not only to do the will of God, but to suffer it also.

From your sister in highways and hedges.

Anna E. Smith,

No. 14 Laurens street, New York.

Note by the Editor.—Sister Smith and her associates, from what we hear, are doing a good work, and we trust all, who can, will lend them a helping hand. Let those in this city, who have time, call on them and satisfy themselves; and let such as have old clothes and other things to part with send in soon as may be at this open door.

Riches of the Bible.—The wealth of the Bible is inexhaustible, and illustrates the Divine fulness. Some one says:

It is the book of laws, to show the right and wrong. It is the book of wisdom that makes the foolish wise. It is the book of truth, which detects all human errors. It is the book of life, which shows how to avoid everlasting death. It contains the most authentic entertaining history ever published. It is a perfect book of divinity. It is a book of biography. It is a book of travels. It is a book of voyages. It is the best ever written. It is the young man's best companion. It is the ignorant man's dictionary. It promises an eternal reward to the faithful and believing.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE EXAMINER TRACTS.

No. 1. Earth, not Heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 5. Moral Depravity; by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 7. Doom of the Ungodly: or, The Wicked Dead remain eternally under death's dominion. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price 5 cents.

No. 8. The Wages of Sin: by a Presbyterian Clergyman. Price, 5 cents.

No. 10. Letters to a Clergyman; or, Life only through Christ, not a heresy; by Dr. J. K. Finley, Pittsburg, Pa. Price, 5 cents.

The foregoing tracts are the Bible Examiner size i. e., octavo; and are 16 pages each. Price, 5 cents single. Four of either can be sent for 2 cents postage; where that number is called for, we will send them at our own expense. They will be sold at $3 per 100; but in that case, sent at the expense of the purchaser. One dozen of the foregoing will be sent for 50 cents, and we will pay the postage.

No. 9. The Essential Baptism; by the Editor of the Bible Examiner, 33 pages. Price, 7 cents.

The following are 12mo. Tracts, of 24 pages each:

Man's Nature and Destiny; or, the Animal man and the Spiritual man. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs. Price, 5 cents.

The Atonement, by Geo. Storrs, and The Gospel Hope, by the same; both works now printed in one Tract. Price, 5 cents.

TERMS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE.

Two Dollars a Year; or, 52 numbers; One Dollar for six months; or, 26 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York City, 50 cents additional.

The Postage on the Herald of Life, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, anywhere out of the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All Letters relating to the Herald of Life, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed:

GEO. STORRS, Box 4,658, New-York.

All names of persons, sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the Post Office, County, and State must be given, and written plainly; and if a change is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters confusion and delay are inevitable.

Would You Inherit the Kingdom?

A SERMON BY THE EDITOR.

"Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Matt. vi., 33.

To understand this text we must view it with its connection. Our Lord has assured his followers, "No man can serve two masters—Ye cannot serve God and mammon:" or, ye cannot serve God and a mind bent on the things of this world—such as riches, etc. "Therefore, I say unto you, take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for the body, what ye shall put on." This verse and the following have been amazingly perverted by some minds, by not considering that it is common in Scripture to speak of a thing of less importance than another, as if it were of no importance. Many examples of this may be given. Our Saviour said, Luke xiv., 26, "If a man hate not his—wife—and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." How are we to understand such an expression? By no means in an absolute sense. The apostles are the best commentators on the meaning of our Lord's words that we can have. Do they countenance the absolute sense of these words? See Eph. v., 25., 28, "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it." "So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife loveth himself." And in the 29th verse the apostle says: "No man ever yet hated his own flesh," or himself—his "life." The thing in an absolute sense is impossible. Again, our Lord, John vi., 27, says—"Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for the meat which endureth unto everlasting life." This is a text of the same character as the other; not to be explained so as to contradict inspired expositions of man's duty as to things of this life. When man was placed in Eden, and in innocency, he was placed there "to dress and to keep it." Paul to Timothy, 1 Tim. v., 8, says—"But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel." And again, 2 Thess. iii., 10–12, he says—"For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat. For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busybodies. Now them that are such we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread."

With such a commentary on our Lord's words, we cannot be in doubt as to their meaning; and as I before said, he spoke in accordance with the custom of those days, in which things of less value, when placed by the side of those immensely more valuable, are spoken of as of no value—to be hated—not to be regarded; that is, comparatively speaking. So the words, "take no thought," etc., we are not to understand in an absolute sense. Paul did not so understand them when a prisoner at Rome, and at a time, too, when he declares, "I have finished my course—I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand." In the same chapter, immediately after, he tells Timothy—"The cloak that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments." Pray, Paul, are you not taking "thought what you shall put on?" Why think about that "cloak," when you are just going "to be offered?" Paul cannot help thinking he shall want that cloak to keep him warm while here. He had learned, it is true, in whatsoever state he was to be content, but not so content as not to use lawful means to make his condition more comfortable when in his power. So, when our Lord says, take no thought, he only prohibits such thought as is implied in serving mammon—such thought as rules and absorbs the mind to the exclusion of the service of God, the superior and most important of all thoughts and service; or, such thought as implies distrust of God's fatherly care over us, while we make his service the great, grand, and absorbing business of life.

We may paraphrase the verse and connection thus: "You cannot have a mind devoted to God, and at the same time bent upon and absorbed by the riches of this world; therefore, I say unto you, be not anxiously careful for your life, about food and raiment, lest you serve mammon, and make a treasure laid up on earth your portion, and thus depart from God. To guard you against this anxious care, consider the fowls of the air: though they lay up no stores, yet your heavenly Father feedeth them," etc. "Therefore, be not anxiously careful, saying, What shall we eat? or What shall we drink? or Wherewithal shall we be clothed? (for the Gentiles, who know not God, make these things the all-absorbing object of their pursuit) and your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of these things; therefore, seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, or that righteousness which he requires, and all these things shall be added unto you, while diligent in business, but without distracting thoughts; take, therefore, no distracting thoughts about the future: the future, if it comes, will bring its own cares, but you should not anticipate them, and burden your minds by adding them to those of the present time: sufficient unto the day is the evil it brings."

Such, we believe, is the true sense and meaning of our Lord's discourse. And he calls our minds to the immense value of an inheritance in the kingdom of God, in comparison of which, food, raiment, and life itself, are of no value.

God has a kingdom to be established. It is called "the kingdom of God," and this by way of distinction from all the kingdoms that have gone before it. The kingdoms, or reigning governments of this world, are emblematically set forth as dreadful beasts, savage, oppressive, warlike and doomed to destruction; but another is to succeed them entirely dissimilar: mild, equitable, peaceable, and everlasting. We are required to pray, "Thy kingdom come." We are bound to pray understandingly: not to do so is to mock God. How can we pray understandingly for that of which we are in ignorance? How can such a prayer be sincerely offered? If we know not what it is we are praying for, how can we desire it? If there is no desire for that we pray for, our prayer is hypocrisy. Paul tells us, 1 Corth. xiv., 15, "I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also." We may safely say—All prayer must be thus offered, if acceptable to God. If so, then it is essential that we have knowledge in regard to the location and nature of the kingdom of God, else we do not pray with the understanding. These remarks are equally applicable in view of the command to seek first the kingdom; or, make it the first object of our attention. How can we seek it at all, if we are ignorant of its nature and location? How can the injunction have any weight with us, if we know not what it is we are to seek, or where it is to be found? It is vastly more important than most professed Christians suppose, that we have clear and distinct ideas about this kingdom, if we would not pray hypocritically, and seek for it as one that beateth the air. Let us then inform ourselves on these matters.

The nature and location of the kingdom of God we have in another discourse pointed out, viz., The reign of Christ on earth with all his saints made immortal. We now wish to enforce the injunction to "seek first" this kingdom and "his righteousness." The term first often signifies chief. If so in the text before us, then we are commanded to make this object the principal concern of our life; it is to stand out in our minds as the great business for which we now live: it is to have a prominence in our affections and actions that no other is entitled to. But how can this be the case so long as there is no definite idea in our minds as to the nature and location of this kingdom? Without this, how can the mind be made to realize its value, so as to give it that attention for which the demand is made? How can we obtain the knowledge necessary to give such importance to the subject as shall lead us to obedience to the command to make that kingdom the first, or chief object of our pursuit? To secure this end, must there not be, somewhere, a description of the kingdom of God? Where can we find that description if not in the Bible? It certainly is not contained in the fancies of men, nor the creeds they have invented. If it is described in the Bible, how shall we learn what it is, unless we "Search the Scriptures?" How then can any man be said to be seeking that kingdom who neglects this examination, and makes it not the most anxious study of his life? It is not reveries, or a few flights of fancy, that makes a man an understanding seeker of the kingdom of God. We must serve God in truth, as well as in spirit, or we "beat the air." Let us, then, most earnestly and prayerfully seek this kingdom by a careful study of the words of God as spoken to us by the Holy Spirit through holy men of old.

To be heirs of the kingdom of God, we must not only seek the kingdom but "his righteousness:" that is, the righteousness which God requires. Not some fancied, indescribable, and undefinable operation, unknown except to a diseased imagination, but that of holiness, or purity of mind and life, taught by patriarchs and prophets, but especially brought to view in the teachings of him who "spake as never man spake," and who exemplified it in his life, so that he became the living embodiment of all he taught; and left us in no doubt as to what constitutes holiness, or what that righteousness is which God requires, to prepare us to be "joint heirs with Christ" in the kingdom of God. It is "the righteousness of faith," or, the righteousness which is produced by a believing reception of the Son of God, and a constant contemplation of his holy life, conversation and tempers, which by "beholding we are changed into the same image, from glory to glory," or honor, "even as by the Spirit of the Lord;" which Spirit works by the truth of God, that being its "sword," and the instrument of sanctification—"Sanctify them through thy truth—thy word is truth." Christ, as we have said, was the living embodiment of the truth he taught, and left us an "example" that we should "walk even as he walked." 1 John ii., 6, and 1 Peter ii., 21. Let us, then, carefully look at him—his humility, his patience, his forgiving disposition, his resignation, his love of enemies, his love to God, his hatred of sin, especially, his spirit and practice of obedience, so that he could say, "I delight to do thy will, O God." Here is a lesson for us to learn. Whoever lays it to mind, and believes it essential that he should learn this lesson in order to an inheritance in the kingdom of God, will see the propriety and importance of making it his "first" and principal, or chief object. It is not learned in a day, though we may form the resolution at once to commence the work, and make a beginning; but we shall find that the longest life is none too long to accomplish a work of such magnitude and importance. The doctrine and commandments of men have set up a lower standard, even that of fallible men, whose memoirs are sought and read as the standard of all their attainments. Whatever value there may be in such memoirs, they are worthless, if not pernicious, when compared with that standard given us by the Son of God.

Let us, then, set the Lord Jesus before our minds for constant contemplation. If we find ourselves coming short, let us not faint nor be discouraged, but renew our effort, depending upon the aid of that Spirit which our Lord promised before he went away, and which he assured his followers our heavenly Father is more ready to give to them that ask him than we are to give good gifts to our children. Our Lord and Master watches over us, not to find occasion against us, but to "help our infirmities." Thus, if we find we come short, we are to increase our "diligence" that we may grow up into the likeness of Christ, even "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ;" and thus "grow up into him in all things, who is the head." Eph. iv., 13–15.

The kingdom of God lies before us: we are called to give it our highest attention and efforts. Consider its value, its glory, its high privileges, its exalted honors, its endless durability. Consider, it was that which filled the Saviour's heart—"the joy set before him" the kingdom of God, where he would sit with his followers on the throne of his glory. It was that which occupied the minds of patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and all the faithful martyrs. Shall we then neglect it? Shall we not heed the command of our Lord, who is soon to return to earth, and establish this kingdom? Where are our sympathies? Are they with the "kingdoms of this world," or, with the "kingdom of our Lord and his Christ?" And let us remember—"The unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God."

The Days of Noah.

The Bible tells us of a time when all the evils of sin and sinners shall be removed, and holiness fill the whole world. That blessed time will come just as certainly as to-morrow's sun will rise. But, it is to be feared that very many good people are greatly and most dangerously deceived as to the manner of its coming. Many suffer themselves to be deluded with the false idea, that that time will gradually glide in upon the world, through the preaching of the gospel and the present administration of things; whereas, the Scriptures teach the direct opposite. Let us examine the word of God on this point.

The inspired Paul says, "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared as with a hot iron." "This know, also, that in the last days perilous times shall come: for men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." Peter says; "Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers walking after their own lusts, and saying: "Where is the promise of his coming?" for, since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of creation. Jude says: "Remember ye the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; how that they told you there should be mockers in the last time, who should walk after their own ungodly lusts. These be they who separate themselves, sensual, having not the Spirit." The blessed Jesus, in speaking of his second personal coming, says: "That day shall not come except there be a falling away first. Many servants shall say: "My Lord delayeth his coming, and shall begin to smite their fellow servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken; and the Lord shall come in a day when they look not for him, and cut them asunder and appoint them their portion with hypocrites."

These are only a few of the many dark and awful descriptions in which the word of God teaches us the abounding wickedness of the world up to the very day that Christ comes. Yea, so extensive and universal will be the wickedness and apostacy of the great mass of mankind to the last, that Jesus asks the question, "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man."

What, then, were the characteristic features of the days of Noah? One simple, but awful word describes the last period of the antediluvian world—that word is wickedness. The days of Noah were days of wickedness, abounding wickedness. People were not only giants in size, but also in wickedness. A portrait of those days has been drawn by an infallible historian. The Spirit or the Living God tells us what was the character of the days of Noah:

"And it came to pass, that the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and they took them wives of all which they chose. And the Lord said: 'My Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh.' There were giants in the earth in those days. And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence. And God looked upon the earth and, behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth."

Such is the picture, and the Son of God himself has told us that "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man."

Let us, then, compare this account with the present times, and see how far the features of the one correspond with those of the other.

1. "The sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and they took them wives of all which they chose." This indicates depravity among the children of Seth, "the sons of God." Professors of religion married the profane, the pious mingled with the depraved, without discrimination or distinction Believers were "unequally yoked with unbelievers." The result was, that adultery, fornication, and lewdness of every description was everywhere dominant. Just such a state and condition of morals as such a conformity of the church to the world would naturally produce, characterized the days of Noah.

And what is the condition of things in this respect at the present time? Do not the sons and daughters of God, i. e., those who are so by profession, show a much fonder love and attachment to the sons and daughters of the world than they do to those who are truly and decidedly the Lords? They realize no pleasure in their company. They seek and vastly prefer that which is pleasing and captivating to the corrupt taste, which they can only find with those of the world. Hence, you can always more readily find ten church-members willing to attend a party of pleasure than half that number to attend a prayer-meeting or any religious service. Hence, also, the alarming amount of conjugal infidelity that prevails. The records prove that the present age is one of awful depravity—an age of adultery, fornication and lewdness. Divorces, with the vulgarity and obsceneness brought forth in connection with them, and the staple of conversation respecting them, are greatly multiplying, and the most shameful things in this regard are of almost daily occurrence. And any one having eyes to see, and ears to hear, and a judgment to discern, must admit that "the leprosy of lust, the gangrene of hell," has fastened upon the vitals of the world—that, in this respect history is repeating itself, and that the present age answers to the days of Noah.

2. God then said: "My Spirit shall not always strive with man." The Spirit of God no longer wrought as aforetime. Wickedness had become so deeply rooted in the hearts of men, that divine truth was quite choked out. The preaching of the word ceased to have saving effect.

And have we not, to a most alarming extent, just such a condition of things at the present time? The minister of Christ may come before his people with his own heart full, and warm with the Spirit of his Master, and fully conscious of his fearful responsibility, proclaiming the most solemn and searching truths, and yet how few will believe him; how many will laugh at, and scoff, and deride his message. A most incorrigible hardness as regards the claims of God and the soul, characterizes the great mass of mankind. Their hearts seem totally destitute of moral sensibility. Nothing seems to seize upon their hearts. All the enginery of truth, love and judgment, plays upon them to no effect. All serious and soul-saving religion is despised. In the days of Noah they mocked and derided the messenger and despised the message of salvation, and so it is now.

3. It is further said that "the earth was filled with violence." And what a record do the daily papers present of the most shocking and diabolical crimes. Murders and assassinations, and wholesale butcheries, and defalcations and speculations are of such frequent occurrence that they scarcely excite a moment's thought. And as with individuals so with nations. The present age has been unprecedented for revolutions, rebellions, "wars, and rumors of wars." From one end of the earth to the other, war, war, war, and still there is no hope for the better. Everywhere vast preparations for battle are making, while monarchs hide their bloody purposes under promises of peace. The prophet's words are now being put into practical effect, "Proclaim ye this among the gentiles, prepare war; wake up the mighty men; let all men of war draw near, let them come up: beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruning hooks into spears; let the weak say I am strong." At this present hour, the world is like a magazine, waiting only for the match to be applied to explode from end to end. And in point of violence, wars, and bloody conflicts, the present times resemble the days of Noah.—Prophetic Times.

The Future.

There is much speculation and vagary about the future, forming every variety of the thing. The veritable heathen take the lead, having a priority in the existing fancies of this day. They fancy that, if good, they go at death to some delightful fields, where they can enjoy an everlasting ramble: but if wicked, to places of various kinds of torments. The Indians of our continent, I believe are Universalists, as far as concerns Indians; for they fancy that all Indians at death go to a country of excellent hunting grounds. The Mohammedans have their carnal paradise. Many Protestants accept of this fancy, with a little alteration or amendment, as a half-way place. The Romanists have copied after the heathen schools. I judge, have taken the average of beliefs among the variety. Our Protestants have also taken the doctrines of the future from heathen standards, abating some things and intensifying others. They have in their notions a better heaven: but, an infinitely fiercer hell. The utmost limit prescribed by the heathen for the torment of the condemned is a thousand years: but our amiable Protestants, to all eternity, cannot conceive of the mind that could compute the ages of torments for the lost. Alas! alas! What a "pollution of the sanctuary of strength."

The Swedenborgians, have things so balanced, that those who get into the margin, only, of the bad place, may, after a while (upon good behaviour I suppose) pass over the line unto the twilight of heaven among the imperfect saints.

The Spiritualists have refined the whole thing into a transcendental subtlety. They think they have reduced orthodoxy to practice, and blame the sects for not accepting the result, and mean to punish them for it.

Now, all this apostacy from the truth is because the people left the "fountain of living waters, and hewed to themselves cisterns that could hold no water."

The heathen, "because when they knew God, glorified him not as God, neither were they thankful, but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish hearts became darkened; professing themselves to be wise, they became fools; and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image, made like to corruptible man," etc. Rom. i., 21, and forward.

The poor Christian sects, accept of these vulgar apostates from the "knowledge of God," whom he gave up to vile affections who, became extreme in all that was disorderly and unseemly, as their doctors in divine things, whom they quote a hundred times, to one of Moses and the prophets, in support of their immortal soul theory. Tell it not in Gath! publish it not in the streets of Askelon! that the evangelical Christian churches (so called) have descended so low as to raise heathen philosophers and heathen priests to the dignity of apostles of their gospel.

They (poor things) may date the beginning of their fall, where they began to mystify the faith; embodying in their creeds the unaccountable, the unexplainable, and the impossible! St. Paul detected this mischief in his day. He says, "The mystery of iniquity doth already work." 2 Thes ii., 7, etc.

This happened to them, because they forgot the promises made to the fathers: and the "faith once delivered to the saints." This creature, like the heathen, are given up; they go all lengths in apostacy. "Because they receive not the love of the truth." "For this cause God shall send them strong delusions, that they should believe a lie that they all might be damned, who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness"—the unrighteousness of unbelief. "Who believed not the truth."

I suppose there would have been no heathen for thousands of years past, had the house of David proved true and faithful. Since it fell and was raised up in Jesus, there would have been no Christian apostacy either, or any of these vagaries about the future, if the church had remained steadfast in the apostles' doctrines, which were the coming again of Jesus, to sit upon David's throne, which involves the restoration of the "Kingdom of the Lord," in which Solomon reigned, and which King Abijah said was the Lord's in the hands of the sons of David.

Also, the doctrine of the resurrection of believers and confessors, from Abel down.

One other thought about the "future," which thought suggested the following. It is this.

The kings of Judah, and the prophets, before God announced his determination to suspend his kingdom, unto a better day, had no idea of any future but the climax of power and glory, and the culmination of their power to a sublime central kingdom, answering to that discription, given in Psa. lxxii., almost realized in the reign of Solomon. But after this purpose was formed, to suspend and supercede the Jews' nationality, and their leadership among nations, giving the kingdom "to whomsoever he pleased," the prophets talk profusely of the future; but always after this manner—"Whose right it is to reign; and I will give it him." Ezk. xxi. "A king shall reign in righteousnest, and princes shall rule in judgment." Isa. xxxii. "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse: and a branch shall grow out of his roots." Isa. xi., 1.

"And there was given him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Dan. vii., 14. And this—"And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom; and all dominions shall serve and obey him:" verse 27. See also in Rev., "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever," xi., 15. To give all the declarations and intimations of the kind, we must need transcribe much of the Bible.

We feel to say from our hearts—O that the church had hearkened to the prophets; then it would have been well with her. And even now (if indeed it is day time with her) "if she will not harden her heart, as in the provocation, in the wilderness," she may come to the knowledge of the truth, and to the brightness of the rising of Zion. B. Matthias.

Armonk, N. Y.

"Save me from my Friends."

This is an adage that will apply to many professors of religion as well as to many other matters. The Advent cause is by no means exempt from this folly and inconsistency of some of its most zealous advocates. Those who have so confidently set the time for the coming of Christ, and have so repeatedly been out in their reckoning; ought, by this time, to have learned to distrust their own supposed wisdom, and be a little more modest in their assumptions. They have in reality done more to injure the cause they profess to love than any open enemies could have done. One great reason why so few are now looking for and expecting the Saviour, is, because they have lost all confidence in those who have so often fixed a specified time for this great event, and have been disappointed. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick," and thousands who in the time of William Miller were strong in the faith of the speedy advent of Christ, are now gone back into the world, or are fallen asleep in the orthodox churches.

And every succeeding period that has been advocated by others since that time, has made the number of Advent believers less, and brought the good cause into reproach. It is now uselesss to attempt to revive the state of feeling and expectation that existed in the world and in the churches in '43. So that when Christ really comes, there will be few indeed prepared to receive him, with their loins girt, and their lamps burning. At the first advent of Christ the time was not definitely known, though many like Simeon and Anna were waiting, hoping, and praying for the blessed day to dawn. And this, I rejoice, to believe, is the best and only safe state of mind to be found, watching, waiting, and hoping, when the master shall come again to give to those who love his appearing the long-promised boon of endless life in his kingdom. The present state of the world and the churches is well exemplified by the fable of the boy and wolf. A boy was sent by the shepherds to carefully watch the fold, and give timely notice when the wolf made his expected visit. Every little noise the boy heard he imagined to be the wolf, and time and again the shepherds were on the alert to receive the visitor, every time the boy shouted wolf, wolf! The false alarm had been so often spread that it was difficult at length to gain any attention to the oft-repeated cry; till, at last, when the wolf really came and scattered the flock there was no response to the warning cry. So it is to be feared it will be when the Son of man shall come in the clouds of heaven, to execute vengance on his enemies, and reward his faithful ones with everlasting life. "I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish."

"When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Faith in his coming. Is not the world and the church just in that unready state? And is not this one great occasion of it? The would-be wise watchmen have so often cried, wolf, wolf, that few, very few, will be ready for the midnight cry, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him."

Even some of those who profess to believe that Christ is to come next year, and even set the day and the hour, are only laughed at for their credulity; especially when they are as busy as the unbelieving world in building houses, and anxiously preparing for what they profess to believe will never come.

If they could receive the despised doctrine of the future age, when men shall build houses, and plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them, there might be some reason in their course. But when most of them skip over, or leave far behind, the judgment reign of Christ, for a thousand years, with his risen saints, over the saved nations—and will have the earth and all the works of men burned up, and utterly perish, immediately after the Advent—this building fine houses, that no insurance company can save from the final conflagration, seems, to say the least of it, a useless loss of time and labor. The Jews at the first Advent rejected Christ as the Messiah because he came not as a king, to sit on David's throne, and restore the twelve tribes of Israel to their long lost inheritance. They would pass over all that was written in the prophets of the sacrifice, suffering and death of their expected Messiah, and would only receive him as the conquering and glorious king of Israel. So many in our day are just in the same predicament, they would ignore, and pass over, all that the prophets, have written of the restoration of Israel, and the reign of Christ and his risen saints over a renovated world, when all nations shall be blessed in the promised seed of Abraham, and shall bow to his righteous sceptre.

Passing by all this, they, like the Jews of old, are not ready to receive Christ as he will really appear on the throne of his father David, but expect him at once to enter on the last and final state of glory in the new Jerusalem, when sin, pain, and death will be seen and felt no more.

The new Jerusalem, representing the glorified and perfected church of God, the bride of the Lamb, as the mystic Babylon represents the apostate and anti-christian church of Rome, and her numerous progeny.

J. PARRY.

Davenport, Iowa, Dec., 1867.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Elder Joseph Parry's post-office address is, DAVENPORT, Iowa, where he expects to pass the Winter.

A GENEROUS OFFER.

I AM desirous that subscribers to the HERALD OF LIFE, of all others, should have such aid as the book entitled "THE THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE" affo ds in support of the system of truth so ably maintained in that invaluable weekly paper. I will therefore mail a copy of the second issue of the said book (containing the full index, appendix, and notices of the book), and will pay the postage, on receipt of a letter from any such subscriber enclosing $2, directed to me, 417 Broad street, Newark, New Jersey.

O. S. HALSTED.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—In addition to the foregoing we have made arrangements with Judge HALSTED to furnish the work as follows: Any person who will send us $3 shall have the remaining numbers of this volume of the HERALD OF LIFE, and we will send them "THE THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE" free of postage. Thus they will get at least 36 numbers of the HERALD and the book for the retail price of that work, viz., $3. Will not every one avail themselves of this chance to get one of the most useful works ever published? To those who are now subscribers for the HERALD, Judge Halsted's offer is very generous, and we hope none will fail to embrace it, and write to him immediately for it; yet they can save fifty cents by sending a new subscriber to this office, as above directed. The book is one to study; and with its aid your Bible will be more perfectly understood and valued.

LOST NUMBERS.—We give notice once more if any of our subscribers have failed to receive their papers, since the commencement of this volume, if they will inform us soon, we will supply them with any No. except No. 8, of which we have run short. Of all numbers except one and eight we have at present an abundant supply, and we intend soon to send them off as tracts, if our subscribers do not call for them. Any new subscribers who wish all the numbers of this volume must state their wish explicitly, or we shall not send them.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 18, 1867.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

OUR PAPER.

THIS number completes the first quarter of the present volume of the HERALD OF LIFE. We shall not issue a paper next week. January 1, 1868 will be the date of our next, and the commencement of the second quarter of this volume. We trust each of our present subscribers will do their best to send at least one new one for the remaining 36 numbers. We again call attention to the "GENEROUS OFFER" of Judge HALSTED, and our arrangement with him to supply a copy of his work to those who send a new subscriber. In addition to that offer, we will supply each new subscriber with the back numbers of this volume, so far as we can do it without breaking perfect sets, without charge. We can furnish a few new subscribers from the comencement of this volume; but such we shall expect to pay the full subscription price for the volume.

The evidence we have that our paper is exerting a strong influence in turning men from the fables which have so long held sway in the nominal churches, is encouraging. Let it stir us all up to new zeal to spread the truth of "Life future only through Christ." That is the crowning truth of the gospel; and when fully received will clear away the rubbish Popery has spawned into Protestantism, and which has proved a dividing and distracting element, preventing love and begetting hatred and every evil work, driving men into Universalism, deism, and real infidelity. Shall not such work cease? Is it not time that the false notions of man's nature and destiny, and of God's character and government, should be exposed and driven from the church and the world? Has not the name of God been long enough "blasphemed" by his professed friends? Truly, "the times of this ignorance" has seemed to be too long borne with already. Shall it continue? or, will those who have have had light on the subject "come up to the help of the LORD against the mighty" dishonor done to his name and his government by these long abuses of truth, to which the nominal churches still cling with a sort of "death grasp"? Let us all awake to our responsibilities in this matter.

"PERSECUTION."

IT is a general truth that those who "will live godly shall suffer persecution;" but it does not follow that persecutions come alike, or in the same form, to all Christians, or that every disciple of Christ will have the same things, in kind, to pass through their Lord did. If so, then all must be literally both scourged and crucified by their enemies. In that case there will be none of them "alive" to be "changed in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump," or, when Christ appears in his glory; for, "Christ died." Must all his followers be persecuted unto death? We think not. The general truth, of persecution in some form, remains, even though many Christians have passed through life without outward annoyance. Persecution even unto death, in reality, may be no worse to bear than the trials others have received in striving against temptations of various kinds, which they have been called to encounter in their Christian course; trials which perhaps no one has known but themselves and their divine Master.

Br. Percival, in his article in another column, may be right or wrong in his supposition that Christians must yet experience sore persecution to make them "all one." We rather think he is wrong; but whether right or wrong, it is our opinion, we have not anything to do with anticipations about it: our business is to live for our Lord and Master, looking for his return "from heaven," to "change our vile bodies, and fashion them like unto his glorious body." He has taught us that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We are not to borrow on the future for evils or trials; though we are permitted to do so for good things, "Looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, despising the shame," etc.

We know that trials will come in some form to all Christians: but the precise form they will take, most likely, will differ from our calculations, if we undertake to find out what they will be. It is enough for us to know, God "will not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able," but will sustain us by his grace, if our trust is in him.

As to a separation between true and false professors by a coming persecution, we are inclined to the opinion that the separation will take place in a different manner. The word seems to indicate that "the wheat and the tares will both grow together till the harvest;" and that "the wise and foolish virgins" will mingle in each other's company till the "Bridegroom cometh." The next great separation we think will take place then and there, and not by any general outward persecution prior to that period.

The outward state of the nominal church will, likely, be one of "peace and safety," and a feeling that "we are rich and increased in goods and have need of nothing," expecting shortly to "convert the world;" not knowing that the world has already converted the church; for, "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" a question that imports there will be but little real faith on the earth at that period, though there will be a multitude of professors of religion; for "many," saith the Saviour, "will say unto me, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied [preached] in thy name?" etc. "We have eaten and drunk in thy presence;" [carefully attended to the supposed ordinances of religion]; etc., to whom "He shall say, I tell you, I know you, whence ye are; depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity." Then will come the "weeping and gnashing of teeth," and it will be among professors of religion who have lived in church relations, and attended to their church ordinances, and despised those who did not conform to their traditions and ordinances, but labored to be conformed to the life and character of their Lord and Master at whatever cost or sacrifice. These have been brought into union and "communion with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ;" not by any outward ordinances or ceremonies, but by being made "partakers of the divine nature" by the internal work of the holy breathings of God upon them, till they possess "the life of God," and walk in his Spirit of love; for "God is love," and "Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit;" i. e., "his spirit of love." That is the grand evidence to ourselves that we are the Lord's, and shall be found of him in peace in the day when Christ shall "separate his sheep from the goats."

That will be the time when the next great separation will take place; and "the Lord knoweth them that are his." Love is the grand mark of Christ on all them that are his, and they need not persecution to make them love, though that may be the occasion of manifesting that the love exists: yet our prayer must be "Lead us not into temptation"—trial—persecution—"but deliver us from evil." If, however, trials of any kind, whether persecution or anything else come, we have the blessed assurance that "all things work together for good" to us if we "love God." We need not therefore, anticipate evil, but maintain a "faith that works by love;" so shall we go joyfully and safely on till we have accomplished our race for life eternal.

TO WHOM IS THE HONOR DUE?

Do you ask, The honor of what? We answer: The honor of the modern invention of a "Mortal Resurrection." We had supposed it due to some New England opposer of "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST;" but it seems we were mistaken. There is a man whose self-conceit is so great, and his fierce denunciation of every one that does not "fall down and worship" his dictation, that we determined never again to mention his name in our writings. It seems, by a pamphlet we have just received, that man is entitled to the high honor of being the author of the fancy notion of a "Mortal Resurrection" for saints and sinners. A worthy parentage! We are not surprised at all: nor should we be surprised if he should proclaim himself the final judge of all men.

The pamphlet we have received is a review of the attempt to establish the monstrous position of a mortal resurrection. The reviewer has handled the author rather roughly, but we judge very righteously, if the representation he makes of the perversion of Scripture is correct, especially his monstrous violence to 1 Corth. xv. Such liberties taken with that chapter deserve the severest censure. We have not yet read the whole review, but enough to get an idea of the work of attempting to make out a mortal resurrection from the dead. The title of the review is:

"AN EARNEST VINDICATION of the Primitive Doctrine of the RESURRECTION against the Heresy of the Nineteenth Century, the Mortal Resurrection of the Saints, as set forth in a work entitled Anastasis, by John Thomas, M. D.: By FRANCIS COGHILL." "Price 25 cents."

Read this pamphlet and learn the folly and madness of the doctrine of a mortal resurrection theory. The pamphlet is "Printed for the author, by B. Wilson, Geneva, Ill." Whether Mr. Coghill resides at that place, we do not know, but presume letters will reach him there, especially if directed to the care of Mr. Wilson.

P. S.—SINCE the foregoing was in type Br. Grim came to this city, and we presented him Br. C.'s pamphlet with a request for him to examine and give it a further notice. The result is the following communication:

Having read the "Vindication by Francis Coghill," we can commend the first twenty-seven pages as a complete refutation of Dr. Thomas' mortal resurrection theory. I was pleased and instructed, and would recommend the work to the careful perusal of all those who believe the absurdity of a "mortal resurrection." In fact, it just required such a mind as Dr. John Thomas to invent such a hybrid. We presume the question was in his mind which we gave the learned Dr. some twenty years ago, viz., "Where in the Scriptures will I find the doctrine of the resurrection of the wicked taught?" His answer was 1 Cor. xv. I admire the consistency of the Dr. He has long since learned that all that come up from the dead, come up in the same condition: and therefore to obviate the absurdity of the wicked's coming up immortal, which would destroy his pet theory of destruction after a resurrection, he hatches out the doctrine of a "mortal resurrection of the dead." We shall hereafter give the Dr. the credit of being the father of it.

It is not not our purpose to review the Dr.: Br. Coghill has done that effectually, and we thank him for the able manner in which he has done it. But while we commend him for the labor he has performed, it reminds us of a good cow, who, while the milkmaid is praising her to a friend for the quantity and quality of the milk she has just drawn from her, kicks the pail over and upsets all the milk. So in this case: while we are reading and praising our brother, we arrive at a point where he gives Dr. T. all the argument; and were we in the Dr.'s place, we should use his own argument against him. On the text, in 2 Cor. v., 10, "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ," etc., and to the question, "In what body does Peter appear then?" Mr. Coghill says.

> We will answer this fearlessly and without equivocation. He will appear at the judgment seat of Christ, immortal, glorious, powerful . . . . He will be . . . . before the assembled multitudes accepted of Christ. He will be vindicated in the presence of those who put him to death. They will see him there—they will recognize him, and if they did not repent before, they will then bitterly repent, when it is too late, and wring their hands, and call upon the rocks to fall upon them, etc. We remark before this scene has taken place, Peter will have ascended up into the air . . . immortal. . . . . This is the Paulite doctrine—this is the doctrine of Christ, of Peter, of the apostles and the prophets. This is Godlike doctrine.

Now, in order to finish up and complete the author's true idea of the resurrection, we make one more quotation from his work on page 29. He says:

> The next saying of Paul we notice [in the Dr.'s work] is Gal. vi., 8. He that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. On this passage our author [Dr. T.] says, "those who have sowed to the flesh must come forth corruptible and mortal, or they could not reap corruption of the body." "So say we," says Br. Coghill.

Here the Dr. receives an admission that we think is fatal to all the argument that Br. Coghill has advanced against him. Is there any power revealed in the Bible that gives a mortal resurrection to man? If so, the Dr. may be right.

After going through all the passages speaking of the resurrection from the dead mentioned by the Dr., Br. Coghill shows they are all incorruptible in their nature; and then, when he reaches nearly the end of his "Vindication," he makes the fatal admission that wicked men will rise mortal! Where is the difference between the Dr. and Coghill? It is just this: The righteous will come forth immortal, by the power of the Spirit of God that dwelleth in them. But the wicked will come forth with some fungi power, like the mushroom, that dwelleth in themselves. We commend the following remarks of Br. Coghill's on Matt. xxv., 46, "These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." He says:

> To our mind the above would have been the strongest argument that could be adduced; for here we have the righteous GOING into eternal life, being at the judgment seat of Christ; implying that they had appeared there mortal. Indeed we are free to confess that had this been the only passage on the subject in the book, we cou'd have come to no other conclusion. But the New Testament is full of instruction on the subject, as we have seen by this time, and in order to get correct views of a doctrine we have to bring together all the teachings scattered through the book, subject them to the tests of reasoning, and accept only such doctrine as they all tend to, and harmonize with.

To this, we say, "amen." First then, we begin with Jesus Christ in John vi., 38. "For I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." All right, Lord. But what is the the will of him that sent thee? Answer:

"And this is the will of him that sent me, that of all of which he (the Father) hath given me, I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again the last day." Query. Where do we find the will of God to raise up the wicked, some time after the last day, in mortal flesh? Will Br. Coghill answer? Again: "As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father; so he that eateth of me, even he shall live by me." As it requires the life of the Father to cause Jesus to live, and the life of Christ diffused through his believers, to cause them to live, will Br. Coghill inform us how the wicked are to live? He answers, in his "Vindication," they live in mortality, while the child of God is quickened immortal. But we ask, What quickens believers? Jesus answers, "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." But says Br. Coghill, "Jesus is talking of eternal life." True, he is talking of a resurrection to eternal life, and he never talks of any other future life; for he had no other life to give.

Adam generated mortal life, and it ends where God said it should, in the dust. Just where the apostle said it should: "They that sow to the flesh, shall" in their reaping time—death—end in corruption: but, "he that soweth to the Spirit, shall," (in God's reaping time, when he who is their life shall appear, then shall they who have sown to the Spirit) "reap everlasting life." O what a spectacle to see mortality, which through all its life was sowing corruption, until as the apostle Peter says, "Like the natural brute beasts, they perished in their own corruption;" to see this mass of corruption springing into life, without any quickening power; and then call this the "Paulite doctrine, and the doctrine of Christ and the apostles!" Again we ask our Br. C., what he does with the language of Christ, "But they who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection of the dead . . . . neither can they die any more; for (or because) they are equal to the angels: [nay, more] and are the children of God] What makes them children of God?], being children of the resurrection?" Again; in Rom. viii., 2, "If so be the Spirit of God, that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you . . . . he shall quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."

Here then is the doctrine of the resurrection as taught by Jesus Christ and his apostles; and it is opposed to any resurrection from the dead except it be unto eternal life. And we think that the doctrine of a resurrection to mortality, even of the wicked, is just as God-dishonoring as the resurrection of the righteous to mortality: for the very reason that, Jesus had no will for any such thing; and he informs us that the Father had no will for any such purpose; and therefore it is dishonoring to God and his Son Jesus Christ to call it his doctrine. All of which is submitted in love.

A FEW SCRAPS.

THE following extracts from "DR. ALEXANDER'S LETTERS" have been sent us by Sister E. H. BRISTER, now residing in Canton, Ill.

"No conviction of my soul gains more strength than that our great study should be The Bible. O how, how, how shall we check the waste of mind upon the ever-increasing frivolities of literature! Literature needs a deluge. We are antediluvians in this regard. Is God about to banish our impertinent rivalry of his book by sweeping our books away by war, discord, or other calamity? I hope not. Let me begin reform at home. I am ashamed of trifling all my days among periodical scraps and short-lived nothings, while whole tracts of Scripture remain unexplored. Query: What would John, Paul, or Peter, if arisen in our day, do in the premises? I am sick at heart of a book-and-paper surfeit. I wish I could get some remedy."—Dr. Alexander's Letters, p. 250.

"Among perverted texts none suffer more than 2 Cor. v., 11—"Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men." Very pretty theories are spun out of it. But look at the Greek—ton phobon tou kuriou—it is the unvarying expression for the fear of the Lord, or true religion, everywhere else so translated, and why not here, also, as well as in Acts ix., 31? Out of many instances in the LXX., take these at random: Job xx., 28; Psa. xxxiv., 11; Isa. xi., 3; Proverbs xxiii., 17; i., 7; ii., 5; viii., 13."—p. 245.

Dr. A. says of a sermon he heard in New York, "It was an odious caricature of old Hopkinsian divinity, such as ferments in the head of an ill-trained but vigorous mind, and throws up a scum of crudities. 'Government,' 'Government,' 'Government;' nothing but government, till I begin to feel as if the Creator was but a secondary Administrator put to hard shifts to save appearances. It was a sermon well adapted to make—e. g., 'I suppose all the united malice of all the devils in hell would not keep a poor sinner in hell to all eternity. O no. None but God can have firmness enough to do that,' etc. These were his words so far as I remember."—p. 250.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We suppose if we were to use language as strong as Dr. Alexander has done, on the same subjects, we would be denounced as a "heretic"—"a disbeliver in the sovereignty of God," etc. Just as if God, because he is a "sovereign," has not a right to do any horrible thing that can be thought of! no matter how much it shocks the "reason" he has endowed us with, and which he calls upon us to exercise, saying, "Come, now, let us reason together," etc. Isa. i., 18. Men who have no "reason" to exercise are not accountable; and if their wild minds run into "Hopkinsian divinity," or any other absurd notions of the divine sovereignty, we can only pity them; to reason with them appears to be out of the question.

A ROMISH NUT.—A Roman Catholic priest, in Germany, entering the pulpit, took a walnut into it. He told the people that the shell was tasteless and valueless—that was Calvin's church. The skin was nauseous, disagreeable, worthless, valueless—that was the Lutheran church. He then said he would show them the holy Roman Apostolic church. He cracked the nut and found it rotten.

DID THE SERPENT LIE?

"And the serpent said unto the woman, ye shall not surely die." Gen. ii., 17.

According to H. W. Beecher and many others, the body of man is a prison-house for his immortal soul, which is the real man, and all that death means is, to demolish the prison and let the MAN out free.

I have preached from the above text designing to show that upon the hypothesis of Beecher and others, it is utterly impossible to make it appear that the serpent uttered a falsehood. For the LORD God had said concerning the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, "Thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." But the serpent said "Ye shall not surely die." It is self-evident, therefore, that one or the other uttered a falsehood. But the true Christian would sooner burn at the stake than to charge the lie on the LORD God. The liar, therefore must be the serpent, who is a liar and the father of it. So far all is very clear.

But the difficulty is to admit the theory of Beecher and others, and prove the serpent a liar. But he must needs be convicted of lying, or be allowed to give the lie to the LORD God: and he who will allow him to do so wicked and blasphemous a thing, might as well do it himself.

So the orthodoxy are tied up to an impossibility, for they dare not accuse the LORD God of lying: and as to the serpent, he also told the truth, if Beecher's real man escapes his prison, and does not surely die. Nor will it avail them anything to say, the soul-man does surely die a spiritual death; for, as a literal death kills a literal thing, so a spiritual death kills a spiritual thing: and the same theory that makes a soul-man immortal makes him also purely spiritual, or pure spirit. The work of death is always to kill something that has life, or action; whether it be a spirit, a man, a beast, a vegetable, a moral or immoral principle. A death that does not kill is no death at all, and has no meaning at all. When moral principles are dead they cease to act, and so of immoral principles.

But an immortal thing is proof against the power of death, because it cannot cease to act; and, therefore, cannot be killed, nor die a spiritual death.

And furthermore, we have no account that an immortal being, either literal or spiritual, ever sinned: and hence no account that such ever died. Immortality is a condition above sinning, and beyond the reach of death.

But the threatenings of God are all against the sinner, the ungodly, or some such term.

Now, if the soul-man is a sinner he will as surely die as God has said it: but if he is not a sinner, then all souls will be saved, and the Universalist has got us; and while in the body we may go ahead in sin—eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall all be happy. So much for putting a soul-man into a clay tenement.

But the worst is not yet told. The LORD God made the prison first; and then made Mr. Beecher's soul-man and put him into it before he was guilty of any crime at all, and shut him in; but soon after agreed to let him out through the gate "surely die" as soon as he might find it convenient to sin. So now there is no way left for any of us to make good our escape from prison but to sin our way out through the surely die gate.

And so Paul is made to say, in substance, "Sin entered the world, and the soul-man escaped from prison by sin, which escape is passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Rom. v., 12. And again, "For the wages of sin is the escape of the soul-man from prison." Rom. vi., 23. But Paul did not so express himself, yet he is very excusable; for he was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, who was a Pharisee, LL. D., and the Pharisees knew nothing of this mode of letting men out of jail. Acts v., 34.

Now, to conclude, the letting out of prison of Mr. Beecher's soul-man, is either a blessing to him, or a curse. If it is a blessing will he tell us why God has thus far withheld the precious boon from Enoch and Elijah, those two good, old prophets? And if it is a curse, why not translate all good men, to the end that they may escape the curse, like Enoch and Elijah? And did not the Son of God, Mr. B.'s God, love freedom from prison as much as any of his professed followers? and why did he voluntarily return back again into his prison after the short absence of three days?

"O, consistency, thou art a jewel." The simple fact is, God made man a literal, tangible, material and bodily being: and without such a body no man has ever been known to live, and without which none ever will live. I thank God we have a system of faith which is self-consistent, in harmony with the word of God, and with common sense.

PERSECUTION.

NEAR forty years ago, when only eight or nine years old, I went with my father on some business several miles from home. We called, in the course of our journey, on an old man, then known as Master Norris, an old school-teacher, with whom father had a long conversation on various matters. Among other things they got upon the church, and the old man made one remark, several times, which I have always distinctly remembered. It was this, "The church of God will go to heaven through fire yet." He repeated this with so much earnestness, that it fixed itself in my memory indelibly. During the excitement of looking for the Lord, I have, of course, lost sight of this idea, until since the disappointment of 1854; when the thought has returned to mind, and for five or six years past I have been in full belief that the old man's prophecy is yet to be fulfilled. Hardly a doubt have I, that yet before Jesus comes to redeem his people from death and mortality, his living, waiting ones will know by bitter experience what our brethren have felt, who suffered by "flame, by sword, by captivity, by spoil," by "hunger," by "death," and "by the beasts of the earth;" "many days." If I am correct, it is time that we were looking at the matter, and preparing for the struggle, for "to be forewarned is to be forearmed." If I am mistaken, there is some one among the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE who can show it, and I shall receive their corrections with all gratitude. So I shall present my reasons in as brief and simple a manner as I can; praying God to direct, and bless to the glory of his name and the good of his cause.

My first reasons are chosen from analogy. Our great Redeemer and head suffered persecution in every conceivable form, both by word and deed, from the world and the church; from open foes, and pretended friends, and ended by suffering a cruel and shameful death! and he declares, "The servant is not above his Lord, nor the disciple above his Master." "If they have persecuted me, they will persecute you."

Our Lord's disciples also, as is well known, were hated and persecuted by the world and the professed church, just as he informed them they would be; every one of them suffering martyrdom for their faithfulness to him and his words. Then as the gospel pursued its course over Asia, Northern Africa, and Southern Europe, every step in its course is stained with blood; and during the days of the Pagan Roman Emperors, their bitter hatred, and that of their benighted subjects, was poured upon the unresisting heads of God's faithful ones until the martyrs of Jesus were counted by millions! But, at length, the Emperor was converted; Christianity became popular; persecution ceased, and the gospel spread all over Europe. Then came on the great apostacy, and for more than a thousand years the soil of Europe was drenched with the blood and manured with the ashes of the disciples of Christ. But this too must cease. God shortened the days; the arm of the persecuter was stayed, and God's church once more emerged into liberty. The gospel sun passed on; darkness fell upon Asia—twilight spread over Europe, while the bright day of gospel truth dawned upon this great western world; and here, on this broad field, the church has grown, and spread its branches from sea to sea. Free and unfettered, with none to molest; every man free to worship God as he pleases. The church has under her control such a combination of means for spreading the gospel over the world as is perfectly astounding. She can print a ship load of Bibles in a day, and by the aid of steam, she can carry them to the most distant lands in a month. She can flash words of warning, of hope, or of instruction to a thousand cities in one short hour, and have those words read and listened to by millions of waiting ears. She is prospered in basket and store, in going out and coming in. She is truly, "rich and increased in goods and has need of nothing," in her own estimation. But, in the midst of this overwhelming prosperity, with this almost boundless power of doing good and glorifying God, what is her true character? Is it anything such as it was when the Master went away? Anything such as his written word requires? Alas! alas! She has grown proud, selfish, worldly. The simplicity, the love, the noble generosity, the unity of the Spirit, the separation from the world that characterized the primitive church, is gone.

Divided into hundreds of little distinct parties and sects, built upon some peculiar notion of some of the members of the party, instead of the word of Christ and the apostles; the entire effort of each and all is to exalt and to aggrandise its own party, even though it be at the expense of pulling down others. The most splendid church, the finest choir, the most gifted and eloquent preacher, seems to be the height of their ambition. And now, what shall we think? If God spared not his own Son, nor his faithful, loving followers, in their purest and best days, and if, subsequently, Europe became, for more than a thousand years one unchanging scene of suffering, sorrow and death, on the part of his church, because they would live godly in Christ Jesus; shall the church in America, with her boundless privileges, her overflowing store of blessings, pass on in peace and quiet to the end of his labor, and never taste the bitterness of the cruel cross which the church in other lands and in other times has ever had to bear? If the church in the dark ages needed to be purified and tried, and made white through the instrumentality of persecution, (see Dan. xi., 35), what, oh, what shall we think of it now? Our Saviour prayed that his people might all be one. Why? That the world may believe. John xvii., 21. But divided as they now are; destitute of that pure love by which men were to know that they were his disciples, as they now are (John xiii., 35), how can the world believe? And how can a just God condemn the world to death for not believing the gospel, when that gospel is preached and illustrated before them so wretchedly? Surely, it cannot be. No, no. The gospel, purged of all error, and traditions of men, in all its native simplicity and beauty, must be preached by men of God, men who are worthy of that high and holy calling, and exemplified by a people perfectly united in love, continuing steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship; in short, a people who shall walk steadfastly in his steps who did no sin, nor was guile found in his mouth. Such a testimony, if rejected, would justly condemn the world to death. Nothing short of it, in my judgment can.

But how shall the work be effected? the great change be brought about? Will preaching and praying do it? Will scattering the Scriptures, or religious literature, or the dissemination of light and knowledge do it? Will religious revivals do it? Will prosperity in all things do it? All these have been tried, and tried in vain. Things only grow worse and worse. Every year witnessess the upstarting of some new Christian (?) sect, making confusion still worse confounded, and making this great stumbling-block for sinners still more prominent and hateful. How, then, shall this great and needed change be wrought? I answer—the rod, the merciless rod alone will do the work. I may be mistaken in my judgment; but, as I live, I can imagine no means for bringing the church back to her duty but sharp chastisement; and I fully believe that God will, very soon, bring into play agencies by which it will be made worth a man's life to follow Christ truly, and then we shall see such a separating of the true and the false, of the wheat and the chaff, such an entire ignoring of the ten thousand worthless notions that now separate Christians; such a uniting again of all who honestly love the Lord, as have not been seen for generations. But enough for this time. In my next, I shall try to show that my conclusions are not based upon analogy, and the necessity of the case only, but upon the unfailing word of God.

C. L. PERCIVAL.

Massawippi, P. Q. (Province of Quebec.)

"THE LORD IS AT HAND."

NINE-TENTHS of those who profess to be the disciples of Christ, believe that this expression of the Apostle Paul, in his letter to the Philippians, means the approach of death, at which, or immediately after, they are ushered in the presence of Christ. Is this notion correct? Is there any promise in the Word of God that the Saviour appears personally to the dying believer, except in the sense in which he is always with his faithful disciples? Or is there any passage in Scripture from which such a notion could be inferred? We cannot remember ever having seen either. When he spoke to his sorrowing disciples that he is about to leave them and be long absent, the promise was added, that he would be always with them in his representative, the Holy Ghost. This promise has been and is still fulfilled, and will remain so until he comes again in person. But when the Apostle says: "The Lord is at hand," he refers to that coming which is often expressed by different phrases, as, "the day of the Lord," "the coming of the Lord," "the appearing of our great God and Saviour," etc.

Jesus Messiah, who once came to this earth as a perfect man, with all the feelings of a man, to suffer and to die for us, and who, after his resurrection, ascended to sit down on the throne of his Father, as a Mediator between God and sinful man, waiting until his enemies are prepared to become his footstool, then to return to this earth, according to the assurance of the angel which he gave them when they stood gazing up into heaven after he was taken up." Therefore when the Apostle says, "the Lord is at hand," he spoke of "the Lord's coming in the clouds of heaven with the myriads of his saints."

We must not wonder that this coming of the Lord takes so prominent a part in the writings of Paul and also of the other writers of epistles to the churches; for in the first place, this "coming of the Lord" is the substance of things hoped for, or should be the hope of every Christian, for with that "coming" is the resurrection unto life and immortality inseparably connected, and at which time the believer enters into his kingdom to reign with him forever. Secondly, there was no necessity for admonishing or speaking upon the spiritual presence of Christ, as those whom they addressed felt that glorious presence continually,—they knew that he was with them. To the Corinthians the Apostle writes, "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you?" And again, more particularly, "Know ye not yourselves that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye are reprobates?" To the Romans he writes, "But ye are not in the flesh but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his." It would, therefore, have been altogether out of place to say to them that the spiritual coming of Christ is at hand.

The disciples were commended to watch and prepare for the actual and personal coming of their divine Master. His particular charge to them was: "Watch, for ye know neither the day nor the hour when the Son of man cometh." They were, therefore, bound to obey his command in their own practical life, and to impress it upon others whose hearts were brought under the influence of the Gospel through their word, without regard to any particular reason by which that "watching" might be justified.

But are we indeed left to obey and watch in ignorance? By no means; the reason is plain. The coming of the Lord is the crowning point, the closing scene, the consummation of this dispensation. It is the coming of the bridegroom to the marriage with his betrothed bride; the coming of the Son of man to finish his work of triumph by taking possession of his inheritance purchased by his blood. It is the coming of the King of kings to his rightful throne, that of his father David. But some might say, the Apostle speaks of a coming of the Lord which was to be at hand, and now eighteen hundred years have passed, and he has not come yet. To this we would reply that before his coming the second time in power and great glory, the Gospel age or dispensation was to be accomplished; and though the time of its accomplishment would always remain uncertain, the great event of his coming must be regarded as sure. The apostles, then, and those who received the truth by their preaching, realized the certainty of this truth; and as one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day, so to the eye of faith, the distance seemed as nothing, the future was blended in the present. With this truth then very distant, but realized as present, the apostles comforted, exhorted, and encouraged each other and their flocks. "The Lord is at hand." "Behold the Judge standeth at the door." "Yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord." "Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it until he receive the former and the latter rain. Be ye also patient; stablish your heart for the coming of the Lord is nigh." (James.) If, then, these men, who lived at the very beginning of the gospel dispensation watched so carefully for, and were comforted with that glorious coming, how much more should we, who most assuredly live at the close of that dispensation realize that event, watch for it, and enjoy in the hope of its speedy accomplishment! But do we, indeed, live at the close of this dispensation? Yes, for the signs which were assigned to be the heralds of its approach, are being fulfilled in a manner which can scarcely be disputed.

O that this argument may be impressed upon those whose hearts are not in it—who still remain careless as regards the day of the Lord, the vital point in the Christian faith, the substance of Christian hope. Brethren and friends, if you have never been admonished to watch for that real personal coming of our Lord, be admonished now; we remind you of it. We warn all who are still encouraged in their indecision, or their open rejection of the Saviour's invitation to "watch," by the excuse of Israel of old: "The time is not yet come;" or by the infidel's plea—itself a fulfilment of the prophecy: "Where is the promise of his coming?" There is no time for hesitation, for the Lord is at hand! Now is the accepted time, before the day of decision makes repentance impossible. Should you be regarded with scorn and treated with contempt, what then? Should you even lose some of this world's goods by the profession of your hope in that glorious coming, what then? God will be a Father unto you—a reconciled Father in Jesus Messiah—and ye shall be sons and daughters of the Most High, and heirs in his kingdom.—Israelite Indeed.

"PERILOUS TIMES."

WE take the following extracts from an English writer who is speaking of the perplexity that seems to exist everywhere. Among the causes of this he says:

In the first place, there is a strong, uneasy feeling that the tendency of European society is to adopt a democratic form of government, and that this must ultimately, and at no distant period, pass into the form of military despotism, upheld by the forces of democracy. Such a government exists in France, but in that land it does not sufficiently represent popular ideas to be permanent in its present shape; and persons who have recently had opportunities of familiar intercourse with the French people, have noted that there is a general expectation of some catastrophic change in that country. The author of John Halifax, who has just returned from France, which she visited for the first time, and where everything appeared to her with freshness and clearness, because it was entirely new, tells us that beneath the polished manners, and the gentle and courteous speech of our neighbors, she detected a latent fierceness, which blazed up when political questions were discussed, and that things were said which she may not repeat, because she feels they were confidences reposed in English honor and English reticence. Other visitors to France, accustomed to the country, and familiar with the highest persons in the state, are not unaware of this same temper of the public mind, which the author of John Halifax illustrates by a reference to the gardens of Portici, blooming on the lava roof of Vesuvius.

A catastrophe in France is certainly among the events which would not surprise any statesman. But it is at this point that perplexity commences. What would follow the catastrophe? The deluge first, but what next? We have been "shooting Niagara" in England, but the "after!" Are we not all of us—at least, those of us who think with any earnestness—wondering with Mr. Carlyle at the may be or must be to come? It is the same with France. What is to replace the Imperial Government, if it should fall? Some good people have a very lively notion that Napoleon III. is the Anti-Christ, who will shortly develop into something he has not hitherto seemed to be. I confess that I regard with much more apprehension that which is to follow him. The Peace Conference at Geneva, with its declaration of war against everything that is old or established, its denunciation of religion "as incompatible with peace," its scheme for a "social revolution," and the formation of a European republic under the name of "The United States of Europe," and its "religion of humanity"—a "religion" with not only Christ but God also left out of it—is to my mind an uglier and more dangerous fact that the French empire. It is easy to say that the men who met at Geneva are wild dreamers, whom nobody sympathises with. I answer that they represent the restlessness, and dissatisfaction, the bitterness, and the wild hopes of many thousands of the population of the chief states of Europe. We have heard of "the religion of humanity" before. It is a French invention—a development of positivism," which proposes to substitute for Christianity "the worship of humanity," as the only "supreme Being" who may come out of the next catastrophe in France, as the guillotine and the Goddess of Reason came out of the first, is more like the prophetical photographs of "the man of sin," than any person or any system yet known to us.

Roman Catholicism is losing its influence over the popular mind everywhere, except in Spain and England. I do not except Ireland, where the spirit of Fenianism is at war with religion. In Ireland the tendence is to Theism, and "the religion of humanity;" in France the churches are full of women and girls, but the men, and even the boys, are absent. Is there any one wise enough to tell us what people in England believe in just now? What they did believe, in a more or less ineffectual way, some years ago, we know; but the fountains of the great deep of human thought have since then broken up, and men are drifting. Drifting whither? Some to the modified Romanism of the Ritualists, for want of a staff to lean upon; some to Socinianism, though not separating themselves from a church whose creeds contain this article—that Christ is the Son of God; and others to the sheer precipice of hopeless Rationalism—the "darkness visible" of utter unbelief. A similar perturbation is going on in America, where not less than 3,000,000 persons are stated, on the authority of Mr. Hepworth Dixon, to be "Spiritualists," or persons who believe they hold intercourse with, and have revelations of truth from, the unseen world through the agency of the spirits of persons who have died. Nor is this the only evidence of perturbation in that great transatlantic continent, which is likely to exercise so great an influence on the affairs of the world. There the "unlicensed liberty" of religion has produced new faiths, numerous and monstrous, which strike at the very foundations, not only of Christianity, but of society and of morals. What the Rationalism of Germany is doing for the destruction of faith, the religious theories of America are doing for the overthrow both of faith and morals. These are things which I think justify me in saying that the present times answer to the description of the last days in Luke xxi., 25, 26: "And there shall be . . . . upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; . . . . men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." I think that since the gospel was first preached, there has never been a time when the perturbation of thought was so general as now. There have been great crises and revolutions, but a handful of persons contributed to produce them. Now it is the popular mind that is agitated, the whole conscious fabric of society that is in the throes of a vast catastrophic change.

FROM I. M. CHAFFEE.

ZUMBROTA, MINN., Nov. 17, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I do not find myself in circumstances to give for the support of the HERALD OF LIFE as I could wish. Scant crops last year, and much less this, limit our means to such an extent that close economy governs us in our pecuniary affairs; but bear in mind that the support of our paper requires money, I wish to say that if the enclosed $5 is not sufficient for you to continue it to us, you need not send it until another remittance from us, which will be as soon as means presents itself. Isolated, so far at least as believers in the doctrines advocated in HERALD OF LIFE are concerned, we find the paper a very welcome visitor; more so perhaps than we should under other circumstances. And thinking others are in a similar situation to ourselves, we feel a deep desire to have it continued to cheer them in their labor of spreading the truth; and may the God of Israel open our hearts to give liberty toward its support, and give health and strength to its present Editor to perform the duties devolving upon him until Jesus comes and relieves him from his arduous task.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have continued to send Br. Chaffee's paper; and thank him for his remittance, and his wishes and prayers concerning ourself. We think the LORD has heard the prayers of his people for us so far as relates to health; for, though we are now seventy-one, we never enjoyed better; yet, we are conscious that we cannot endure as much labor as when younger. Our strength, such as it is, we intend shall be devoted to him who hath given it, while it lasts; and we rejoice in hope of the immortality and glory to be revealed.

FROM S. C. HOFFMAN.

MIDDLEVILLE, MINN., Nov. 1867.

BR. STORRS: I think the time is about at hand that we shall begin to reap a little of the seed of life. May the good Lord grant it to be an abundant shower.

I have obtained one subscriber, and inclose two dollars for the same. I found a brother and sister here, believers in the immortality of the soul and eternal misery. I let them have one of my papers for six months, and likewise the "SIX SERMONS." The sister was so highly pleased with the latter, that she sent it off thirty miles to a Baptist, (if I mistake not) a minister. So you see the leaven is working in this new country. I hope to be able to report more before the Winter is out. Not that I think the work is done when they are converted to the doctrine of "No life out of Christ;" but if it rejoices every one as it does me, I think that a great point is gained. O how I have rejoiced while silently looking over the principles of life, to see that life and death is the grand struggle of our probation. I often say, could I only have an assurance of living forever, even in this mortal state, without a thought of the fear of death how contented we could settle ourselves for life. But here, we have no continuing city; yet we seek one to come. O, Lord bless the truth. Yours hope.

FROM A. W. MONROE.

NEW ALBANY, IND., Dec. 5, 1867.

BR. STORRS: I am happy to inform you that Br. Wendell is here among us; though somewhat disappointed in preaching at this place for the want of a house to preach in; but there was a door open at Jeffersonville, only five miles distant by rail, the Christian Tabernacle (Br. N. Feild's church), where he is unfolding the Life views to a very attentive congregation. Although Br. Feild differs with us as to that one point, he is very cordial toward Br. Wendell, and says he wishes him "God's speed."

I have been trying to study out a plan to get a house for the Lord here. Our city is spotted with, I think, twenty churches, two of which are not occupied: they are "for sale;" but the few who believe in the coming kingdom are poor, as to this world's goods, or else we would buy one of the two churches now offered for sale. I would just say, if some brother has money to loan, and will invest it in this church property, we will mortgage it to him, and will pay him ten per cent interest in advance annually. It would require $2,500. If any one should favor it, and will write to me, I can give them all the information necessary.

Br. Wendell expects to leave next Monday for Cincinnati, Ohio.

May the Lord bless him on his journey. The bread he is casting upon the waters may he find many days hence. I am glad to inform you that "Life only in Christ" is being received with commendable zeal hereabout. The Lord be praised. Your brother in Christ.

OBITUARY.

FALLEN ASLEEP.—Geo. Huntington writes us from Providence, R. I.: My beloved father, Dr. THOMAS HUNTINGTON, Brooklyn, Conn., died on the 1st inst.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Thus our old and tried friends fall one after another. Br. Huntington has been with us in the great Life-truth for many years, though we never had a personal interview with him as we recollect. His memory is precious to us, as he has often cheered us in our work by his letters and remittances. We trust to meet him again in the glorious day that has begun to dawn, and which will reveal Him who is "The Resurrection and the Life."

IN MEMORIAM.

"FELL ASLEEP in Jesus," in Philadelphia, on the 10th inst., at 3 P. M., sister MARY ELIZABETH STEINBECK, of pulmonary consumption: aged 34 years.

Our now sleeping sister was a younger daughter of the late Walter Dickson, of Groton, Mass., who, in 1823, with his family (consisting of wife, three daughters and a son) emigrated to Palestine, to establish an Agricultural Mission, for the purpose of affording instruction to the resident Jews to cultivate the land of Israel. He was a firm Advent believer in the '43, '44 views; but subsequently embracing "Age-to-come" views, thus endeavored to practically carry out those views to some good result in the Land of Promise: and remained there, laboring in hope, until 1858, when they were brought to an abrupt close by the hands of violence: which eventuation brings us, now, to speak more fully on the subject of the following remarks:

During Bro. Dickson's sojourn in the Holy Land, two of his daughters (Almira and Mary) married two brothers (members of a Prussian Mission in Palestine) named Steinbeck: both being located near Jaffa (Joppa): Sister Mary and her husband, sometime after marriage, residing in a part of her father's house.

On the night of January 12, 1858, a party of five Arabs broke into the house—having previously shot Frederick Steinbeck (Mary's husband), while he defended the gate of their cattle inclosure—cruelly beat the elder Dickson (his son, Henry Dickson, being absent from home at his sister's residence, while her husband was gone on business, to Jerusalem), pillaged the house of all its movables, and crowned their fiendish work by beating and other outrages on Mary and her mother, while their husbands and father were helpless, and Frederick dying from his mortal wound. The shock given by these personal injuries to Mary (her constitution never strong) and the horrible circumstances surrounding the loss of her husband, made such an ineffacable impression on her mind—though of a cheerful natural temperament—that she never recovered from it, but has gradually been pining into decay.

Some three years ago, her physician, in Lowell, Mass., advised her immediate cessation from her professional duties—teaching, etc., and removal south; and for the past three years, she made her home in Philadelphia—a most welcome member of our family. Wife and herself had been intimate neighbors and Christian believers through their girlhood; and Mary's brother Philip, having married wife's sister Susan in 1852, preceded his father to Palestine, where he deceased in his missionary duties, and was interred next to "David's sepulchre," at Jerusalem, before his father's arrival; and the writer, also, having had the privilege of being a traveller in that land—all these considerations led our sister to feel entirely at home with us.

In the Summer of 1860, while attending a grove meeting, held at Weston, Mass., she had the privilege, for the first time, of hearing preaching on the subject (by Elder John Howell) of the unconscious state of the dead; and from a conviction then received, was led to investigate and search the Scriptures carefully, until her mind became fully convinced at the Wilbraham Camp-meeting, in a subsequent year, that the Life views, as advocated in the HERALD OF LIFE were the nearest to truth. These views she held, without a shade of doubt, to the end of her course. And during all her later illnesses (for she experienced many ill-turns of hemorrhages of the lungs and bowels), she would often remark, "How good and fitting it appeared" (to her) to "fall asleep, at night, and awake in the resurrection, as it were, in the morning." "How blessed," again she would say, "it is that 'He giveth his beloved sleep,' and that I shall awake in his likeness," and requested when she deceased that Bro. Burbank should make some remarks in connection with her faith, from that text, "He giveth his beloved sleep." She had given her heart unto the Lord at the early age of eleven years; and from that time forward had a realizing sense of the Spirit's witness that she was one of the "little flock;" and when she fully realized that not only her life was "hid with Christ in God," but that in and through him only had any person a Scriptural foundation or hope of a future life, she more intelligently and rejoicingly remarked "How beautifully precious is my LIFE-GIVER now, to me; how fitting it is that our Father has only endowed his heavenly man, as the Second Adam, with the keys of life and death, so that our beloved Redeemer may be the one to unlock the prison-door, and release his disciples and believing friends out of prison; while his unbelieving enemies and evil-doers shall "remain in the congregation of the dead," locked-up forever. With such a hope, in a well-balanced mind—cloudless until within five minutes of her falling asleep—two days before decease, she requested us to write to her sister, residing in Wisconsin (also an Advent believer, but not holding still to the consciousness of the dead), this testimony, "Tell Augusta, though we will not meet again in this life, that I hope to meet her in the morning of the resurrection, and that I 'fall asleep' in the faith that, till then, the dead (in or out of Christ) know not anything."

During all her last three months' confinement in the house, and when she was suffering most intensely, her fortitude was wonderful, and her patience never gave vent to a single murmur. In her keenest agony her voice only uttered the prayer, "O Lord, help me to keep still;" requested us to pray that if it was the Lord's will, that she might soon be released from suffering. Indeed, God's love and grace were so manifestly seated upon her countenance and expression, that we all (her Advent and other visiting friends) felt that, in her presence there was "peace" and cheerfulness—and the Holy Spirit's choicest fruit, "the love of Christ" exemplified.

Many of the HERALD's readers will doubtless recollect several poetic pieces, from time to time, the effusion of her mind and pen, under the heading "BY MARIE S."

She leaves two young children (a girl of twelve, and a boy of ten years) orphans, to mourn her loss. Wife left town, last night, to be present at her interment, as she had requested to be laid away to rest at Fitchburg, Mass., where her children could visit her "sleeping" place.

IN MEMORIAM.

BY MRS. L. R. K. BISHOP.

Written on the death of Mr. Moses Morrill, of Warner, N. H.

Press the lids softly down on the mild blue eyes,
Smooth back the white hair from the broad open brow,
Compose the dear hands on the cold, pulseless breast,
And bid the grief-stricken ones gaze on him now.

The shadows of suffering are all passed away,
He fears not, nor feels any more the death-chill,
Those heart-throbs of anguish have ceased evermore,
And the pain-convulsed limbs are all quiet and still.

The loved ones may cease their assiduous care,
Their sad, anxious vigils no longer may keep;
The dew drops of agony for the last time
They have wiped from his face—he has fallen asleep.

Smooth the pillow once more for the dear gray head,
O'er his couch and robed form spread death's drapery white;
Softly let down the curtains, then leave him alone,
Till we bury the precious dust out of our sight.

* * * * * * *

There's an empty place at the generous board;
A vacant arm-chair by the hearth-stone to-day;
There are loved tones whose music will greet us no more,
A venerable form laid in sadness away.

Sad mourner! with anguish too bitter for tears,
Let not the dark billows go over thy head:
Lo! spanning the clouds of the gloom-shadowed vale,
Is the bow of God's covenant—LIFE FROM THE DEAD!

He bears on his girdle the symbols of power,
Who shall yet have the victory, pitiless grave!
His chosen thy portals in triumph shall pass,
At the beck of the CONQUEROR—mighty to save!

Thine eyes, mourning one, shall his beauty behold,
Thy feet with glad haste his bright retinue swell,
If joined to the LIFE-GIVER: and thou shalt meet
With the loved and the lost, in his Kingdom to dwell.

A SWEET COMPANIONSHIP.

A RECENT work published in England, by Elihu Burritt, the learned blacksmith, contains an interesting account of one whom he designates as the "Half-Hermit of Tregedna," and of whom he says that he has made himself the Rarey of the bird world, and has "proved, by the happiest illustration that any one with the law of kindness in his heart, on his tongue, in in his eye and in his hand, may have the most intimate fellowship of these sweet singers, and their best songs from morning till night, without the help of snare or cages.

"What prettier out-door exercise," he asks, "for the kindly dispositions of gentle-spirited children could there be, as a change from lessons of love to their own kind, than this playing of the Rarey among the birds? What a pleasant accentation it would give to their voices, as a permanent habit, to talk to those birds; to coax them down from the tree-tops, or out of their hidings in the hedges, with little calls and cooings such as children can make! How prettily it would train their hands for gentle actions in after-life, to put them out with tempting crumbs on the palm toward the little doubting flutterers overhead, eyeing the movement with such keen speculation, as if questioning whether it meant bread or a stone! Let any boy or girl who thinks it can be done, or would know how it can be accomplished, just see how simply the bird friend of Tregedna did it.

"It was all an incident to his benevolent disposition, not a premeditated design. It commenced at the time when he was laying out the grounds of his little dell park. While at work upon the walks and flower beds, and turning up the fresh earth with his spade or rake, several of the little birds would come down from the trees and hop along after him a little distance, picking up the worms and insects. By walking gently, and looking and speaking kindly when they were near, they came first to regard his approach without fear, then with confidence. They soon learned the sound of his voice, and seemed to understand the meaning of his simple, set words of caressing. Little by little they ventured nearer and nearer, close to his rake and hoe, and fluttered and wrestled and twittered in the contest for a worm or fly, sometimes hopping upon the head of his rake in the excitement. Day by day they became more trustful and tame. They watched him in the morning from the trees near his door, and followed him to his work. New birds joined the company daily, and they all acted as if he had no other intent in raking the ground than to find them a breakfast. As the number increased, he began to carry crusts of bread in the great outside pocket of his coat, and to sprinkle a few crumbs for them on the ground. When his walks were finished, and he used the spade and rake less frequently, the birds looked for their daily rations of crumbs; and would gather in the tree-tops in the morning and let him know with their begging voices, that they were waiting for him.

"He called them to breakfast with a whistle, and they would come out of their thick, green leaves of the grove, and patter, twitter and flutter around and over his feet. Sometimes he would put a piece of bread between his lips, when a bright-eyed little thing would pick it out like a humming-bird taking honey from a deep flower-bell, without alighting. They became his constant companions. As soon as he stepped from his door, they were on the lookout to give him a merry welcome with their happy voices. They have come to know the sound of his step, his walks and recreations. Often, when leaning upon his hoe or rake, one of them will alight upon the head of it and turn up a bright eye at his face. Even before he gave up the practice of shooting birds of another feather, one would sometimes hop upon the gilt guard of the lock, and peer around upon the brass trigger with a look of wonder which he interpreted aright, and left off killing birds susceptible of the same training.

"He leaves his chamber window open at night, and when he awakes early in the morning he often finds a robin or goldfinch hopping about on the bed-posts, or on the back of a chair close by, trying to say or sing in the best articulation of its speech: "It is time to get up; come and see the flowers; a dew of pearls is on their leaves, and the sun is above the sea."—Selected.

GARIBALDI.

Now that events are transpiring in Southern Europe, upon which we who have faith in the near approach of the Saviour's advent look with deep interest as fulfilments of important prophecies, our readers may not be uninterested in a brief sketch of the history and experience of him who leads in the strife for freedom; who is one of the most prominent actors in those great political changes that are now being wrought in that locality. Though always a plain, unpretending man, he has developed a character by the power of which he makes thrones tremble.

Giuseppe Garibaldi was born in Nice, July 4, 1806. "In boyhood he was remarkable for his affection toward his parents and his sincerity to his companions." It is said that when a mere boy, at the risk of his own life, he saved from drowning a poor washerwoman, and in after life he performed similar deeds on several occasions. He was educated to the profession of mariner, in which capacity he visited Rome and received such impressions respecting the condition of that city as, it is claimed, led him into those revolutionary views which, in February, 1834, resulted in his exile from Italy. Driven from his native land, he went to Marseilles, whence he made several voyages, upon one of which, being sick, he was left at Constantinople, where he became a teacher till he could find an opportunity to re-embark. This he soon after succeeded in doing, and returned to Marseilles. Here he shortly after set sail for Tunis, and thence to Rio Janeiro. At Rio, in company with another, he engaged in commercial pursuits, but soon found that neither himself nor his partner was fitted for a merchant. About this time he was persuaded to espouse the cause of Uruguay, then fighting for her independence. With 20 men under his command, he embarked in a small craft which he named the Mazzini. "In an engagement with two launches, which he beat off, he received a gunshot wound in the neck which nearly proved fatal. He landed at Gualaguay on neutral soil, where he was treated with some outward respect and consideration; but he soon discovered that he was to a certain extent a prisoner, being prohibited from moving more than a short distance from the city. He endeavored to escape, but being betrayed by his guide and retaken, he was brought back bound hand and foot, and was tortured nearly to death with the view of extorting from him the names of those who had favored his flight. Two months later he contrived to reach Montevideo, where he joined a land expedition under Bento Gonzales, in which he distinguished himself. Until the termination of the war he was employed in the service of the republic, chiefly at sea, though sometimes on land." After the war he returned to Montevideo and taught mathematics till Rosas the dictator of Buenos Ayres declared war against the republic. This war commenced disastrously. "The city itself was besieged; many were seized with panic; the minister of war robbed the treasury and fled, and public affairs seemed to be on the brink of ruin. Garibaldi organized a flotilla, recommended the formation of an Italian legion (the command of which was conferred on Anzania) and though especially charged with the defence by sea, he frequently fought with and commanded the Italian legion. Montevideo was saved." During the Uruguayan war Garibaldi married a "South American woman of extraordinary energy and devotion," who at once became the companion of all his hardships and dangers. In the Spring of 1848, a year memorable in Italy, he, with a portion of the Italian legion, sailed from South America and on arriving in Piedmont placed himself at the disposal of Charles Albert then king of Sardinia and the champion of Italian independence, but met with a cool reception. Soon after, the king being defeated, Garibaldi with a few resolute republicans prolonged the resistance until forced across the frontier by the Austrians in greatly superior numbers. He now returned to Nice and spent some time with his mother, wife, and children; but his repose was short. The Pope having fled, "the new executive gave to Garibaldi a command, sending him to watch the Neapolitan frontier, near Rieti, in which situation he remained till the Spring of 1849, when the first act of Avezzana, the new minister of war, was to call Garibaldi to Rome and adequately arm and provide for his men. The French expedition to restore the Pope having appeared before Rome on April 30 (8,000 infantry, 2 squadrons of cavalry, and 12 guns), Garabaldi was, with 1,200 men, posted in some villas outside the gates. Notwithstanding the disparity of numbers, he attacked the right wing of the French, when Avezzana, who commanded in chief, seeing from the city wall the peril of the Italians, dispatched 1,500 men to his succor; whereupon Garibaldi charged the French so vigorously with the bayonet as completely to break them, pursued them several miles and returned with 300 prisoners. The Neapolitans now threatened Rome, and these were twice beaten by Garibaldi, at Palestrina and Velletri. The French, strongly re-enforced, having on June 30 gained a footing inside the wall, the republican triumvirate abdicated." Although the situation was now discouraging indeed, Garibaldi was still hopeful and resolved to continue the struggle. It was at this time that he issued his proclamation in which occurred the language quoted in our remarks upon the encyclical letter of the Pope. "Garibaldi left Rome to try to penetrate to Venice with about 4,000 men, of whom 800 were mounted, and, marching by Tivoli to Terni, met the second Italian legion, which was waiting him. Thence he took to the left to await an Austrian corps, but lost many men at Orvieto by a French column. The population was favorable, but being disheartened remained passive; the enemy, in immensely superior numbers, was fearful and over cautious, and never accepted a general engagement. Garibaldi displayed a wonderful talent in advantageously posting his men at every halt (never in a city), and in so adroitly manœuvering as to extricate himself and leave his enemy behind him every time he appeared to be surrounded. At St. Angelo in Vado some detachments in the city were cut off, which was the only serious loss he sustained. On July 30 he reached San Marino, his force being reduced to 1,800 men, and there found in his front a fresh Austrian army in addition to the 13,000 pressing on his rear. Terms were now offered to the effect that there should be a general amnesty and all should return home, the arms being surrendered to the republic of San Marino. Such conditions would have been accepted had a few French belonging to the second legion been permitted to return to Switzerland; but as it was insisted that they should be sent to Rome, where the French might maltreat them, the offer of the Austrians was rejected without hesitation, and at night about half the forces (the rest chose to surrender) made their way toward Cesena; and though vigorously pursued the remnant embarked for Cesenatico in some fishing boats on August 2d. Making their way toward Venice (then besieged) with the intention of eluding the blockading squadron, the little band was toward nightfall descried by the Austrian fleet in the Adriatic, and the small craft of the patriots were scatered during the night, some captured, and others run ashore. In the boat with Garibaldi were his wife and a few of the most compromised, who gained the shore and dispersed in twos and threes to avoid the vigilance of the pursuit. Two days later Anna Garibaldi, who refused to leave her husband, being worn out by fatigue, died, leaving Garibaldi oppressed with grief. In this state of utter wretchedness, with nothing but his indomitable courage to sustain him, he made his way from the east to the west coast of Italy, while the punishment of death was decreed for whosoever gave him bread, water, or shelter. From Tuscany he embarked for Spezia, and at Chiavari in the States of Sardinia, he was arrested and conducted to Genoa.

Banished from the States of Sardinia, he arrived at New York in the Summer of 1850, declined the public reception offered him, and earned a living by making candles in a manufactory on Staten Island till an opportunity occurred of resuming the occupation of mariner. About three years later, having lost his mother, to whom he had confided the care of his three children, he accepted the invitation to return to Nice, where he lived in retirement. In the beginning of 1859, on the breaking out of the war with Austria, he was invited by the Sardinian government to form a corps since celebrated as the "Hunters of the Alps." Detached from the rest of the army, he crossed over on its extreme left into northern Lombardy, with a comparatively small force, beat several Austrian detachments, entered, the foremost of the allies, Varese, Lugano, Como, Bergamo, and Brescia, and rendered the most important services to the Italian cause throughout the war." His history from the close of the Austrian war down to the present time must be fresh in the minds of all.

These Italian patriots, actuated by principles of republicanism, a form of government the best probably, that will or can be attained until the everlasting kingdom is established, are wholly unconscious of the position they occupy as instruments in the hands of God for the fulfilment of prophecy, but let the wise, abating no effort to spread far and wide the blessed, sanctifying truth of revelation, keep faithful watch, for "in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh." L. C. T.

WATCHFULNESS.

JESUS said, What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch. The question would naturally arise, For what are we to watch, and why? The subject on which Jesus was discoursing, with its connection, plainly reveals that his second coming, with the scenes that would foreshadow that event, was the subject for which he required special watchfulness, as they knew not when the time was.

Can it be a matter of small moment, as many affirm, whether such a fact is revealed or no? A fact which prophets desired to look into, and searched diligently what manner of time the spirit that was in them did signify, when it testified of the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow. The suffering is a matter of history: the glory is yet future, when he shall come to be admired in all them that believe; the most stupendous event this world ever witnessed, and the most glorious to his waiting bride, who has long been sighing for his return, looking for it with intense desire, more than they who watch for the morning, as it were, hasting unto the blissful time when we shall see him face to face. Can such esteem it a matter of small moment whether his expected return be attested by infallible witnesses, and the time for its completion near at hand?

The lover of Jesus will, I think, rejoice at every token of his approach, and with John, in the Apocalyptic vision, respond when Jesus said, "I come quickly"—"Even so, come Lord Jesus."

Why watch? We can see the necessity in the case of his disciples while he was yet with them. Who would have thought that confident Peter would have denied his Lord? or, the beloved John have forsaken him and fled? Yet such is human weakness, and Jesus, who knew what was in man, knew well how terrified they would be. He said repeatedly, in that eventful night of agony, Watch, that ye enter not into temptation. And finding them regardless of his warning—Sleep on now. Had they heeded the warning of Jesus, would Peter have wept so bitterly? and as history relates, ever after wept when reminded of his guilt by the cock crowing.

Jesus, looking through the vista of time, commands all to Watch. At this period, how important the injunction. Jesus then saw full well its necessity, as he made the inquiry, When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth? He saw the giddy whirl of pleasure seeking, like the fatal sirocco sweeping over the earth as science unveiled the inexhaustable stores of wealth, forgetting that the gold and silver are the Lord's, as well as the cattle upon a thousand hills. He beheld the strife for power, the political agitations that would convulse the world, as the great revolution drew near; and that his people would be in danger of thinking their Lord was delaying his coming and they could safely and inocently mingle in speculation's mart. The plausible excuse, the ability to do more good. To such the warning is timely; for we know not when the Son of man cometh; lest coming suddenly, he find us sleeping or encumbered with the cares of this life.

At this period, there are, I think, reasons for watching, that were applicable to no other period of time. The waiting ones are branded as fanatics, and often meet the inquiry, What difference does it make whether we die, as we all shortly must, and go to him or he come to us? In my view there is a vast difference: In the first place, I find no intimation in the volume of truth that we are to go to him; but in connection with preparing a place, he promises to come for his own. The Jewish high priest, who was a type of Jesus, entered the holy place, alone, and came out and blessed the people. So Jesus has entered the holiest of all, with his own blood, and will come to bless those who are looking for him.

In the second place, Jesus must come to raise the dead ere the Christian can triumph, and the shout of victory be heard from the now silent mansions of the dead, and corruption be clothed with incorruption; mortal with immortality. To me it is another gospel, another plan altogether. Yet how subtle, how well calculated to beget indifference. Like begets like. While all about us seem confident and secure, how firm our faith in Jesus' words need be to watch for his coming. How manifest the care of the loving Jesus for the best interests of his people, down to the end of time. Can we for a moment forget it? Will the syren cry of "Peace and safety," lull us to sleep, and Jesus' timely warning be forgotten? Encumbered with the dross of of earth, will the thrilling announcement, the bridegroom cometh, startle us from our slumber for an unsuccessful effort to go with him to the marriage feast?

My much loved friends, let the world call me fanatic, enthusiast, heretic, or what they please; but oh, reckon me not among the number who say, My Lord delayeth his coming; or, those who esteem it of no consequence. Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, and every power be paralized when I forget or indifferently regard the cheering promise of my Lord's return and cease to stir up the pure minds of others by way of remembrance. May your unworthy correspondent, with all she can influence, meet the approval of "well done." LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

TOBACCO LOVERS BEWARE.

"A PROMINENT Paris physician says that the practice of smoking half a dozen cigars daily will take five years from the life of any man."

Aye; and we should not wonder if, in most cases, it "will take" eternal "life" away along with the "five years" of this "life." When will men abandon the filthy, and offensive practice of chewing and smoking a weed which only two animals beside themselves will eat, viz: "the tobacco worm, and the filthy wild goat of Africa." The practice is "evil, and only evil, and that continually." We almost suffer a living martyrdom in this filthy city by the fumes of this vile weed. We can hardly draw a breath, away from home, without being compelled to take in some of this "filthy, wild goat" effluvia. We are obliged to dodge, turn, and sometimes run, to get out of the way of it. Alas! we see no hope of being delivered from the nuisance till "the kingdom comes," into which nothing that "defileth" shall be permitted to enter. May that time soon arrive.

THE LOVING BRIDE.—How the true bride longs for the return of her absent companion. And how earnest also is his desire to be restored to the society of the woman he has chosen above all others for his life-long associate. Just in proportion as they are truly one (as God designed husband and wife should be) will any separation prove unwelcome: and when separation is necessary, the time of reunion is not alone looked for; no, a stronger word is needed: it is longed for with all the intensity of fervent love.

O Bride of Christ! Art thou longing for thy husband's return? Art thou even looking for it? Hast thou made thyself ready? There is cause to fear that there is a professed Bride of Christ, that loves not his appearing, nor desires to hear it spoken of as near. Her heart seems bent on "preparing a place" for the Bridegroom and not allowing him to return until it is prepared, rather than receiving him speedily, with the inheritance prepared by himself. Oh! for more of the true Bride's spirit, which says, "Come, and come quickly! Amen!"—Voice of the West.

A TREACHEROUS HIGHWAY.—Once let the people get poisoned with the wretched falsehood that, in order to carry on the work of the church and meet its costs, they must contrive some roundabout device of sale, or fair, or pic-nic—a mixture of merchandise, cajolery, and merry making, by which the few shall be deluded into parting with more than they want to give, and the many shall be educated into the worse delusion of supposing that they are not to surrender anything unto the Christ that died for them without an ostensible equivalent taken back, and you strike at the root of all Christian charity, while the name is on your lips. You cast up a treacherous highway for the Lord's feet. You hide out of sight the central reality of sacrifice, which is the giving up to God of that which cost the selfish heart something. You eat out the heart of the church to extend its outward prosperity. No scheme to endeavor to carry up missionary zeal will bear inspection which interposes a worldly, or self-seeking, or ambitious motive between the soul and the Saviour. —Dr. Huntingdon.

WHAT LUTHER LOVED.—Luther, when studying, always had his dog lying at his feet—a dog he had brought from Wartburg, and of which he was very fond. An ivory crucifix stood at the table before him. He worked at his desk for days together, without going out; but when fatigued, and the ideas began to stagnate, he took his guitar with him to the porch; and there executed some musical fantasy (for he was a skilful musician), when the ideas would flow upon him as fresh as flowers after a summer's rain. Music was his invariable solace at such times. Indeed, Luther did not hesitate to say that, after theology, music was the first of arts. "Music," said he, "is the art of the prophets; it is the only other art which, like theology, can calm the agitation of the soul, and put the devil to flight." Next to music, if not before it, Luther loved children and flowers. That great, gnarled man had a heart as tender as a woman's.

ROTHSCHILD AND THE SEXTON.—The Jews have a saying that as Solomon was king of all the Jews, so Rothschild is the Jew of all kings. Rothschild, who recently visited Berlin, went to see the new, magnificent temple of the Israelites. The sexton, who did not know the visitor, but, as he was well dressed, expected a good "bakshish" for his services, showed him the building in all its details. On leaving the synagogue, Mr. Rothschild remarked to his guide, "It is a most beautiful and costly structure; I guess it must have cost about two hundred thousand thalers." "Oh," said the sexton, "I wish you had in your possession what the building cost over that amount, then you would be a rich man." Rothschild smiled, thanked the man for his good wish, and gave him a rich consideration for his services.

DAZZLING ARGUMENT.—"You teach," said the Empuror Trajan to Rabbi Joshua, "that your God is everywhere, and boast that he resides among your nation. I should like to see him." "God's presence is indeed everywhere," replied Joshua, "but cannot be seen; no mortal eye can behold his glory." The emperor insisted. "Well," said Joshua, "suppose we try first to look at one of his ambassadors?" The emperor consented. The rabbi took him into the open air at noonday, and bade him look at the sun in its meridian splendor. "I cannot," said Trajan; "the sight dazzles me." "Thou art unable," said Joshua, "to endure the light of one of his creatures, and canst thou expect to behold the resplendent glory of the Creator? Would not such a sight annihilate thee?"

SNAPPING AT A SCOLD.—A good woman had a bad neighbor who used to visit her for the purpose of getting up a quarrel. To get rid of her she resorted to a novel method. When the first hard word dropped the scold's lips, she looked at the fire, snapped the tongs and made no reply. The scold poured out a volley of abuse. The good woman snapped the tongs again. Another volley. Another snap. "Won't you speak?" said the scold. Snap went the tongs. "Speak!" said the scold. Snap. "Do speak or I shall burst," said the scold, and away she went, cured by the silent snapping of the tongs.

Moral.—It takes two talkers to make a quarrel.

HOW TO GET RID OF RATS.—It has been discovered that rats can be got rid of by covering the floor near the rat-hole with a thin layer of moist caustic potash; when the rats walk on this it makes their feet sore; these they lick with their tongues; it makes their mouths sore; and the result is, that they shun the locality not alone, but appear to tell all the neighboring rats about it, and eventually the house is abandoned by them, notwithstanding the neighborhood may be teeming with rats.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1843. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind —willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST. D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this; Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

This work has been out of print for some months, but is now re-printed.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage, 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.
